Until 1952, the monarch possessed extensive ruling powers, and governed with the help of his security forces. Until 1950, the judiciary largely retained its Ottoman stamp, using Ottoman commercial, civil, and penal codes. Since then, new codes have been promulgated and have come into use. There are now civil, religious, and special courts, in addition to a Special Council (Dīwān K̲h̲āṣṣ) which interprets laws.

While the new 1952 Constitution granted greater powers to the Cabinet and the Legislature, and thus curtailed those of the throne, there was, as a result of the incorporation of Central Palestine into the kingdom, a greater centralization of the administrative functions, and a rapid increase in the number of public officials. This was largely due to the large refugee population that came in with this incorporation, and all the new social and economic problems which it brought. Another consequence was that the membership of the cabinet expanded with the transformation of governmental functions. The need for social legislation and economic planning for development led to the organization of such official agencies as the Development Board, the Aqaba Port Authority, the Developmert Bank, and the Bank of Reconstruction.

The administrative division of the country now (1966) comprises eight provinces (liwāʾ), each administered by a governor appointed by the central government. These are in turn subdivided into districts administered by a ḳāʾim-maḳām or district officier, and into *nāḥiya*s of villages headed by a mudīr. Moreover, towns and cities usually have elected mayors and municipal councils. The districts have administrative councils.

In both Egypt and the countries of the Fertile Crescent a major feature of government has been the centralization of administration and the rapid transformation and expansion of government functions which has accompanied the greater need for public and welfare services.

Except for Lebanon, where a pluralist system permits the resolution of conflict through a compromise based on the delicate balancing of sectarian-communal interests, government in Egypt, Iraq, Syria, and even Jordan, is highly centralized and ultimately dominated by the military. Whereas in Lebanon one observes a public preference for as little government as possible, this is not true of the other countries of the Fertile Crescent and Egypt. In all of these, to a greater or lesser extent, government is viewed as an agency of change and development, and one which must provide social services and economic benefits. Moreover, in Egypt, Iraq and Syria, government tends towards personal, authoritarian rule. Thus the constitutional provisions in these countries do not reflect accurately the ways of government and administration. Executive power seems to predominate over legislative assemblies wherever and whenever they exist. In the latter, there has lately developed the preference, especially in Egypt, for corporate (or occupational) representation. There is consequently no relation between the life of a cabinet or a government (especially today under presidential systems) and that of a legislature in these countries. In other words, executive power is hardly bound by the strictures of an elected legislative body so long as this power has the support of the army.

Neither in Syria nor in Iraq—and only to a slight degree in Lebanon—has government completely eroded sectarian, tribal, and parochial loyalties. With the exception perhaps of Lebanon, governments in these countries (Jordan being included for a different reason, namely the Palestine Question) continue to depend rather on coercion than on persuasion for governmental action. The central rôle played by force in the government of these countries is perhaps reflected again in the rule of the state by the military; and failing that, in the mixture of military and civilian elements in their administrations.

Because of their social composition and ethnic and religious diversity, the principal function of government in Iraq and Jordan was, for many years, the imposition of public order and security; in other words, the major task of the central government was to ensure that its authority was widely recognized and accepted by all groups within the state. This was necessary also in order to achieve the more systematic collection of taxes, to provide the revenue essential for the development of agriculture and the execution of public works.

In Syria and Iraq especially, recent political instability, as reflected in coups, counter-coups and purges, has caused the work of their permanent administrative cadres to suffer greatly. A worse consequence has been the resultant public mistrust and suspicion of all administration, which in turn makes the work of any government more difficult.

All the countries considered here have experienced some form of British or French tutelage, which has affected their governmental structures and procedures, especially in the judiciary, in provincial administration, and in the administration of public education. Their real independence is so recent that one may assume that they are undergoing a period of transition. Yet the difference between government in these countries now and in the past is that, in addition to maintaining law and order, it has assumed new and wider functions of planning and, in certain instances, managing the national economy, as well as providing extensive social welfare to the populace.

A more recent development in some of these countries seems destined to lead to ever greater centralization of power and hence to stronger administrative regulation and control; this is the phenomenon of the single-party state political organizations such as the Arab Socialist Union in Egypt and the Iraqi Arab Socialist Union in Iraq. Thus, state control is not exercised only through the government and administration, but also through its mass political organization, which has no competitors since the latter are precluded by law from at least public existence.

iv. — North Africa

The use in the Magh̲rib of the word ḥukūma, with the meaning of "government", seems to have occurred only at a very recent date. According to an unpublished investigation by Father Demeerseman it is not found in the works of Tunisian writers until the second half of the 19th century, and then only rarely and in the restricted sense of a dependent government or a more or less autonomous province of a large state. It is only under Western influence that the term has acquired its meaning of government in the abstract. It is therefore another example of a strictly Arabic term which has gradually absorbed a Western concept.

Before the three countries of the Magh̲rib had come under European domination, local rulers had made frequent attempts to introduce some modern methods into the administration.

To begin with, in Algeria, the amīr ʿAbd al-Ḳādir [q.v.] attempted to organize a Muslim state against the French authority and especially to provide it with sufficient military strength to enable it if necessary to fight against the French troops. But circumstances obliged ʿAbd al-Ḳādir to devote his main attention to war and, from 1840, the action of Bugeaud forced him to be content with a nomad government which had of necessity to eschew all modern ideas.

In Tunisia, the first signs of modernism were due to the influence of the French who had settled in Algeria, and appeared during the reign of Aḥmad Bey (1837-55 [q.v.]). There also the reforms began in military matters, with the formation of an army and of a fleet which was to be based at Porto-Farina. But there very soon arose financial difficulties and Aḥmad Bey turned to financial and monetary reforms.

Aḥmad Bey's successor, Maḥammad Bey (1855-9), was forced by circumstances and by the pressure of several European consuls to introduce far more sweeping reforms. After instituting the S̲harʿī Court to deal with questions of the law of inheritance and of landed property in 1856, he solemnly promulgated on 10 September 1857, an act entitled in Arabic ʿahd al-amān and in French Pacte fondamental [see dustūr, 638b]. In the following year there was set up in Tunis a municipal government consisting of prominent citizens.

It was Maḥammad Bey's successor, his brother Muḥammad al-Ṣadūk, who promulgated on 26 April 1861, after having consulted Napoleon III at Algiers in the previous year, a series of legislative measures which might be regarded as a constitution. Its rules concerning the succession to the throne remained unchanged until 1957. A ministry was formed, responsible to the Bey; a supreme council of 60 members appointed by the Bey and the government shared the responsibility for the development of the legal system and for voting the state budget; the independence of the judiciary was proclaimed. These reforms were introduced before public opinion in Tunisia, even among the ruling classes, was prepared for them. And since, in addition, the financial situation led to taxes being raised, in 1864 a section of the population rose in revolt. After this the 1861 constitution was suspended, in fact if not in law.

The last Tunisian to introduce reforms before the establishment of the French protectorate was the general Khayr al-Dīn [q.v.], who held the office of minister on several occasions, and notably that of Prime Minister from 1873-77. The belief in the need for reform was a result not of circumstances but of his own conviction as is proved by his book: Akwām al-masālik fī maʿrifat aḥwāl al-mamālik (Tunis 1867). Once he was in power, he made great efforts to introduce his programme of modernization by European methods but within a completely Muslim framework. After four years the manifold intrigues which surrounded him and the inability of public opinion in Tunisia to understand his aims led him to abandon his efforts. After this, the financial collapse of the country, European intrigues, and the incompetence or the doubtful honesty of the new Tunisian rulers merely aggravated the crisis, which ended in the formation of the French protectorate.

The development in Morocco followed a similar pattern, though at a later date. It was not until the middle of the 19th century that Morocco came into closer contact with Europe, through a brief war with France (August 1844), the commercial treaty of 1856 with Great Britain and the Spanish-Moroccan war of 1859-60.

The sultan ruling in 1860, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (1859-73), realized that henceforward the state of Morocco could not remain as it was. Already in his father's lifetime he had attempted to introduce some reforms in the Moroccan army. When he became sultan, he tried to lead the country towards a modern economy and to curb the corrupt practices of some of the officials by paying them salaries. But his task was made very difficult by European intrigues and the Moroccans' failure to understand his aims; and the agricultural crisis of 1867-9 forced him to renounce his attempts.

His son al-Ḥasan (1873-94 [q.v.]), also aware of the need to transform the Moroccan state, decided, on his accession, to resume his father's economic and military projects: it was he who brought to Morocco European instructors for his army. However his reforms, limited in scope, perpetually hindered by European rivalries and weakened by the financial crisis which began to be apparent in Morocco in the last quarter of the 19th century, only succeeded in irritating Moroccan public opinion, not only in the towns but even among the dissident tribes. All that remained were a few fortifications on the coast, a few batteries of field artillery and much ill-feeling.

When his son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (1894-1908 [q.v.]) came to the throne, the situation was not favourable for reform: Morocco was retreating more than it was advancing. Until the death of his vizier and mentor Aḥmad b. Mūsā, the new sultan scarcely exercised any power, but once he found himself alone (May 1900), he wished to introduce reforms, partly because of the situation in Morocco but also because of his own modernist outlook. He brought a quantity of machines and equipment in Europe, intending to build a railway to Fez, but chiefly he envisaged a reform of the Moroccan finances by decreeing that all taxpayers were equally liable to pay land-tax (tartīb). The violent reactions of the Moroccan tribes and the exacerbated rivalry of several of the European powers plunged Morocco into such disturbances that in 1908 ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was forced to abdicate without his attempts at reform having produced any result.

Before he had relinquished power, his elder brother ʿAbd al-Ḥafīẓ (1907-12 [q.v.]) was proclaimed sultan at Marrākush in order to resist European encroachment, and he finally mounted the throne in 1908. But he was confronted by a financial crisis, tribes who were in an excitable state and ready to revolt, and European powers with heightened ambitions in Morocco. Like his predecessors, he acknowledged the need for the reforms which he was being urged to make by a number of Moroccans, who saw in them the only means of escaping from the hold of the European powers. One of these groups, based in Tangier and reinforced by Syrians expelled from Tunisia, went so far as to draw up a draft constitution, dated 11 October 1908 and published in a Tangier Arabic journal, Ṣawt al-Maghrib (French translation of it published by J. Robert, in La monarchie marocaine, Paris 1963, 311-23). This constitution was not adopted by the Moroccan government and the failure of various successive plans for reform led to the signing of the treaty of protectorate on 30 March 1912 at Fez by the sultan and M. Regnault, as representative of France.

Thus it can be seen that the attempts of the rulers in the 19th century to modernize the government of their respective countries were in vain because local opinion was completely unprepared for these changes, which it believed (not without some reason) to be a result of European influence, which it mistrusted, and because no ruler was strong enough over a sufficiently long period to impose a new system of government.

The European occupation of North Africa, mainly French, resulted in considerable changes in the organization of the governments there.

In Algeria, after an inevitable long period of trial and error, the government of the Republic, by the decree of 9 December 1848, divided the country into three departments under the direction, as in France, of prefects; before this the French citizens resident in Algeria had been given the right to send deputies to the National Assembly. It can be said that, as from 1848, in spite of various vicissitudes of no great importance, the administrative assimilation was recognized as an accomplished fact.

All the same, because the administration of the native population presented its own problems, a special régime was introduced in Algeria. At first there was formed at an early date a real government of Algeria, consisting of a governor-general to whom were responsible for most of the time the various public services established locally. The office of governor-general was suppressed and replaced, from 24 June 1858 to 10 December 1860, by a minister for Algeria based in Paris. Then the government of the Third Republic, while restoring the governor-general, made the various officials serving in Algeria directly responsible to their ministry in Paris. This experiment lasted until 31 December 1896, but proved so unsuccessful that the earlier system was restored. In both cases it had been apparent that over-centralization did not produce good results and that Algeria ought to be governed from within the country, under the authority of the French government and the control of the French parliament.

In fact it had been realized from the very first years after the conquest that the French administration could not be applied without modification, since the customs, the reactions and the innermost beliefs of the Muslim population differed so greatly from those existing in France. Thus, in spite of the prefects, the laws and regulations and all the French institutions which were transplanted into Algeria, there existed always two systems of government, because the one country contained two entirely different populations without enough in common for a unification to be considered. This system began with the Arab bureaus, a military organization responsible for the administration of the Muslim populations, and ended in the statute of 20 September 1947 instituting in Algeria two electoral colleges: one for the Europeans and one for the Muslims, very unequal in number and in composition, however, since Muslim women were not given the vote until 1958.

The staff of the governor-general's office and of the administrative departments under it were usually of French nationality, and it was not until after the Second World War that Muslim Algerians began to occupy a few posts of responsibility in them. Thus the administration of Algeria during the French period was a hybrid one in which the metropolitan French and the French of Algeria played a preponderant rôle, while the Algerians themselves were reduced to a completely secondary position, in spite of their claims, and especially from 1936 onwards.

In Tunisia, the convention of Ḳaṣr Saʿid, known as that of Bardo, of 12 May 1881, established a provisional French occupation which the convention signed at La Marsa on 8 June 1883 converted into a French protectorate. The Tunisian government and its administration still continued to exist, but the French Resident-General and his staff had the authority to control them and to establish alongside them modern technical administrative departments (of finance, public works, education, public health, etc.) in order to introduce in Tunisia the reforms envisaged by the convention of La Marsa.

Thus until the conventions of 3 June 1955, which established in Tunisia a régime of internal autonomy, two administrations existed side by side: a Tunisian administration working under the authority of the Bey and directed by Tunisian ministers, who were themselves under the control of French officials, and a modern administrative system, working in theory under the Bey's authority, but in fact acting under that of the Resident-General and of the Secretary-General of the government of Tunisia, who was always a Frenchman. It was not until 3 June 1955 that the Tunisian government regained its autonomy. It must be added that the technical administrative departments were at first staffed almost entirely by Frenchmen, since at that time very few Tunisians had received a modern education, and that they showed a marked tendency to remain mainly French, to apply French norms and to recognize in fact the authority only of the Resident-General and the French government. The result was that, in spite of official statements, the protectorate quickly turned into a direct administration.

In Morocco, there were two elements at least which favoured a strict application of the formula for a protectorate: the international situation and the personality of Lyautey. France in fact had succeeded in establishing its protectorate over Morocco only by accepting serious international mortgages and by agreeing that a part of Moroccan territory should be under Spanish protection. The majority of the signatories of the Act of Algeciras (7 April 1906) were not disposed to allow the protecting power to infringe any of the rights which this international conference had recognized as theirs. It is true that the First World War caused some of them, such as Germany and Austria-Hungary, to disappear, and that the U.S.S.R. did not continue the claims of Imperial Russia in this matter. But enough fairly vigilant signatories remained to ensure that France felt herself bound to the agreement, in relation not only to them, but also to Morocco. Lyautey, for his part, had a profound belief in the formula of the protectorate, having studied it in other territories and found it more flexible than the colonial system pure and simple, and also because he had for Morocco a high esteem and respect and wished to revive the country but not destroy it.

The treaty of protectorate of 30 March 1912 therefore in principle left the governmental and administrative framework of Morocco intact, while bringing it under the control of the authorities of the protectorate. The respect which Lyautey and his staff unfailingly showed to the Sultan and his Moroccan entourage proved with what sincerity this system was applied. Nevertheless, to an even greater extent than in Tunisia, because the Moroccan ruling classes were much less prepared for modern and western ideas, the French were obliged to begin to create technical departments, of necessity staffed by Frenchmen, so that the process already observed in Tunisia was repeated exactly in Morocco, where there gradually grew up a kind of French administrative "feudal system" beside the Moroccan officials and those they governed. In their plan for reforms in 1934, the Moroccan nationalists, at this date a young movement, demanded entry to the technical administrative departments for Moroccans and a strict limitation of the number of French officials, who should abandon any idea of direct administration, their rôle being limited to the supervision of the Moroccan agents and the performance of purely technical duties. This claim was unsuccessful, and the direct administration continued to be one of the main subjects of the propaganda of the Moroccan nationalist movement. The situation remained unchanged until the Franco-Moroccan declaration signed at La Celle Saint-Cloud on 6 November 1955, which announced "negotiations destined to render Morocco an independent state united to France by the permanent links of an interdependence freely agreed to and defined". Independence was proclaimed on 2 March 1956.

The present situation (December 1966). In accordance with the constitution of 30 July 1959, the Republic of Tunisia now has a presidential government. President al-Ḥabīb Abū Ruḳayba (Bourguiba), who was elected in November 1959, was re-elected for a second term on 8 November 1964 by an almost unanimous vote. In a decree of 12 November 1964 he appointed the members of his government, who are responsible to him: thirteen secretaries of state, three under-secretaries of state, and two directors, one of the broadcasting service, the other of the presidential cabinet. The functions and personnel of this ministry have remained unchanged, except for the death of the Secretary of State for Internal Affairs, who was immediately replaced.

In Morocco there were six successive ministerial cabinets between 4 December 1955 and the promulgation of the constitution of 7 December 1962, the last two of them presided over by the kings Muḥammad V (26 May 1960) and Ḥasan II (2 June 1961). Once the institutions provided for by the constitution were established, King Ḥasan II appointed as Prime Minister Mr. Aḥmad Baḥnīnī, who formed a cabinet composed of fourteen ministers and five under-secretaries of state. After a re-organization of ministerial posts in 20 August 1964, a new government was formed on 8 June 1965 under the presidency of the king and its composition was slightly altered on 10 July. These arrangements were made after the king had decided, on 7 June, to proclaim a state of emergency as provided for by article 35 of the constitution of 1962. The present government (December 1966) is composed of twenty ministers, three directors of the royal cabinet and two under-secretaries of state. It is responsible only to the king, parliament having been suspended for an indefinite period.

In Algeria, after the confused political crisis which followed the granting of independence, the Assembly elected on 20 September 1962 instructed Mr. Aḥmad Ben Bella to form the Algerian government and to hold the office of Head of the Algerian State until a constitution should be worked out and promulgated. This government consisted of a vice-president and seventeen ministers. After the vote on the Algerian constitution, which took place on 28 August 1963, then its approval by the referendum of 8 September, and finally the election of Mr. Aḥmad Ben Bella on 15 September as President of the Republic, a legal government was immediately formed by the President on 18 September. In addition to the President of the Republic, who assumed also the title of President of the Council, it consisted of three vice-presidents, one of whom held a ministerial portfolio, and twelve ministers. A reorganization which took place on 2 December 1964 left only two vice-presidents, one of whom held a portfolio, but increased the number of ministers from twelve to fifteen plus a secretary of state. Following the coup d'état of 19 June 1965 in which Mr. Aḥmad Ben Bella was removed from office in favour of Colonel Houari Boumedienne (Hawwārī Abū Madyan), the latter formed, on 10 July, a government with himself as president and consisting of nineteen ministers.

In the constitutional decree it was laid down that the head of the government, the President of the Council, assumed in addition the office of Minister of National Defence; that the government functioned under the authority and control of the Council of the Revolution which had carried out the coup d'état of 19 June; that this Council could effect a total or partial reorganization of a ministry "by means of an Order in Council"; that the members of the cabinet were individually responsible to the head of the government and collectively responsible to the Council of the Revolution and acted with powers delegated to them by this Council; and, finally, that all governmental measures would be promulgated in the form of an order or decree. This government has several times been partly reorganized following the resignation or the dismissal of a number of ministers.

v. — Pakistan

Before independence, the area which is now East Pakistan formed part of the province of Bengal. This was the earliest territory in India to come under British rule, and was divided into administrative districts of enormous size: for example, the population of Mymensingh District is larger than that of Switzerland. The Collector of the district was the principal official responsible for public order and the collection of taxes. A District Judge was the head of the judiciary. Away from district headquarters, the only representatives of the government were police officers. The Governor of Bengal was assisted by a Council, from which evolved a Legislative Council, out of which Ministers were selected from 1920 onward to take charge of the departments of the provincial government.

The area which is now West Pakistan had none of the uniformity of administration described above. There were three provinces—Punjab, Sind, and the North-West Frontier Province—divided up into administrative districts, which were on a much smaller scale than in Bengal. Because these provinces were the last to be added to British India, there was a frontier character about the administration. At first, all the functions of government in the district (including the judicial) were exercised by one British officer, the Deputy Commissioner, though later separate District Judges were appointed. The Deputy Commissioner was assisted by a strong corps of officials, stationed at the lesser centres of the district. However, only about half of the area now in West Pakistan was under direct British administration. There were also a number of princely states, the largest being Bahawalpur and Kalat together with Amb, Chitral, Dir, and Swat. These were recognised as having complete internal autonomy: Kalat was subdivided into dependent chiefdoms, among which Kharan was semi-independent. In addition, a large portion of the North-West Frontier Province, and a large part of Baluchistan (in which Kalat is situated) were treated as 'unadministered territory', in which the British law did not prevail. Here the tribes followed their own custom of long standing.

At the apex of the system, in charge of the whole of British India and in tutelary role over the princes, was the Governor-General. He was assisted in the central administration by an Executive Council. The Members of Council each had charge of one or more departments of government.

Before the period of British rule, the Muslims had predominated in the administrative system. Gradually, the British substituted English for Persian as the language of higher administration while at the lower levels Persian and Urdu were replaced by the vernacular languages, such as Bengali. Also, appointment increasingly depended upon a competition in an open examination in which Western subjects of knowledge were preferred to the classical, oriental subjects. In consequence, the traditional Muslim administrative families found themselves increasingly at a disadvantage. Their loss of administrative and judicial office was most striking in Bengal. In the old Bengal Presidency (which included Bihar and Orissa, as well as Bengal proper) the Muslims formed 31 per cent of the population, but by 1880 they held only 8.5% of the 'gazetted' (i.e., executive) posts. By contrast in Punjab, where Muslims formed 51% of the population they held 39% of the posts. However, the Muslims did succeed in retaining their position in some of the provinces. In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh (today called Uttar Pradesh, in the Indian Union) Muslims formed 13% of the population but held 45% of the gazetted posts. Throughout India, they retained 20% of gazetted posts: not much less than their proportion to the population of India. The heads of districts (Collectors and Deputy Commissioners) and all their superiors were drawn from the Indian Civil Service. This service was wholly British until 1853, when it was opened to competition under stringent conditions. A candidate from a reformist Hindu sect gained a place in 1864, and thereafter a small but steady stream of Hindus gained admission. The first Muslim was not appointed to the I.C.S. until 1885. By 1915, there were a total of 1,371 members of the I.C.S. Of these, 1,305 were British, 3 were Eurasian, 41 were Hindu, 6 were Parsi, 7 were Indian Christians and 9 were Muslim. However, during the last 25 years of British rule, the Muslims did succeed in securing more places in the I.C.S. At the time of independence there were about one hundred Muslim I.C.S. officers. Of these one-third belonged to Punjab, and the remainder came from areas which were to form the Indian Union. There were none belonging to East Bengal, where the standard of education was low.

In addition, Muslims had secured a fair proportion of places in other higher echelons of the public services, especially in the Audit and Accounts Service. Among members of this service, one (Chaudhri Muḥammad ʿAlī) was to become Prime Minister and another (G̲h̲ulām Muḥammad) the Governor General of Pakistan. From 1918, Indians became eligible for the officer cadre of the Indian Army, and Muslims also obtained a proportion of appointments and promotions commensurate with their total numbers, with a preponderance of officers from Punjab and the North-West Frontier Province.

After independence (1947), the élite character of the higher civil service was perpetuated. The I.C.S. was replaced by the C.S.P. (Civil Service of Pakistan). Recruitment is by a modified form of competition. The top 20% of places are filled by merit on the basis of open examination; the remaining 80% are allotted in equal numbers to the two 'wings': East and West Pakistan. By 1961, the C.S.P. numbered 357 officers (including 28 still under training). This service continued to supply the great majority of district officers and senior officials in departments and ministries.

The main task in government in the new state of Pakistan was to hold together the two wings, separated by over one thousand miles of Indian territory, and to bring East and West Pakistan into a reasonable balance. The administrative variety of West Pakistan complicated the problem. Gradually, the different elements were reduced to one. The princely rulers of Bahawalpur and Kalat were deprived of their powers. In 1955, the West Pakistan Act created one unit, or one province for the West wing, with its headquarters at Lahore. The tribal areas of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier, together with the little states of Amb, Dir, Chitral and Swat were excluded from the control of West Pakistan, as was Karachi, then the capital city. These remained directly under the central government.

The way was now open to producing a constitution for Pakistan. For the first nine years, the country continued to be governed under the Government of India Act of 1935, somewhat amended. This retained a Governor-General at the apex of the system with a large reserve of power in his hands. Ostensibly, the government was in the hands of a Prime Minister and Cabinet responsible to a national legislature, but actually power was largely exercised by the Governor-General (who, from 1951, was the former senior official, G̲h̲ulām Muḥammad, followed by another senior officer, Iskandar Mīrzā). Under these men, the administrators and the police officers virtually governed Pakistan.

The 1956 Constitution introduced a number of limitations upon the head of the state, who was now designated President. But political instability continued, and in 1958 the President declared an emergency and abolished the constitution. Iskandar Mīrzā's successor, General (later Field Marshal) Ayyūb K̲h̲ān further strengthened the position of the president, and under the 1962 constitution (Article 31) 'The executive authority of the Republic is vested in the President'.

In order to safeguard the armed forces, the constitution further provides (Article 238) that the Minister of Defence must be a person who has held the rank of Lieutenant-General, or its equivalent in the navy or air force. Otherwise, the President chooses his Council of Ministers without outside restriction. Ministers may participate in the proceedings of the National Assembly, but they are answerable to the President.

Shortly after the military revolution of 1958, the capital was moved from Karachi to Rawalpindi, pending the construction of a new capital, Islāmābād, nearby. The Ministry of External Affairs remained at Karachi; all other ministries moved to Rawalpindi. There are eleven ministries: Defence; External Affairs; Finance; Commerce; Home and Kashmir Affairs; Industries and Natural Resources; Communications; Education and Information; Law and Parliamentary Affairs; Agriculture and Works; Health, Labour and Social Welfare. Important agencies directly under the President include the National Planning Commission and the Bureau of National Reconstruction. The permanent official at the head of the department is termed Secretary to Government. The senior hierarchy is composed of Secretaries, Joint Secretaries, Deputy Secretaries and Under Secretaries. In 1956, all 19 Secretaries belonged to the West wing, together with 38 of the 41 Joint Secretaries and 123 of the 133 Deputy Secretaries.

Resentment at alleged dominance by the West Wing causes constant agitation for wider autonomy for East Pakistan. Certain concessions have been made. The railways have been transferred from central to provincial control. The two provinces are administered by Governors, appointed by the President. The governors may be civil servants, army officers, or political leaders. Each province has a Secretariat, composed of the Departments which are under provincial control, such as education, public health, and agriculture. The provinces are divided up into major administrative areas called Divisions under Commissioners: there are four Divisions in the East and twelve in the West wing. The principal administrative area remains the district, under the Deputy Commissioner or Collector. There are 17 districts in the East and 51 districts and political agencies in the West wing.

An innovation carried out by President Ayyūb Khān is the creation of a consultative system of administration for economic, social and political development with its base among the people. Councils, known as Basic Democracies, are elected by the people at the village level and in the wards of the towns. These Union Councils send up members to sub-district councils (Thana or Taḥṣīl Councils) and these in turn contribute to District Councils. At the lower levels, the representatives of the people (the Basic Democrats) predominate, but higher up the infusing of administrators and the technical services becomes stronger. Above these come Divisional and Provincial Councils in which one-third of the members are drawn from the Basic Democrats.

A description of government in Pakistan would be incomplete without some reference to the rôle of the armed forces in government. Although the air force is modern and powerful, the main element is the army, with its armoured division and six (or more) infantry divisions. The army has many times been required to restore public order when the civil administration has lost control, while in times of public disaster (such as the cyclones which periodically devastate East Pakistan) the armed forces are the principal organizers of relief. Army officers have been called upon to administer the programme of the Basic Democracies, while the armed forces are authorized to nominate 10% of the candidates for the C.S.P., and in practice the percentage is often higher. Under these circumstances, it is important that the armed forces are, to an overwhelming degree, recruited from the West wing, mainly from Punjab and the North-West Frontier. In 1955, of the 900 army officers of the rank of Major and above, only 14 came from East Pakistan, and of the 680 air force officers, 40 came from the East.

This inbalance is unlikely to be altered for many years, and is a major cause of the movement for greater provincial autonomy which constantly agitates East Pakistan. However, it appears safe to predict that the two wings will not separate, and that Pakistan will remain a unique example of a single state and government resting upon the two sides of an interjacent state.

vi.—INDONESIA

From its beginnings in the early 17th century, the United East India Company's authority in the Indies had been exercised by a governor general, assisted by a Council of the Indies (Raad van Indië), with full local legislative and executive powers, but with ultimate control being strictly exercised by the Company's governing board, the Gentlemen Seventeen (Heren Zeventien) in Holland. When the Crown assumed the Company's responsibilities in 1800, the governmental machinery in the Indies remained by and large unchanged, a state of affairs which, in fact, continued even when the Dutch parliament in the years after 1848 wrested control over colonial matters from the royal prerogative (in the East Indian Government Act of 1854 and the Accounting Act of 1864). Though henceforth responsibility for colonial government and the colonial budget lay with a Minister of Colonies accountable to the Second Chamber, parliamentary control proved, if anything, an even more centralizing factor on Indonesian affairs than had the King's or Company's authority in the past; in modern times, it was also rendered more effectual by improved communications between homeland and colony.

At the beginning of the 20th century, by which time Dutch control had come to extend to all parts of the archipelago, the Netherlands Indies embraced a wide variety of indigenous societies ruled under various constitutional and administrative arrangements. The colony's heartland, the densely-populated island of Java, for several centuries already under increasing Dutch control, was almost in its entirety directly administered, as were several important areas in the other islands—the Outer Territories (Buitengewesten)—, most notably parts of Sumatra. Elsewhere, the Dutch ruled indirectly, through existing indigenous chiefs and potentates. In part, this diversity was due to historical accident, to the exigencies of Western economic needs, but in part also to the various levels of social and political evolution of the colony's autochthonous peoples and societies. Dutch constitutional theory, moreover, to the very end adhered to the basic principle of divided authority, i.e., to the principle of having natives wherever possible ruled by natives. Thus where in the greater part of the Outer Islands Dutch administrators were officially restricted to the rôle of advisers to princes and sultans tied to the Netherlands by means of contractual or treaty agreements, even in directly-ruled Java there was a double bureaucratic hierarchy, one Dutch the other Javanese. This dualism was paralleled by separate judicial codes, procedures, and courts for the different racial communities in the Indies.

But in practice the colonial realm constituted a strictly centralized and bureaucratically-dominated administrative entity closely directed from Batavia (Jakarta) in Java, seat of the colonial government. Besides the Governor General and the Council of the Indies, the colonial government consisted of several departments (their number increased with the growth of specialized services in the 20th century), whose directors were responsible to the Governor General, but who did not, together, form a 'ministerial' collegiate body parallel to that of the compact Council of the Indies. Paramount among governmental institutions was, next to the Governor General and the Council, the Department of Interior Administration (Binnenlands Bestuur) and also the Secretariat located at the viceroy's permanent official residence, Buitenzorg (Bogor) in West Java. In both central and territorial administration, Dutch officialdom occupied the dominant, policy-making positions, subject of course to the stringent, and in budgetary matters also detailed, supervision of the Ministry of Colonies in The Hague.

Sporadic efforts to diminish the home grip on colonial affairs, and at the same time to lessen the virtual bureaucratic monopoly on the reins of colonial government having failed, the dichotomy between democracy at home and autocracy in the Indies continued until the turn of the 20th century. Beginning in 1903, a few cautious attempts at decentralization were made, and municipalities, in particular, henceforth came to enjoy a modicum of self-rule which, however, benefited the European settlers rather than the natives. It took almost another fifteen years for more far-reaching reforms to be introduced, commencing with the institution in Batavia of an advisory chamber, the Volksraad (People's Council), which opened in 1918. Shortly thereafter, and in part guided by the recommendations of a Commission appointed by the Governor General in 1918, the home government enacted more far-reaching decentralization legislation, providing an administrative and in part also political underpinning for the hastily-born central People's Council. At the same time, the new basic law for the Indies (Indische Staatsinrichting) of 1925 opened the way towards greater colonial autonomy vis-à-vis the metropolitan parliament, especially with regard to the budget. Decentralization within the Indies—limited to Java until the mid-1930's—attempted to free the native administrative corps, largely recruited from among the Javanese aristocracy, from the minute control of its European superiors in the Binnenlands Bestuur. New territorial corporate entities—Provinces and Regencies (regentschappen)—were called into being for purposes of administrative devolution, but also to provide lower-level conciliar bodies, the Provincial and Regency Councils; these were filled partly through appointments though to a larger extent through elections based on a rather narrow franchise. The 60-odd Regency Councils acted as electoral colleges for the island's three Provincial Councils which, in turn, served in the same capacity for the Volksraad.

The quasi-democratic scaffolding hastily if belatedly attached to the bureaucratic polity had barely two decades in which to be consolidated before the Japanese occupation of the Indonesian islands. Its success in that short period was uneven, greatest perhaps at the centre, where the Volksraad in spite of many and serious shortcomings—it was, inter alia, boycotted by many nationalist groups—provided some kind of schooling in modern political procedures. In the late 1920's it acquired a bare Indonesian majority and was also granted co-legislative powers, especially significant with regard to the annual budget. But the increasing radicalization of Indonesian political life, highlighted by armed revolts in 1926-7, and the subsequent strengthening of the bureaucratic apparatus, greatly reduced the usefulness of the Volksraad. Coming so soon after the sweeping decentralization measures had been introduced, the resurgence of bureaucratic power also considerably inhibited the proper functioning of the lower conciliar bodies. When administrative decentralization was extended to the Outer Territories in the late 1930's, it was almost wholly devoid of the political experimentation that had taken place in Java. Dutch rule thus bequeathed to Indonesia a basically centralized state structure still dominated by officialdom, and with only some incipient and frail features of democratic self-rule.

In spite of its brevity, the Japanese interregnum in Indonesia (1942-5) wrought several far-reaching changes in the Dutch system. Quite apart from the temporary dismemberment of the archipelago (the different islands were administered by separate military commands), the Japanese dismissed Dutch officials, replacing them by Japanese and Indonesians, and in the place of the Western-style, quasi-democratic deliberative bodies they provided appointive councils of extremely limited competency. It was in the field of agitational politics, however, that major changes occurred which, combined with Japanese organizational innovations, profoundly affected the population, most notably the younger generation. This rapid mobilization of Indonesian political life, sharpened by ideological cleavages and by the rise to political prominence of military and paramilitary forces, stood in marked contrast to the basically unaltered conservatism of the increasingly Indonesianized bureaucratic administrative machinery. Governmental authoritarianism, albeit in a more ruthlessly arbitrary form, was similarly unaffected by the change in colonial overlord.

Indonesian independence (proclaimed in August 1945) and the subsequent four-year struggle against Dutch military attempts at re-colonization sharply raised the politicization of Indonesian society. The first provisional constitution of the Indonesian Republic [see DUSTŪR], promulgated only three weeks after the Japanese surrender and still influenced by Japanese tutelage, provided for a presidential form of government. An elected legislative assembly was envisaged under the constitution, but owing to the revolution and continued armed conflict with the Dutch, national elections took place only in 1955. In the interim, an appointed Central Indonesian National Committee functioned as a legislature; its prestige was considerably heightened when late in 1945 cabinet responsibility was shifted to the (numerically augmented) Committee which very soon was greatly influenced by the emerging political organizations, prominent among them the Nationalist, Masjumi (Muslim), and Socialist parties.

The republican organs of government were only operational in some parts of Indonesia, most notably in Java and Sumatra. Elsewhere, the return of Dutch military forces and administrative personnel inaugurated a wide variety of semi-autonomous 'states' under the Dutch aegis, culminating in the late 1940's in sixteen distinct political entities (including the Republic). It was therefore to a federal, bicameral Republic of the United States of Indonesia that the Dutch transferred sovereignty in December 1949; but within less than a year the federal charter gave way to Indonesia's third provisional constitution (1950) which, in turn, remained in force for less than a decade. It established a unitary and parliamentary system. Cabinets were based on coalitions among the three major parties [see ḤIZB, vii] that had gained prominence (Nationalists, Masjumi, and Nahdatul Ulama [Muslim Scholars' Party]) before, but especially after, the general elections of 1955. The fourth important group, the Communist Party, remained outside the government coalitions, though wielding increasing influence at the centre and particularly among the electorate. During the initial period, the liberal-democratic system, though far from properly rooted in Indonesia's political culture, appeared to be working fairly smoothly, a beginning being made with political decentralization proper: regional and local government devolved on elective assemblies. But growing ideological polarization between Islamic and 'secular' groupings—particularly pronounced in the Constituent Assembly, likewise elected in 1955—, proliferation of parties coupled with lack of internal party discipline, cabinet instability, continued international frustrations caused by the Netherlands' retention of West New Guinea (Irian Barat), economic deterioration coupled with regional discontent, but also increasing military interference in the political process—all these adverse factors helped to discredit constitutional government among members of the élite and wide sectors of the political public.

In the wake of widespread armed revolt and threatened secession in the outer territories, both the central military authorities and the chief executive embarked on a progressively authoritarian course. The president abrogated the deadlocked Constituent Assembly, proscribed some parties, most notably Masjumi, and from 1957 on gradually inaugurated a new political system, "Guided Democracy". The Republic's first provisional constitution of 1945, which was reinstated by presidential decree (July 1959), provided the legal basis for the new order. Parliamentary government had thus been forced to yield to a centralized system not too dissimilar, in substance, to earlier forms. The instrumentalities of Guided Democracy, created in piecemeal fashion and by no means clearly coordinated, before long overshadowed the parliament which—reflecting the steep decline of the political parties—was in fact reconstituted as a 'Mutual Aid' legislature on an appointive basis in 1960, its membership enlarged by several 'functional' groups, particularly the military. New and often unwieldy bodies with overlapping authorities and duties were rapidly added at the president's behest and choosing, including the High Advisory Council and the People's Provisional Consultative Assembly (both in fact provided for in the 1945 charter), as well as a National Planning Council, and for that matter a presidential cabinet comprising some 90 ministers. It was the Consultative Assembly (not the parliament), with a membership exceeding six hundred, that served as the nation's de jure supreme body, empowered to elect the chief executive who, in turn, was accountable to it.

The smooth working of Guided Democracy did not, however, overly depend on the formal structural arrangements that appeared to be lacking in cohesion. Actual political power had been drained from the ten or so political parties still permitted to exist, with the partial exception of the Communist Party whose massive organization constituted one of the real foci of political strength. It was paralleled and counterbalanced by the increasingly well-disciplined army, whose active participation in political and administrative matters had steadily grown as a result of internal disorder and foreign confrontations (with the Netherlands first, and the Federation of Malaysia thereafter). The army had also been the prime beneficiary of the nationalization of most foreign-owned enterprises, and of the dismantling of the political parties' strength in the decentralized organs of local and regional government. At the apex of Guided Democracy stood the president, its founder and ideologue par excellence, invested with lifelong executive powers during the Consultative Assembly's first session. By the early 1960's Indonesia had unmistakeably moved ever closer to a highly personalized if not autocratic system of government. Yet while the president's legal as well as extra-legal powers were very wide indeed, they were circumscribed less so formally than by the existence of other power factors.

A major political upheaval which started in October 1965 and whose causes and ramifications have remained partly obscured at the time of writing (mid-1966) may be expected to have profound effects on Indonesian government, even though the fragile constitutional framework of Guided Democracy has for the time being survived. One major result of these momentous events has been the decimation, if not the virtual destruction, of the Communist Party, achieved with the aid of militant Muslim groups. Another, though far less clearcut, result is a seeming diminution of the powers of the president, shorn of his lifetime incumbency by the fourth plenary session of the People's Provisional Consultative Assembly. As of the mid-1960's the army appeared to be the major beneficiary of the political restructuring, to all appearances wielding power in a barely less authoritarian and centralized manner than that of the immediately preceding system. Whether political democracy could, or would, once again be grafted upon this old-new structure and whether, if once more attempted, it would strike stronger roots than before, must remain open questions.

ḤULĀ, "ornaments, personal jewellery" [see LIBĀS].

ḤŪLA, a town reported to be in Nadjd, Central Arabia. The description of this town published in *EI*¹, s.v., was apparently based only on a report by W. Palgrave (Central and Eastern Arabia, London 1865, i, 361 and map). The name, of which there is no modern knowledge or historical record, is erroneous; Palgrave's description may actually refer to al-Ḥawṭa [q.v.], a town to the north of Ḥūla's reported location. (J. MANDAVILLE)

AL-ḤŪLA, present-day name of the lake in Israel (35° 40′ E. and 33° 10′ N.), to the south of Mount Hermon not far from the sources of the Jordan, which flow into it. This lake, triangular in shape and 5-6 km. long, issues in the river Jordan at its south-east corner. It is 80 metres above sea-level and thus 265 metres above the level of the lake of Tiberias. Its water is fresh and it is famed for its fish and its aquatic birds. The plain which surrounds it, arḍ al-Ḥūla, was formerly a vast swamp covered with papyrus, reeds and giant water-lilies. The marshes in this basin are now almost all drained as a result of the widening and deepening of the bed of the Jordan. Thus the region now comprises extensive areas of cultivation. But irrigation raises the problem of the distribution of the water among the adjacent countries.

This lake has borne throughout the ages various names. The name al-Ḥūla seems to derive from the Aramaean Oulatha, a place mentioned by Josephus. This name was used in 23 B.C. by Caesar, when he made over to Herod the inheritance of Zenodorus, consisting of Oulatha, Paneas and the surrounding region. Josephus calls the lake Semachonitis, and the Talmud Samakhi. It is identified with the waters of Merom, where Joshua defied the army of Jabin, King of Hazor (Joshua, XI, 5-7). Arabic writers such as al-Ḳalḳas̲h̲andī and Abu 'l-Fidā' sometimes refer to it under the name of Lake of Bāniyās [q.v.], probably because of its proximity to the town of this name. They also mention it under the name of Buḥayrat Ḳadas, from the name of an ancient Hebrew town, the ruins of which are found on top of the mountain; Abū S̲h̲āma refers to the lake as al-Mallāḥa (a place to the north-west possessing a good spring), a name also used by William of Tyre. There should also be mentioned the name of Baḥr al-K̲h̲ayt, still in use by the local population today.

The names of al-Ḥūla and Buḥayrat Ḳadas have also been given to a lake situated between Ḥimṣ and Ṭarābulus, which is often confused with the Palestine lake. It is the lake at Ḥimṣ to which Abu'l-Fidā' refers when he writes that in 584/1188 Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn made his camp on the shores of the lake of Ḳadas; al-Dimas̲h̲ḳī confuses the two localities: he refers to the lake of Ḳadas situated between Ḥimṣ and Mount Lebanon and adds that the town of Ḳadas, which gave its name to the lake, was taken by S̲h̲uraḥbīl b. Ḥasāna, whereas it was in fact the town in Galilee which the latter conquered.

HŪLĀGŪ (HÜLEGÜ or rather HÜLE'Ü, the intervocalic g being purely graphic), the Mongol conqueror and founder of the dynasty of the Īl-K̲h̲āns [q.v.] of Persia, born ca. 1217, was the grandson of Čingiz-K̲h̲ān [q.v.] by the latter's youngest son Toluy [q.v.]. Sent by his brother the Great K̲h̲ān Möngke at the head of an army against the Ismāʿīlīs and the Caliph, he left Mongolia in the autumn of 1253, proceeding at a leisurely pace along a carefully prepared route, the roads having been specially cleared and levelled and bridges built across the rivers for the easier passage of his forces. In S̲h̲aʿbān 653/September-October 1255 he encamped in the meadows of Kān-i Gul near Samarḳand, where he remained till the beginning of S̲h̲awwāl/November; and it was not till 1 D̲h̲u 'l-Ḥid̲j̲d̲j̲a 653/1 January 1256 that he finally crossed the Oxus. Here he received the homage of most of the petty rulers of Persia and the Caucasus area; in the course of the year 654/1256 the greater part of the Ismāʿīlī strongholds were taken without difficulty; on the fall of the dynasty see ALAMŪT, NIZĀRĪS. On 10 Muḥarram 656/17 January 1258 the Caliph's army was routed in a pitched battle; on 15 Muḥarram/22 January Hūlāgū in person sat down before Bag̲h̲dād, which surrended on 4 Ṣafar/10 February; for details of the execution of the Caliph and the sacking of his capital see BAG̲H̲DĀD. An attempt made in 658/1260 to conquer Syria failed. Hūlāgū succeeded in taking Aleppo, and Damascus, deserted by its defenders, surrendered without a blow; but news of the death of the Great K̲h̲ān caused him to return to Persia and the army he had left behind was destroyed by the Egyptians at ʿAyn D̲j̲ālūt [q.v.] in Palestine on 25 Ramaḍān 658/3 September 1260. On the unsuccessful war with the Golden Horde in 660/1262 see BERKE.

The petty kingdoms in D̲j̲azīra, Kurdistān and Asia Minor as well as the Christian territories south of the Caucasus were incorporated as vassal states in the kingdom founded by Hūlāgū so that his power stretched from the Oxus almost to the Mediterranean and from the Caucasus to the Indian Ocean. The sovereign took the title of Īl-K̲h̲ān ("subordinate k̲h̲ān") and he and his successors down to G̲h̲āzān K̲h̲ān [q.v.] reigned in the name of the Great K̲h̲ān in Mongolia (afterwards in China). The Christian element amongst his subjects was particularly favoured by Hūlāgū, and especially by his Christian wife Doḳūz K̲h̲ātūn, often to the detriment of the Muslims. The towns destroyed during his wars were in part rebuilt even in Hūlāgū's time; he himself in times of peace delighted to live in north-western Ād̲h̲arbayd̲j̲ān, particularly on the banks of Lake Urmiya, where many edifices, such as the famous observatory on a hill north of Marāg̲h̲a, a palace in Ala-Tag̲h̲, Buddhist temples in K̲h̲ōy, etc. were constructed. He restored a strong castle (on the earlier fortification cf. Yāḳūt, i, 513) on the mountainous island of S̲h̲āhū (now S̲h̲āhī). The remains still survive, according to the archaeologist E. F. Schmidt, "on the almost inaccessible summit of a great rock rising a thousand feet above the shore of the island." Here were kept the treasures won in battle in Persia and elsewhere, and here was the burial place both of Hūlāgū himself and of his successor Abāḳā. Hūlāgū died on 19 Rabīʿ II 663/8 February 1265. In accordance with the Mongol custom several beautiful young women were buried with him; this is the last occasion on which human victims are mentioned in connection with the funeral of a Čingizid prince.

HŪLĀGŪ, a Mongol noble of Lāhawr (Lahore), whose brief rise to power in that city in about 735/1335 was symptomatic of the general resentment felt at Muḥammad b. Tug̲h̲luḳ's rule. When the sultan had left Dihlī for the south of India to put down the rebellion of Djalāl al-Dīn Aḥsan [q.v.] Hūlāgū killed Tātār Khān, governor of Lāhawr, appointed Gul Čandra (?) the Khokar his minister, and proclaimed his independence. On the news reaching Dihlī, the wazīr Khwādja Djahān, who had not yet followed the sultan south, marched to Lāhawr with an army and put down the rebellion; since 300 widows of the rebels were sent to imprisonment at Gwāliyār the rebellion must have been on a considerable scale. Nothing more is known of Hūlāgū; it seems that he was one of the many foreign nobles encouraged by Muḥammad b. Tughluḳ to assist him to his ambition of conquering Persia and Transoxiana.

al-ḤULAL al-MAWSHIYYA, Arabic chronicle considered until recently as anonymous; according to Ibn al-Muwaḳḳit's al-Saʿāda al-abadiyya (2 vols., Fez 1336/1917), however, it is the work of Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Abi 'l-Maʿālī Ibn Sammāk, a contemporary of Muḥammad V of Granada, whom he eulogizes in the introduction to his work, which was finished on 12 Rabīʿ I 783/6 June 1381. It is a curious motley patchwork in which the author, without troubling himself with the differences of style or the historical value of his sources, has juxtaposed passages taken from the best-informed and best-known authors, such as Ibn al-Ṣayrafī, Ibn Ṣāḥib al-Ṣalāt, Abū Yaḥyā b. al-Yasaʿ, al-Baydhaḳ, and Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭān, with forged official letters, testimonies invented by the author, and ridiculous legends whose origins appear to be oriental. Although its full title, al-Ḥulal al mawshiyya fī dhikr al-akhbār al-Marrākushiyya, might lead one to think that it is concerned with the history of Marrākush, it is in fact a résumé of events under the Almoravid empire and an account of the beginnings of the Almohad movement up to and including ʿAbd al-Muʾmin. It then becomes a very brief account of the other Almohad caliphs, ending with a mere list enumerating the Marīnid sultans up to Abū Tāshfīn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUmar in 783/1381. The first European historian to use the material in this chronicle was Conde, who used a Spanish translation of the 17th century (mentioned by R. Basset [*EI*1, s.v.] as being in the Bibl. du Gouvernement Général, Algiers) far superior to those he made himself or used in other passages of his Historia de la dominación de los árabes en España. Dozy used the Ḥulal as one of his sources in his Histoire des musulmans d'Espagne and in Loci de Abbadidis. Amari gives a brief extract from it in the appendix to the Bibl. arabo-sicula. Codera referred to it for his Decadencia y desaparición de los Almorávides. Lévi-Provençal quotes from it in his Documents inédits as does Huici Miranda in his Historia política del imperio almohade and Las grandes batallas de la Reconquista.

Bibliography: Two editions of the Arabic text have been published up till now: the first, Tunis 1329/1910, is completely unacceptable; the second, by I. S. Allouche, Rabat 1936, is executed with scrupulous care following a MS provided by Lévi-Provençal and anothei belonging to Algiers University, along with the fragments edited by Dozy in Loci de Abbadidis and Recherches, but without reference to the MSS in the libraries of Paris, Lisbon, and Évora, which Huici Miranda consulted for his complete translation, published as volume i of the Colección de crónicas árabes de la Reconquista, Tetuán 1951. ḤULM [see taʿbīr al-ruʾyā].

ḤULMĀNIYYA, followers of Abū Ḥulmān al-Fārisī a native of Persia, educated in Ḥalab and later living in Damascus where he disseminated his ideas. He is recorded as a ṣūfī, e.g., in Sarrādj (d. 378/988), Kitāb al-Lumaʿ fi'l-taṣawwuf (ed. Nicholson 1914), 289, where it is related that Abū Ḥulmān al-Ṣūfī once swooned on hearing the street-cry of a herbseller, the author seeing in this a testimony to the effect of samāʿ being dependent on the spiritual state of the hearer. But his ṣūfism is not generally acknowledged, and by ʿAbd al-Ḳāhir al-Baghdādī (d. 729/1037), Hudjwīrī (d. 465/1072) et al. he and the Ḥulmāniyya are accused of two heresies: (1) They maintain the doctrine of ḥulūl and imtizādj, and in connexion with this they believe in the transmission of spirits, intiḳāl. With reference to Sūra XV, 29 f., they believe that God is embodied in every beautiful being and they therefore make sudjūd before a pretty form. This point is mentioned, without names, by al-Ashʿarī (d. 327/938) in Maḳālāt al-Islāmiyyīn (ed. Ritter, Bibl. Isl., 1929, 214), and by Muṭahhar al-Maḳdisī, K. al-Badʾ wa 'l-taʾrīkh, ii (composed 355/966), ed. Cl. Huart, Paris 1901, 91 (text) and 81 (tr.). (2) They feel themselves, by their professed knowledge of God, relieved of all prohibitions and thus advocate licentiousness.

Hudjwīrī says that they are connected with "the Sālimī sect of anthromorphists". These formed a philosophical madhhab in Baṣra in the 3rd/9th century. Ibn Sālim professed God's continued creation, for instance in the voices of reciters of the Ḳurʾān, and he had the idea that God on the Day of Judgement will appear in a corporeal human shape, visible to the human eye. There may be some connexion on this point, but the pretended tendency to ibāḥa of the Ḥulmāniyya does not harmonize with the earnest asceticism of Ibn Sālim and Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī, who calls him "our shaykh" (Ḳūt al-ḳulūb, Cairo 1310, ii, 172, ll. 12-35) and who writes in his spirit. Al-Makkī does not mention Abū Ḥulmān, nor does al-Ghazālī, but he concerns himself with the ideas of the Ḥulmāniyya and refutes them in some of his works. Thus, in Iḥyāʾ ʿulūm al-dīn, iv, 218 f. (ed. Cairo 1322) he condemns people who claim to appropriate to themselves divine character and the embodiment thereof through ḥulūl, whereas God has reserved the perfect beauty for Himself. In al-Maḳṣad al-asnā (Cairo 1322, 110, 114 f.) al-Ghazālī speaks of ṣūfis who pretend to borrow (istiʿāra) God's names and ṣifāt and thus imply ḥulūl. And in Mishkāt al-anwār (Cairo 1322, 51) we find the interesting remark that the idea of God's manifestation in every kind of beauty, be it in man, animal or plant, to which the believers make sudjūd as to their gods, is to be found among "the farthest Turks who have no religion and no sharīʿa".

ḤULŪL signifies etymologically, among other things, the act of loosing, of unfastening, of untying (a knot); of resolving a difficulty, and, with the accusative or with bi or fī, of alighting at a place. Hence its various meanings in the Muslim religious sciences and in falsafa.

(1) In grammar ḥulūl denotes the occurrence of the accident of inflexion (iʿrāb); (2) in law it denotes the application of a prescription; (3) in Hellenistic philosophy (falsafa) it denotes: (a) the inhesion of an accident in an object (mawḍūʿ; cf. A.-M. Goichon, Lexique de la langue philosophique d'Ibn Sīnā, Paris 1938, nos. 179 and 184); (b) the substantial union of soul and body: ḥulūl al-rūḥ fi 'l-badan (al-Fārābī, Ahl al-madīna al-fāḍila, Cairo 1906, 80); ḥulūl al-lāhūt fi 'l-nāsūt [cf. AL-ḤALLĀDJ]; (4) in theology (kalām) and mysticism (taṣawwuf) ḥulūl expresses "infusion", the indwelling of God in a creature (see further IMĀMA, TANĀSUKH); it is often a synonym for ittiḥād [q.v.].

The upholders of atomism, together with al-Ashʿarī, admit the ḥulūl of soul in body because they consider the rūḥ (the soul) to be a rarefied body, even in the case of angels and demons; but, like the other mutakallimūn, they reject ḥulūl in meaning (4).

Muslim authors give various descriptive definitions (rusūm) of ḥulūl. For some it is the appropriation of one thing by another, or the "infusion" of one thing into another, such that when one is described the other is also described, whether this identification be a true one (taḥkīkan), as in the case of the water that rises in the stem of a flower, or the case of the inhesion of accidents in bodies, or metaphorical (takdīran), such as the "inhesion" of sciences in immaterial beings. The following definition is also found: al-ḥulūl is qualifying appropriation (al-ikhtiṣāṣ al-nāʿit), that is to say the appropriate dependence of two terms which makes one the qualifier and the other the thing qualified. The first is called al-ḥāll, the second al-maḥall. An example is the dependence of the whiteness that covers a body. Finally, ḥulūl has also been defined as the existence of one thing in another in a dependent fashion (al-ḥulūl ʿalā sabīl al-tabaʿiyya), a definition that is virtually equivalent to the preceding one.

Two kinds of ḥulūl are distinguished: (1) one extensive (al-ḥulūl al-sarayānī), when the infuser (al-ḥāll) spreads to all parts of the receptive object (for example, the water rising in the stem of a flower); (2) the other localized (al-ḥulūl al-ṭarayānī or al-djiwārī), when the "infuser" takes up only a part of the object, for example, the water contained in a receptacle, or the point that ends a line.

These various precise definitions have enabled Muslim theologians to refute the idea of God's ḥulūl in creatures: (1) such a ḥulūl would exclude absolute necessity in God; (2) it would involve the existence of two eternals (God and the receptive object); (3) God would become divisible through the division of the receptive object, unless the latter were reduced to an atom, which is unworthy of God.

We see in al-Djurdjānī-Taftāzānī (Sharḥ al-mawāḳif, second marṣad of the Ilāhiyyāt, fifth maḳṣad) how the upholders of ḥulūl are classed: (1) the Christians (according to their various positions); (2) the Nuṣayrīs and the Ishrāḳiyya; (3) certain Ṣūfīs whose doctrine lies between ittiḥād and ḥulūl. Their position, says al-Taftāzānī, comes round again to that of the Christians.

Muslim authors normally call the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation ḥulūl, although Christian authors speak of taʾannus, tadjassud, and also of ittiḥād. They sometimes use the verb ḥalla to say that the Word "descended" into a human nature, or to speak of the descent of the Holy Spirit.

The Sunnīs and Shīʿīs condemn the following sects as ḥulūliyya, on the same grounds as the Christians: (a) the extreme Shīʿīs (ghulāt): Sabāʾiyya, Bayāniyya, Djanāḥiyya, Khaṭṭābiyya, Namīriyya (Nuṣayriyya), Muḳannaʿiyya, Rizāmiyya, Bāṭiniyya, ʿAzāḳira, Druses; (b) Sunnī Ṣūfiyya: Ḥulmāniyya, Fārisiyya [cf. AL-ḤALLĀDJ], Shabbāsiyya; (c) Monists: Ittiḥādiyya (Ibn Taymiyya refers to their waḥdat al-wudjūd as ḥulūl muṭlaḳ, cf. tadjassud al-aʿmāl according to al-Farghānī, Muntaha 'l-madārik, Cairo 1293, ii, 84-6; cf. IBN AL-ʿARABĪ].

(L. MASSIGNON-[G. C. ANAWATI])

ḤULWĀN, in Greek χάλα, a very ancient town which was situated near the entrance to the Paytak pass through the Zagros range, on the famous Khurāsān highway. Its site has been identified with that of the present-day village of Sar-i Pul-i Dhuhāb, which is 33 km. east by south of Ḳaṣr-i Shīrīn [q.v.] (see H. C. Rawlinson, Notes on a march from Zohâb to Khuzistân, in JRGS, London, ix (1839), 40, and the Guide Bleu, Moyen Orient, Paris 1956, 697). In Assyrian times the town was known as Khalmanu. In those days the town was situated on the natural frontier between Babylonia and Media (see Ritter, Erdkunde, ix, 388). According to an Arab tradition quoted by al-Ṭabarī (see Nöldeke, Geschichte der Perser und Araber, 138), the town was founded by the Sāsānian monarch Ḳavādh I (d. 531), but it is clearly far more ancient than that. From other Muslim sources it would seem that Ḳavādh established a land survey office in Ḥulwān, and that registers were kept there until after the Muslim conquest (A. K. S. Lambton, Landlord and peasant in Persia, London 1953, 15, n. 3; cf. DAFTAR, 78a).

After the great victory of the Muslim Arabs at al-Ḳādisiyya [q.v.] in 16/637 and the subsequent evacuation of Ctesiphon by the Sāsānian court, Yezdigird took refuge at Ḥulwān for a time, before continuing his eastward flight. Ḥulwān fell into the hands of the advancing Arabs. Ḥulwān then and for some time after was a flourishing town in a fertile district producing much fruit. The town was surrounded by a wall which had 8 gates; the principal mosque was in the centre, inside an ancient castle. The Jews had a synagogue there. Towards the end of the 4th/early 11th century, Ḥulwān was ruled by a quasi-independent dynasty which had been founded by Muḥammad ibn ʿAnnāz and it became very well known under his son Abu 'l-Shawk [see ʿANNĀZIDS]. The anonymous author of the Ḥudūd al-ʿālam (139) described Ḥulwān as 'a very pleasant town, traversed by a river. It produces figs which are dried and exported everywhere'.

Ḥulwān was taken by the Saldjūḳs in 437/1046, who set it on fire; its destruction was completed by an earthquake 3 years later. It was subsequently rebuilt on a smaller scale and it is now known as Sar-i Pul-i Dhuhāb.

ḤULWĀN, town situated twenty five kilometres south of Cairo, four kilometres from the right bank of the Nile and approximately 35 metres above bank level. Ḥulwān is linked by road and rail with Cairo and is a rapidly growing industrial complex, containing a large steel works and the electricity generating plant for south Cairo. At the 1960 census, its inhabitants numbered about 95,000.

Historically, Ḥulwān derives its fame from its mineral springs. It would appear that the site was settled in Pharaonic times, for during the excavations of 1946 graves and pottery dating from the First Dynasty were uncovered; remains of Roman baths were also discovered. However, it was not until the period following the Arab conquest and the governorship of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn Marwān that substantial settlement occurred upon the site. According to al-Maḳrīzī, when ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn Marwān was forced to evacuate Fusṭāṭ during the disastrous flood of the year 70/690, he moved south towards what is now Ḥulwān. The position pleased him, possibly because of its proximity to Fusṭāṭ and its being above the level of the Nile flood. He set up his residence there, built palaces and mosques and planted palm gardens and vineyards. He also ordered the construction of a nilometer; this was replaced by the nilometer constructed on the island of Rawḍa in 96/715.

During the governorship of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn Marwān, Ḥulwān continued to prosper and its fame was celebrated in verse by the poet Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt. After Umayyad times, its position declined and, by the Mamlūk period, the palaces and mosques had disappeared and the source of the mineral springs had become filled with sand. During the reign of the Khedive ʿAbbās, the springs were uncovered and a centre was established at Ḥulwān for the treatment of soldiers suffering from skin diseases and rheumatism. Under Ismāʿīl and Tawfīḳ, Ḥulwān continued to grow and Ismāʿīl built there a palace for his mother (Ḳaṣr al-Wālida). Baths were built at the springs in 1869 and, during the construction, the remains of the Umayyad baths were discovered. The present baths were completed in 1892. On the banks of the Nile, adjacent to Ḥulwān, King Farouk (Fārūḳ) built for himself a summer residence; this was subsequently known as Rukn Ḥulwān and became a museum and public park.

HUMĀ (P.), the bearded vulture (Gypaetus barbatus), the largest of the birds of prey of the Old World, which is usually found in the regions of perpetual snow; it carries off the bones of dead animals, breaks them on rocks and eats the fragments, which led the Persian poet Saʿdī to say that the humā was superior to all the other birds because instead of feeding on living flesh it ate only bones (Gulistān, i, story 15). It was thought that anyone who intentionally killed a humā would die within forty days. That this bird was considered to be of good omen is illustrated by another verse of the Gulistān (i, story 3): "Nobody will go to seek for the shadow of the owl, even if there were no humā in the world"; it was believed in the ancient world that the shadow of the humā falling on a person's head predicted his elevation to royalty: thus this verse of the Būstān (ed. Furughi, 26, v. 15): "I wished that, thanks to my fortunate star, the wing of the humā should be spread out over my head". Hence the epithet humāyūn [q.v.] meaning "august, royal, fortunate, of good omen", and humāy with the same meaning, which has become a proper name: e.g., Humāy, the mobadh of Bahrām Gūr, and Humāy, daughter of Gushtasp (Wolff, Glossar, s.v.), Humāy, sister of the hero Isfandiyār (Shāhnāma, Tehrān 1935, vi, 1613-4, v. 2071; tr. Mohl, iv, 428), Humāy (Ar. Ḥumāya), daughter and wife of Bahman (Artaxerxes) son of Isfandiyār and mother of Dārāb (Tehrān ed., vi, 1755 ff.; tr. Mohl, v, 11-36; see DĀRĀB). Humāy is the name of the prince of Zamīnkhāvar and Humāyūn that of the princess of China in the verse romance by Khwādjū Kirmānī [see KIRMĀNĪ]. The humā is mentioned several times in Firdawsī's Book of kings: the royal crown is sometimes ornamented with humā feathers; a steed seems like a humā in full flight; the wings of the humā cover a fortress with their shadow; a place is so terrifying that even the humā is afraid to fly over it (for other examples, see Wolff, s.v.); in short, the poet makes use of the humā to create striking images, but does not attribute to it the magical powers which he gives to the sīmurgh [q.v.]. On the statement of the Fihrist that the Thousand and one nights were written for the queen Humāy, daughter of Bahman, see ALF LAYLA WA-LAYLA, col. 361a.

HUMĀM B. YŪSUF [see HAWWĀRA (Egypt and the Sudan)].

HUMĀM AL-DĪN B. ʿALĀʾ TABRĪZĪ, Persian poet of the Mongol period who was for some time vizier of Ādharbāydjān. He was held in great esteem by contemporary men of standing such as Rashīd al-Dīn Faḍl Allāh and Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad Djuwaynī, the Ṣāḥib-Dīwān. In 686/1287-8 he accompanied the latter to Rūm for the sequestration of the property of the Parwāna Muʿīn al-Dīn—an event to which he alludes in his poems. Towards the end of his life he became the disciple of Shaykh Saʿīd Farghānī, and after performing the ḥadjdj, retired to the khānḳāh which he had founded at Tabrīz with some financial assistance from the Ṣāḥib-Dīwān. Several sources state that he died in 713/1313-4 but in the Mudjmal-i Faṣīḥī it is mentioned that his death took place in 714/1314-5 at the age of 116. His poems were collected on the instructions of Rashīd al-Dīn Faḍl Allāh and edited posthumously with a preface in which his age at the time of his death was given as 78. He was buried in his khānḳāh at Tabrīz.

Humām has left a Dīwān of 2,000 verses including some Arabic ḳaṣīdas in praise of Nadjm al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Ghaffār, the Ḳāḍī al-Ḳuḍāt Muḥyī al-Dīn, Shaykh Ibrāhīm b. Saʿd al-Dīn Ḥamawī, Ḳuṭb al-Dīn Shīrāzī and the Ṣāḥib-Dīwān. Some of his Persian poems are in praise of Ghāzān Khān. His ghazals, though elegant enough, show no outstanding originality but imitate for the most part the style of Saʿdī. In nearly all the biographical notices of Humām, his meeting with Saʿdī is mentioned but there is no evidence for this in the works of either poet. One of his ghazals appears to have been plagiarized by Saʿdī and many of his poems are responses to a single bayt of Saʿdī.

In addition to ḳaṣīdas and ghazals, Humām wrote a mystical mathnawī in the Hazadj metre entitled Ṣuḥbat-nāma. This was dedicated to Sharaf al-Dīn Hārūn, the son of the Ṣāḥib-Dīwān.

ḤUMAYD B. ʿABD AL-ḤAMĪD AL-ṬŪSĪ, ʿAbbāsid general who was chiefly responsible for the victory of al-Maʾmūn over Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī; he died, poisoned, in 210/825. His generosity and his magnificence were celebrated by several poets, in particular by ʿAlī b. Djabala [see AL-ʿAKAWWAK]. His sons, themselves poets though producing little (see Fihrist, Cairo ed. 235), became in their turn patrons, eulogized in particular by Abū Tammām and al-Buḥturī. Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd, sent against Bābak [q.v.] and killed in 214/829, was lamented by Abū Tammām, over whose tomb his brother Abū Nahshal erected a cupola; al-Buḥturī dedicated to this Abū Nahshal fifteen poems and also wrote panegyrics on his brothers Abū Djaʿfar and Abū Muslim.

ḤUMAYD B. THAWR, AL-HILĀLĪ, Arabic poet of the 1st/7th century. Aṣmaʿī (Ibn ʿAsākir, Taʾrīkh Dimashḳ, iv, 457) calls him a poet of (early) Islamic times, whose language is correct, but he does not consider him a classic. Marzubānī (Muwashshaḥ, 80), Djumaḥī (Ṭabaḳāt, 113) and Ibn Ḳutayba (Shiʿr, 230) call him islāmī. Amongst his poems is a dirge on the murder of ʿUthmān (Ibn ʿAsākir, 458) and verses addressed to the caliph Marwān. Later authorities, however, thought that he was a companion of the Prophet and died in the reign of ʿUthmān.

His poems (shiʿr) were collected by al-Aṣmaʿī, Abū ʿAmr, al-Shaybānī, Ibn al-Sikkīt, al-Ṭūsī and al-Sukkarī (Fihrist, 158, 7; see also Ḳālī, i, 252/248 and 133); they were still in the hands of Baṭalyawsī (Iḳtiḍāb, 475, 1), Ibn Khayr (Fihrista, 397, 19) and even ʿAbd al-Ḳādir (Khizāna, i, 9). Of his poetry we possess only fragments, e.g., his famous descriptions of the wolf (Ibn Ḳutayba, Shiʿr, 231; Murtaḍā, iv, 121 with Shinḳīṭī's note; Ibn al-Shadjarī, Ḥamāsa, 207), of the sandgrouse (ḳaṭā, Aghānī[1], vii, 159 = Aghānī[3], viii, 260; ʿAynī, i, 178) and of the dove (Yāḳūt, Geogr. Wtb., iv, 1006 f.).

ḤUMAYD AL-ARḲAṬ, an Arab poet of the middle Umayyad period. Little is known of his life besides what can be gathered from his verses. His lifetime is fixed approximately by his poems in praise of al-Ḥadjdjādj; one of them (Bakrī, Simṭ al-laʾālī, 649) in which he ridicules ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr [q.v.] must have been composed during the siege of Mecca in 72/691-2. Another poem (Ṭabarī, ii, 1137) refers to the war of al-Ḥadjdjādj against Ibn al-Ashʿath and was therefore written somewhere between 81 and 85 A.H. (cf. also Proverbia Arabum, ii, 326). He is also credited with a satire (hidjāʾ) against al-Ḥadjdjādj (Bayhaḳī, Maḥāsin, 394) but this seems unlikely. His poems were collected by al-Aṣmaʿī, Abū ʿAmr al-Shaybānī, Ibn al-Sikkīt and al-Ṭūsī (Fihrist, 158). His Dīwān was still in the hands of Ibn al-Mustawfī (Khizāna[1], ii, 253). Ḥumayd was famous for his skill in writing radjaz-poetry. He is reckoned by the Muslim critics amongst the best radjaz-poets (Bayhaḳī, Maḥāsin, 458, 10) and was a forerunner of al-ʿAdjdjadj and Ruʾba. His verses are not impromptus but carefully composed poems which deal with all subjects typical of Arabic poetry. He describes, e.g., a horse (Mubarrad, Kāmil, 495), a hunting scene (Ḥamāsa, 795), a wild ass (Ibn al-Sikkīt, Manṭiḳ, 291), a lover's complaint (ibid. 496). There are some verses, referring to Sūra CV and the story of the Elephant, but they are also attributed to Ruʾba (no. 77 Ahlwardt). He also composed poems in other metres than radjaz (though some of them are also attributed to Ḥumayd b. Thawr, Lane, i, 2112). Amongst them are two (Maydānī, i, 427 and ʿAynī[1], ii, 82) in which he blames a greedy guest. This conduct which ran counter to all canons of Bedouin hospitality led to Ḥumayd's being counted as one of the world's greatest misers (Aghānī[3], ii, 163). Sometimes he is confused with his namesake Ḥumayd b. Thawr [q.v.].

AL-ḤUMAYDĪ, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Abī Naṣr Futūḥ b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Futūḥ b. Ḥumayd b. Yāṣil, Andalusian scholar of Arab origin. His family belonged to the Yemenī tribe of Azd. His father was born in al-Ruṣāfa, a suburb of Cordova, but moved to Majorca, where this son of his was born about 420/1029. Abū ʿAbd Allāh devoted himself to the study of theology, tradition, and law with different teachers and was a follower particularly of the Ẓāhirī school under the guidance of its most eminent exponent, Ibn Ḥazm, in his retreat at Niebla. He later emigrated to the East and by the gentleness of his character, his piety, and his erudition in his professorship at Baghdād (where he died in 488/1095), succeeded in avoiding the persecution and hatred provoked by the intemperance of his master and became one of the most admired scholars of his age. His biographer al-Ḍabbī and the latter's continuator al-Dhahabī, as well as al-Maḳḳarī, praise him in the most warm terms as a jurisconsult, traditionist, historian and poet, but the only work by him which we know, the Djadhwat al-muḳtabis fī dhikr wulāt al-Andalus wa-asmāʾ ruwāt al-ḥadīth wa-ahl al-fiḳh wa-ʾl-adab wa-dhawi ʾl-nabāha wa-ʾl-shiʿr (ed. Muḥammad b. Tāwīt al-Ṭandjī, Cairo 1953) demonstrates that he was better informed about traditionists than about historians, for he devotes a great deal of space to obscure scholars who were his colleagues but passes over in silence historians of the importance of ʿĪsā al-Rāzī and ʿArīb b. Saʿd. Given the reputation which he achieved by his teaching, one might have expected a better book, but since he wrote it to please his admirers at Baghdād, who wished to know the state of letters in Spain, he relied solely upon his memory without having at hand reference works which might have helped him in his task. It is therefore not a matter for astonishment that the book contains many inexactitudes and is lacking in truly interesting information. In his dates he is content with approximations, which have been the cause of some confusion and even of serious errors in some cases. For the rest, as Dozy says in a severe judgement, he may be credited with a certain impartiality as an honest man; but nothing more, for his mind did not rise above the commonplace.

AL-ḤUMAYMA, ruined site in Jordan, situated in 30° N. and about 35° 20′ E., some 50 km. south-east of the town of Maʿān, halfway between there and the gulf of ʿAḳaba.

This place, mentioned by the Arab geographers as belonging to the djund of Dimashḳ and to the region of al-Sharāt, is famous in history chiefly as having been used as a residence by the ʿAbbāsid claimants between 68/687-8 and 132/749. It was after the death of ʿAbd Allāh b. al-ʿAbbās at Ṭā'if in 68/687-8 that his son ʿAlī, who had given his support to the Umayyad caliphate, came to live at al-Ḥumayma, where he is said to have bought the "village" and built a fortified dwelling. It was there also that in 98/716, according to a widespread tradition, the son of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyya, Abū Hāshim [q.v.], as he was dying, transferred to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī his rights to the imāmate and the leadership of the secret revolutionary movement of which he was the leading spirit.

Situated on the route of the ancient road linking Aila and Petra, al-Ḥumayma was certainly built on the site of an ancient collection of dwellings, which some have identified with the town of Auara founded by the Nabataean king Obodas in 93 B.C. and listed in the Peutinger Table. There are to be seen on the site today the ruins of some walls, the remains of an aqueduct, and some fairly extensive ruins situated at the foot of an eminence called Umm al-ʿAẓam, but no building has survived.

HUMĀYŪN, as epithet of the ruler. The word humāyūn is frequently used in the Shāhnāma with the meaning of "fortunate, glorious, royal". Its specialized use for things or ideas connected with the ruler is already seen here in the designation of the legendary imperial banner as dirafsh-i humāyūn. It was only slowly, however, that the word penetrated into Persian chancery style. In the inshā' work ʿAtabat al-kataba of Muntadjab al-Dīn Djuwaynī, which was compiled towards the end of the Great Seldjūk period, the idea does not yet appear. It is only in the chancery of the Khʷārazmshāhs that we find it sporadically used, as in the Wasā'il al-rasā'il, ascribed to the poet and epistolographer Rashīd al-Dīn Waṭwāṭ, in the combination alḳāb-i humāyūn (royal honorific titles). The historian of the Timurids, Ḥāfiẓ-i Abrū, makes much use of the epithet in combinations such as rāyat-i humāyūn (royal standard), urdū-yi humāyūn (royal army camp) and ḥukm-i humāyūn (royal command). It is perhaps no coincidence that this word is found comparatively often in Ḥāfiẓ-i Abrū, since at the same time as he was writing in Herāt, on the orders of Baysonḳur, the grandson of Timur, there was undertaken at the court of Herāt a critical examination of the received text of the Shāhnāma. It was not until the Ṣafavid period that the term became really widely used: raḳam-i humāyūn (royal cipher, also the name of a type of document), ḥukm-i h., farmān-i h. (royal command, especially in the introductory formulas of the various types of documents), and muhr-i humāyūn (royal seal). In addition there continued to appear terms like ḥukm-i djahānmuṭāʿ (a command, which the [whole] world obeys). In the 10th/16th century the epithet was transferred also to the person of the ruler: nawwāb-i humāyūn-i mā (our Royal Highness). Humāyūn referred also simply to the state, in the designation of the administration of the state- and crown-lands as daftar-khāna-yi humāyūn wa khāṣṣa. In the Ḳādjār period an extension was obtained through the use of the yā-yi mushābih: darbār-i humāyūnī (the royal court), aʿlā ḥaḍrat-i humāyūnī (the royal majesty). In recent years the epithet has become obsolete. The Shāh is referred to now as Shāhanshāh-i āryā-mihr.

With the spread of Persian culture and especially Persian chancery practice, the concept already in the Seldjūk period reached Asia Minor and in the Timurid period, with the Mughal rulers, as far as India. In India the word was used to about the same extent as under the Ṣafavids. In Asia Minor, among the Seldjūks of Rūm, it seems to have remained confined to introductory or concluding formulas in documents: tawḳīʿ-i humāyūn (the royal seal), or ḥukm-i yarlīgh-i humāyūn čunānast ki (the royal command is as follows). The same use is found as early as the beginning of the 9th/15th century among the Ottomans, who in chancery practice were linked firmly to Seldjūk traditions. In formulas such as nishān-i hümāyūn we ṭughrā-yi meymūn ḥükmi oldur ki (867/1462, Meḥemmed II) or nishān-i hümāyūn we mithāl-i meymūn ḥükmi oldur ki the interchangeability of the term with the Arabic maymūn is clear. The term sharīf also is interchangeable with hümāyūn. From chancery practice the word became transferred to things and ideas which belonged to the Sultan. The chroniclers refer to murād-i hümāyūn (the royal will) or ḥuḍūr-i hümāyūn (the royal presence; but also ḥaḍrat-i ʿālampanāh). The word was used of institutions, notably the Dīwān-i Hümāyūn [q.v.]; the main gate (dated 883/1478) to the Topkapî Palace is called Bāb-i Hümāyūn [see saray]; and later, especially in post-Tanẓīmāt times, the word appears in the names of various offices, schools, etc., as a general equivalent of 'royal', 'imperial'.

In Transoxania also, among the khāns (later emīrs) of Bukhārā, whose administrative practice was completely modelled on the Persian, the idea is found in the introductory formulas of documents: ḥukm-i humāyūn shud (besides ḥukm-i ʿālī ṣādir shud) and in addition in combinations such as farāmīn-i humāyūn in the adhortatio and, as among the Ḳādjārs, farmūda-yi humāyūnī.

Etymologically humāyūn is obviously connected with the Avestan māyā (joy, delight, happiness, blessing) and hu-māyā (blessed). This basic meaning has been retained also by the modern Persian humāyūn, as is clear from the above-mentioned interchangeability with maymūn. In addition, already in the Ṣafavid period the word was connected with humā (phoenix, royal eagle). Thus Sebastian Beck in his grammar gives the definition humāyūnī "Phönixgleichheit, die kaiserliche Majestät".

HUMĀYŪN, Nāṣir al-Dīn Humāyūn Pādishāh, posthumously called Djannat Āshiyānī, eldest surviving son of Ẓahīr al-Dīn Muḥammad Bābur Pādishāh [see bābur], and second Mughal ruler of Hindūstān and Kābul, was born at Kābul on 4 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 913/6 March 1508.

In 923-4/1517-8 he was left in nominal charge of Kābul, and administered Badakhshān, 926-31/1520-5 and 933-5/1527-9. In Ṣafar 932/December 1525 he joined Bābur at Kābul for the invasion of India. He took part in the battle of Pānipat and himself blockaded Āgra, there receiving the great diamond afterwards presented to Shāh Ṭahmāsp. He led a force against the trans-Ganges Afghāns, returned to Āgra in Rabīʿ II 933/January 1527 and on 13 Djumādā II 933/16 March 1527 commanded the right wing at Khānwa. In April he departed for Badakhshān, where he campaigned indecisively against the Özbeks for the recovery of Samarḳand. In 935/1529 peace was made and he returned to India, falling gravely ill at Sambhal, but recovering. Possibly in spite of a plot to supplant him, the khuṭba was read in Humāyūn's name at Āgra three days after Bābur's death, on 9 Djumādā I 937/29 December 1530.

After his accession his half brothers had to be satisfied. Kāmrān advanced from Kābul to Lahore. Humāyūn acknowledged the Pandjāb, Ḳandahār and Kābul as Kāmrān's djāgīr: Hindāl received Mewāt and ʿAskarī received Sambhal. Humāyūn in 937/1531 subdued the Rādjā of Kālindjar, and conducted a campaign against the Afghāns advancing from Bihār, led by Bāyazīd and Bibban, whom he defeated at Damoh. He also besieged Shēr Khān at Čunaṙ in 938/1532. He then returned to Āgra. In Muḥarram 939/August 1533 he founded the city of Dīn Panāh at Delhi, whose fortifications were completed in Shawwāl 940/May 1534, when he returned to Āgra again. Humāyūn next confronted the northward expanding power of Sultan Bahādur Shāh of Gudjarāt. In Shaʿbān 941/February 1535 he set out from Āgra. In late March the two armies met, and Bahādur was besieged at Mandasawr. Two months later Bahādur abandoned his army and fled by Mandu (sacked by Humāyūn) and then onwards by Čampaner to Aḥmadābād and Cambay, hotly pursued by Humāyūn till he escaped by sea to Diu. Humāyūn besieged Čampaner and took it with much treasure in Ṣafar 942/August 1535. Humāyūn delayed at Čampaner till news of gathering Gudjarātī forces drew him to Aḥmadābād; at Maḥmūdābād he defeated the Gudjarātīs led by ʿImād al-Mulk. Humāyūn then departed to Mālwa, leaving Gudjarāt in charge of ʿAskarī, who abandoned it around May 1536, but was forestalled by Humāyūn in a race to capture Āgra. After one year in Āgra he set out in Ṣafar 944/July 1537 to combat the growing power of Shēr Khān Sūr in Eastern India. He took, after some months of siege, the fortress of Čunāṙ, while Shēr Khān was subduing Bengal. Humāyūn entered Bengal by Gaṙhī, while Shēr Khān escaped by Djhārkand. In Humāyūn's absence in Bengal, Hindāl assumed sovereignty in Āgra, at which Humāyūn set out from Gawṛ in Bengal. Shēr Khān blockaded Humāyūn's return at Chausa on the south bank of the Ganges. Kāmrān then advanced from Lahore and displaced Hindāl at Āgra, at which Humāyūn negotiated peace with Shēr Khān: but Shēr Khān then attacked his unprepared army, routed it and drove it into the river on 9 Ṣafar 946/26 June 1539. Humāyūn barely escaped drowning and hastened to Āgra with a few horsemen. He remained there about six months negotiating with his brothers. Kāmrān retreated to Lahore, depriving him of many men, while Shēr Shāh (Shēr Khān) advanced up the bank of the Ganges. Humāyūn advanced to Kannawdj, near which after a month's confrontation his forces were defeated and driven into the river on 10 Muḥarram 947/17 May 1540. Humāyūn once more narrowly escaped drowning and fled through Āgra to Lahore, where a council of the royal princes and Čaghatāʾī *Beg*s was held. Crossing the Rāvi at Shēr Shāh's approach, Kāmrān with ʿAskarī took the road for Kābul and Humāyūn turned towards Sind, with whose ruler, Shāh Ḥusayn Arghūn, he negotiated from Bhakkar in 948. In Radjab 948 he besieged Sehvān, but was harassed by Shāh Ḥusayn, who induced Humāyūn's cousin, Yādgār Nāṣir, with many soldiers, to desert him. Humāyūn then retired by Djaysalmer to Djodhpur and then to Amarkot, the Rānā of which offered hospitality. There on 5 Radjab 949/15 October 1542 his son Akbar [q.v.] was born. Humāyūn then moved to Djūn, where he passed 6-9 months in desultory hostilities with the Arghūn ruler. In Rabīʿ II 950/July 1543, with camels provided by the Arghūns, Humāyūn set out for Ḳandahār, but ʿAskarī secured the town against him, and Humāyūn travelled westwards to Sīstān, narrowly escaping capture and obliged to seek the hospitality of Shāh Ṭahmāsp.

The year 951/1544 was passed in Iran. He was given a princely reception at Herāt, and travelled by Mas͟hhad (visiting the Imām Riḍā's tomb), Nīs͟hāpūr and Sabzawār to Ḳazwīn, from where he joined S͟hāh Ṭahmāsp at his summer camp, in Ḏjumādā I 951/August 1544. Humāyūn gave Ṭahmāsp his great diamond and was forced to sign papers professing S͟hīʿism. He was treated with alternate hospitality and coldness and remained with the S͟hāh about 2 months. When he left, 12,000 Persian troops accompanied him to aid him. He visited Tabrīz and Ardabīl, and returned to Mas͟hhad in Ramaḍān/December. He reached Ḳandahār in Muḥarram 952/March 1545. In Ḏjumādā II/September ʿAskarī surrendered the town, which was occupied by his Persian auxiliaries, but taken from them by Humāyūn one month later. He then marched on Kābul, taken from Kāmrān without a struggle in Ramaḍān 952/November 1545. Next spring he marched on Badak͟hs͟hān, and in the autumn fell ill there, which led to a wavering of allegiance. Humāyūn then concluded peace with Sulaymān Mīrzā and marched to Kābul in midwinter. Kāmrān, who had reoccupied the town with Arg͟hūn assistance, fled in April to seek aid from the Özbeks. Humāyūn was detained by dissensions among the Mug͟hal nobles till June 1548, when he went to combat Kāmrān in Badak͟hs͟hān. On 12 Raḏjab 955/17 August 1548 Kāmrān submitted, and Humāyūn returned to Kābul in October. In spring 956/1549 Humāyūn set out against Pīr Muḥammad K͟hān, but retreated after an indecisive stand outside Balk͟h and was himself attacked by the Özbeks. He reached Kābul in Ramaḍān 956/September 1549. In Ḏjumādā II 957/June or July 1550 Humāyūn set out by G͟hūrband against the still rebellious Kāmrān, but was routed and wounded at the Ḳipčāḳ Pass. Kābul surrendered to Kāmrān; Humāyūn regrouped his forces at Andarāb, defeated Kāmrān within two months at ʿUs͟htargrām, and made his third victorious entry into Kābul. In 958/1551 Humāyūn marched out against Kāmrān, now in alliance with Afg͟hān tribes. On 21 D͟hu 'l-Ḳaʿda/21 November, Hindāl, the most loyal of Humāyūn's brothers, was killed in a night attack. In spring 1552 Humāyūn defeated the Afg͟hān tribes, and Kāmrān fled to India. Kāmrān was handed over by Sultan Ādam Gakkar to Humāyūn and, on the insistent advice of the Begs, blinded, probably in Ramaḍān 960/August 1553. By this Humāyūn finally achieved ascendancy over the resources of his family.

In D͟hu 'l-Ḳaʿda 959/November 1552 Humāyūn advanced to Bangash, and in 960/1553 beyond the Indus. He then prepared at Kābul for the invasion of Hindūstān, but was diverted to Ḳandahār by an unfounded report of Bayram Beg's disloyalty and passed the winter of 960-1/1553-4 there. In D͟hu 'l-Kaʿda 961/October 1554 he reached Kābul again, and in November set out for Hindūstān. In December he crossed the Indus and in Rabīʿ II 962/February 1555 entered Lahore. After an earlier success at Dīpālpūr, on 28 May Humāyūn's greatly outnumbered forces met the main body of Sikandar S͟hāh Sūr's army at Sarhind, and on 2 S͟haʿbān 962/22 June 1555 decisively defeated it. On 4 Ramaḍān/23 July Humāyūn entered Delhi and sat on the throne. On 7 Rabīʿ I 963/20 January 1556, Humāyūn, who had gone to the roof of his library to observe the rising of Venus, while kneeling to the evening call of prayer, fell down the staircase and died of his injuries, on 13-14 Rabīʿ I/26-7 January.

Humāyūn inherited no stable administrative system over the conquests in Hindūstān, and a family tradition of divided territorial inheritances. His 22 years of rule were a long struggle against his family, most of all Kāmrān, as well as external enemies, and in this he was often reduced to extremities. He lacked the strategic genius of his father, and in his early periods of success sometimes fell into heedless laziness and opium-eating. His career, like Bābur's, is a series of military adventures in different geographical areas, outside which he seldom succeeded in maintaining his control. After his Persian exile he showed a new resolution, and he had the courage and stamina to lead his forces to final victory and to a conquest which survived his son Akbar's minority. In his later years he was a humane monarch and was devoid of sectarian intolerance. He was a keen patron of mathematics and astronomy, wrote Persian verse, and carried books on the roughest of his travels.

Bibliography: Four contemporary productions (nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9 below) shed incidental light on Humāyūn's reign, but the chronicles of it were produced a quarter of a century and more after his death, and half a century after his accession. The record of his early years of rule in India is sketchy and there are difficulties of chronology, some discussed by Hodivala and by S. Ray (see below). The most copious source and official biography is (1) the Akbar-nāma of Abu 'l-Faḍl ʿAllāmī, i, ed. M. Āḳā Aḥmad ʿAlī and M. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm, Bibliotheca Indica, Calcutta 1877: English translation by H. Beveridge, Bibl. Ind., Calcutta 1897. The compiler was not one of the Central Asian nobility who had accompanied Humāyūn and he occasionally misunderstands information he has gathered. Next in importance are three memoirs compiled by those in close contact with Humāyūn, when the materials for (1) were being collected, ca. 1587 A.D.: — (2) Humāyūn-nāma of Gulbadan Begam, ed. with Eng. tr. Mrs. A. S. Beveridge, Oriental Translation Fund, N.S., London 1902; (3) Tad͟hkira-yi Humāyūn wa-Akbar, ed. M. Hidāyat Ḥusayn, Bibl. Ind., Calcutta 1941; translations by W. HUMĀYŪN SHĀH BAHMANĪ, the eleventh Bahmanī dynast and the third of the line to rule from Bīdar, 862/1458 to 865/1461. He was the eldest son of ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn Aḥmad II, who designated him his heir shortly before his death, at the same time giving him shrewd if idealistic advice about the management of the kingdom (Niẓām al-Dīn Bakhshī, Ṭabaḳāt-i Akbarī, Bibl. Ind. ed., Calcutta 1913, i, 421). Party faction was rife in the Deccan, and even before his accession, on rumours of ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn Aḥmad's death in 859/1455, the king's brother-in-law Djalāl Khān had proclaimed himself king at Nālgōnḍa. On his accession as (ʿAlāʾ al-Dunya wa ʾl-Dīn) Humāyūn Shāh, he had immediately to contend with the proclamation of his younger brother Ḥasan as king and with a hired mob outside his own residence waiting to plunder it: but he shouldered his way through the crowd, marched to the palace, and unseated Ḥasan personally; he then ascended the throne himself and, in his address to the nobles (recorded at length by Sayyid ʿAlī Ṭabāṭabā, Burhān-i maʾāthir, Ḥaydarābād ed., 89), appointed Maḥmūd Gāwān [q.v.] as his chief minister.

During his reign no foreign expeditions were undertaken; his aim appears to have been to strike a balance between the contending factions, the Dakhnīs and the 'foreigners', and to consolidate his extensive kingdom. His own kinsmen caused him as much trouble as did the rival political groups: Sikandar Khān, son of the Djalāl Khān mentioned above, soon rebelled, apparently dissatisfied with his appointment as sipāhsalār of Tilangānā, and Humāyūn attempted to come to peaceful terms with him; but Sikandar insolently proposed a partition of the kingdom, battle was joined and Sikandar was killed by a fall from his horse; the life of the instigator of the rebellion, Djalāl Khān, was spared. A consequence of the rebellion was a punitive campaign by the royal forces against the rādjās of Tilangāna who had sided with the rebels, during which Humāyūn's brother Ḥasan was released from prison by a rebellious courtier and again proclaimed himself king. On this occasion he was defeated by Humāyūn's army, fled towards Vidjayanagara, and was captured by the governor of Bīdjāpur who sent him in chains to Humāyūn. The king decided to let matters get no further out of hand, and put to death Ḥasan and all those who had supported him, as well as others who were suspected of opposition, with systematic sustained ferocity; obviously some of his opposers remained, for he was killed by a maidservant while he slept on 28 Dhu ʾl-Ḳaʿda 865/4 September 1461 —according to the account of Firishta, which is generally tendentious; this chronicler generally denigrates Humāyūn's character, and gives him the sobriquet of Ẓālim; the author of the Burhān-i maʾāthir is less vitriolic, but still gives some account of Humāyūn's cruelty; and the poet Nāẓirī in a venomous chronogram gives dhawḳ-i djahān [= 865], 'delight of the world', as the year of his death. But all these authors were 'foreigners' in the Deccan sense, sympathizers with the punished party, and modern opinion is to regard them as grossly distorting the true picture. (T. Wolseley Haig, in Cambridge history of India, iii, 411-2, accepts their view uncritically). The unfavourable reputation, however, had obviously been so much fostered locally that it is the common belief at Bīdar that Humāyūn's tomb there was split in two when his body was placed in it, God refusing his remains protection: in fact the tomb was struck by lightning in 1300/1882. A very different opinion of Humāyūn is, however, expressed by his own minister Maḥmūd Gāwān—not a man given to idle flattery—in his letters, who praises his uprightness and kindness (Riyāḍ al-inshāʾ, Ḥaydarābād 1948, letters 49 (p. 187) and 145 (p. 399); also his letter to the ruler of Gīlān, ibid. no. 21 (p. 102), where he attributes to Humāyūn the improved stability of Deccan politics). Certainly there is nothing in the first two years of Humāyūn's reign for which to execrate his name; and his punishment of those seeking his throne (and no doubt his life also) was not unusually cruel for his time. It has been suggested that he enjoyed poor health, which was responsible for his early (natural) death and for his occasional petulance of character.

ḤUMS, people observing rigorous religious taboos, especially Ḳuraysh and certain neighbouring tribes. The word is the plural of aḥmas, "hard, strong (in fighting or in religion)", but one of the Ḥums is called aḥmasī (fem. aḥmasiyya). Ibn Hishām (126) thinks that taḥammus, the observance of the taboos in question, was an innovation of Ḳuraysh about the time of Muḥammad's birth, and some changes may have been made to emphasize the superiority of Ḳuraysh to other tribes; but the nature of the taboos makes it likely they are older. In particular the Ḥums, during the period of sanctification (iḥrām) for the pilgrimage, ate no cheese made from sour milk, did not clarify butter, did not enter tents of camel-hair, did not enter or leave their houses by the doors, and did not leave the ḥaram of Mecca to take part in the ceremonies at ʿArafāt. The chief difference between the Ḥums and others was that the others, the Ḥilla, could not circumambulate the Kaʿba in ordinary clothes; they must either do so naked, or in clothes borrowed from the Ḥums; any ordinary clothes worn in circumambulation had to be discarded immediately afterwards, and became taboo for everyone (laḳā). The Ḥums connected with Mecca comprised, besides Ḳuraysh, the tribes of Kināna and Khuzāʿa, and certain small tribes connected with Ḳuraysh in the female line, notably descendants of Madjd bint Taym al-Adram. It is possible that there was some observance of taḥammus not connected with Mecca (cf. evidence in Wellhausen, Reste, 85 f.). Many South Arabian tribes belonged to the Ṭuls, a group with religious observances similar to the Ḥums in some points and to the Ḥilla in others. The Ḳurʾān forbids some of the practices mentioned: II, 189/5, not entering houses by doors; II, 199/5, not going to ʿArafāt; VII, 31/29, nudity in worship.

HŪN [see SIKKA—India].

ḤUNAYN, (modern al-Sharāʾiʿ?), a deep and irregular valley with clusters of palm trees, situated a day's journey from Mecca on one of the roads to al-Ṭāʾif [q.v.], the scene of the famous battle, the second mentioned by name in the Ḳurʾān (IX, 25-26), fought early in Shawwāl 8/630 soon after the conquest (fatḥ) of Mecca. The confederate tribe of Hawāzin with its subsection of Thaḳīf began mobilizing its forces soon after the Prophet left Medina. The confederates apparently hoped to attack the Muslim force investing Mecca. As each side maintained spies in the other's camp, Muḥammad, about a fortnight after his conquest of Mecca, marched against Hawāzin with a force of twelve thousand men. The confederate commander, Mālik b. ʿAwf al-Naṣrī [q.v.], brought Hawāzin's families and flocks along, though strong protests at their presence were made by Durayd b. al-Ṣimma al-Djushamī [q.v.], the venerable poet and warrior who fell in the ensuing battle.

On leaving the oasis of Ḥunayn, the road enters winding gorges, suitable for ambushes. Here Mālik b. ʿAwf awaited the Muslims, who little suspected the presence of an enemy thought to be encamped at Awṭās. Surprised by the precipitous charge of Bedouin cavalry, the Muslims retreated in disarray. From here on it is difficult to reconstruct the course of the battle for the various accounts of the Muhādjirūn, Anṣār, Hāshimids, and Shīʿīs differ. It appears that the Prophet on his grey mule was isolated for a time with few attendants and in grave danger. The Muslims, however, abandoned their unmanageable mounts, rallied, and attacked the enemy, who apparently was unable to exploit his initial success because of the congested and narrow battle-front. It is possible that Khālid b. al-Walīd [q.v.], who commanded the Muslim cavalry, deserves the credit for turning the tide, also claimed for the Anṣārīs by the Medinese school. In any case, within a few hours the rout of the enemy was complete, as is testified by the negligible Muslim losses of some twelve killed, by the vast number of captives, including about 6,000 women and children and by the enormous booty of over 24,000 camels. The fleeing Bedouins, some of whom were pursued to Awṭās, sought refuge behind the ramparts of al-Ṭāʾif,where Muḥammad besieged them.

(H. LAMMENS-[ABD AL-HAFEZ KAMAL])

ḤUNAYN B. ISḤĀḲ AL-ʿIBĀDĪ, the most important mediator of ancient Greek science to the Arabs. It was mainly due to his reliable and clearly written translations of Hippocrates [see BUḲRĀṬ, in Suppl.] and Galen [see DJĀLĪNŪS], that the Arab physicians of the Middle Ages became worthy successors of the Greek.

Life: Ḥunayn was born in 192/808 in al-Ḥīra [q.v.], where his father was a pharmacist. The nisba indicates that he was a descendant of the so-called ʿibād, i.e. Arab tribesmen who had once embraced Christianity and who after the rise of Islam remained faithful to the Syrian Nestorian church, refusing to adopt the new religion. Ḥunayn may be assumed to have been bilingual from his youth, for Arabic was the vernacular of his native town, and Syriac was the language of the liturgy and of higher Christian education. Later in life, when settled in Baghdād, he translated far more books into Syriac than into Arabic, in accordance with the wishes of his clients. He himself showed a certain predilection for the Syriac language at the expense of Arabic, which he blamed for its lack of an adequate nomenclature as compared with either Syriac or Greek or Persian (see a fragment of his Kitāb al-Nuḳaṭ, ed. L. Cheikho, in Mashriḳ, xx (1922), 373). But in their Arabic translations he and his school avoided mere transcriptions as far as possible, and thus helped to forge the Arabic scientific terminology. He was also at pains to acquire a sound knowledge of Arabic grammar; he is even said to have studied it at Baṣra and to have brought from there al-Khalīl's Kitāb al-ʿAyn. That he had the advantage of meeting the famous grammarian personally, as Ibn Djuldjul and others point out, is impossible for chronological reasons (see M. Plessner, in RSO, xxxi (1956), 244 f.). The Arab bibliographers unanimously attest that Ḥunayn was faṣīḥ.

How Ḥunayn acquired his astonishing knowledge of Greek is told by the eyewitness report of a certain Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm (see Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa, ed. Müller, i, 185 f.), which does indeed sound very trustworthy. It relates that Ḥunayn began his study of medicine at Baghdād under Yūḥannā b. Māsawayh, the famous court-physician and director of the bayt al-ḥikma [q.v.]. But as Ḥunayn used to ask too many troublesome questions, he incurred the anger of his master, who eventually ordered him to leave his school. Ḥunayn then disappeared from the capital for more than two years. The narrator himself is silent upon his whereabouts, but some sources contend that he went to Alexandria, others that he was staying in bilād al-Rūm. When he came back, he was so thoroughly versed in the Greek language that he could even recite from Homer. Afterwards he was reconciled with Ibn Māsawayh, who also encouraged him further to translate from the Greek (cf. Les axiomes médicaux de Yohanna Ben Massawaïh, ed. P. Sbath, Cairo 1934, 8, 33 f.).

Under the caliph al-Mutawakkil Ḥunayn was appointed chief physician to the court, but he had to suffer great hardships through the capricious behaviour of this Commander of the Faithful. One day he fell a victim to an intrigue of his Christian colleagues. As he was an enemy of image-worship, they induced him to spit on an icon during an audience. This provoked the indignation not only of the Nestorian katholikos, but also of the caliph. Ḥunayn was flogged, put in jail and deprived of his whole estate, including his library (for the historicity of this account see B. Hemmerdinger, in Actes du XII^e Congr. Int. d'Étud. Byzant., ii, Belgrade 1964, 467-9, and G. Strohmaier, in Klio, xliii-v (1965), 525-33). After six months he was set free and reinstated in his office, which he held until his death in 260/873. He had two sons, Dāwūd and Isḥāḳ [q.v.]. Both of them became medical practitioners; the latter, following in his father's footsteps, excelled in translating from the Greek, but concentrated more on philosophical works.

Translations: Ḥunayn is credited with an immense number of translations, ranging from medicine, philosophy, astronomy, mathematics to magic and oneiromancy. His Arabic translation of the Old Testament [see TAWRĀT], made after the Septuagint, was regarded as the best among other renderings (see al-Masʿūdī, al-Tanbīh, 112). So far as his versions are conserved, they can help in establishing the Greek text, for Ḥunayn had Greek manuscripts at his disposal which were several centuries older than ours. They also represent a valuable substitute for some writings that are otherwise lost.

Thanks to the important edition of Ḥunayn's Risāla ... ilā ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā fī dhikr mā turdjima min kutub Djālīnūs bi-ʿilmih wa-baʿḍ mā lam yutardjam by G. Bergsträsser (Ḥunain Ibn Isḥāq über die syrischen und arabischen Galen-Übersetzungen, Leipzig 1925, Abh. K. M. xvii/2), we possess a detailed report on the various translations of Galen that were available at his time. There exists a different recension of this Risāla, which was found some time later (see G. Bergsträsser, Neue Materialien zu Ḥunain Ibn Isḥāq's Galen-Bibliographie, Leipzig 1932, Abh.K.M. xix/2). Ḥunayn enumerates 129 titles, of which he himself translated about 100 into Syriac or Arabic or into both. The list is not exhaustive, however, for al-Rāzī [q.v.] wrote a special treatise Fi 'stidrāk mā baḳiya min kutub Djālīnūs mimmā lam yadhkurhu Ḥunayn wa-lā Djālīnūs fī Fihristih (see Fihrist, i, 300, cf. P. Kraus, Épître de Bērūnī, Paris 1936, no. 175). One must bear in mind that Ḥunayn wrote the Risāla after the complete loss of his library (see above), a fact to which he repeatedly refers in it (p. 1.11 f., 3.5-10, no. 95, cf. nos. 42 and 118). In the Risāla as well as in another tract Fī dhikr al-kutub allatī lam yadhkurhā Djālīnūs fī Fihrist kutubih (ed. G. Bergsträsser, in Neue Materialien, 84-98) he makes some statements about the spuriousness of several writings ascribed to Galen, and it is remarkable to see how his judgement coincides with the results of modern scholarship (see M. Meyerhof, in SBPr. Ak. W., phil.-hist. Kl., 1928, 531-48 and F. Kudlien, in Rheinisches Museum, cviii (1965), 295-9). Only the question of the commentary on the Hippocratic oath remains doubtful: Ḥunayn regarded it as genuine, but we have nowadays to rely on a few Arabic fragments (collected by F. Rosenthal, in Bulletin of the History of Medicine, xxx (1956), 52-87), whereas Ḥunayn had the full text before him.

In the Risāla he also gives some occasional remarks on his philological methods. They are not different from ours: he used to collect as many Greek manuscripts as possible and to collate them in order to get a sound textual basis for the translation (cf. nos. 3, 20, 74, 84). In search of manuscripts he travelled to Syria, Palestine and even to Egypt (cf. no. 115). But in one respect his philological principles deviate from the modern. Like other Christian translators he felt the obligation to eliminate all traces of paganism from the works of the ancients, e.g., to replace the pagan gods by the one God and His angels, etc. Usually this did not impair the scientific value of his translations, but it did some harm to the rich mythological material found in the dream-book of Artemidorus (see G. Strohmaier, in F. Altheim and R. Stiehl, Die Araber in der Alten Welt, v, Berlin, forthcoming).

The Risāla also contains valuable data on the translations of Galen made by Ḥunayn's predecessors and contemporaries. He does not spare them harsh criticism, if necessary, and he often had to revise their Syriac or Arabic versions. He himself translated either into Syriac for his Christian colleagues or into Arabic for the Muslim sponsors of his work [see BANŪ MŪSĀ]. It is remarkable that there is no word about the famous bayt al-ḥikma; the whole activity seems to have been based on a kind of private enterprise. He engaged two members of his family, his son Isḥāḳ, his nephew Ḥubaysh b. al-Ḥasan al-Aʿsam, and another pupil, ʿĪsā b. Yaḥyā, who also took part in translating Galen. Since Ḥubaysh and ʿĪsā did not understand Greek well enough, they made Syriac translations after Ḥunayn's Arabic (nos. 36, 38, 119) or, much more often, Arabic translations after Ḥunayn's Syriac. This could lead to some deterioration (cf. Galeni Compendium Timaei Platonis, ed. P. Kraus and R. Walzer, London 1951, 22-4), if Ḥunayn or Isḥāḳ did not have the opportunity to compare these new versions with the Greek original (cf. nos. 20, 49, 69, 86, 113, 126). Usually the colophons in the manuscripts of these second-hand versions mention Ḥunayn as the only translator, a fact which is already stated in the Fihrist (i, 128 and 289). The reason for this is not clear. Perhaps it is due to the modesty of the pupils themselves, or else they wanted to conceal the circumstance of the double translation, as Muslim intellectuals had been well aware of its shortcomings.

Unfortunately, there exists no corresponding risāla for the non-Galenic writings, and it remains to be proved by an analysis of the language and by possible mistakes resulting from ambiguities of Syriac words, whether the present Arabic versions were made by Ḥunayn directly from the Greek or by someone else after his Syriac translation. Nearly all of these Syriac versions are now lost (for the possible ascription of some fragments to Ḥunayn see G. Furlani, in ZS, iii (1924), 28 and J. Schleifer, in RSO, xviii (1940), 348).

Ḥunayn's own works: Besides his translations Ḥunayn composed numerous original works, mainly on medical, but also on philosophical, geophysical, meteorological, zoological, linguistic, and religious subjects. He is even credited with a history of the world from Adam down to al-Mutawakkil. His medical treatises are mainly epitomes and rearrangements of classical material. Many of them are written in the form of questions and answers, this curious kind of literature being very common also in the biblical exegesis of the Nestorian church at this time (cf. E. G. Clarke, The selected questions of Ishō bar Nūn on the Pentateuch, Leiden 1962, 10-3). His main work in this field is al-Masāʾil fi ʾl-ṭibb (numerous mss.), later translated into Hebrew and Latin. There also exists a so-called Isagoge Johannitii ad parvam artem Galeni (many Latin mss. and early printed texts). According to M. Steinschneider (Die hebräischen Übersetzungen, 710) this is another recension of the same work.—The following titles show Ḥunayn's special interest in ophthalmology: al-ʿAs͟hr maḳālāt fi ʾl-ʿayn (ed. M. Meyerhof, The book of the ten treatises on the eye ascribed to Hunain ibn Is-hâq, Cairo 1928). This work appears in two different Latin versions, as the Liber de oculis Constantini Africani and Galeni de oculis liber a Demetrio translatus (see J. Hirschberg, in SBPr. Ak. W., 1903, 1080-94).—For his sons Dāwūd and Isḥāḳ he wrote al-Masāʾil fi ʾl-ʿayn (ed. P. Sbath and M. Meyerhof, Le livre des questions sur l'œil de Ḥonain ibn Isḥâq, Cairo 1938, MIE 36). —A little tract about the incorporeal nature of light Fi ʾl-ḍawʾ wa-ḥaḳīḳatih shows Aristotle as his main authority in the field of physics (ed. L. Cheikho, in Mas͟hriḳ, ii (1899), 1105-13 and with French translation in Actes du XIe Congr. Int. des Orient., Paris 1897, IIIe sect., Paris 1899, 125-42, German translation by C. Prüfer and M. Meyerhof, in Isl., ii (1911), 117-28).

The often quoted Nawādir al-falāsifa are extant in later Arabic extracts, a mediaeval Hebrew translation of which has been edited by A. Loewenthal (Sefer Mūsrē ha-Pīlōsōfīm, Frankfurt a.M. 1896, German translation by the same, Berlin 1896). The Arabic text remains to be edited (see K. Merkle, Die Sittensprüche der Philosophen "Kitâb âdâb al-falâsifa" von Ḥonein ibn Isḥâq in der Überarbeitung des Muḥammed ibn ʿAlî al-Anṣârî, Leipzig 1921; M. Plessner, in Tarbiz, xxiv (1954-5), 60-72, VI f.; J. Kraemer, in ZDMG, cvi (1956), 292-302). The book is mainly a collection of stories, letters, and sayings ascribed to the ancient Greek philosophers, mingled with Ḥunayn's own reflections. It is based on similar Byzantine florilegia and contains very old material (see G. Strohmaier, in Hermes, xcv (1967)). Part 3 deals with the death of Alexander the Great: its connexion with the Alexander Romance remains to be investigated.—A little apologetic tract Fī kayfiyyat idrāk ḥaḳīḳat al-diyāna is conserved in an abridged form (ed. L Cheikho, in Nöldeke-Festschrift, i, Giessen 1906, 283-91, and P. Sbath, in Vingt traités philosophiques et apologétiques, Cairo 1929, 181-5). Some points in this treatise may be understood as an intelligent and cautious polemic against Islam.—Ḥunayn's bibliographical Risāla to ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā has been mentioned above; there also exists a short letter to his sponsor Salmawayh b. Būnān as an introduction to the translation of Galen's De consuetudinibus (German translation by F. HUNGARY [see BASHDJIRT, MADJARISTĀN].

HUNS [see HAYĀṬILA].

HUNTING [see BAYZARA, FAHD, ṢAYD; for hunting-songs see ṬARDIYYA].

HUNZA and NAGIR, two principalities in the extreme west of the Karakoram range of mountains, lie between Gilgit in the south, Ishkomān in the west, Afghān Wākhān in the north, and Chinese Turkistān in the north and east, i.e., approximately between 74° 10′ and 75° 20′ E. and 36° 10′ and 37° N. The whole area is extremely rugged and mountainous and for the most part uninhabitable. Permanent settlements exist only in the river valleys where terracing and irrigation of the mountainsides is possible, principally along the Hunza river, which traverses Hunza from north to south and west, and its left tributary the Nagir river. The Hunza river falls into the Gilgit river, a tributary of the Indus, below Gilgit town. The road beside it, skirting Mt. Rakaposhī (25,550 ft./ 7,780 m.) in the Kailās range, provides the only access to the territory which does not entail crossing passes at 15,000 ft./4,500 m. or more. Although Hunza is much the larger of the two states, their populations are approximately equal, ca. 13,500 souls each (1931 census). Of these, two-thirds are Burusho, who speak Burushaski, a language with no known affinities. The remainder are Wākhīs, in the north west of Hunza, and Shinā speakers, in the south west of Nagir. The Nagirīs are Shīʿī Muslims, but the Hunzukuts have for the last four or five generations belonged to the Ismāʿīlī, or Mawlāʾī, sect led by the Āghā Khān.

The Mīrs, or Thams, of Hunza and Nagir are drawn from two closely related families of legendary origin. Their capitals are at Bāltīt (altitude 8,000 ft./ 2,400 m.) and Nagir (7,500 ft./2,250 m.) respectively. Hunza, reputedly the more vigorous of the two states, has maintained its independence since the earliest times, though occasionally paying nominal allegiance either to the Chinese or to the rulers of Gilgit. In the first part of the 19th century the Hunzukuts were responsible for a series of raids on caravans passing between Kāshghar and Kashmīr, many captives being sold into slavery in Badakhshān. When the Sikhs occupied Gilgit they attempted without success to subdue their troublesome neighbour. Only in 1869 did the Tham of Hunza, Ghazan Khān, agree to pay tribute to the Dogra Mahārādjā of Kashmīr, though no Kashmīrī was allowed to enter the valley. In 1891 the Tham was murdered by his son Safdar ʿAlī, who recommenced raids on Gilgit and accepted Russian overtures. This led to a small Indian force being sent into the states, which were thereafter included in British India. Safdar fled to Kāshghar and his brother Muḥammad Naẓīm was proclaimed Tham in his place. He was succeeded peacefully by his son Ghazan Khān in 1938. For recent history, see KASHMĪR.

ḤŪR (A.), pl. of ḥawrāʾ and its masc. aḥwar, adjective from the root ḥ.w.r., with the general idea of 'whiteness' (the root ḥ.y.r., signifying 'perplexity' or 'astonishment', which has occasionally been suggested, is to be rejected); ḥawrāʾ is applied more particularly to the very large eye of the gazelle or the oryx, the clear whiteness of which arises from the contrast with the blackness of the pupil and the iris; by extension, ḥawrāʾ signifies a woman whose big black eyes are in contrast to their 'whites' and to the whiteness of the skin. The plural ḥūr is a substantival adjective used in the Ḳurʾān for the virgins of Paradise promised to the Believers, the houris; the latter term has entered European languages through the Persian singular (ḥūrī or ḥūrī beheshtī) and the Turkish ḥūri, whereas the Arabic noun of unity, a secondary formation from ḥūr, is ḥūriyya, pl. ḥūriyyāt.

The houris are mentioned in various verses of the Ḳurʾān dating from the Meccan period, that is to say the period when stress is laid upon the Last Judgement and when the delights of Paradise are contrasted with the torments of hell. The Holy Book announces to the Believers first that they will have as wives houris (LII, 20; cf. XLIV, 54) like "the hidden pearl", in recompense for their actions upon earth (LVI, 22-3/23-4); they will be "spotless virgins, amorous, like of age" (LVI, 34-9/35-40; cf. LXXVIII, 33, XXXVIII, 52) and will have "swelling breasts" (LXXVIII, 33); neither man nor djinn will have touched them (LV, 56, 74); they will keep their eyes modestly cast down (LV, 56, XXXVII, 47/48, XXXVIII, 52); resembling "ruby and coral", they will be enclosed in pavilions (LV, 58, 72). The only detail added during the Medinan period is that they will be "purified wives" (II, 23/25, III, 13/15, LXI, 12, IV, 60/57), which means, according to the commentators, that they are free alike from bodily impurity and from defects of character.

To these rather brief statements, tradition and traditional exegesis have added details giving a more precise form to the houris and a more sensual character to the pleasures promised.

Firstly, the verse saying that neither man nor djinn will have touched them suggests to some commentators that there are two classes of houris, one sharing the nature of men, the other that of djinns. As for the substance from which they are created, some believe that they are made of saffron, others of saffron, musk, amber and camphor, and that they have four colours: white, green, yellow and red. In any case their flesh is so delicate that the texture of the muscles of their legs can be seen, even through 70 silken garments. Their physical characteristics are described in general terms: their eyebrows are a black line upon light, their forehead is a crescent moon, and their shining faces reflect the divine light. On the breast of each are inscribed two names: one being a name of Allāh and one that of her husband. They bear their husband's name in the feminine (see above, FĀṬIMA, ii, 846b. On hands and feet they wear many jewels and precious stones.

They dwell in pavilions or castles hollowed out in a single pearl and furnished with 70 sumptuous beds and 70 couches of ruby covered with 70 rugs, and are surrounded by 70,000 maids of honour, who, at their husband's arrival loosen and hold up their 70,000 tresses. Their age is equal to that of their husbands, namely 33 years (the age of Jesus); their virginity is perpetually renewed. The Elect will have the bliss of deflowering them, and their pleasure will be a hundred times greater than on earth; some—such as Jesus—will have a hundred houris at their disposal and will be able to have connexion with each of them as many times as he has fasted days in Ramaḍān and performed good works. The houri remains enclosed in her pavilion and walks gracefully to meet her husband; she strolls sometimes with him beside the streams of Paradise and drinks with him wine which produces no intoxication. Being purified, she knows neither the menstrual discomforts of women, nor human needs, nor the pains of childbirth, for she bears no children.

To complete the picture, we must consider the lot reserved for women-believers admitted to Paradise. According to the Ḳurʾān, the Elect will meet again those who were virtuous among their ancestors, their wives and their descendants (XIII, 23; cf. XL, 8; in XXXVI, 56 and XLIII, 70 only wives are mentioned). The commentators maintain that every women who was married and virtuous by nature will meet her husband in Paradise and become again his legal wife; those who had several husbands will be able to choose the one they prefer; while polygamous husbands will be allowed to keep all their earthly wives. The women among the Believers will be 70,000 times superior to the houris, will know none of the cares of earthly life and will spend their time enjoying pleasures of every sort. The commentators remain silent on the fate of virtuous women who have remained unmarried, and give the impression that the daughters of Eve are definitely at a disadvantage in comparison with men.

The traditional exegesis, although it readily admits all the concrete amplifications, does not always accept uncritically the popular materialistic and sensual idea of the houris and of the delights of Paradise in general which has become common. Al-Bayḍāwī himself (on II, 23) considers that there is no substantial identity between the foods, the women, etc. of Paradise and their earthly equivalents. A similar interpretation, leading to the bilā kayf, was to be widely developed by the falāsifa and the Ṣūfīs, who gave an esoteric meaning to the concrete statements of the Ḳurʾān, while modernist exegesis, it being impossible to reject these statements, tends to reduce the number of houris which the Elect will enjoy, rejects many *ḥadīth*s which are in greater or less degree canonical, and tries to confer a spiritual character on the promised delights, while recognizing the difficulty of convincing those of the Faithful who adhere to literal interpretations [see DJANNA].

Among Islamologists there are many who have tried to explain the picture which the Ḳurʾān gives of houris. Carra de Vaux, in the art. DJANNA in EI[1], suggests that in "some Christian miniatures or mosaics representing the gardens of Paradise ... the figures of angels [may have been interpreted] as being those of young men or girls", but it is not easy to arrive at the real origin of the sensual concepts set out in the Ḳurʾān and amplified by tradition. L. Massignon (Mystique et continence en Islam, in Études carmélitaines, 1952, 95) considers that "the symbolism of the houris of Paradise ... alludes basically to the simple regaining, by the human species, of the first Paradise, where sexual life was well established". On the other hand, Ch. J. Ledit (Mahomet, Israël et le Christ, Paris 1956, 117) observes that the Ḳurʾān takes account of certain domestic difficulties of the Prophet, considers the houris, and finds in Muḥammad's meditation "the compensation for a cruel situation, the sublimation of impulses which refuse to degrade themselves in slave delights, and at the same time, the allurement of the later fulfilments of Medina—in a word, all the benefits of the classical play of psychism in the course of purification." There is indeed practically no further mention of houris during the Medinan period when, in the sphere of human affections, the Prophet found his equilibrium.

ḤURAYMILĀ, a town (est. pop. 3,000 in 1965) of al-Maḥmal district in Nadjd, Central Arabia; in the early 12th/18th century residence of the reformer and founder of Wahhābism [q.v.], Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb. Ḥuraymilā is said to have been founded by Āl Mubārak of Āl Abī Rabbāʿ, a group of ʿAnaza stock who left the town of Ushayḳir in al-Washm after a dispute with Banū Tamīm. In 1045/1635-6 they settled on the site of Ḥuraymilā, where the *shaʿīb*s now known as al-Shuʿba and al-Abraḳ join Wādī Abū Ḳitāda (variant Kidāda). The name Ḥuraymilā is conventionally spelled with alif mamdūda, although its meaning is explained as the diminutive singular of ḥarmal, a noxious shrub (Rhazya stricta Decne.) common in the area. Ḥuraymilā and the neighbouring villages of al-Ḳarīna and Malham are sometimes referred to collectively as al-Shaʿīb, the name locally applied to Wādī Abū Ḳitāda.

Āl Mubārak were still influential in Ḥuraymilā in 1965, although they shared the town with settled sections of Subayʿ, al-Dawāsir, Banū Tamīm, Banū Hādjir, Ḳaḥṭān, and other tribes. The amīr, who reported directly to the Amirate of al-Riyāḍ, administered the neighbouring towns and hamlets of al-Barīna, Malham, Sadūs, Ṣalbūkh, Ghiyāna, and al-Ḳarra. The *amīr*s appointed for Ḥuraymilā have usually not been natives of the town.

The economy of Ḥuraymilā, like that of other settlements of the area, is based on agriculture. Wheat, lucerne and, more recently, fruits and garden vegetables are grown in addition to the date palm. Sheep, goats, and cattle are fed on forage crops. A relatively dense growth of ṭalḥ (Acacia sp.) is protected in a ḥimā (pasture and forest reserve [q.v.]) in the wādī bed immediately southwest of Ḥuraymilā.

ḤURḲŪṢ B. ZUHAYR AL-SAʿDĪ, Companion of the Prophet, who conquered Sūḳ al-Ahwāz, took part in the siege of "the House" and became a Khāridjī. Although there is no source which gives the date of his conversion, it can be deduced that it took place at a fairly early date from the fact that he was among the Muslims who swore obedience to the Prophet "under the tree" (6/628) at al-Ḥudaybiya [q.v.]. The name of Ḥurḳūṣ is mentioned for the first time in the works of the Arab historians in 17/638: as the Persian general al-Hurmuzān [q.v.], the defender of al-Ahwāz, was behaving in a threatening way in spite of a pact which had been concluded with the Muslims, ʿUtba b. Ghazwān, the governor of Baṣra, warned the caliph ʿUmar about this, and the latter immediately sent troops under the command of Ḥurḳūṣ; having collected their forces, the Muslims marched against al-Hurmuzān and defeated him above the bridge of Sūḳ al-Ahwāz (known more briefly as al-Ahwāz). It was Ḥurḳūṣ who took this town, imposed the djizya on the population of the territory, which extended as far as the outskirts of Tustar, sent to Medina the announcement of his victory and the fifth of the booty, sent Djazʾ b. Muʿāwiya in pursuit of al-Hurmuzān and, with ʿUtba b. Ghazwān, informed this general of the peace conditions which the caliph imposed on him and which he accepted. Ḥurḳūṣ had received from the caliph the title of amīr for the war (ʿala 'l-ḳitāl) and that of amīr (governor) of the country which he was to conquer; but when the campaign against al-Hurmuzān was resumed, he took only a secondary part in the operations, for other leaders were put in charge of the troops of Kūfa and Baṣra. He appears again in 35/655-6 at Baṣra, for when a group set out from there for Medina to protest, together with the dissidents from Egypt and Kūfa, against the policy of the caliph ʿUthmān, he was their leader (al-Ṭabarī, i, 2955; Miskawayh, i, 487). In the episodes of the siege of "the House", the murder of ʿUthmān and the election of ʿAlī, Ḥurḳūṣ did not play an important part. He appears again at Baṣra, when ʿĀʾisha, Ṭalḥa and al-Zubayr, in revolt against ʿAlī, were approaching the town. He then joined with Ḥukaym b. Djabala, the chief of police at Baṣra, and with others who had been implicated in the murder of ʿUthmān, to prevent by armed resistance the forces of the three rebels from seizing the town [see AL-DJAMAL]. When the armistice between the governor ʿUthmān b. Ḥunayf and the three enemies of ʿAlī was broken and Baṣra was completely occupied by the latter, an order was issued forcing the population to arrest all those who had taken part in the siege of "the House" (nuffār); Ḥurḳūṣ was the only one who, by fleeing and obtaining the protection of his tribe, the Banū Saʿd, was able to escape the ensuing massacre. The sources do not mention the presence of Ḥurḳūṣ at the Battle of the Camel; it is therefore reasonable to suppose that he followed the policy of his fellow tribesmen who, belonging to the ʿUthmāniyya, the party which was loyal to the caliph ʿUthmān, had no desire to fight for ʿAlī (al-Ṭabarī, i, 3168). He was, on the other hand, present at Ṣiffīn in the army of the caliph; al-Dhahabī is the only writer, so far as is known, to provide this information, but it seems very probable that Ḥurḳūṣ was at the battle, for al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays [q.v.] (the chief of the Tamīm of Baṣra, of which the Banū Saʿd were a sub-group), after having remained neutral in the war of the Camel, had then gone over with his followers to the side of the caliph. Later, Ḥurḳūṣ adopted an entirely different attitude from that of his tribe by adhering to Khāridjism; the sources mention his presence at Ḥarūrāʾ ([q.v.]; Shammākhī, Siyar, 49), a fierce argument which he had with ʿAlī when the latter publicly announced his intention of remaining faithful to the convention of Ṣiffīn (al-Ṭabarī, i, 3360 f., etc.), his participation in the secret meetings of the dissidents at Kūfa, where they decided to assemble near the al-Nahrawān canal, and his two refusals to become their leader, and finally his death among the Khāridjīs at al-Nahrawān. Al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays, on the other hand, fought with 3,000 of his followers on the side of ʿAlī in this battle (Ṣafar 38/July-August 657).

Ḥurḳūṣ has been identified with a Tamīmī called ʿAmr Dhu 'l-Khuwayṣira (or Dhu 'l-Khunayṣira) al-Tamīmī, who was guilty of having been insolent to the Prophet during a sharing out of booty (Ibn Hishām, 884; al-Wāḳidī-Wellhausen, 376 f.; al-Ṭabarī, i, 1682; for the identification with Ḥurḳūṣ: Mubarrad, Kāmil, 565; al-Damīrī, Ḥayāt al-ḥayawān, s.v. Ḥurḳūṣ; Ibn Ḥadjar, Iṣāba, cited below). But he has even been identified with Dhu 'l-Thudayya, who had an excrescence on his shoulder resembling a small breast (thudayya) and who, in his turn, is sometimes identified or confused with another individual called al-Mukhdadj, i.e. the One-armed. ʿAlī had a search made among the Khāridjīs killed at al-Nahrawān for one or the other of these persons in order to verify the truth of a prophecy which he had heard. The historical sources which relate this episode give no explanations about the prophecy, but some ḥadīths report it in terms which connect it either explicitly or by allusion to Khāridjism; in addition the ḥadīths state that a mysterious person called Dhu 'l-Khuwayṣira or Dhu 'l-Thudayya or al-Mukhdadj had given Muḥammad the occasion to predict this movement, so that it was natural that ʿAlī should seek to discover the mysterious personage among the Khāridjīs of al-Nahrawān, and that he should be identified sometimes with Ḥurḳūṣ and sometimes with other warriors who were killed in the battle (citations and details in Caetani, Annali, 8 A.H. § 169 & n. 1, 38 A.H. §§ 107, 112 & n. 2, 115, 119, 126, 129 (p. 111), 130, (p. 114), 139, 140, 150-3, 158).

The attitude of the biographers of the Companions towards Ḥurḳūṣ is worthy of note: Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr ignores him in his Istīʿāb; Ibn al-Athīr and al-Dhahabī have accepted his Khāridjism as a fact; Ibn Ḥadjar informs us that there were doubts about the death of such a Companion among the Khāridjīs at al-Nahrawān and, since a ḥadīth excluded from Paradise one of the participants in the oath "under the tree", he adds that this excluded individual had been identified with Ḥurḳūṣ, but he does not accept the responsibility of asserting this.

HURMUZ (Old Persian: Ahuramazda, "wise lord"; Pahlavi: Auharmazd; Persian: Hurmazd, Hurmuzd, Hurmuz), supreme god of the ancient Iranians, whose name was later given to the planet Jupiter and to the first day of each month of the Zoroastrian year. In the works of Muslim writers (especially the Iranians and particularly the poets) are found allusions which display a very imprecise knowledge of Mazdaism; although there occurs the name of Zoroaster (Zardusht), one searches in vain for the name of Hurmuzd (cf. M. Moʿīn, Mazdayasna, parts 7 & 8 and the introd. by H. Corbin); however, according to Wolff (Glossar, s.v.), it is found—once—in the Shāh-nāma of Firdawsī, who uses most often Yazdān and, less often, Īzad. On the other hand, the name Hurmuz(d) is found in the works written by the historians of religion: the Bayān al-adyān of Abu 'l-Maʿālī, a lucid but brief summary, in Persian, completed in about 485/1092; the Kitāb al-Milal wa 'l-niḥal of al-Shahrastānī (479-548/1086-1153); the Tabṣirat al-ʿawāmm of Shaykh Murtaḍā (7th/13th century); the Dabistān al-madhāhib (ca. 1064-7/1654-7). The author of the Bayān states (tr., 22) that the Persians called their supreme Divinity Hurmuzd, Īzad [Old Iranian Yazata], Yazdān [Old Iranian Yazatānām]; it was probably this text that al-Maḳdisī follows (Livre de la création et de l'histoire, ed. tr. Cl. Huart, i, 56); in chapter ii (tr., 35), he gives a clear but concise account of the beliefs of the Gabr and of the dualism of Yazdān and Ahriman. Al-Shahrastānī, describing the beliefs of the Zarvanīs, explains (ed. Cureton, 183; tr. Haarbrucker, i, 277) how Ahriman and Hurmuz were born of Zarvān (cf. Christensen, Sassanides, 145 ff.) and by what stratagem Ahriman became the eldest and seized (though not for ever) the dominant rôle from Hurmuz; then, explaining the doctrine of Zoroaster, he mentions again the dualism of Ahriman and Yazdān (no longer Hurmuz). The Tabṣira (several passages of which derive from the Bayān al-adyān) contains (chap. ii) an account of the opinions of the Magians (madjūs): here Hurmuzd is referred to as Yazdān; "the world has two creators: Yazdān, and Ahriman who is Satan (shayṭān); it is said that when the Almighty created the world, he had a disturbing thought and exclaimed: 'Let me have no adversary to become my enemy!' and the product of this thought was the devil. It has also been said that, the Almighty being alone, he was afflicted by sadness and there occurred to him an evil suspicion, the product of which was Ahriman"; this work next gives an account of various beliefs concerning the origin and the activities of the two principles, and the creation and the age of the universe. In the Dabistān is found verbatim the passage quoted on the creation of Ahriman (tr., i, 356-7) whereas on other pages (269 and 338) Yazdān appears under the name of Urmuzd. It should be added that Zartusht Bahrām, author of the Zaratusht-nāma (a life of Zoroaster in 1580 verses, written in 677/1278), mentions only Yazdān (e.g., in verse 535), Lord (khodāvand) of the universe (ed. Rosenberg, Tehrān 1959).

The name Hurmuz was borne by five rulers of the Sāsānid dynasty. Hurmuz I, who reigned for only a year (272-3 A.D.), had been governor of Khurāsān and distinguished himself in the war against the Romans; he gave his protection to Mani as his father Shāpūr had done. Hurmuz II (302-9) is said to have persecuted the Manicheans, according to traditions preserved in some Coptic texts (Christensen, 195, n. 7); nevertheless he left behind him the reputation of having been a gentle and just ruler; he was killed by the Arabs after having defeated them; he had two sons, Shāpūr II and a prince Hurmuz who, after being a prisoner for thirteen months, escaped and made his way to Constantinople, where he accompanied the emperor Julian in his Persian campaign. Hurmuz III, during his brief reign, was forced to fight against his youngest brother who had obtained the support of the Hephtalites [see HAYĀṬILA]; he was defeated and killed. Hurmuz IV (579-90) is represented by the Byzantine historians as a proud man of mediocre intelligence; according to al-Ṭabarī on the other hand, his justice surpassed that of his father, Khusraw Anūshirwān, he being compassionate towards the common people but severe towards the nobles, which earned him the enmity of the latter and of a section of the Zoroastrian clergy; the hostilities continued, with the Byzantines gaining the advantage; Hurmuz having dismissed his best general Vahrām Čūbīn following a defeat, the latter led a revolt which became general; as a result Hurmuz was deposed and executed; this revolt and the love story of this king and Shīrīn form part of the subject of several great Persian poems. Hurmuz V, having striven to gain power, was executed on the orders of the last of the Sāsānids (632 A.D.). The name of Hurmuz was borne by other persons who appear in the indices of al-Ṭabarī, Yāḳūt and other writers; the most important was Hurmuzān [q.v.].

HURMUZ (HORMUZ, ORMUS). The original town, or Old Hormuz, as it has been called to distinguish it from its island offshoot, was situated on the mainland of Persia on the east side of the entrance to the Persian Gulf, at the head of a creek which has now largely silted up; the existing town of Mināb (27°09′ N., 57°05′ E.) stands on its site. Nearchus and his fleet, when on their way from the estuary of the Indus to the head of the Persian Gulf, anchored at the mouth of the Anamis river (now the Mināb creek), in the district of Harmozeia (Hormuz) (see William Vincent, The voyage of Nearchus and the Periplus of the Erythrean Sea, London 1809, 52, and idem, The commerce and navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Ocean, London 1807, i, 328-30). Ptolemy mentions the town as Harmuza, but gives its position incorrectly. It is possible that it may have been identical with Ammianus Marcellinus's Hermupolis (XXIII, 6, 49). Ardashīr I, the founder of the Sāsānian dynasty, has been credited with the foundation of the town, but it was probably in existence long before his time.

In the 4th/10th century, (Old) Hormuz was already the seaport for the provinces of Kirmān, Sīstān and Khurāsān (see Yāḳūt, iv, 968; Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, 124; Le Strange, 318). Marco Polo, who visited Hormuz in 1272 and again in 1293, after expatiating on the flourishing and widespread trade of the town, stated that it was a sickly place and that the heat of the sun in summer there was tremendous

(see The Book of Ser Marco Polo, ed. by Sir Henry Yule and revised by Henri Cordier, London 1905, i, 107). A few years after Marco Polo's second visit, repeated raids by marauding tribes became so serious that Ḳutb al-Dīn Tahamtan the King of Hormuz, in 700/1300, abandoned the site and moved all the inhabitants and their possessions to the small island of Djarūn, 60 km to the west and 6 km south of the nearest point on the mainland. A good harbour was constructed at the sheltered northern end of the island, and before long an exceedingly flourishing town came into being. This town was called New Hormuz, but by degrees the epithet 'new' was dropped and the island and its town were thenceforward known as Hormuz. The name Djarūn was transferred to the small town and port of Surū or Shahrū on the mainland 17 km to the north-west, where goods in transit to or from Hormuz were transhipped; this name became corrupted to Gamru and was further corrupted by Europeans into Gambrun, Gombrun and Gombroon. In 720/1320 King Ḳutb al-Dīn captured the island of Ḳays, which had up till then enjoyed great commercial prosperity, and also subdued Baḥrayn. Later in the reign of Ḳutb al-Dīn the intrepid Moorish traveller Ibn Baṭṭūṭa visited Hormuz, which he described as a large and fine city, with busy markets, as it was the port from which the wares from India and Sind were despatched to the ʿIrāḳs, Fārs and Khurāsān (see Ibn Baṭṭūṭa, ii, 230 ff. = Eng. tr., H.A.R. Gibb, ii, 400 f.: see also the account by Ibn Baṭṭūṭa's contemporary, Friar Odoric of Pordonone, in Cathay and the way thither, by Sir H. Yule, revised by Henri Cordier, London 1913, 112).

For the next three centuries Hormuz was extremely prosperous, despite its lack of fresh water and vegetation and the extreme heat in summer. The Russian traveller Afanasii Nikitin, who visited Hormuz in 1472, stated that it was a vast emporium where there were peoples and goods of every description from all parts of the world; however, he qualified his praise by complaining of the high duties there (Khoženie za tri Morya, Moscow 1958, 21). The Venetian J. Barbaro, who also visited Hormuz some years later, likewise praised it as a commercial centre (Travels of Josafa Barbaro, tr. William Thomas, London 1873, 79).

In 1507 a Portuguese fleet under the great Albuquerque appeared off the island. Realizing its great strategic importance owing to its situation at the entrance to the Persian Gulf, Albuquerque seized the island, but a mutiny of his men forced him to withdraw. Seven years later, however, Albuquerque returned, and this time the Portuguese occupation of the island was permanent. Occupied as he was with his great struggle with the Ottoman Turks, Shāh Ismāʿīl I could do nothing except protest at this violation of his territory. Under Portuguese rule, Hormuz continued to prosper, but the fact that the island was in foreign hands was always deeply resented by Persia. The kings of Hormuz, who had hitherto been vassals of the Persian monarch, became subordinate to Portugal. The Venetian jeweller Gasparo Balbi, who was in Hormuz in 1580, described it as: una città non molto grande, ma popolosa, posta in un' isola di trenta miglia di grandezza, ma è la piu sterile di quante mai io n'habbia viste; perciò che in esse non si trova altro che sale e le legne e le altre cose al vito necessarie vi vengono portate dalla costa di Persia, ch'è distante da questa citta da 6 miglia; evise ne conducono in tanta quantità, que la città ne resta copiosamente fornita (see Balbo's Discrittione di Ormus, in Il Nuovo Ramusio iv: Viaggi di C. Federici e G. Balbi alle Indie Orientale, ed. O. Pinto, Rome 1962, 118). The Englishman, Ralph Fitch, who was in Hormuz three years later, described it as 'the dryest island in the world, for there is nothing growing in it but salt' (Purchas his Pilgrimes, London 1625, Part II, 1731).

After Shāh ʿAbbās I had consolidated his power, it became obvious that to so nationalistic a monarch the continued presence of the Portuguese in Hormuz would soon precipitate a crisis. Already, by 1602, Allāhwerdi Khān, the Governor-General of Fārs, had wrested Baḥrayn from the feeble hands of the King of Hormuz, who, like his predecessors since 1514, was merely a vassal of Spain and Portugal. In 1614 the Persian forces occupied Gamru (Gombroon), the last foothold of the Portuguese on the mainland, thereby depriving the garrison and inhabitants of Hormuz of one of their sources of supply of water. Eight years later, Shāh ʿAbbās, by putting strong pressure on the English East India Company, forced it to allow a number of its ships to co-operate with the Persian land forces in an assault on Hormuz. Despite strong resistance by the Portuguese, the Persians, with the assistance of the English vessels, forced the garrison to surrender and to evacuate the island. Hormuz was soon deserted and many of its buildings were demolished in order to provide material for the erection of new buildings in Gamru, which was renamed Bandar ʿAbbās in honour of the Shāh. The part played by the English East India Company on this occasion not unnaturally aroused the anger of the Portuguese. The late Sir Arnold Wilson, in his book The Persian Gulf (Oxford 1928, 149), stated that it was difficult to discover what the East India Company gained from this action. It seems clear, however, that if the Portuguese had been allowed to remain in Hormuz, the East India Company would never have been able to compete with the flourishing Portuguese entrepôt at Hormuz, while its establishments on the coast and also its vessels would have been always in jeopardy from their ships based on that island.

At the present time the population of Hormuz is small and fluctuating. In the cooler months, the numbers increase when the salt and iron oxide deposits are worked, but in the summer many migrate to the mainland, especially to Minā. The only relatively stable elements of the population are the fishermen.

(O. LÖFGREN)

AL-HURMUZĀN (in Persian Hörmiz(d)ān), Persian toparch and general, defender of Khūzistān from the end of 16/637, or more probably the beginning of 17/638, to 19/640 or perhaps 21/642, who was taken prisoner by the Arabs at Tustar and killed by ʿUbayd Allāh b. ʿUmar [q.v.] at Medina (end of 23/November 644); the Persian officer who fought at Dhū Ḳār and whom al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj, ii, 228, calls al-Hurmuzān was really called Hāmarz [q.v.]. Al-Hurmuzān commanded the right wing of the Persian army at al-Ḳādisiyya [q.v.] (Djumādā I 16/June 637) and when the tide of the battle turned against the Persians, he retreated with other generals to Bābil; after putting up a feeble resistance there, he withdrew to the Ahwāz (= Khūzistān), having some possessions at Mihridjānḳadhaḳ and in the districts of the Ahwāz. According to al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, 380; cf. al-Dīnawarī, 136 f.), he also took part in the battle of Djalūlā' (probably in Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 16/November-December 637), and, from Nahr Tīrā, he harassed the Muslim frontier fortresses of the Maysān and of the Dast-i Maysān. The Muslims, having obtained the help of the tribe of the Banu 'l-ʿAm (a sub-group of the Tamīm) then inflicted on him, between Nahr Tīrā and Duluth, a crushing defeat, as a result of which he withdrew to the east of the Dudjayl, crossing the river by the bridge of Sūḳ al-Ahwāz (= the town of al-Ahwāz) and obtained peace by abandoning to the invaders Manādhir, Nahr Tīrā and the part of the territory of Sūḳ al-Ahwāz which they had already seized. But the peace did not last. Pressed by the king Yazdadjird, who was fleeing from Ḥulwān to Iṣfahān and thence to Iṣṭakhr, al-Hurmuzān once again took up a threatening attitude, which, it is said, forced the Muslims to resume the offensive. After one or two campaigns the course of which is not clear (the most detailed account is that of the traditionist Sayf b. ʿUmar) al-Hurmuzān entrenched himself in Tustar (Shushtar) on the upper Dudjayl. The Muslim forces subjected this town to a long (2 years or 18 months) and bitter siege. Al-Hurmuzān, after the besiegers had taken by assault the trenches defended by the troops of Fārs, Djibāl and al-Ahwāz, retreated into the town and, when this was occupied through treachery, into the fortress. Finally he surrendered to the caliph and was led to Medina with twelve other Persians by the Companion Anas b. Mālik. Al-Hurmuzān's arrival in Medina is described with a number of details which seem to bear a romantic stamp (and which have provided subjects for the novels Harmosan and Hormusan by Platen and by Schwetschke: see A. Muller, Der Islam, i, 244, n. 1): the Persians clad in luxurious gowns of brocade with gold belts, bracelets, etc., and al-Hurmuzān with his diadem, astonished the inhabitants of Medina; the conversation between ʿUmar and al-Hurmuzān was a dramatic one; the latter obtained amān, thanks to a ruse; he was stripped of his clothing and his ornaments and the Companion Surāḳa b. Mālik b. Djuʿshum, who was as thin as he was, put them on, on ʿUmar's orders. Al-Hurmuzān was invited to embrace Islam but refused, and the caliph, on ʿAlī's advice, decided to banish the whole group of prisoners to Syria (or Egypt); during the voyage they were shipwrecked and the Persians, having been saved, embraced Islam; ʿUmar then recalled the prisoners to Medina. Apart from these stories, the basic facts of which have evidently been embroidered, the sources supply other information which there seems no real reason to doubt: al-Hurmuzān became ʿUmar's adviser on Persian affairs (the pension of 2000 dirhams, which, according to several sources (Ibn Saʿd, al-Balādhurī, Yaḥyā b. Ādam, etc.) the caliph assigned to him as well as to other dihḳans, was perhaps in reward for their services); he was a person of some consequence at Medina (otherwise his murder would not have become a state matter); he embraced Islam (the sources agree on this point, even though his sincerity is sometimes held in question); often the difference is stressed between al-Hurmuzān, who had become a Muslim, and Abū Lu'lu'a (the murderer of ʿUmar) and Djufayna (also killed by ʿUbayd Allāh b. ʿUmar), who remained Christian; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 457 f. and Yaḥyā b. Ādam assert that he pronounced the formula professing the faith of Islam when he saw that he was wounded, but it is possible that by this detail the traditionists wished to stress his firm adherence to Islam in the face of death rather than to delay his conversion to the final moments of his life. The doubt concerning his conversion rests in fact only on the phrase which ʿUthmān is said to have uttered: "they [those whom ʿUbayd Allāh had killed] were in our dhimma". But the facts which above all have made al-Hurmuzān famous in the annals of Islam are the following: when the Persian slave Abū Lu'lu'a stabbed the caliph ʿUmar in the mosque at Medina and was killed as he attempted to make a way for himself through the crowd, the suspicion spread that he had had accomplices. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf (or ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr) remembered a few days earlier having seen Abū Lu'lu'a conferring with his compatriots al-Hurmuzān and Djufayna (the latter was a Christian from al-Ḥīra whom Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳāṣ had brought to Medina); the three men, he said, having got up as he approached, there had fallen between them a dagger of a special type which resembled that which Abū Luʾluʾa had used to wound the caliph. ʿUmar's son, ʿUbayd Allāh, had threatened to make those guilty pay dearly if his father died from his wound. The words of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAwf confirmed him in the idea that the Persians who had been seen in conversation with Abū Luʾluʾa had taken part in the attempt on ʿUmar's life, and when ʿUmar finally died (26 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 23/3 November 644), he not only killed Abū Luʾluʾa's wife and a young daughter who was a Muslim, but having made a pretext to call al-Hurmuzān aside, he wounded him mortally with his sword, and killed Djufayna in the same way. In his great anger he cried out that he was going to kill all the foreign slaves living in Medina (or all the Persians: al-Masʿūdī iv, 353) and also others, alluding to some Muhādjirūn (Ibn Saʿd, iii/1, 257) or to some of the Muhādjirūn and the Anṣār (al-Ṭabarī, i, 2795). He was held back and threatened, but continued to shout thus. ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ took his sword away from him; Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳāṣ and ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, who had hastened to the scene, laid hands on him, and they had to be separated. While awaiting a decision on his fate, Saʿd imprisoned ʿUbayd Allāh in his house, (or it was Ṣuhayb, the Companion who had been charged with the leading of the prayer after the attempt on ʿUmar's life, who put him in prison). As soon as he was elected caliph, ʿUthmān concerned himself with the matter and, in spite of the vigorous opposition of several Muhādjirūn and Anṣār, decided to pardon ʿUbayd Allāh and to pay blood money from his own revenue to the families of the victims. This action, for reasons which are not clear, later became a charge of indictment against ʿUthmān, and it is probably the resulting polemic concerning his intervention and his decision which gave rise to the divergent accounts of the sources on who were the persons competent to solve the question: it is related that ʿUthmān handed over the murderer to the son of al-Hurmuzān, but that the latter renounced his right to vengeance and that, because of this generous act, he was carried home in triumph (Usd, etc.); but it is also related (Ibn Kathīr) that al-Hurmuzān had no heirs; it is reported that he had wished to embrace Islam at the hands of al-ʿAbbās, whence the right of the Banū Hāshim to have a say in the question of the revenge (al-Ṭabarī-Zotenberg) or that he had a brother-in-law (ṣahr) among the Ṭālibīs (al-Iṣṭakhrī).

Al-Hurmuzān was nicknamed ʿurfuṭ, but the reason for this is not clear, ʿurfuṭ being the name of a thorny shrub which exudes an evil-smelling resin.

ḤURR (1) in the legal sense, "free" as opposed to "slave" [see ʿABD]; (2) with social and ethical extensions, "generous", "gentlemanly" [see ḤURRIYYA, i]; (3) in modern usage, used for both "free" and "independent" [see ḤURRIYYA, ii and ISTIḲLĀL].

AL-ḤURR B. ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN AL-THAḲAFĪ, nephew of Mūsā b. Nuṣayr [q.v.] and cousin of his son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. He was appointed governor of al-Andalus by the Arab wālī of Ḳayrawān, Muḥammad b. Yazīd, in 97/716. He arrived in the Peninsula accompanied by 400 noblemen of Ifrīḳiya, among whom were the first men of eminence to enter al-Andalus. One of his first measures was to transfer the capital of his government to Cordova, considering that the position of Seville was now too remote in view of the extension which the conquest of the country had acquired. Being a Ḳaysī by origin, and so an enemy of the Yemenīs, he established a form of government full of arrogance and intransigeance towards his co-religionists and of harshness towards the vanquished Hispano-Romans. Since he embarked upon a policy with regard to the latter which was so different from that followed by ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Nuṣayr, it would appear that it was the Ḳayrawānī ʿulamāʾ who had come with him who began the thankless task of redistributing the lands and property confiscated from the vanquished. It would be during his term of office, which lasted until Ramaḍān 100/March-April 719, that the Spanish Reconquista began with the proclamation of Pelayo and the episode of the siege of Covadonga, although it is still impossible, for lack of sure documentation, to fix the exact date. Al-Ḥurr was deposed by the caliph ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, who appointed as his successor al-Samḥ b. Mālik and charged him personally with the task of establishing justice, governing mildly, and exacting the "Fifth" from the conquered lands.

AL-ḤURR B. YAZĪD B. NĀDJIYA B. KAʿNAB B. ʿATTĀB B. AL-ḤĀRITH B. ʿAMR B. HAMMĀM AL-RIYĀḤĪ, AL-YARBŪʿĪ, AL-TAMĪMĪ came at the head of a troop of 1000 horsemen from al-Ḳādisiyya as a vanguard of the forces sent by ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād, the governor of al-ʿIrāḳ against al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib [q.v.]. The latter was advancing at the time with a group of his kindred and followers in the direction of al-Kūfa. Al-Ḥurr was ordered to follow closely the group of al-Ḥusayn so as to bring him to ʿUbayd Allāh in al-Kūfa; he was however not told to fight. Accordingly he kept close to the camp of al-Ḥusayn and prevented him from turning back to al-Madina, but agreed that he should proceed in a direction other than al-Kūfa. The relations between al-Ḥurr and al-Ḥusayn were not at first hostile: he even prayed behind al-Ḥusayn; he denied at the same time having any knowledge of the letters sent by the people of al-Kūfa to al-Ḥusayn.

Rigidly adhering to a new order received from ʿUbayd Allāh (2 Muḥarram 61/2 October 680) he prevented al-Ḥusayn and his followers from arriving at a settled place, compelling them to pitch their camp in the barren spot of Karbalāʾ.

When ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳāṣ, heading the forces dispatched by ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād, rejected the proposals of al-Ḥusayn and decided to fight him, al-Ḥurr decided to join al-Ḥusayn, although knowing that the latter's situation was desperate. He expressed his regret, went over with a small group of his followers to al-Ḥusayn and the latter promised him God's forgiveness. He fought bravely, killed 2 warriors of the force of ʿUmar b. Saʿd and was finally killed (10 Muḥarram 61/10 October 680).

The tradition about the repentance of al-Ḥurr, his audacity in the encounter and his heroic death became a part of the story of the martyrdom of al-Ḥusayn.

AL-ḤURR AL-ʿĀMILĪ, laḳab of the ithnāʿasharī shaykh MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN B. ʿALĪ B. AL-ḤUSAYN AL-ʿĀMILĪ AL-MASHGHARĪ (also of his brother, the historian Aḥmad who died in 1120/1708-9 and who succeeded him in Mashhad as shaykh al-Islām, before being invited to Iṣfahān by shāh Sultan Ḥusayn in 1115/1703-4). He was born on Friday 8 Radjab 1033/26 April 1624 at Mashghar in the Djabal ʿĀmil, where he completed his first studies with his father, his paternal uncle, the shaykh Muḥammad, his maternal grandfather, the shaykh ʿAbd al-Salām b. Muḥammad, and one of his father's maternal uncles, the shaykh ʿAlī b. Maḥmūd; at Djabʿ, in the same Djabal, he was also the pupil of the shaykh Ḥusayn Ẓahīr and of Zayn al-Dīn, a great-grandson of al-Shahīd al-thānī [q.v.]. After remaining 40 years in the Djabal, during which he twice made the pilgrimage to Mecca, Muḥammad visited the shrines of Arab ʿIrāḳ, whence he journeyed to Iran to settle in Mashhad and to remain there as the shaykh al-Islām of the sanctuary of Imām ʿAlī al-Riḍā. In the course of another ḥadjdj, he passed through Iṣfahān, where he was favourably received by Muḥammad Bāḳir Madjlisī [q.v.]. The latter presented him to Shāh Sulaymān, who also offered him his patronage although, it appears, he showed some surprise at first at the simplicity and lack of savoir-faire of the shaykh. He died at Mashhad, where he had soon returned, and was buried in the sanctuary, near the madrasa of Mīrzā Djaʿfar.

As a pupil of Zayn al-Dīn, who himself had been the pupil of Muḥammad Amīn Astarābādī (but who was also the grandson of such a well qualified representative of the uṣūlī school as shaykh Ḥasan b. Zayn al-Dīn, the author of the Maʿālim al-uṣūl [see UṢŪLIYYŪN]), it is not surprising to find him among the Akhbāriyyūn, whose methodology he strove to justify with arguments considered "more subtle than a spider's web" (awhan min bayt al-ʿankabūt). His principal work is indeed a vast collection of ḥadīth, the Tafṣīl wasāʾil al-Shīʿa ilā aḥkām al-sharīʿa (even his opponents admire the breadth and erudition of this work although they criticize its faults in juridical elaboration), which makes him the second of the "three great Muḥammads of recent centuries" (the first being Muḥsin-i Fayḍ and the third Madjlisī). The great work, composed over 18 years, was lithographed at Tehrān in 1323-4 (3 vols.) and was "completed" quite recently by Mīrzā Ḥusayn Nūrī Ṭabarsī, a very polemical disciple of the shaykh Murtaḍā al-Anṣārī and the master of the contemporary ʿālim Āḳā Buzurg Ṭihrānī, who died at Nadjaf in 1320, with his Mustadrak al-wasāʾil wa mustanbaṭ al-masāʾil (3 vols., lith. Tehrān 1311-1321). The second great work of the shaykh al-Ḥurr on ḥadīths, Djawāhir al-saniyya fi 'l-aḥādīth al-ḳudsiyya, which also was printed in Tehrān, 1302, is regarded as the first collection of ḥadīth ḳudsī. But the second Muḥammad shared with the third (and this separates them both from the first) that hatred for Ṣūfism which inspired his Ithnāʿashariyya fī radd al-ṣūfiyya. He also worked in the field of ʿilm al-ridjāl, composing a biographical khātima for his Wasāʾil, and especially his very well-known Amal al-āmil fī ʿulamāʾ Djabal ʿĀmil (lith. Tehrān 1302) on the scholars of his native land, with a section devoted to the ruwāt, and a continuation on the "non-ʿĀmilī" scholars from the time of shaykh Ṭūsī down to his own day: Tadhkirat al-mutabaḥḥirīn fī ʿulamāʾ al-mutaʾakhkhirīn. The Amal al-āmil was "completed" by the sayyid Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAlī b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAlī Shabbāna al-Baḥrānī (fellow pupil of the shaykh Yūsuf al-Baḥrānī at the school of the shaykh Ḥusayn al-Māḥūzī, d. 1180/1766) with a Tatmīm Amal al- āmil, devoted also to the poets "from the time of al-Farazdaḳ down to our own day" and to the ʿulamāʾ of Baḥrayn; it has been further enriched recently by the Takmilat Amal al-āmil by the sayyid Ḥusayn Ṣadr al-Dīn. Among the numerous works of shaykh al-Ḥurr (who was quite prepared to collect the *ḥadīth*s of the Ahl al-Sunna) there is also a dīwān of 20,000 verses, according to his contemporary, the sayyid ʿAlī Khān Madanī Shīrāzī in his Sulāfat al-ʿaṣr.

ḤURRIYYA, "freedom," an abstract formation derived from ḥurr "free" corresponding to Hebrew ḥōr, Aram. ḥēr (ḥerūtā), widely used also in Muslim languages other than Arabic. Already in pre-Islamic times, "free" was known not only as a legal term denoting the opposite of "unfree, slave" (ʿabd [q.v.]) but also as an ethical term denoting those "noble" of character and behavior. The legal concept of "freedom" continued to be used as a matter of course by Muslim jurists, who were inclined to give preference to the presumption of a free status for individuals in doubtful cases [see ʿABD] but otherwise accepted the existence of slavery and the deprivation of a section of humanity of their freedom without questioning, at least openly, the moral foundations. In the ethical sense, the superiority of the ḥurr, showing in his gentlemanly behavior, his generosity, his readiness to suffer for a noble cause, was constantly extolled in poetry and prose. The Greco-Arabic translation literature introduced the Muslims to some sayings illustrating Greek thinking on the problem of freedom; at the same time, it helped to reinforce the equation of "free" and "noble" and added some confusion of its own through the use of ḥurriyya to translate eleutheriotēs "generosity" in the Aristotelian canon of virtues. Furthermore, the writings of philosophers such as al-Fārābī and Ibn Rushd took some limited cognizance of "freedom" as a political term. In Muslim metaphysical speculation, ḥurriyya came to occupy a rather significant position through Ṣūfism. It appears as one of the guideposts on the mystic path in the Lumaʿ of al-Sarrādj and in the Risāla of his successor al-Ḳushayrī. Through the Risāla in particular, it gained a firm place in Ṣūfī literature. For the mystic, "freedom" is basically the freedom from everything except God and the devotion to Him. It is the recognition of the essential relationship between God the master and His human slaves who are completely dependent on Him, "freedom," as Ibn ʿArabī expresses it, "being perfect slavery" (al-Iʿlām bi-ishārāt ahl al-ilhām, Ḥaydarābād 1362, 8). However, one also hears about the existence of men who defended the necessity of "absolute freedom" (O. Pretzl, Die Streitschrift des Ġazālī gegen die Ibāḥīja, in SBBayer. Ak. 1933, text 27 f., trans. 51).

Ḥurriyya, although much discussed, did not achieve the status of a fundamental political concept that could have served as a rallying cry for great causes. Only this much can be stated with assurance. Beyond it, any evaluation of the situation prevailing in mediaeval Islam with regard to "freedom," in the way in which the term is generally if loosely used in the contemporary West, depends on the particular view one holds of "freedom" and the definition one chooses to give to the concept. Obviously, the actual situation varied greatly over the vast expanse of Muslim history, but some basic lines may be said to define the general picture: The individual Muslim was expected to consider subordination of his own freedom to the beliefs, morality, and customs of the group as the only proper course of behaviour. While he valued his personal freedom and was proud of it, he was not supposed to see in it a good to be defended at all costs against group demands. Politically, the individual was not expected to exercise any free choice as to how he wished to be governed. At times, he did stress his right to be considered and treated as an equal by the men in power. Under special circumstances, there was extensive community participation in the government (as, for instance, in early Islam or among certain sectarians), or, at least, a certain degree of wider distribution of the political power among the population (as, perhaps, in city states such as Seville). In general, however, governmental authority admitted of no participation of the individual as such, who therefore did not possess any real freedom vis-à-vis it. On the metaphysical level, the question of how much freedom could be vouchsafed to human beings in view of the omnipotence of God has occupied the Muslim mind from the very beginnings of Islam [see IKHTIYĀR]. Whatever concessions were made, however, were not made in the name of any kind of individual freedom, but in order to assure a better regulated society. Moreover, the widely adopted Ashʿarī solution of the free will dilemma, no less than all the others, was far too subtle for the masses to understand; at any rate it failed to impress them with the importance of the element of human freedom it contained.

ii.—Modern Period

The Ottoman Empire and after. The first examples of the use of the word freedom in a clearly defined political sense come from late 18th century Turkey. The word used is not ḥurriyya but serbestiyyet (later also serbestī), pseudo-Arabic and pseudo-Persian abstracts from serbest, an established Ottoman term connoting the absence of limitations or restrictions (thus, serbest tīmār means a fief in which all the revenues go to the timariot, as against an ordinary tīmār in which certain revenues are reserved to the imperial exchequer [see TĪMĀR]). In its first known appearance in an official document, the word serbestiyyet denotes collective rather than personal freedom—i.e., independence rather than liberty in the classical liberal sense. This is in the third article of the treaty of Küčük Kaynardja [q.v.] (1774), establishing the short-lived independence of the Crimean Tatars from both Turkey and Russia. The two states agree to recognize the Tatars as "free and entirely independent of any foreign power"; the Sultan is regarded as their religious head, "but without thereby compromising their political and civil liberty as established". The forms of words in the Italian original of the treaty for these two phrases are "liberi, immediati, ed independenti assolutamente da qualunque straniera Potenza" and "senza pero mettere in compromesso la stabilita libertà loro politica e civile"; this is rendered in Turkish as serbestiyyet we g͟hayr-i taʿalluḳ mustaḳill wud͟jūhla ed͟jnebī bir dewlete tābiʿ olmamak üzre ... and ʿaḳd olunan serbestiyyet-i dewlet we memleketlerine k͟halel getirmiyerek (Turkish text in D͟jewdet, *Taʾrīk͟h*², i, 358-9; Med͟jmūʿa-i muʿāhedāt, iii, 254; Italian in G. F. de Martens, Recueil des traités ..., iv, Göttingen 1795, 610-2).

The French Revolution gave the word serbestiyyet a new meaning. Moralī El-Seyyid ʿAlī Efendi, the Ottoman ambassador in Paris under the Directoire, uses it several times in his sefāretnāme to translate liberté, chiefly in relation to symbols and ceremonies (e.g., TOEM, no. 23 (1329 A.H.), 1458, 1460. On the display of the 'symbols' of freedom by Frenchmen in Turkey, see D͟jewdet, *Taʾrīk͟h*², vi, 182-3). The Reʾīs al-Kuttāb ʿĀṭif Efendi, in his memorandum of 1798 on the political situation resulting from the activities of revolutionary France, shows a clearer understanding of the new political content of the term, and of the danger that it represented to the established order, in the Ottoman Empire as elsewhere. In his introductory account of the Revolution, he tells how the revolutionaries had enticed the common people (ʿawāmm-i nās) to follow them with promises of equality and freedom (müsāwāt we serbestiyyet) as a means of obtaining complete happiness in this world. More specifically, he is alarmed by the actions of the French in the former Venetian possessions which they had acquired—the Ionian islands and four towns on the mainland. By evoking the forms of the government of the ancient Greeks and installing a form of liberty (serbestiyyet), the French had made clear their hostile intentions (D͟jewdet, *Taʾrīk͟h*², vi, 395, 400; cf. B. Lewis in J. Wld.Hist., i (1953), 120 ff. (revised version in G. S. Métraux and F. Croizet, eds., The new Asia, New York-London 1965, 47 ff.), and Slavonic Review, xxxiv (1955), 234-5).

Before the end of the year the French had landed in Egypt, where General Bonaparte, on arrival, addressed the Egyptians on behalf of the French Republic, "founded on the basis of freedom and equality" (ʿalā asās al-ḥurriyya wa'l-taswiya: versions in D͟jabartī, Muẓhir al-taḳdīs, Cairo n.d., i, 37; Niḳūlā al-Turk, Mud͟hakkirāt, ed G. Wiet, Cairo 1950, 8; the text also appears in D͟jabartī, ʿAd͟jāʾib, iii, Cairo 1879, 4; Ḥaydar al-S͟hihābī's Lubnān, etc.). The word used for freedom is ḥurriyya, which, however, was still far from being a commonly accepted equivalent to the European term in its political sense. Ruphy's French-Arabic wordlist, printed in 1802, renders liberté by ḥurriyya, but with the restriction "opposé à l'esclavage"; in the sense of "pouvoir d'agir" he prefers sarāḥ (J. F. Ruphy, Dictionnaire abrégé français-arabe, Paris, An X [1802], 120). As late as 1841 the Phanariot Handjeri renders "liberté civile" and "liberté politique" by ruk͟hṣat-i s͟herʿiyye and ruk͟hṣat-i mülkiyye respectively (Dictionnaire français-arabe-persan et turc, ii, Moscow 1840-1, 397, with explanations and examples).

Early references to freedom in works of Muslim authorship are hostile, and equate it with libertinism, licentiousness, and anarchy. A significant change can, however, be seen in a passage in the chronicle of S͟hānīzāde ([q.v.] d. 1826) under the year 1230/1815, discussing the nature of council meetings (keyfiyyet-i med͟jālis-i mes͟hweret), which became frequent at this time. S͟hānīzāde is careful to base the holding of such consultations on Islamic precedent and ancient Ottoman practice, and to give warning against its misuse; at the same time he points out that such consultations are normally held, with beneficial effects, in "certain well-organized states (düwel-i muntaẓama)"—a striking euphemism for the states of Europe—and attributes to the members attending the councils a representative quality entirely new to Islamic political thought. The members of the councils consist of two groups, servants of the state and representatives of the subjects (wükelā-i raʿiyyet); they discuss and argue freely (ber wed͟jh-i serbestiyyet) and thus arrive at a decision (S͟hānīzāde, Taʾrīk͟h, iv, Istanbul 1291, 2-3; cf. B. Lewis, in BSOAS, xxix (1966), 385-6).

In the decades that followed, the notion of political freedom became more familiar through discussions of European affairs and translations of European works (e.g. the Turkish version of Botta's Storia d'Italia, Cairo 1249/1834, repr. Istanbul 1293/1876, which abounds in references to liberal principles and institutions). It was also discussed and developed by several Muslim writers, who were influenced more especially by the rather conservative constitutionalism of the post-Napoleonic era—the idea of the Rechtsstaat, or state based on the rule of law, in contrast both to the unbridled absolutism of Napoleon and the licence of the Revolution. One of the most important of these was the Egyptian S͟hayk͟h Rifāʿa Rāfiʿ al-Ṭahṭāwī [q.v.], who lived in Paris from 1826 to 1831. His account of what he saw and learnt was first published in Būlāḳ in Arabic in 1834 and in a Turkish version in 1839; it includes a translation with commentary of the French constitution and a description of parliamentary institutions, the purpose of which is to secure government under law and the protection of the subject from tyranny. What the French call freedom (ḥurriyya), says S͟hayk͟h Rifāʿa, is the same as what the Muslims call justice and equity (al-ʿadl wa'l-inṣāf)—that is, the maintenance of equality before the law, government according to law, and the abstention of the ruler from arbitrary and illegal acts against the subject (Tak͟hlīṣ al-ibrīz fī talk͟hīṣ Bārīz, ed. Mahdī ʿAllām, Aḥmad Badawī and Anwar Lūḳā, Cairo n.d. [1958 ?], 148). S͟hayk͟h Rifāʿa's equation of ḥurriyya with the classical Islamic concept of justice [see ʿADL, INṢĀF and ẒULM] helped to relate the new to the old concepts, and fit his own political writings into the long line of Muslim exhortations to the sovereign to rule wisely and justly, with due respect for the law and due care for the interests and welfare of the subjects [see RAʿIYYA and SIYĀSA]. What is new and alien to traditional political ideas is the suggestion that the subject has a right to be treated justly, and that some apparatus should be set up to secure that right. With remarkable percipience, S͟hayk͟h Rifāʿa sees and explains the different rôles of parliament, the courts and the press in protecting the subjects from tyranny—or rather, as he points out, in enabling the subjects to protect themselves. What is far from clear is the extent to which he felt these ideas and institutions to be relevant to the needs of his own country. In his later writings there is little suggestion of any such relevance; even his commendation of the Khedive Ismāʿīl for setting up a consultative assembly in 1866 shows a traditional concern with the duties of the ruler—justice and consultation—rather than a liberal concern with the rights of the ruled. In his al-Murs͟hid al-amīn (Cairo 1862, 127 ff.), he defines freedom under five sub-headings, the last two of which are civic (madanī) and political (siyāsī). Both are defined in relation to social, economic and legal rights, without any specific reference to political rights in the liberal sense. The first three sub-headings are natural, social (i.e., freedom of 'conduct') and religious. Political freedom is the assurance of the state to the individual of the enjoyment of his property and the exercise of his 'natural' freedom (i.e., the basic innate power of all living creatures to eat, drink, move etc., limited by the need to avoid injury to himself or to others) (see L. Zolondek, Al-Ṭahṭāwī and political freedom, in MW, liv (1964), 90-7.)

Shaykh Rifāʿa's Turkish contemporary Ṣādiḳ Rifʿat Pasha [q.v.], though vaguer in his theoretical notions of the meaning of freedom, is more specific on its immediate application at home. In an essay first drafted while he was Ottoman ambassador in Vienna in 1837—and in close touch with Metternich —he discusses the essential differences between Turkey and Europe, and those respects in which Turkey might profitably seek to imitate Europe. Ṣādiḳ Rifʿat is deeply impressed by European wealth, industry and science, in which he sees the best means of regenerating Turkey. European progress and prosperity, he explains, are the result of certain political conditions, of stability and tranquillity, which in turn depend on 'the attainment of complete security for the life, property, honour and reputation of each nation and people, that is to say, on the proper application of the necessary rights of freedom (ḥuḳūḳ-i lāzime-i ḥürriyyet)'. For Ṣādiḳ Rifʿat, as for Shaykh Rifāʿa, freedom is an extension of the classical Islamic idea of justice—an obligation of the ruler to act justly and in accordance with the law; but it is also one of the "rights of the nation" (ḥuḳūḳ-i millet), and the establishment of these rights in Turkey is a matter of "the most urgent necessity" (text in Ṣādiḳ Rifʿat Pasha, Müntekhabāt-i āthār, Istanbul, Awrupaniñ aḥwāline dāʾir .. risāle, 4; cf. ibid., Idāre-i hukūmetiñ baʿḍ-ı ḳawāʿid-i esāsiyye-sini mutaḍammin .. risāle, passim; another version in ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Sheref, Taʾrīkh muṣāḥabeleri, Istanbul 1340, 125 f.). Similar ideas are expressed by another Turkish writer, Muṣṭafā Sāmī, a former Embassy secretary in Paris, who in an essay published in 1840 speaks with admiration of the political and religious liberties of the French. Such ideas find official expression in the first of the great reforming edicts—the ferman of the Rose-chamber (Gülkhāne) of 1839, which recognizes and seeks to establish the rights of the subject to security of life, honour and property, and to government under law. There are two specific references to freedom— in the clause guaranteeing that "everyone shall dispose of his property in all freedom (serbestiyyet)", and in the clause concerning the Councils, in which everyone present "shall express his ideas and observations freely (serbestče) and without hesitation." (Text in Düstūr, first series, i, 4-7; in modern script, in A. Şeref Gözübüyük and S. Kili, Türk anayasa metinleri, Ankara 1957, 3-5; English trans. in Hurewitz, i, 113-6).

These ideas of freedom are still very cautious and conservative; one would expect no other from Shaykh Rifāʿa, the loyal servant of the rulers of Egypt, or from Ṣādiḳ Rifʿat, the disciple of Metternich and coadjutor of Reshīd Pasha [q.v.]. The subjects were to be treated justly by the government; Indeed, they had a right to be treated justly, and laws should be promulgated to secure such treatment. But there is still no idea that the subjects have any right to share in the formation or conduct of government—to political freedom, or citizenship, in the sense which underlies the development of liberal political thought in the West.

While conservative reformers talked of freedom under law, and some Muslim monarchs even experimented with councils and assemblies [see DUSTŪR, MADJLIS, MASHWARA], government was in fact becoming more and not less arbitrary and oppressive. The modernization of government and the abrogation of intermediate powers at once strengthened the autocracy of the state, and removed or weakened the traditional limitations on its functioning. More authoritarian government provoked more radical criticism; the newly created and rapidly expanding press [see DJARĪDA] provided a medium for its expression; 19th century Europe offered a wide range of inspiration and example.

The suggestion has been made that some of the Lebanese movements of the periods 1820-1 and 1840 may have been inspired or influenced by French Revolutionary ideologies of national liberation and political democracy. The documents on which these suggestions rest (Philippe and Farīd Khāzin, Madjmūʿat al-muḥarrarāt al-siyāsiyya wa'l-mufāwaḍāt al-duwaliyya ʿan Sūriyya wa-Lubnān, i, Djūniya 1910, 1 ff.) are few and uncertain, and may reflect the activities of French agitators more than any genuine local movement. A more definite expression of libertarian ideas occurs in an account of the revolt of the Maronites of Kisrawān in 1858-9, led by Ṭanyūs Shāhīn [q.v.]; he is said to have aimed at "republican government" (ḥukūma djumhūriyya), probably meaning some form of representative government (Anṭūn al-ʿAḳīḳī, ed. Yūsuf Ibrāhīm Yazbak, Thawra wa-fitna fī Lubnān, Damascus 1938, 87; English trans. M. H. Kerr, Lebanon in the last years of feudalism . . ., Beirut 1959, 53. See further P. K. Hitti, The impact of the West on Syria and Lebanon in the nineteenth century, in J.Wld.Hist., ii (1955), 629-30).

The intensification of Western influence during and after the Crimean War on the one hand, and the growing internal political and economic pressures on the other, both helped to bring a revival of libertarian thought and activities in the eighteen sixties. In Turkey, Shināsī [q.v.] stressed the importance of freedom of expression in the introductory editorials both of Terdjumān-i Aḥwāl (no. 1, 1277/1860) and of Taṣwīr-i Efkār (no. 1, 15 June [O.S.] 1278/1862). In Syria, the Christian author Francis Fatḥ Allāh al-Marrāsh [q.v.] wrote an allegorical dialogue (Ghābat al-ḥaḳḳ, Beirut 1866, repr. Cairo 1298/1880-1), which includes a philosophic and political discussion of freedom, and of the conditions that are required to maintain it. More directly political in content was the work of a Muslim author, the famous Khayr al-Dīn Pasha [q.v.], one of the authors of the Tunisian constitutional enactment of 1861 (Aḳwām al-masālik fī maʿrifat aḥwāl al-mamālik, Tunis 1284-5/1867-8; French trans. Réformes nécessaires aux états musulmans, Paris 1868; Turkish version, Istanbul 1296/1879). In this rather conservative programme of reform, Khayr al-Dīn examines the sources of European wealth and power, and finds them in the political institutions of Europe, which secure justice and freedom. Identifying the two, he makes some cautious and rather obscure recommendations on how to secure them in the Islamic state without violating or departing from Islamic traditions and institutions, by reliance on 'consultation' [see MASHWARA], since the consultation of ministers, ʿulamāʾ, and notables is the authentic Islamic equivalent of the European system of representative and constitutional government. It may be noted that neither as chief minister in Tunisia in the years 1873-7, nor as Grand Vizier in Turkey in 1878-9, did he do anything to restore the constitutions which had been suspended in both countries.

Already in 1856, in an ode addressed to Reshīd Pasha on the occasion of the Reform Edict of that year, Shināsī tells the reforming Pasha "You have made us free (āzād), who were slaves to oppression (ẓulm)" and continues: "Your law is an act of manumission (ʿitḳnāme) for men, your law informs the Sultan of his limits (bildirir ḥaddini)."

The radical implications of these words—the replacement of justice by freedom as the antithesis of tyranny, and the suggestion of a constitutional restriction of the sovereign's powers—were developed and made clear in the late sixties and seventies by the group of liberal patriots known as the Young (strictly "new") Ottomans [see YEÑI ʿOTHMĀNLİLAR]. The political ideas of the Young Ottomans, though couched in Islamic terms and related, sometimes with visible effort, to Islamic traditions, are of European origin, and express an Ottoman-Islamic adaptation of the liberal patriotism current in Europe at that time. Their ideal was the British parliament at Westminster, their ideology was drawn from the liberal teachings of the French enlightenment and revolution, their organization and tactics were modelled on the patriotic secret societies of Italy and Poland. In the political writings of the Young Ottomans the two key words are Waṭan [q.v.]—fatherland, and Ḥürriyyet—freedom. The latter was the name of the weekly journal which they published in exile (London, June 1868-April 1870; Geneva, April-June 1870). In this journal, and in other writings, the Young Ottoman ideologists, above all Nāmıḳ Kemāl [q.v.], expounded their interpretation of liberty—the sovereignty of the people, to be secured by constitutional and representative government (see for example the article from Ḥürriyyet published by M. Colombe in French translation in Orient, no. 13 (1960), 123-33). For Kemāl as for earlier Muslim writers, the primary duty of the state is still to act justly—but justice means not only care for the welfare of the subject, but respect for his political rights. These rights must be safeguarded by appropriate institutions: "To keep the government within the limits of justice, there are two basic devices. The first of them is that the fundamental rules by which it operates should no longer be implicit or tacit, but should be published to the world . . . The second principle is consultation (meshweret), whereby the legislative power is taken away from the government" (Nāmıḳ Kemāl, Ḥuḳūḳ-i ʿumūmiyye, in ʿIbret, no. 18, 1872; repr. in Ebü'l-Ḍiyā Tewfīḳ, Nümūne-i edebiyyāt-i ʿOthmāniyye[3], Istanbul 1306, 357-8, and, in the new Turkish script, in Mustafa N. Özön, Namık Kemal ve Ibret gazetesi, Istanbul 1938, 96-7; English trans. in Lewis, Emergence, 140). Like his predecessors, Nāmıḳ Kemāl tries to present these imported ideas as natural developments from traditional Islamic notions; in this way justice grows into freedom and consultation into representation. Thus far, Nāmıḳ Kemāl and his associates had been anticipated by earlier 19th century writers, and even to some extent by rulers, who had summoned councils and issued edicts [see DUSTŪR, MADJLIS, MASHWARA]. But the Young Ottomans, both in thought and actions, went far beyond their cautious forerunners. For Nāmıḳ Kemāl, a consultative assembly, even an elected one, is not enough. The essence of the matter is that this assembly be the exclusive possessor of the legislative power, of which the government would thus be deprived. This doctrine of the separation of powers, to be expressed in and maintained by a written constitution, is supported by the even more radical idea of the sovereignty of the people, which Nāmıḳ Kemāl identifies with the classical bayʿa [q.v.]. "The sovereignty of the people (ḥākimiyyet-i ahālī), which means that the powers of the government derive from the people, and which in the language of the Sharīʿa is called bayʿa . . . is a right necessarily arising from the personal independence (istiḳlāl-i dhātī) that each individual by nature possesses." (Nāmıḳ Kemāl, Ḥuḳūḳ-i ʿumūmiyye, loc. cit.). He was not deceived by the apparently liberal and constitutional aspects of the Tanẓīmāt [q.v.]. The reform edict of 1839 was not, as some had claimed, a fundamental constitutional charter (Sharṭnāme-i esāsī), but a measure of administrative westernization. "Had the Rescript not confined the general precepts of law set forth in its preamble to personal freedom (ḥürriyyet-i shakhṣiyye) alone, which it interpreted as security of life, property and honour, but also proclaimed such other basic principles as freedom of thought (ḥürriyyet-i efkār), sovereignty of the people, and the system of government by consultation [i.e., representative and responsible government], then only could it have taken the character of a fundamental charter . . ." (ʿIbret no. 46, 1872, cit. Ihsan Sungu, Tanzimat ve Yeni Osmanlılar, in Tanzimat, i, Istanbul 1940, 845; English trans. in Lewis, Emergence, 167).

In 1876, with the promulgation of the first Ottoman constitution, the liberal and parliamentary programme of the Young Ottomans seemed to be on the point of realization. Article 10 of the constitution lays down that personal freedom is inviolable, and subsequent articles deal with freedom of worship, the press, association, education, etc., as well as with freedom from arbitrary violations of the rights of the person, residence and property. In its political provisions, however, the constitution is less libertarian. It derives not from the sovereignty of the people but from the will of the sovereign, who retains important prerogatives and all residual powers; it gives only perfunctory recognition to the principle of the separation of powers. Its effective life was in any case brief. In February 1878 parliament was dissolved; it did not meet again for thirty years.

Under ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd freedom was a proscribed word, and the ideals which it connoted became all the more precious. For Turkish modernists of that generation, the fountainhead was the West, which provided both material examples of the benefits of freedom, and intellectual guidance on the means of attaining it. "When you look upon this fascinating display of human progress", wrote Saʿdullāh from the Paris Exhibition of 1878, "do not forget that all these achievements are the work of freedom. It is under the protection of freedom that peoples and nations attain happiness. Without freedom, there can be no security; without security, no endeavour; without endeavour, no prosperity; without prosperity no happiness . . ." (Saʿdullāh Pasha, 1878 Paris Ekspozisyonu, in Ebü'l-Ḍiyā Tewfīḳ, Nümūne . . ., 288; English trans. in B. Lewis, Middle East . . ., 47). As an earlier generation had turned to Voltaire, Rousseau and Montesquieu, so the new generation read the writings of Haeckel, Büchner, Le Bon (specially favoured because of his sympathy for Islam), Spencer, Mill and many others. "If there are today", wrote Ḥüseyn Raḥmī in 1908, "men who can think, can write, and can defend freedom, they are those whose minds were enlightened by these sparks [of European culture]. In those dark and melancholy days, our friends, our guides were those intellectual treasures of the West. We learned the love for thinking, the love for freedom, from those treasures" (Preface to Shipsevdi, Istanbul 1912, English trans. in Niyazi Berkes, Secularism, 292). In more practical political terms, freedom meant constitutional and representative government—the ending of autocracy, the restoration of the constitution, and the safeguarding of the rights of the citizen by free elections and parliaments. But freedom was no longer a purely political matter. For some, the exponents of materialist and secularist ideas, it involved an intellectual liberation from what they saw as the shackles of religious obscurantism. Perhaps the first to conceive of liberation in social and economic terms was Prince Ṣabāḥ al-Dīn [q.v.], who sought to lead Turkey from a collectivist to an individualist social order by a policy of federalism and decentralization and by the encouragement of private enterprise. In 1902 he founded a society dedicated to the achievement of these purposes. Similar ideas inspired the Liberal Entente (Ḥürriyyet we Iʾtilāf [q.v.]), which appeared in 1911 as a rival to the Union and Progress Party [see ITTIḤĀD WE TERAḲḲĪ]. An interesting example of the use of the word in a social and individualist connotation is in Ḳāsim Amīn's [q.v.] famous book Taḥrīr al-marʾa, the liberation—i.e., emancipation—of woman (Cairo 1316/1898 and 1905; Turkish versions: Cairo 1326/1908, Istanbul 1329/1911, and, in Northern Turkish, Kazan 1909).

After the revolution of 1908 the establishment, for a while, of effective freedom of thought and expression initiated a period of vigorous discussion, in which the problem of freedom, with others, was examined, analysed, and discussed from many points of view; political, social, economic and religious freedom all find their exponents and defenders. But as the bonds of autocracy and censorship were wound tighter by the Young Turks, the debate dwindled into insignificance. In the new Turkey that emerged under the first and second republics, the discussion of freedom does not differ significantly from that of Europe, and need not be considered here.

Ottoman subjects from the Arab lands played a certain rôle in the libertarian movement almost from the beginning. On 24 March 1867, the Egyptian prince Muṣṭafā Fāḍil Pasha [q.v.] published in the French newspaper Liberté an open letter to the Sultan, advising him to grant a constitution to the Empire (reprinted in Orient, no. 5 (1958), 29-38). Besides endowing them with their first manifesto, the Pasha also helped the Young Ottoman exiles financially, and was later succeeded in this by his brother the Khedive Ismāʿīl, who saw in them a useful instrument of his political purposes. In Hamidian times, one of the first libertarian journals published in exile was started by Salīm Fāris, a son of Aḥmad Fāris al-Shidyāḳ [q.v.]. Published in London in January 1894, it was entitled Ḥürriyyet—a significant evocation of the earlier Young Ottoman weekly. He was later induced by agents of the Sultan to cease publication. Other exiles included the Lebanese amīr Amīn Arslān, who published an Arabic journal called Kashf al-Niḳāb in Paris in 1895, and a former Syrian deputy in the Ottoman parliament of 1876, Khalīl Ghānim [q.v.], who became active in Young Turk circles. The ideas and arguments of the Young Ottomans and of the Young Turks found their echoes also in Arabic publications, which at this period tend to offer a provincial adaptation of ideas circulating among the Turkish ruling groups. Thus, the much discussed appearance of the motto Ḥubb al-waṭan min al-īmān—"love of country is part of the faith"—on the Syrian fortnightly Al-Djinān in 1870 follows its regular use in the Young Ottoman weekly Ḥürriyyet from 1868 to 1870; the growth of federalist groups among the Ottoman Arabs must be related to the federalist movement among the Turks.

In Egypt, under Khedivial and then British rule, political thought evolved along different lines, more directly influenced by Europe, and less directly affected by events and movements in the Ottoman Empire—though even here these had their effect. Many of the leaders of thought were Arabic-speaking emigrés from the Ottoman lands; the occasional presence and activity in Egypt of such Turkish personalities as Prince Ṣabāḥ al-Dīn and ʿAbd Allāh Djewdet [q.v.] cannot have passed unnoticed. Walī al-Dīn Yakan [q.v.], of Turkish origin and a participant in Young Turk politics, wrote extensively in Arabic on political and social problems. A work of some influence was Djewdet's Turkish translation of Vittorio Alfieri's Della tirannide. Entitled simply Istibdād, it was first printed in Geneva in 1898 and reprinted in Cairo in 1909. This translation appears to underlie the famous Arabic adaptation of Alfieri's book by the Aleppine exile in Egypt, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Kawākibī [q.v.], entitled Ṭabāʾiʿ al-istibdād, Cairo n.d. (Sylvia G. Haim, Alfieri and al-Kawākibī, in OM, xxxiv (1954), 321-34; E. Rossi, Una traduzione turca dell'opera "Della Tirannide" di V. Alfieri, ibid., 335-7).

One of the earliest discussions of freedom—little noticed at the time—in Egypt, after Shaykh Rifāʿa (see above) is that of the Azharī Shaykh Ḥusayn al-Marṣafī. In his Risālat al-kalim al-thamān—"Essay on eight words", published in Cairo in 1298/1881, he examines and interprets, for the benefit of "the intelligent young men of these times", eight political terms "current on the tongues of men" (p. 2). One of them is ḥurriyya (pp. 36-7), which the Shaykh explains in natural and social terms—the difference between men and beasts, the human habit of social specialization and association, and hence the need for social cooperation and the mutual recognition of rights. The Shaykh recognizes the necessity of freedom in this natural and social sense, but rather obscurely warns his young readers against untoward extensions of the concept into the realm of politics.

Despite such warnings, the influence of European liberal political thought continued to grow, and found frequent expression in Arabic as well as Turkish writings. The merits of freedom are variously presented and defended. For some, a vaguely understood freedom is still the secret talisman of Western prosperity and power; its adoption is therefore desirable in order to achieve the same results. For others, freedom means the overthrow of tyranny, usually identified with Sultan ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, and the establishment of a constitutional régime in its place. Perhaps the last and most cogent exposition of the classical liberal position in Arabic is that of the Egyptian Aḥmad Luṭfī al-Sayyid (1872-1963). A declared disciple of J. S. Mill and other 19th century liberals, Luṭfī al-Sayyid gives a central position to the problem of liberty in his political thought. Freedom, basically, means the rights of the individual—his inalienable natural freedom, defined and safeguarded by civil rights, which in turn are secured by political and legal arrangements and institutions. The action and interference of the State must be kept at the minimum; the freedom of the individual and of the nation must be secured by a free press, an independent judiciary, and a constitutional régime guaranteeing the separation of powers.

Luṭfī al-Sayyid is concerned not only with the freedom of the individual, but also with that of the nation, which has corporate natural rights distinct from and additional to the aggregate of the rights of the individuals composing it. Rejecting pan-Islamism and disapproving of Arab nationalism, he sees the nation as Egypt, and argues for her liberation from both foreign rule and native authoritarianism.

The liberal interpretation of freedom continued to find exponents, particularly after the Young Turk revolution of 1908 and again after the military victory of the democracies ten years later. But in the meantime a new interpretation of freedom was gaining ground, resulting from the spread of imperialism and the rise of nationalism. In nationalist usage, freedom is a synonym for independence—the sovereignty of the nation state, untrammeled by any superior, alien authority. In the absence of any such subordination to aliens, a nation is called free, irrespective of the political, social and economic conditions prevailing within it. This interpretation of freedom had less impact among the Turks, whose independence, though threatened, was never lost, than among the Arab peoples for whom the main theme of political life was the ending of alien rule. During the period of British and French domination, individual freedom was never much of an issue. Though often limited and sometimes suspended, it was on the whole more extensive and better protected than either before or after. The imperial régimes conceded freedom but withheld independence; it was natural that the anti-imperialist struggle should concentrate on the latter and neglect the former. In the final revulsion against the West, Western democracy too was rejected as a fraud and a delusion, of no value to Muslims. The words liberty (ḥurriyya) and liberation (taḥrīr) retained their magic, but were emptied of that liberal individualist content which had first attracted Muslim attention in the 19th century. A few voices still spoke of personal, individual rights, and some writers used a word from the same root, taḥarrur, to denote psychological self-liberation, or emancipation (from the shackles of tradition etc.). But for most users of the word freedom was a collective, not an individual attribute; it was first interpreted politically, as independence, and then, when this by itself proved inadequate, reinterpreted in quasi-economic terms, as the absence of private or foreign exploitation.

ḤÜRRIYET WE IʾTILĀF FIRḲASÎ ("Freedom and Accord Party"), also known as Entente Libérale ("Liberal Union"), Ottoman political party, formed on 21 November 1911. It succeeded a number of other liberal-conservative political parties formed after the 1908 revolution in opposition to the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) [see ITTIḤĀD WE TERAḲḲĪ DJEMʿIYETI], including the ʿOthmānlī Aḥrār Fırḳasî (1908), the Muʿtedil Ḥürriyetperverān Fırḳasî (1909), the Ahālī Fırḳasî (1910), and the Ḥizb-i Djedīd (1911). It advocated a policy of administrative decentralization, opposition to radical social reform, and a laissez-faire economy as opposed to state intervention. In the Chamber of Deputies the Liberal Union rallied all those who had belonged to the Ahālī Fırḳasî as well as dissidents from the CUP.

The party was founded during the Turco-Italian war, when Unionist prestige was low. As in the past, personalities such as Dāmād Ferīd, Kāmil Pasha and Prince Ṣabāḥ al-Dīn continued to provide leadership and inspiration. The success of Ṭāhir Khayr al-Dīn, the Liberal candidate, in the Istanbul by-election on 11 December 1911 seemed to suggest that the tide had turned in favour of the Liberals (Yeñi Iḳdām, 12 Dec. 1911; and the memoirs of Cavit (Djāwīd [q.v.]) in Tanin, 30 Oct. 1943). Liberal hopes were dashed in the 1912 elections, which the Unionists manipulated ruthlessly, and this led the Liberals to turn to unconstitutional means to assume power.

Thus in July 1912 the Khalāṣkār Ḍābiṭān Grubu (the "Group of Saviour Officers"), a military extension of the Liberal Union, intervened, brought down Saʿīd Pasha's cabinet (17 July), set up an anti-Unionist régime (21 July), and had the Chamber dissolved (5 August).

The Liberals assumed power at an unfavourable moment. Turkey was at war with Italy and on 16 October the Balkan War broke out. This war proved disastrous for Turkish arms, and as a result the government was discredited. On 23 January 1913, when Kāmil Pasha was thought to be ceding Edirne to the Bulgars, the Unionists overthrew the cabinet in the so-called "Bāb-i ʿĀlī Waḳʿasī" and set up a government of their own.

This marked the virtual end of the Liberal Union, though the party was never officially banned. Some of its members, however, were either bullied or bribed into leaving the country, ʿAlī Kemāl going to Vienna, Riḍā (Rıza) Nūr to Paris and Kāmil to Cairo. In May-June 1913 the Liberals attempted to restore Kāmil, and in connexion with this abortive plot Maḥmūd Shewket Pasha [q.v.] was assassinated on 11 June. Hereafter the opposition was ruthlessly crushed; some were hanged, some exiled to Sinob, while others fled abroad. Colonel Ṣādīḳ went first to Cairo then to Paris, from where the Liberal organisation under Sharīf Pasha continued to plot against the CUP (see Tunaya, 285-94; and Albert Fua and Refik-Nevzad, La trahison du gouvernement Turc, Paris 1914).

A second Ḥürriyet we Iʾtilāf Fırḳasi was formed on 22 January 1919, and once again the party was the last and most comprehensive attempt at rallying anti-CUP sentiment. In the post-armistice situation, the party advocated collaboration with Britain and the other occupying powers and strenuously opposed the nationalist movement in Anatolia under Muṣṭafā Kemāl. Among the founders were ʿAlī Kemāl; ʿAbd al-Ḳādır, a Kurdish senator; Muṣṭafā Ṣabrī; Riḍā Tewfīḳ [Bölükbaşı]; and Meḥmed ʿAlī; all five of these entered the cabinet of Dāmād Ferīd in March 1919, which has appropriately been described as a "Freedom and Accord cabinet" (I. M. K. Inal, Son sadrıazamlar, 1940-1953, p. 2039), although Dāmād Ferīd himself did not take any office in the reconstituted party. A few former liberals such as Riḍā Nūr by 1920 were firmly aligned with the Anatolian nationalists. In May 1919, upon the Greek occupation of Izmir, Ṣabrī, Riḍā Tewfīḳ, and Meḥmed ʿAlī left the cabinet and the party, forming a dissident Muʿtedil ("moderate") Ḥürriyet we Iʾtilāf Fırḳasi. The party was reunited later under the chairmanship of Colonel Ṣādīḳ. Its influence remained limited to Istanbul, and the elections of the fall of 1919 amounted to a repudiation of its policy not only in Anatolia but also in the capital. Its last general meeting was held in May 1920.

ḤURŪF (ʿIlm al-), "the science of letters", is a branch of djafr [q.v.] which was originally concerned with onomatomancy in the strict sense; but, among some esoteric sects, it became a sort of magical practice, to such an extent that Ibn Khaldūn (Muḳaddima, iii, 137-61, Fr. tr. 188-200, Rosenthal 171-82) gave it the name of sīmiyāʾ (σημεῖα), which is usually reserved for white magic. It is based on the occult properties of the letters of the alphabet and of the divine and angelic names which they form. Three basic elements are involved in onomatomantic interpretation: arithmomancy or gematria (ḥisāb al-djummal or, according to Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 209-13, Fr. tr. 241-5, Rosenthal, 234-8, ḥisāb al-nīm), the knowledge of the natural properties of the letters (ʿilm al-khawāṣṣ), based on alchemy, and their astrological conjunctions (ḳirānāt). In this it is related to the talismanic art from which Ibn Khaldūn considers it derives.

The twenty-eight letters of the Arabic alphabet are divided into four categories, each of seven letters, corresponding to the four basic elements. We give here the classification favoured in the East, with the Western variants: fire: ʾ, h, ṭ, m, f, sh/s (west) and dh; air: b, w, y, n, ṣ/ḍ (west), t, ḍ/ẓ (west); water: dj, z, k, s/ṣ (west), ḳ, th, and ẓ/gh (west); earth: d, ḥ, l, ʿ, r, kh, gh/sh (west). It can readily be seen that it is a matter of dividing the Arabic abdjad [q.v.] into seven groups of four letters as follows: ʾbdjd, hwzḥ, ṭykl, mnsʿ (west mnṣʿ), fṣḳr (west fḍḳr), shtthkh (west stthkh), dhḍẓgh (west dhẓghsh); the first letters of each of the seven groups are the fire letters, the second the air letters, the third the water letters and the fourth the earth letters. It is in short a kind of taksīr, "transposition", a procedure which performs a basic function in all forms of djafr. There should also be mentioned the harmonious division of the so-called "lunar" and "solar" letters.

The numerical value of the letters is established as follows: from alif to ṭ, the units (1 to 9); from y to ṣ, the tens (10 to 90); from ḳ to ẓ, the hundreds (100 to 900); and gh is the equivalent of 1,000. In the Maghrib, given the divergencies in the order of the letters, s equals 300, ḍ 90, ẓ 800, ṣ 60, gh 900 and sh 1,000; the four-letter group ʾyḳsh summarizes this system (see, for the Eastern system, R. Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ, Beirut 1957, i, 51 f.; P. Kraus, Jâbir Ibn Ḥayyân, ii, Cairo 1942, 224; for the Western system, Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 211 ff.; Fr. tr., 242 ff.; Rosenthal, 236 ff.; cf. F. Rosenthal, 173, n. 809).

Starting from the principle of alchemy that, by analysing the letters which make up a word, it is possible to establish the qualitative and quantitative structure of the thing which it describes (cf. Kraus, loc. cit.), the literature of ḥurūf developed in two opposite directions: the first consists of combining the letters so as to obtain a whole possessing particular properties, which are supposed to lead to the required result (divination or magical effect), the second, with the same aim as the first, consists of splitting up certain names to which an esoteric character is attached, often because they are taken from a sacred book, in this case the Ḳurʾān, in order to apply to their consonantal elements a complex treatment based on numerical, qualitative, quantitative, astrological and theurgical factors.

It is thus that between the letters and their numerical values there exists a series of relationships which reverberate from group to group. For example, the connexion between b (2), k (20) and r (200), which represent the different positions of the number 2, is reinforced by the groups d (4), m (40), t (400) and ḥ (8), f (80), ḍ/ẓ (800), which are multiples of 2; similarly with the group dj (3) and its multiples h (6) and ṭ (9) (on the properties of the numbers, cf. R. Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ, i, 56 ff.).

Arising from their distribution among the four elements, the "fire" letters, in divination and in magic, ward off any evils connected with cold, increasing the influence of heat wherever this is desired, whether in the physical or the astrological plane. Thus, for example, it is possible during a war to increase the influence of Mars by theurgic combination of the fire letters.

In the same way, the "water" letters are used to predict and to ward off all the ills associated with heat, such as the various kinds of fever, and to increase the influence of cold wherever this is required, on the physical or on the astrological plane. Thanks to them it is possible for example to make lunar influences prevail. And similarly for the other letters.

Apart from these conventional elements of numerical equivalents and co-ordination with the four elements, the science of letters consists only of pseudo-mystical experiments which have absolutely no logical foundation. Al-Būnī (d. 622/1225 ?), the chief authority on the matter (see especially his K. Laṭāʾif al-ishārāt, lith. Cairo 1317), says on this subject: "It must not be imagined that the secret of letters can be discovered with the aid of logical reasoning; it can be reached only through vision and with the aid of a divine intervention" (cited apud Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., iii, 140; Fr. tr., 191; Eng. tr., 174). This is why certain types of exalted mystics (ghulāt) have sought in it "the unveiling" (al-kashf). This was the main reason for the great expansion of onomatomantic and arithmomantic techniques in Islam. It was thought that by experiments based on the occult properties of the ḥurūf the secrets of God could be penetrated and the divine realities perceived. The 99 Beautiful Names of God [see AL-ASMĀʾ AL-ḤUSNĀ] form the chief material for this type of speculation; the principles governing the science of ḥurūf are applied to them and they are used to arrive at the kashf. Some verses of the Ḳurʾān and some prayers (awrād and aḥzāb) have filled a similar rôle.

The science of ḥurūf leads to three conclusions: the first is that the perfection of the onomatomancy proceeds from the meeting of the spirits which preside over the celestial spheres and the stars; the second is that the nature of the letters and their secret properties are communicated to the names which are formed from them; the third is that, in the same way, the names reveal the occult properties of created beings, through the various phases of their existence, and can thus reveal their mysteries. Hence they endow perfect souls with the power to act on nature and to reveal its secrets, in the past, the present and the future (see Ibn Khaldūn op. cit., iii, 137 f.; Fr. tr., 188 f.; Eng. tr., 171 f.).

Thus, by virtue of its object, the "noble science of ḥurūf" occupies a privileged place among the divinatory techniques of Islam, for it is closely connected with "spiritualia" (al-rūḥāniyyāt) and astrology (see Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iii, 50). Its nobility arises also from its close connexion with arithmetic, which the scholars of the ancient world considered to be the main pillar of knowledge. "To understand the mystery of numbers is to penetrate that of the Divine Intelligence, to understand the mystery of ḥurūf is to penetrate that of the Holy Spirit", says the anonymous author of a treatise on the properties of letters (Istanbul, MS Belediye, O.52, fol. 1). According to Ibn Kamāl Pasha (d. 940/1534) in his Sharḥ al-miʾīn (Istanbul, Topkapı Sarayı, MS Ahmet III 1609/3, fol. 46), these sciences were practised by the greatest spirits of humanity such as Hermes (= Idrīs), Plato, Pythagoras, Thales and Archimedes. There have even been attributed to Aristotle two works, one on ḥurūf, entitled K. Kunūz al-mughramīn fī asrār al-ḥurūf wa-ʾstiʿmālihā fi ʾl-umūr wa ʾl-ḥādjāt (Istanbul, MS Hacı Beşir Ağa, 659, fols. 96r-103r, taʿlīḳ of 1117/1705) and the other on arithmomancy, called K. al-Ittisāʿ yuʿraf minhu ʾl-ghālib wa ʾl-maghlūb (Istanbul, MS Reisülküttab Mustafa Ef. 1164/3, fol. 93v-96v, naskhī of 850/1446-7). Their origin must be sought in the 9th and 10th *maḳāla*s of the pseudo-Aristotelian work called K. al-Siyāsa (ed. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Badawī, in Fontes Graecae doctrinarum politicarum Islamicarum, Cairo 1954, i, 65-171).

ḤURŪF AL-HIDJĀʾ, "letters of the alphabet". Al-hidjāʾ is defined in LA, xx, 228, l. 17, xv, 353b, l. 4-5, as taḳṭīʿ al-lafẓa bi-ḥurūfihā. This follows Ibn Sīda, who in his Mukhaṣṣaṣ (xiii, 3 end) attributes this definition to the Ṣāḥib al-ʿAyn (al-Khalīl): "cutting up the word into its ḥurūf", that is, "spelling". Contemporary or recent dictionaries of the Arab world (Muḥīṭ al-Muḥīṭ, al-Bustān, Aḳrab al-mawārid, al-Mundjid) define it more precisely as taḳṭīʿ al-lafẓa wa-taʿdīd ḥurūfihā maʿa ḥarakātihā: "cutting up the word and enumerating its ḥurūf with their ḥarakāt". As for the verb used to render the sense of "to spell", one can say: hadjawtu ʾl-ḥurūf hadjw^{an} or hidjāʾ^{an}, or hadjdjaytuhā tahdjiyat^{an} or tahadjdjaytuhā tahadjdjiy^{an}. Therefore, instead of the expression ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ, one may find ḥurūf al-tahdjiya or ḥurūf al-tahadjdjī, though the first is by far the most commonly used at the present day. Thus, ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ signifies the letters of the alphabet; and "to arrange alphabetically" is normally expressed as tartīb ʿalā ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ. The dictionaries already mentioned also record the expression aḥruf al-mabānī (Muḥīṭ al-Muḥīṭ, radicals h dj w; al-Bustān, radicals b n y), ḥurūf al-mabānī (Akrab al-Mawārid, radicals b n y; al-Mundjid, radicals b n y); but they record ḥarf al-mabnā (Muḥīṭ al-Muḥīṭ and al-Mundjid, under ḥarf) in the sense of one ḥarf, a letter of the alphabet. See also Dict. of Techn. Terms, i, 319, line 1.

Al-Zadjdjādjī devoted four chapters to al-hidjāʾ (al-Djumal, 269-77). Throughout he is concerned with orthography, but he begins the 2nd bāb (271) by distinguishing two kinds of hidjāʾ : one li 'l-samʿ "for hearing", the other li-raʾy al-ʿayn "for seeing with the eye". Of the first he says only : huwa li-iḳāmat wazn al-shiʿr, "it is to establish the metre of poetry". The Mukhaṣṣaṣ (loc. cit.) says nothing of this. It is probably a question in the verse scansion (taḳṭīʿ al-bayt) of division between ḥurūf mutaḥarrika and ḥurūf sākina in order to identify or verify the component units (adjzāʾ).

Spelling presupposes recognition of the identity of the ḥarf and its pronunciation in accordance with the accompanying ḥaraka; thus ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ includes the designation of the sound of which the graphic sign is the symbol. In phonetics, Arab grammarians use ḥarf, pl. ḥurūf, to mean the articulations of the Arabic language, the phonemes; they recognize 29 principal articulations (aṣl). The ḥurūf al hidjāʾ, of course, offer only 28 signs, but it must be borne in mind that alif serves for two : the hamza and alif layyina [see HAMZA].

An expression related to ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ is ḥurūf al-muʿdjam. Ibn Djinnī (Sirr ṣināʿa, i, 38-45) discussed its meaning and grammatical construction. Al-muʿdjam is an infinitive, here in grammatical annexation, of the same form as the nomen patientis (see Traité, § 94 n) of a fourth-form verb aʿdjama, the denominative of ʿudjma "obscurity, lack of clarity" with a privative meaning : "to make the lack of clarity disappear". The ḥuruf al-muʿdjam are the ḥurūf which are the object of this action. One must bear in mind the earliest form of Arabic writing, without diacritical marks, and the obscurity which shrouded most of the signs. The enlightenment in question was achieved by the addition of the diacritical points which made clear the value of each ḥarf in a common ductus. The ḥurūf al-muʿdjam are thus properly those ḥurūf with diacritical points. In order to avoid any mistake in writing over the identification of a ḥarf the ancient writers follow it with a gloss : muʿdjama signifies the ḥarf with point, muhmala the unpointed ḥarf, e.g. ghayn muʿdjama, ʿayn muhmala. This is the invariable usage of the Dictionary of Technical Terms (see Bibliography). For further details, see Wright, Ar. Gr.[3], i, 4. In practice, the expression ḥurūf al-muʿdjam has become a synonym of ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ, to designate "the letters of the alphabet", but it refers solely to writing (see M. Bravmann, Materialien, 8).

The ḥurūf al-hidjāʾ include all the articulations of the Arabic alphabet; we should therefore give here a brief account of the phonetic doctrine of the Arab grammarians concerning them and of the distinctions which they draw. The grammarians simply list these distinctions consecutively; the paragraph titles below have been added to relate them to European phonetics.

I. The genesis of the ḥurūf. The point of departure is the ṣawt al-ṣadr, the resonance emitted from the chest. This ṣawt is an ʿaraḍ, "an accident", that is, something which exists in something else : the nafas, "the [expiratory] breath", its markab, "vehicle", as Rāḍī al-Dīn al-Astarābādhī says (Sharḥ al-Shāfiya, iii, 259, line 7). For this combination: ṣawt al-ṣadr + nafas, the Arab grammarians, in this genesis of the ḥurūf, keep the simple name of ṣawt; with it they contrast nafas, the simple expiratory breath, treating them as two not only distinct but totally different realities. This contrast between ṣawt and nafas is fundamental.

The ḥarf is the product of a maḳṭaʿ, "cutting", in this ṣawt as it rises in the throat, then in the mouth, wherever the articulatory organs oppose this maḳṭaʿ to the moving ṣawt. What properly constitutes the ḥarf is its particular sound : djars (pl. adjrās), the result of the application of the articulatory organs to the place of the maḳṭaʿ; the adjrās differ according to the different maḳāṭiʿ; for each maḳṭaʿ there is a djars, a ḥarf, and one might say a ḥarf ṣaḥīḥ.

The ḥarf, produced in this ṣawt as it moves, naturally makes a madjhūra, for the pronunciation of which the absence of nafas is essential. The articulation of a mahmūsa, on the other hand, only modifies the nafas at the makhradj of the ḥarf; it is produced with and in the nafas. The question then arises, how one passes from one to the other? The Arabs, from the definitions given by Sībawayhi in the Kitāb (ii, 453, l. 21-2 and 454, l. 2-3) onwards, have seen the answer in the energy of the articulation : in strong articulation (ushbiʿa 'l-iʿtimād), the nafas is stopped, held back, there is nothing but ṣawt for and in the ḥarf and the ḥarf is madjhūr; in weak articulation (uḍʿifa 'l-iʿtimād), the way remains clear for the nafas: djarā 'l-nafas maʿahu [al-ḥarf], "there is nafas with it", the ḥarf is mahmūs.

The consideration of the articulatory force is thus very important, indeed the central pillar of the theory, beside the fundamental contrast between ṣawt and nafas. But in constructing their system so, the Arab grammarians introduced the weakest element : since how could a difference in articulatory force cause the presence of ṣawt alone in the one case and of nafas alone in the other? We have tried elsewhere (Examen, 204-5) to demonstrate what phenomena could have led the first Arab theoreticians to establish such a misleading distinction. However that may be, it should be noted from what a special angle they examined articulatory force : as stopping or allowing free passage to the nafas. Their point of view is totally different from that of modern phonetics; we cannot therefore look to Arab theory for arguments against the modern doctrine of voiced consonants when we try to apply this to the sounds of Arabic.

In the genesis of the ḥurūf, we must refer to the particular case of three ḥurūf called al-ḥurūf al-muʿtalla (or ḥurūf al-ʿilla or al-iʿtilāl), the "sick"; these are alif layyina, wāw ḥarf al-madd, and yāʾ ḥarf al-madd. All three are sākina by nature. Their makhradj has the peculiarity of being muttasiʿ, "wide"; the makhradj has such amplitude that the maḳṭaʿ has no longer any means of existence; it takes on the dimensions of the makhradj and loses all efficacy, becoming a word without significance. The ṣawt flows in this makhradj continuously and uninterruptedly : these are the ḥurūf al-madd or al-madd wa 'l-istiṭāla; a soft flow without rough friction; these are the ḥurūf al-līn. These ḥurūf al-muʿtalla are thus the continuous or soft ḥurūf and their ṣawt designates a true vocalic element: the sound a for alif layyina, the sound u for wāw sākina, the sound i for yāʾ sākina. But what is it that is flowing with this ṣawt? It is air (hawāʾ). They are thus fi 'l-hawāʾ, or hawāʾiyya as al-Khalīl said several times [see HĀWĪ].

Consideration of the maḳṭaʿ thus introduced a double division into the ḥurūf: between these three ḥurūf al-muʿtalla which lack any action of the maḳṭaʿ and the others, the ḥurūf al-ṣaḥīḥa which have a normal maḳṭaʿ. The first three are sākina by nature. What will happen if they become mutaḥarrika? Alif layyina changes its identity and becomes another ḥarf, the hamza, a ḥarf ṣaḥīḥ. The other two, strengthened by the advent of the ḥaraka, acquire the similitude of a ḥarf ṣaḥīḥ and thereby the power to act like one. Each remains in origin ḥarf muʿtall; they have simply become like a ḥarf ṣaḥīḥ. The division of the ḥurūf is thus complete. The ḥaraka is not a ḥarf and has no place here; but its description as a "little ḥarf" permits its integration into the whole system of the ḥarf.

II. The makhāridj or points of articulation. There can be no question of giving here another full account of all the makhāridj. One is easily accessible in the Cours of J. Cantineau (19-20) or in H. Fleisch, Traité (§ 44 b-g). The following notes will suffice:

Al-Khalīl alone established terms by which to designate the ḥurūf according to their articulatory region. They are to be found in a text of which al-Azharī is one of the earliest known transmitters (Le Monde Oriental, xiv (1920), 45, lines 7-12).

al-ḥalḳiyya, literally "the gutturals", are for us the laryngeals. Among these al-Khalīl includes only ʿ, ḥ, h, kh, gh, while Sībawayhi includes also hamza and alif. These, with wāw and yāʾ, are described by al-Khalīl as djūf (pl. of adjwaf) "because they emerge from the djawf, the hollow of the chest", without any articulatory region to which they can be assigned except this djawf; thus he sets them on one side, apart from the ḥurūf with a normal makhradj. This affected the order of the letters which he adopted in his Kitāb al-ʿAyn, as well as the arrangement of those lexicographical works whose authors followed the practice of al-Khalīl (see al-Muḥkam wa 'l muḥīṭ al-aʿẓam of Ibn Sīda, ed. Muṣṭafā al-Saḳḳā and Ḥusayn Naṣṣār, i, Cairo 1958/1377, Introduction, 16).

The teaching of the whole grammatical tradition is that kh and gh are among the ḥalḳiyya. Modern phonetics considers them as velar, or, more exactly, postvelar [see GHAYN].

al-niṭʿiyya, "prepalatals": d, t, ṭ, whereas Sībawayhi, followed by grammatical tradition, places the tongue "at the base of the central incisors" [see DĀL].

al-dhawlaḳiyya: r, l, n, and al-asaliyya: z, s, ṣ. The terms indicate articulation with the tip of the tongue but specify only the form of the tongue: flat and thinned at the tip for the first group and pointed for the second (see Traité, § 43d); they make no mention of the position taken up for articulation.

al-shadjriyya: ḍ, sh, dj; from shadjr, "corner of the lips", this might be understood as "lateral", which fits the ancient ḍād [see ḌĀD], but not sh or dj. The term remains obscure.

It is clear from the foregoing notes that differences existed on the subject of phonetics between al-Khalīl and Sībawayhi, but, curiously enough, they found no echo in the Kitāb. There is an obscure point here in the origins of Arab phonetics.

III. The manner of articulation. (1) madjhūra—mahmūsa. madjhūra, "striking", and mahmūsa, "stifled", express directly the acoustic impression as received and assessed. In reality there can be no doubt that they signify the manner of articulation acknowledged by modern phonetics as voiced and unvoiced. The theory of the genesis of the ḥurūf as set out above is sufficient of itself to demonstrate that the Arabs ordered them according to the correlation of their sonority. The definitions of Sībawayhi express the result of the test proposed for distinguishing a madjhūra from a mahmūsa, the former a ḥarf having only ṣawt, the latter being a ḥarf with nafas; they also express the discriminatory part played by articulatory force. These are the definitions:

"The madjhūra is a ḥarf for which the pressure [of the articulatory organs] on the place [required] is made fully and which prevents the presence of [pure] breath with it, until the pressure [applied] for it is concluded and the sound [of this ḥarf] is produced".

"The mahmūs is a ḥarf for which the pressure [of the articulatory organs] on the place [required for this ḥarf] is made weakly, so that there is [pure] breath with it."

The ḥurūf al-madjhūra are: hamza, alif, ʿayn, gh, ḳ, dj, yāʾ, ḍād, l, n, r, ṭ, d, z, ẓ, dh, b, m, wāw.

The ḥurūf al-mahmūsa are: h, ḥ, kh, k, sh, s, t, ṣ, th, f. The Mufaṣṣal brings them together in the mnemonic: satashhathuka khaṣafah.

All the mahmūsa correspond with the unvoiced consonants of modern phonetics; but the presence among the madjhūra of hamza, ṭ and ḳ is noteworthy. As regards the first of these, the difficulty has been dealt with under HAMZA. For ṭ, it was certainly a voiced consonant in the pronunciation described by Sībawayhi: an emphatic dāl; one text of his is decisive (ii, 455, l. 9), where he distinguishes between ṭ and d only by the iṭbāḳ "the velarization". For ḳ: a voiced pronunciation of ḳāf must have existed, at least in part of the ancient Arab world; if not, it would be difficult to explain why it should be precisely the manner in which this phoneme is pronounced which at the present time has become a distinguishing mark between nomadic dialects (voiced) and sedentary dialects (unvoiced) (see Traité, § 46 h). On the history of the question, see J. Cantineau, Cours, 21-2, Esquisse, 187 and Fleisch, Traité, § 46, b-c.

(2) muṭbaḳa—munfatiḥa. Ibn Djinnī (Sirr ṣināʿa, i, 70, l. 12), taking up the main point of the explanations given by Sībawayhi (ii, 455, l. 5-7), describes al-iṭbāḳ as an elevation of the back of the tongue towards the upper palate, the latter acting as a ṭabaḳ (lid) over this part of the tongue (cf. Dict. of Tech. Terms, i, 323, l. 16-8). This movement, which presupposes the depression of the front part of the tongue, is in fact produced towards the soft palate or velum; iṭbāḳ is well translated as "velarization" and muṭbaḳa as "velar". Munfatiḥa, literally "open, disengaged", designates the ḥurūf without iṭbāḳ: it may be translated "non-velar".

The ḥurūf al-muṭbaḳa are: ṣ, ẓ, ṭ, ḍ. All the other ḥurūf are munfatiḥa, but we shall have to distinguish those among them which are mustaʿliya (see (3)).

The ḥurūf al-muṭbaḳa are often called "the emphatic consonants"; but emphasis can exist in different forms. In the type of emphatic in the Semitic languages of Ethiopia, there is no velarization, but glottalization: occlusion of the glottis and audition of a hamza with the articulation of the emphatic (see the details in J. Cantineau, Consonantisme, 291). Ph. Marçais, studying by radioscopy the Articulation de l'emphase dans un parler maghrébin (in AEIO Alger, vii (1948), 5-28), discovered another form of emphasis : pharyngalization. But discoveries in this field may well not be completed. We therefore consider valid the type of emphatic described by the Arab grammarians (see Traité, § 46 i-k).

(3) mustaʿliya—munkhafiḍa, "raised-lowered". The ḥurūf al-mustaʿliya are the four muṭbaḳa just discussed and ḳ, gh, kh; the other ḥurūf are munkhafiḍa. The elevation of the back of the tongue for the muṭbaḳa makes these mustaʿliya "raised". But for ḳ, gh, kh the elevation of the tongue does not go so far as to make the palate a ṭabaḳ over the tongue, according to Raḍī al-Dīn al-Astarābādhī (Sharḥ al-Shāfiya, iii, 262, l. 8-9). For him, it is therefore a matter of a diminished velarization or of the beginning of a velarization. The interest of these mustaʿliya lies in the fact that they prevent imāla, as Sībawayhi already observed (ii, 285, l. 20). They retain their interest for the student of modern dialects, where they are connected with questions of tafkhīm. See J. Cantineau, Cours, 23-4; Traité, § 48b.

IV. The degree of aperture: shadīda—rikhwa—bayniyya.

The ḥurūf al-shadīda are: hamza, ḳ, k, dj, ṭ, t, d, b.

The ḥurūf al-rikhwa are : h, ḥ, gh, kh, sh, ṣ, ḍ, z, s, ẓ, th, dh, f.

The ḥurūf al-bayniyya are : ʿayn, l, m, n, r, wāw, yāʾ, alif.

The Mufaṣṣal gives the following mnemonics for the first class : ʾadjadta ṭabaḳaka or ʾadjiduka ḳaṭabta; and for the last : lima yarūʿunā or lam yarʿawnā.

bayniyya means "intermediary"; the term is recent but convenient; it is used by Muḥ. Makkī in his Nihāya, completed in 1305/1887 (quoted in M. Bravmann, Materialien, 19). The ancient practice was to use a periphrasis, e.g. Muf. (§ 734) : "those which are between the shadīda and the rikhwa".

By their division into shadīda and rikhwa, the Arabs made the same point in fact as modern phonetics does by its own division into occlusive and constrictive. But the terms themselves do not express directly the physiological standpoint presupposed by the terms occlusive and constrictive, but rather greater or less firmness in articulation : shadīda "energetic", rikhwa "relaxed".

In the bayniyya the Arabs saw neither a normal occlusive nor a normal constrictive. There is something to be said for this view (see Cantineau, Cours, 22-3; Traité, § 47 c-d), except for ʿayn, where one can see nothing to set it on one side. But the peculiarities of the bayniyya do not justify a general third class. Of the explanations of them given by the Arabs, the clearest appear to be those given in Sharḥ al-Shāfiya (iii, 260, l. 18 f.) repeated in Dict. of Techn. Terms (i, 322, l. 20 f.).

Other minor divisions of the ḥurūf have been established by the Arabs. It is sufficient to note here : the ḥurūf al-ḳalḳala: ḳ, dj, ṭ, d, b; the ḥurūf al-dhalāḳa: l, r, n, f, b, m (see J. Cantineau, Cours, 24; Traité, § 48 a and c). See further the Dict. already quoted, under ḥarf (i, 320-5).

For the numerical values of the ḥurūf see ABDJAD; for the use of these ḥurūf in magic, see ḤURŪF.

Bibliography: The Arab grammarians set out their phonetics before the idghām in preparation for its exposition: Sībawayhi, Kitāb, ii, Paris 1889, ch. 565 (Cairo ed., ii, 404-7) is of major importance; Zamakhsharī, Mufaṣṣal, 2nd ed. by J. P. Broch, Christiania 1879, §§ 732-4 (Cairo 1323, 393-6); Ibn Yaʿīsh Abu 'l-Baḳāʾ, Sharḥ al-Mufaṣṣal li 'l-Zamakhsharī, ed. G. Jahn, Leipzig 1886, ii, 1459-67 (Cairo ed., x, 123-31); Zadjdjādjī, al-Djumal, ed. Muḥ. Ibn Abī Shanab [Mohammed Ben Cheneb], Algiers 1927, Paris 1957, 375-8; Raḍī al-Dīn al-Astarābādhī, Sharḥ al-Shāfiya, Cairo 1358/1939, iii, 233-92; for the text itself of the Shāfiya of Ibn al-Ḥādjib, ibid., 250, 254, 257, 258. Works on phonetics : Ibn Djinnī, Sirr ṣināʿat al-iʿrāb, i, Cairo 1373/1954; the madkhal (6-45) and the first chap. (46-77) are particularly important; Ibn Sīnā, Asbāb ḥudūth al-ḥurūf, 20 pp. octavo, Cairo 1332; new ed., based on four other MSS, by P. N. Khanlarī, Tehrān 1333 (Publications of the University of Tehrān 207). See also, under ḥarf, Part I, the Dictionary of Technical Terms (K. Iṣṭilāḥāt al-fūnun of al-Tahānawī), Calcutta 1862. Of the authors of tadjwīd it is sufficient to mention: Dānī, K. al-Taysīr fi 'l-ḳirāʾāt al-sabʿ, ed. O. Pretzl (Bibliotheca Islamica, ii, 1930). The Muzhir of Suyūṭī records many facts about phonetics (Būlāḳ 1282; Cairo [1325]) but being unvowelled it is difficult to use. The presentation of the text in the most recent edition, from the Maṭbaʿat ʿĪsā al-Bābī, is much more satisfactory; it is referred to as Muzhir[2].

Bibliography of European writers: J. Cantineau, Cours de phonétique arabe, Algiers 1941; idem, Esquisse d'une phonologie de l'arabe classique, in BSL no. 126, xliii (1946), 93-140; idem, Le consonantisme du sémitique, in Semitica, iv (1951-2), 79-94; these works were reprinted in the Jean Cantineau memorial volume: Études de linguistique arabe, Paris 1960. This memorial volume is referred to here (and elsewhere in my other articles from HĀʾ onwards) under the abbreviated titles of: Cours, Esquisse, Consonantisme. The Esquisse (166-78) covers the phonological oppositions of Arabic phonemes and the question of incompatibilities (199-202), two subjects which could not be dealt with here. The Cours (123-5) contains a bibliography of Arabic and particularly of European authors for classical Arabic and the dialects, and this bibliography is taken up and continued in Notions générales de phonétique et de phonologie in the same memorial volume (128-30). It is enough to mention here: M. S. Howell, A grammar of the Classical Arabic Language, Part IV, Allahabad 1911, 1702-39; A. Schaade, Sībawaihi's Lautlehre, Leiden 1911, 17-23, German tr. of chap. 565 of the Kitāb; on Sīrāfī's commentary on this chapter see G. Troupeau in Arabica, v (1958), 168-82; M. Bravmann, Materialien und Untersuchungen zu den phonetischen Lehren der Araber, Göttingen 1934, 112-31, German translation of the above-mentioned treatise by Ibn Sīnā following the Cairo ed.; W. H. T. Gairdner, The phonetics of Arabic, Oxford 1925; H. Fleisch, Études de phonétique arabe, in Mélanges USJ, xxviii (1949-50), 225-85; idem, La conception phonétique des Arabes d'après le Sirr ṣināʿat al-iʿrāb d'Ibn Djinnī, in ZDMG, cviii (1958) 74-105, a study which led to Genèse des ḥurūf: Madjhūra, Mahmūsa (Examen critique), in Mélanges USJ, xxxv (1958), 193-210 (referred to as Examen); idem, Traité de philologie arabe, Beirut 1961, 200-44, or §§ 41-50 (referred to as Traité). All the important points of classical and dialectal Arabic phonetics are touched upon by C. Brockelmann in his Grundriss der vergleichenden Grammatik der semitischen Sprachen, i, Berlin 1908, 141-282; S. Moscati confines himself to classical Arabic in Il sistema consonantico delle lingue semitiche, Rome 1954; M. Cohen covers a wide field, as the title indicates, in his Essai comparatif sur le vocabulaire et le phonétique du chamito-sémiti- que, Paris 1947 (referred to as Essai comparatif). Finally, a very important text of Sībawayhi, quoted in the Commentary of Sīrāfī, on the difference between madjhūra and mahmūsa, is published in H. Fleisch, L'arabe classique, Esquisse d'une structure linguistique, Beirut 1956, 134-36 (referred to as Esquisse). See also LINGUISTICS and PHONETICS. (H. FLEISCH)

AL-ḤURŪF AL-MUḲAṬṬAʿA/ĀT [see AL-ḲURʾĀN].

ḤURŪFIYYA, unorthodox Muslim sect of gnostic-cabalistic tendencies founded by Faḍl Allāh of Astarābād in Iran at the end of the 8th/14th century.

Its founder was born at Astarābād in 740/1340, and, according to some sources, was named ʿAbd al-Raḥmān; he began his career as a Ṣūfī famed particularly for the care he took to avoid eating any unlawful food, so much so that he was known as ḥalāl-khor. He was a sayyid (descendent of ʿAlī) and the son of a chief justice (ḳāḍī al-ḳuḍāt) who died while he was still an infant. From childhood he showed a great inclination to mysticism and to ascetic practices and while still young he possessed the gift of prophetic dreams and of the interpretation of dreams. At the age of 18 he performed his first pilgrimage to Mecca and on his return stayed for some time in Khwārazm. He then decided to make a second pilgrimage, but during the long journey he was persuaded by a dream to make a detour to visit the tomb of the Imām Riḍā at Mashhad whence he went to Mecca and then again to Khwārazm. After various dreams (in one of which there were revealed to him the names of four especially holy mystics, Ibrāhīm b. Adham, Bāyazīd Bisṭāmī, Sahl Tustarī and Buhlūl), he learned in a particularly significant dream what his mission was to be: a star rose in the east and a brilliant ray from it penetrated into Faḍl Allāh's right eye until the whole star was absorbed. It was revealed to him that "this is a star which rises only every few centuries". When he awakened, Faḍl heard the birds singing and partly understood their language. He acquired his first disciples by means of his penetrating interpretations of dreams; they consisted of a baker, Sayyid Muḥammad Nānvāʾī, a certain Darwīsh ʿAlī, a Darwīsh Bāyazīd and others. Faḍl then went to Khurāsān where he found another disciple, and then to Iṣfahān where he settled in the mosque of Tūḳčī. Here there became his follower the Ṣūfī Muʿīn al-Dīn Shahrastānī, who brought to him other "seekers for God" such as Mawlānā Muʿīn al-Dīn, Mawlānā Muḥammad, Shaykh ʿĪsā, Mawlānā ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn Radjāʾī, Naṣr Allāh Nāfadjī, the author of a Khwāb-nāma (book of dreams), valuable for the biographical information on Faḍl Allāh which it contains, and others. The group increased in number and also many from other countries were attracted by Faḍl Allāh's gift of interpreting dreams and by the simple and upright life which he and his followers led, supporting themselves by their own work, mostly manual (Faḍl himself was a maker of hats), and refusing donations and gifts. In addition to the Ḳurʾān, Faḍl Allāh had a thorough knowledge of the Jewish and Christian sacred books (the Torah, the Psalms and the Gospels) which he quotes frequently in his Djāwīdān-nāma. Faḍl's "interpretations of dreams" consisted chiefly of phenomena of "thought-reading" through dreams: he often told the dreamer his thoughts even before he had related his dream. Unlike other mystics of the period, Faḍl Allāh does not seem to have made use of music and dancing. At the age of about 40, while he was at Tabrīz, he had a new experience: there was revealed to him the hidden meaning of letters and the significance of Prophecy (nubuwwa). After three days and nights of ecstasy, he heard voices asking: "Who is this young man? Who is this moon of the earth and the sky?" and a voice which replied: "It is the Lord of Time (ṣāḥib al-zamān), the Sultan of all the Prophets: others attain faith by imitation and learning, whereas he attains it by an inner and clear revelation (kashf wa ʿiyān)". From being a Ṣūfī, Faḍl Allāh now became the founder of a new religious movement. Returning to Iṣfahān, he lived for a time alone in a cave and, shortly afterwards, a dying dervish announced to him that, following the period of prophecy, there had now arrived the time of the revelation of the divine glory (ẓuhūr-i kibriyāʾ). The sources give various dates for this manifestation of the divinity in Faḍl Allāh ("Grace of God"), the most likely being 788/1386 or 789/1387. In the same year Faḍl is said to have written his main work, the Djāwīdān-nāma-yi kabīr. Like other "divine manifestations" before and after him, Faḍl Allāh seems to have sought to convert to his doctrine the princes and rulers of his time. According to Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī (his contemporary, in Inbāʾ al-ghumr fī abnāʾ al-ʿumr), he invited Tīmūrlang to embrace his religion, and it is certain that he dreamed of marrying the daughter of Ṭoḳtamïsh, the khān of the Golden Horde. He spent the last part of his life at Shirwān (now Baku) where he had taken refuge with the prince Mīrān-shāh, son of Tīmūrlang, from Tīmūrlang's sentence against him issued at Samarḳand after a meeting with the orthodox jurisconsults of that city. Mīrān-shāh, however, instead of helping him, had him arrested. From Shirwān, where, in prison, he wrote his Waṣiyyat-nāma (Testament), Faḍl Allāh was taken to the fortress of Alandjaḳ near Nakhčiwān, where he was executed in 796/1394. The place of his execution (maḳtal) at Alandjaḳ became for some time the Mecca of his followers, and Mīrān-shāh became the Antichrist of the new religion (the Ḥurūfī texts refer to him as Mārān-shāh, "king of the serpents").

The first khalīfa of Faḍl Allāh was his disciple ʿAlī al-Aʿlā, author of various Ḥurūfī books, whose ambition was to win to Ḥurūfism the Ḳara-Ḳoyunlu prince Ḳara Yūsuf, who had defeated Mīrān-shāh. He was executed in 822/1419 after having spread Ḥurūfī doctrine in the country of Rūm (Anatolia), where he appears as early as 802/1400, and having helped to instil Ḥurūfī ideas into the community of the Bektāshiyya [q.v.]: he did indeed visit the tekke of Ḥādjdjī Bektāsh at Ḳïrshehir. His propaganda reached as far as Edirne, the Ottoman capital at that time, and to the territory of the Laz and to Trebizond. In 848/1444 a Ḥurūfī missionary was the guest at Edirne of the heir to the throne, Meḥemmed (the future conqueror of Constantinople), who showed an interest in his doctrines; but he was burnt alive as a heretic. In Anatolia the Ḥurūfī doctrines survived, along with others, in the strange fraternity of the Bektāshīs, and Turkish literature contains several good Ḥurūfī poets, notably Nesīmī [q.v.] (flayed alive at Aleppo in 807/1404).

In spite of the relatively short period during which it was an organized movement, the Ḥurūfī sect suffered from heresies and schisms, the chief of these being that of the Nuḳṭawiyya founded by an "ex-communicated" former follower of Faḍl Allāh, Maḥmūd Pasikhānī, from Gīlān.

There are three principal works by Faḍl Allāh, the Djāwīdān-nāma, in prose, written half in Persian and half in the Persian dialect of Astarābād (a poetic version was produced by ʿAlī al-Aʿlā in 802/1400), the Muḥabbat-nāma and the ʿArsh-nāma (in verse); they are still only in manuscript. These works are interesting also from the point of view of dialect. There exist numerous Ḥurūfī treatises, short tracts and poems written by various followers of the founder of the sect, but of particular importance are the works of his khalīfa and recognized interpreter, ʿAlī al-Aʿlā, i.e., the Istiwā-nāma, the Maḥshar-nāma (in prose) and the four mathnawī poems Bashārat-nāma (written in 803/1401), Tawḥīd-nāma, Kursī-nāma (written in 810/1408), and Ḳiyāmat-nāma (written in 814/1412).

Doctrines: Stress has been laid on the cabalistic character of Ḥurūfism, which has in fact taken its name from this feature (ḥarf, pl. ḥurūf = "letter"). This is certainly its most obvious characteristic but it would be wrong to consider it the central point of its doctrine. The most important problems of Ḥurūfism are its doctrines on prophecy and on man. The first arose fairly clearly in the following way: Muḥammad may truly be called the "Seal of the Prophets" because with him prophecy ends and there begins a new cycle, superior to that of prophecy, that of sainthood (wilāya) which in its turn, with the appearance of Faḍl Allāh, was superseded by that of the revelation (ẓuhūr) of the Divine in man. The world is eternal, since creation/emanation is a continual process, the divine attributes (including that of "creator") being identical with the essence of God, which in itself is inaccessible (kanz-i makhfī, hidden treasure). The Divine revelation moves in cycles (according to one text, each of 1360 years) and in each cycle are repeated events and persons from the preceding cycles, in a sort of "eternal return" ("the walnuts of this year are different from and yet the same as those of the harvest last year"), a completely different conception from the Indian theory of metempsychosis (to which Sunni-Islam has always been hostile [see ḤULŪL and TANĀSUKH]).

The second problem, that of the relationship between man and God, is solved not, as some would have it, in a pantheistic sense, but by an exact and continual theophany of the inaccessible divine treasure in man (and especially in the Man par excellence, Faḍl Allāh) on whose face is written in clear letters the actual name of God, Allāh, the nose being the alif, the two lobes of the nose two *lām*s, and the eyes having the form of hāʾ. The traditional eschatological ideas are, however, rejected by the Ḥurūfīs and the Ḳurʾānic anthropomorphism is explained in the sense that God can be represented only in Man. What other meaning could the following ḥadīth have: "Soon you will see your Lord as you see the moon when it is full; you will not be deprived of the sight of Him"? Man, naturally, is understood to be the particularly pure and holy man, in this case Faḍl Allāh. Nesīmī asserted that "God is none other than the son of Adam. The thirty-two letters are the words of the speech of God. Know that all the world is God himself—Adam is the soul and the sun is the face".

This leads us to Ḥurūfī cabalism. The fundamental idea is that God (as we have seen, impossible to grasp in His essence) reveals Himself in the Word (Faḍl Allāh was well acquainted with the beginning of St. John's Gospel). Now the Word is made up of sounds, and sounds are always—in Islamic tradition—identified with "letters" (ḥurūf). The whole total of letters (and of their numerical value according to the abdjad) is thus the total of all the emanating and creative possibilities of God, and is God Himself made manifest. Hence the enormous importance given to letters and to "interpretative" calculations made with them, the various methods of which are too complicated for examples to be given here: it resulted in their having their own cabalistic tafsīr of the Ḳurʾān; one phrase is changed into another (of the same numerical value) which indicated its "true" meaning in the same way that the elements of the world are transformed ceaselessly in the infinite cycles of its existence. Every atom moreover, said Faḍl Allāh, "is a tongue which speaks". In the same way are explained the reasons (Ḥurūfism attaches great importance to the ʿaḳl, "intellect") for the number of *rakʿa*s in each canonical prayer, of the number of the canonical prayers themselves, of the limbs and of the human face, etc., in a kind of grand and unitarian ontological nominalism.

As has been stated above, the Ḥurūfīs had at first an organization of their own as an autonomous religion, with their own rites and prayers, described in an important chapter of the Istiwā-nāma of ʿAlī al-Aʿlā. The adhān, for example, included formulae such as the following: ashhadu anna lā ilāha illā F-ʾ-H ("... that there is no God but FʾH", the cabalistic formula for Faḍl Allāh); ashhadu anna Ādam khalīfat Allāh ("that Adam [= Man] is the vicar of God"); ashhadu anna Muḥammadan rasūl Allāh ("that Muḥammad is the messenger of God"). The pilgrimage to the place where Faḍl Allāh was killed took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda (the month in which he was killed) and, according to the same Istiwā-nāma, "... after 28 ṭawāf (circumambulations) around the door of the maḳtal, they (= the Ḥurūfīs) name 40 Knowers of God in the East and in the West of the world, go into the bed of the river, pick up three times twenty-one pebbles, i.e., 63: 21 for the Earth, 21 for Water, 21 for the Air, and throw them into the Fire, which is the origin of Satan, with their faces turned towards the fortress of the accursed and foul Mārānshāh (the king of the serpents = Mīrānshāh) which is opposite the gate of the fortress of Alandjaḳ—may it be preserved from disasters and calamities—and is called "the fortress of Sandjar"; then they take off the pilgrim's dress ...".

When it began however, it was not intended that Ḥurūfism should be merely a secret or esoteric religion but that it should become also (a premature ambition at that time) a visible religious organization, with autonomous rites; it was hoped that it would gain some rulers as its adherents. It did not succeed in this, but its doctrines penetrated into various quarters, not only into Bektāshism but also into certain aspects of Persian Ṣūfism, from some of whose doctrines (and from the ever-present undercurrent of Ismāʿīlī/gnostic beliefs) they had been in large part derived.

AL-ḤUSĀM B. ḌIRĀR, ABU 'L-KHAṬṬĀR, a Kalbī aristocrat of Damascus, who arrived in Spain as governor in the year 125/743 to replace the successor of Baldj, Thaʿlaba b. Salāma al-ʿĀmilī, who had been mortally wounded at Aqua Portora. He managed to keep the unruly Syrian djundīs away from Cordova by giving them fiefs in the regions of Elvira-Granada, Reiyo (Archidona and Malaga), Jaen, the Algarve (south Portugal), and the district of Tudmīr (Murcia), though it appears that this conciliatory measure was taken on the advice of Ardabasto, the son of Witiza and chief of the Christian dhimmīs, who had been given the task of collecting the kharādj from them. But soon his Kalbī partisanship overcame his political prudence and he provoked an implacable war through his bias against his enemies. The opposing Ḳays faction allied themselves with the Lakhm and the Djudhām under the command of Ṣumayl who from this moment began to show a considerable activity, making himself little by little the justification of the government's policy and even, ten years later, playing an important rôle in the rise of the Hispano-Muslim emirate with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān I. His coalition plan having received the approval of his allies, he succeeded in gaining the adhesion of Écija and Morón, to whose Djudhāmī chief Thawāba b. Salāma he shrewdly offered the command of the coalition. The revolt broke out in Andalusia, and the rebels concentrated in the district of Sidona in Radjab 127/April 745; a little later they encountered Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār, who had hastened up with his troops, on the banks of the Guadalete. Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār was defeated and taken prisoner and Thawāba b. Salāma, on his triumphant arrival in Cordova, proclaimed himself governor of Spain. Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār did not long remain in prison; his followers attacked by night the prison in which he was being kept and carried him off to Niebla, from where he strove to re-group his followers, but he failed to get the upper hand over the coalition which had displaced him. As for his good relations with the vanquished Christians, we know only that when Sāra, the granddaughter of Witiza, arrived in Damascus to complain to the Caliph Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik of the dispossession of which she had been victim at the hands of her uncle Ardabasto, Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār was ordered to return her hereditary property.

ḤUSĀM AL-DĪN [see TIMURTASH].

ḤUSĀM AL-DĪN, Abu 'l-Shawk [see ʿANNĀZIDS].

ḤUSĀM AL-DĪN ČELEBI, Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Akhī Turk (d. 683/1284), favourite disciple and second khalīfa of Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī [q.v.], was born of a family which had come from Urmiya to settle at Konya (Aflākī, Manāḳib al-ʿārifīn, ii, 759; tr. Huart, ii, 242). Since he became a murīd of Djalāl al-Dīn as a young man and knew Shams al-Dīn al-Tabrīzī (d. 642/1244), it may be assumed that he was born in about 623/1226 (cf. op. cit., ii, 738; tr. ii, 223). His father and grandfathers were prominent akhīs of Anatolia. Ḥusām al-Dīn lost his father at an early age, but was cared for by various notables of the day. When he reached puberty his beauty captivated all beholders (op. cit., ii, 738; tr. ii, 224). At this time he went with all his servants and young companions to Djalāl al-Dīn, became his murīd, and released all his entourage from the duty of serving himself. He gave away all his wealth, down to his household goods, to benefit Djalāl al-Dīn and his circle. His devoted attachment and probity impressed Djalāl al-Dīn, who gave him the superintendence of the waḳf revenues which accrued to him and of the gifts which he received from various persons. All these sums were sent to Ḥusām al-Dīn, who would distribute them first to Djalāl al-Dīn's family and then among the members of his circle according to their degrees (op. cit., ii, 777; tr. ii, 255). He quickly became prominent among the murīds for his piety and his devotion to Djalāl al-Dīn, whose regard for him was increased by the fact that he, unlike the others, showed great respect for Shams al-Dīn al-Tabrīzī and then for Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Zarkūb (op. cit., ii, 782; tr. ii, 259). It was evidently at this time or shortly afterwards that Djalāl al-Dīn made approaches to the officers of the government to procure Ḥusām al-Dīn's appointment as shaykh of the Khānḳāh-i Ḍiyā and the Khānḳāh-i Lālā at Konya (see Mektubât-i Mevlânâ Celâleddin, 128-9), approaches which were successful (cf. Aflākī, i, 558, ii, 754 f., 758; tr. ii, 73, 237 f., 241). Five years after the death of Shaykh Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (657/1258), Djalāl al-Dīn appointed Ḥusām al-Dīn as khalīfa in his place. It was within these five years that the first volume of the Mathnawī was written (659/1260-1), at the prompting of Ḥusām al-Dīn who acted as amanuensis. When this first volume was finished, Ḥusām al-Dīn's wife died. This loss distressed him, so that he did not urge Djalāl al-Dīn to proceed with the Mathnawī (Mathnawī, ii, 247; Aflākī, ii, 742-4; tr. ii, 228). Two years later he married again and work on the Mathnawī was resumed. Until Djalāl al-Dīn's death (672/1273), he acted as his khalīfa and amanuensis, and after that, on Djalāl al-Dīn's nomination, was his khalīfa for the remaining twelve years of his life (see Sulṭān Walad, Walad-nāma, 122 f.; Sipahsālār, Risāla, 146 f.; Aflākī, ii, 746 f.; tr. ii, 231); men of all classes were attracted to him by his optimistic outlook, his generosity and his fine character. He died at Konya in 683/1284, according to Aflākī (ii, 779; tr. ii, 256) on 22 Shaʿbān/3 November but according to his tombstone (see A. Gölpınarlı, Mevlânâ'dan sonra Mevlevîlik, 28) on 12 Shaʿbān/25 October. He is buried in the turba of Djalāl al-Dīn.

Ḥusām al-Dīn, who himself composed no works, owes his fame to the help he brought to the writing of the Mathnawī. Djalāl al-Dīn acknowledges this in various books of the Mathnawī, praises him under various titles and honorifics, and even calls the work Ḥusāmī-nāma (see Mathnawī, i, 3, iv, 278_{1-6}, vi, 271_{1-8}; Sipahsālār, 142 f.; Aflākī, ii, 742-3; tr. ii, 227 f.). Whenever and wherever Djalāl al-Dīn found an occasion for dictation, Ḥusām al-Dīn would take the verses down and read them back to him (Aflākī, ii, 740, 742; tr. ii, 226, 228). The work, suspended for two years after the completion of the first book, was resumed in 672/1263-4 and finished shortly before Djalāl al-Dīn's death (see A. Gölpınarlı, Mevlânâ Celâleddin, 120 f.). The portions taken down at various times were corrected and explained as Ḥusām al-Dīn read them back (Aflākī, i, 496-7; tr. ii, 19), the copy written on the basis of these corrections and explanations later being rightly regarded as one of the most reliable texts (loc. cit.); some manuscripts transcribed from this copy exist in the libraries of Konya and Istanbul (see Nihâd M. Çetin, Maṭnawī'nin Konya Kütüphanelerindeki eski yazmaları, in Şarkiyat Mecmuası, iv (1961), 96-118). Ḥusām al-Dīn's second contribution to the Mawlawī way of life, later to develop into a ṭarīḳa, was to establish its 'rules' (ādāb): thus he made it the regular practice that the *samā*ʿ [q.v.] took place after the Friday prayer and that the Mathnawī was read after the Ḳurʾān had been read (Aflākī, ii, 777; tr. ii, 255). It was during his headship of the movement also that Djalāl al-Dīn's mausoleum was built, so that it possessed a focal point and centre, what might be called a Mawlawī ḳibla (cf. A. Gölpınarlı, Mevlânâ'dan sonra Mevlevîlik, 24).

SULṬĀN ḤUSAYN MĪRZĀ B. MANṢŪR B. BAYḲARA was born in Harāt in Muḥarram 842/June 1438. At the age of 14 he entered the service of Abu'l-Ḳāsim Bābur. In 858/1454, when Abu'l-Ḳāsim Bābur made peace with Abū Saʿīd, Ḥusayn Mīrzā entered the service of the latter, but was imprisoned by him. After his release through the intervention of his mother, he returned to Abu'l-Ḳāsim Bābur, with whom he remained till his death (861/1457). He then joined Muʿizz al-Dīn Sandjar, who held Marw, Mākhān and Djām, and married his daughter; his eldest son, Badīʿ al-Zamān, was born of this marriage. A period of struggle with Abū Saʿīd [q.v.] and his sons now began. Immediately after the death of Abū Saʿīd, Ḥusayn Mīrzā went to Harāt and ascended the throne on 10 Ramaḍān 873/25 March 1469. With one brief intermission, he remained the undisputed ruler of Khurāsān until his death (911/1506). Ḥusayn Mīrzā showed Shīʿī inclinations at the beginning of his reign, but abandoned these entirely under the influence of Nawāʾī and others. He was a brave soldier, fighting personally in many battles.

Ḥusayn Mīrzā's long reign in Khurāsān is more important from the cultural than from the political point of view. Under his rule relatively peaceful conditions were established in Khurāsān and the province enjoyed a period of prosperity. His capital of Harāt became an important cultural centre. Poets, men of letters and of learning enjoyed the patronage of both Ḥusayn Mīrzā and his close friend the Turkish poet Nawāʾī, the last great classical Persian poet Djāmī, the historian Mīrkhwānd, the miniature painter Bihzad [qq.v.] and the calligrapher Sulṭān ʿAlī Mashhadī being among the most famous personalities of the court. Ḥusayn Mīrzā himself composed poetry in Turkish and Persian, using the makhlaṣ Ḥusaynī. His Turkish Dīwān contains *ghazal*s composed throughout in one and the same variant of ramal, namely – ᴗ – – | – ᴗ – – | – ᴗ – – | – ᴗ –, the most popular metre of the period. In spite of the high praise given them by Nawāʾī, these poems are of no more than average quality (the fact that the Ṣafawid Sultan Ḥusayn ordered a translation of a selection of them into Persian (cf. British Museum, Or. 3379) is to be attributed rather to the importance of the person of the poet than to the intrinsic value of his poetry). He is also the author of a brief treatise in Turkish, a sort of apologia pro vita sua, which is interesting for its exposition of the ideals and conceptions of a mediaeval Muslim Turkish monarch. The Madjālis al-ʿushshāḳ, which is ascribed to him by Sām Mīrzā, is in fact, as Bābūr and Khwāndamīr stated, by Kamāl al-Dīn Ḥusayn Gāzurgāhī.

ḤUSAYN, who was known until his accession to the throne as Sulṭān Ḥusayn Mīrzā, was the eldest son of Shāh Sulaymān, the Ṣafawid monarch who reigned 1077-1105/1666-94. Ḥusayn, who was born in 1079/1668, was by nature quiet and studious, with an inclination in his earlier years to austerity. Having been brought up in the harem, in accordance with the pernicious practice inaugurated by Shāh ʿAbbās I, Ḥusayn was completely ignorant of state affairs and, indeed, of the world in general when, at the age of 26, he succeeded his father on the latter's death. Ḥusayn soon showed himself to be of weak character, and the court eunuchs took advantage of this fact to assume control over the government of the country, but intense rivalry soon developed between them and the *mudjtahid*s and *mullā*s. Although at first violently against the drinking of alcohol, the Shāh was, by means of a subterfuge, induced to become addicted to it (see Krusinski, The history of the revolution of Persia taken from the memoirs of Father Krusinski ...... by Father du Cerceau, Dublin 1729, 54-6). Moreover, the Shāh by no means neglected the pleasures of the harem; thus his early tendency to austerity soon became a thing of the past.

The first few years of the reign were uneventful, but peace and calm were to prove transitory. Trouble first arose in Balūčistān, but it was soon quelled by the able and forceful Giorgi XI, the King of Kartli and Wālī of Georgia; he was known to the Persians as Gurgīn Khān and also as Shāh Nawāz Khān. A more serious revolt then occurred in Ḳandahār, under the leadership of the astute Ghalzay chieftain Mīr Ways [see GHALZAY]. For once taking a sensible course, the Shāh sent Gurgīn Khān with a strong force to quell the revolt. Gurgīn Khān successfully carried out his task and sent Mīr Ways under strong guard to Iṣfahān, with a warning that he was a dangerous man. Mīr Ways, who was a subtle and able man, however, ingratiated himself with the simple Shāh and intrigued with Gurgīn Khān's numerous enemies at the court, with the result that he was soon freed and allowed to return to Ḳandahār. Soon afterwards Mīr Ways, after having Gurgīn Khān murdered, defeated the Georgian garrison. Although several attempts were subsequently made to subdue Mīr Ways, they all failed and he remained virtually independent for the rest of his life. After Mīr Ways's death in 1126/1715, his brother and successor ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (erroneously named ʿAbd Allāh in certain sources) attempted to make peace with the Persian court, but he was soon assassinated by Maḥmūd, Mīr Ways's ambitious and brutal elder son.

Encouraged by the success of the Ghalzays, the Abdālī tribe, whose main centre was at Herāt, also revolted and frustrated all attempts by the Persians to subdue them. Trouble also occurred in the Persian Gulf, where the Muscat Arabs, under Sultan Ibn Sayf II, captured the islands of Baḥrayn, Ḳishm and Larak in 1717. Two years later the turbulent Lezgis of southern Dāghistān ravaged Shīrwān and parts of Georgia. When Wakhtang VI, the Wālī of Georgia and nephew of the late Giorgi XI (Gurgīn Khān), had gathered his forces together and was about to crush the Lezgis, he received orders from the Shāh to stay his hand. Wakhtang obeyed this order, but he was so enraged that he vowed never to take action in defence of Persia again. Late in the same year Maḥmūd of Ḳandahār, with a force of some 11,000 men, invaded Persia and captured Kirmān. He remained in occupation of the town for several months, but was then forced to withdraw to Ḳandahār to quell a revolt there (the story that Maḥmūd was forced to withdraw after being heavily defeated by Luṭf ʿAlī Khān, the nephew of Fatḥ ʿAlī Khān Dāghistānī, the Shāh's iʿtimād al-dawla, though given in a number of sources, has no basis in fact).

In December 1720, Fatḥ ʿAlī Khān Dāghistānī's enemies at the court procured his arrest on a trumped-up charge of treason and had him disgraced and blinded; his nephew Luṭf ʿAlī Khān, the commander of the only well organized force in the country, was also disgraced and thrown into prison. It was at this juncture that a Turkish envoy named Dürrī Efendi arrived at the Persian court. Rumours of the impending disintegration of Persia had reached the Turkish Government and it had sent Dürrī Efendi to ascertain whether or not these rumours were well-founded. In his report Dürrī Efendi predicted that the Ṣafawid régime was apparently near its end, as there were no men in Persia who were capable of governing it (Relation de Dourry Efendy, Paris 1810, 54-5). Likewise very interested in the situation in Persia was Peter the Great of Russia. His envoy Volynsky, who had been in Persia from 1715 to 1717, had brought back disquieting reports of the situation in that country. In order to glean further and more recent information, Semeon Avramov, the Russian Consul at Rasht, went on Peter's orders to the Persian court, where he arrived just after the departure of Dürrī Efendi. At the same time Peter the Great sent Captain Baskakov secretly to Gilan to make a military report on the terrain. Avramov reported in much the same sense as Dürrī Efendi (see P. G. Butkov, Materiali dlya Novoy Istorii Kavkaza, 1722-1803, St. Petersburg 1869, i, 6).

The dismissal and cruel treatment of Fatḥ ʿAlī Khān Dāghistānī, who was a Lezgi and a Sunnī, so enraged his compatriots and co-religionists in Dāghistān that they again invaded Shīrwān, where they sacked the town of Shamākhī. Among those to suffer severe loss on this occasion were a number of Russian merchants. The rebels then appealed to the Sultan of Turkey for protection, who accepted them as his subjects. The news of this outrage at Shamākhī gave Peter the Great his excuse for invading Persia, which he did in the following year, advancing as far as Darband.

Meanwhile, Maḥmūd, having put down the revolt in Ḳandahār, had once again invaded Persia. After occupying Kirmān again, he boldly advanced on Iṣfahān. Although greatly inferior in numbers, his men overwhelmed the royal forces near the village of Gulnābād, 30 km east-north-east of Iṣfahān. Three days later, Maḥmūd resumed his advance and soon encircled the capital. With Luṭf ʿAlī Khān disgraced and in prison, the only leader capable of defeating Maḥmūd and driving him back to Ḳandahār was Wakhtang VI of Georgia; in view, however, of his vow, he refrained from action. Although Ṭahmāsp Mīrzā, the heir to the throne, escaped from the doomed capital during the siege, he made no serious attempt to raise forces to relieve the city, with the result that, after many thousands of the inhabitants had died of disease and starvation, it capitulated in October 1722. Maḥmūd, having received the insignia of royalty from the unfortunate Shāh Sulṭān Ḥusayn, entered the capital in triumph and mounted the throne.

Meanwhile, after Peter the Great had staged his invasion, Turkey also invaded the unfortunate country. War between Russia and Turkey then nearly ensued, but it was averted by the efforts of the Marquis de Bonnac, the French Ambassador to the Porte. He managed with great skill to arrange for a treaty to be signed by Turkey and Russia for the partition of much of northern and western Persia in 1724.

After his deposition, Sultan Ḥusayn was kept in confinement in Iṣfahān. In February 1725, Maḥmūd, during a fit of insanity, murdered, largely with his own hands, most of the Ṣafawid princes. He wounded the ex-Shāh himself, when he endeavoured to ward off a savage blow aimed at one of the young princes. Soon afterwards, Maḥmūd, who had become completely insane, either died a natural death or was murdered by his cousin Ashraf, the son of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. Ashraf thereupon mounted the Persian throne.

In the following year war broke out between the Ghalzays and the Ottoman Turks. In the late autumn of 1726 Ashraf, on receipt of a rude message from Aḥmad Pasha, the Turkish commander-in-chief, that he was going to restore Sultan Ḥusayn to the throne, sent emissaries to Iṣfahān, who put the unfortunate ex-Shāh to death.

AL-ḤUSAYN b. ʿAlī, Bey of Tunis (1705-35), founder of the Ḥusaynid dynasty. The son of a Greek renegade recruited into the ranks of the od̲j̲aḳ, Ḥusayn was āg̲h̲ā of the sipāhis at the time of the war between Algeria and Tunisia (1704-5). Proclaimed Bey after the capture of Bey Ibrāhīm by the Algerian troops, Ḥusayn first repulsed the Algerians, then got rid of the Dey, Muḥammad K̲h̲od̲j̲a, who was supported by the army, and finally also of Bey Ibrāhīm after he had been set free. Ḥusayn was recognized by the Ottoman Sultan, who gave him the title of Pas̲h̲a with the rank of Beylerbeyi, governor of the province of Tunisia (1708); he omitted from the list of his titles dāyī (Dey), which from that time on was given to an official of lower rank. While recognizing Ottoman suzerainty, Ḥusayn at the same time persuaded the council of the highest military officers to grant him hereditary power, to be passed on to his descendants by the order of primogeniture in the male line (1710). Thus was founded the Ḥusaynid dynasty, which continued to reign over Tunisia until 1957.

From 1705 until 1729 Ḥusayn's reign was peaceful; his relations with the European powers were very good, and were distinguished by the conclusion of treaties with France (1710 and 1728), England (1716), Spain (1720), Austria (1725), and Holland (1728). Nevertheless the behaviour of the Tunisian privateers caused the French fleet to stage demonstrations off La Goulette in 1728 and 1731.

Internal political life was severely shaken in 1729 by the revolt of Ḥusayn's nephew, ʿAlī Pas̲h̲a, who, deprived of political power, raised the central tribes with the help of his son Yūnus and, when defeated, fled to Algeria. After at first being interned there, ʿAlī Pas̲h̲a was later on supported by the Dey of Algiers, Ibrāhīm, and they invaded Tunisia together. Beaten in turn at Smend̲j̲a (4 September 1735), Ḥusayn retreated to al-Ḳayrawān, while ʿAlī Pas̲h̲a was proclaimed Bey in Tunis. Ḥusayn endeavoured to take the offensive again, but failed before Tunis and retired once again to al-Ḳayrawān, where he continued his resistance for five years. The town was finally taken by Yūnus on 16 Safar 1157/25 May 1740, and Ḥusayn was captured and executed a short time later.

During the first twenty years of his reign, Ḥusayn showed much creative activity: he restored the walls of al-Ḳayrawān and built madrasas at Sousse, Sfax and Gafsa. In Tunis itself he was responsible for putting the aqueducts into good repair and for planning the saddlers' quarter (Sūḳ al-sarrād̲j̲īn), for building the dyers' mosque (D̲j̲āmiʿ al-d̲j̲adīd), the madrasas al-Nak̲h̲la, al-Ḥusayniyya and al-D̲j̲adīda, and the mausoleum of the Dey Ḳara Muṣṭafā. In his reign, ʿAzīza ʿUt̲h̲māna, grand-daughter of the Dey ʿUt̲h̲mān and famous for her pious foundations, died. She was buried near the Madrasa al-S̲h̲ammāʿiyya. Furthermore, it was Ḥusayn who transferred the centre of Tunisian government to the Bardo.

ḤUSAYN b. ʿAlī, Amīr and "Grand S̲h̲arīf" of Mecca and the Ḥid̲j̲āz from 1326/1908 to 1335/1916, and King of the Ḥid̲j̲āz from 1335/1916 to 1343/1924, was the elder son of the second son, ʿAlī, of the first Sharifian Amīr of Mecca of the ʿAbādila family of the ʿAwn branch of the Meccan S̲h̲arīfs, the famous Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Muʿīn b. ʿAwn, who died in 1275/1858. In spite of almost-successful attempts by the long-dominant Zayd branch of the S̲h̲arīfs to regain the Meccan amirate, the descendants of Muḥammad ibn ʿAwn in fact retained it until its disappearance.

Ḥusayn, born in Istanbul in 1270/1853 or 1273/1856, passed his youth partly in the Ḥid̲j̲āz and partly in Istanbul, where he was, after 1311/1893, a permanent resident and political détenu. Bilingual in Turkish and Arabic, an abundant and mellifluous talker and writer, combining obstinacy with ambiguity and a dominating temper with outstanding charm, he was prominent in local society and developed the qualities which he was later to demonstrate in high office. His four sons (ʿAlī, ʿAbd Allāh, Fayṣal and Zayd [qq.v.]) were all Turkish-educated, but all, by order of their authoritarian father, passed prolonged periods also in Arabia. Ḥusayn himself was appointed to the Ottoman Council of State, and moved acceptably in the highest official and Court circles.

One effect of the Turkish revolution of 1326/1908 was to displace into exile the ruling Amīr of Mecca, ʿAlī ibn ʿAbd Allāh, first cousin of Ḥusayn. The succession fell to the latter's uncle, ʿAbd Allāh Pas̲h̲a, but, already old, he sustained a fatal stroke before leaving Istanbul. After some days of eager canvassing between ʿAwn and Zayd interests, the candidate of the former, Ḥusayn, secured the backing of the (reputedly Anglophile) Grand Vizir, Kāmil Pās̲h̲ā, and was appointed by the Sultan (cf. Hilmi Kâmil Bayur, Sadrazam Kâmil Paşa, Ankara 1954, 287 ff.). He was received with great pomp at D̲j̲idda and at Mecca in the last days of 1326/1908.

In a situation of extreme delicacy vis-à-vis the Turkish wālī of the Ḥid̲j̲āz wilāyet, the new Amīr displayed at first every sign of loyalty to his Sultan-Caliph. He took up arms against Idrīsī rebels in ʿAṣīr, occupied Ibhā, and carried out a partial though unsuccessful invasion of Ḳaṣīm, to assert tribal rights. Nevertheless he was, during these years, simultaneously formulating certain ambitions of his own highly inconsistant with loyalty to Turkey, and was insisting on all, or more than all, the privileges of his own position. He obstructed, and in the end through tribal action prevented, the extension of the Ḥid̲j̲āz Railway southward from Madīna, successfully resisted Turkish attempts to normalise the administration of the province and to impose conscription, enhanced his personal position by daily entertainment on a lavish scale, and even, though invisibly, placed himself in touch with Arab secret societies in Syria and Egypt working for home-rule for the Arab provinces. His second son, ʿAbd Allāh, held tentative conversations with the British in Egypt.

On the outbreak of the First World War in 1333/1914, the last-mentioned contacts were resumed, and Ḥusayn's ideas for Arab, and personal, aggrandisement took shape. He temporised over the Turkish demand for the raising of Arab forces to aid his suzerain, and found himself unable to support the proclamation, in the Holy Cities, of Holy War for the Caliph. Closer contact was made with Damascus, through his son Fayṣal, and with the British in Cairo through secret messengers. The latter negotiations resulted in the "McMahon Letters" exchanged with Sir Henry McMahon, the British High Commissioner in Egypt: letters which seemed to express a broad Anglo-Arab agreement but later became famous and disastrous from their inconclusive ambiguities. The impulse to proclaim an Arab uprising against the Turks was increased by Turkish anti-Arab repression in Syria, and not less potently by British promises of immediate aid, in arms and money, for such a revolt. In mid-summer 1335/1916 the Arab revolt was proclaimed by Ḥusayn ibn ʿAlī, military operations (in desert-Arab style) began, the Turks were expelled from Mecca, and soon afterwards from Djidda, the smaller Red Sea ports, and with little delay from almost the whole of the Ḥidjāz except Madīna. In the late autumn Ḥusayn announced himself as "King of the Arab Countries" —a title unacceptable, however, to the Powers (Britain, France, Italy), who substituted that of "King of the Ḥidjāz".

When military operations moved beyond the Ḥidjāz, and particularly when British participation in officers, supplies, money and staffwork became all-important in the Arab forces, King Ḥusayn could no longer control, or even appreciate, the course of events or plans, and perforce he ceased, except by distant criticism and in some degree through influence over his active sons ʿAbd Allāh and Fayṣal, to take any part. He stayed in Mecca, locally a dominant figure, eloquent, irritable, increasingly remote from realities, and of little weight in an Arab world less interested in him than he supposed. The end of the war in 1918 found him still hoping for a united Arab kingdom under his rule; but he was soon disillusioned by the course of events in the Levant and by the Allied attitude to his wide claims, though this could not have been entirely unknown to him. The Allied military occupation of all (geographical) Syria and ʿIrāḳ and the arrangements embodied in the Sykes-Picot Agreement of 1916 precluded effective Arab rule. This agreement was published by the Bolsheviks in November 1917; at least the general terms had already been communicated to him by the Allies in May of that year (Dawn, The Amir ..., 131). Ḥusayn was powerless to influence these developments or even the acts of his own sons; he was still more at sea in all that was reported to him of the peace-making at Versailles, where Arab claims received little attention. King Ḥusayn was in fact unable to play any rôle in affairs outside the Ḥidjāz from 1337/1918 onwards.

In his own Kingdom, his maladministration became notorious. He failed to extend his rule over any other part of Arabia, and, angrily rejecting the Mandates applied to the northern Arab territories, declined to ratify the Peace treaty. He quarrelled with Egypt over arrangements for the Ḥadjdj ceremonial, and, still more dangerously, with the central-Arabian power of Ibn Suʿūd over tribes, oases and refugees. His assumption of the Caliphate itself, while on a visit to ʿAmmān, in 1343/1924, when that title and office was abolished by the Turks, was a crowning mistake; he was accepted as Caliph by only a small minority even of Arabs, aroused powerful opposition, and added nothing to his prestige (cf. the attack of Rashīd Riḍā, cited by E. Kedourie in JRAS, (1963), 215).

The end came from the Wahhābī followers of Ibn Suʿūd, whom he had needlessly offended. These, with strong iconoclastic religious emotions and many old scores to pay off, invaded the Ḥidjāz only six months after the assumption of the Caliphate. They swept to the walls of Mecca and forced the old King to abdicate in favour of his eldest son ʿAlī, and retire to Djidda, and thence by British steamer to ʿAḳaba. He took with him his whole personal fortune, amounting, according to general belief, to some millions of pounds sterling, mainly in gold coins packed in petrol tins.

After some months passed at ʿAḳaba the King was removed by British cruiser to Cyprus, where he lived quietly in a villa at Nicosia. He was accompanied by his youngest son Zayd, and visited periodically by the others. His mood was one of disillusion and bitterness, but he had pleasure in conversation and in his horses. After sustaining a stroke in 1930 he moved—or was moved—via Beirut to his son ʿAbd Allāh's court at ʿAmmān, and died there in mid-summer 1931. He was buried in the Ḥaram al-Sharīf at Jerusalem

AL-ḤUSAYN B. AL-ḤUSAYN, the last dey of Algiers, was born at Izmir and ruled from 1818 to 1830. When his predecessor ʿAlī Khodja died of the plague on 1 March 1818 Ḥusayn was occupying the high office of khodjat al-khayl (tribute collector). Ḥusayn was raised to the dignity of dey without having sought it, and being of a moderate disposition opened his reign by gestures of clemency. His reward was two attempts at assassination. Thereafter he remained mostly in the kasbah, which dominated the city of Algiers, surrounded by Kabyle guards.

There was unrest in Algeria: the beys of Constantine and Oran were faced with serious local rebellions which were maintained, especially in the Oran area, by religious groups. Thanks to his patience and the activity of competent and devoted collaborators, Ḥusayn finally re-established calm in 1826 in the east, and in 1828 in the west.

Nevertheless external affairs were dominant during his reign. He had to send vessels and men to help the Ottoman government against the Greek insurgents. Previously he had been invited by the European powers, after the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, to suppress piracy and abolish slavery. As he was evasive, a Franco-British naval demonstration had taken place off Algiers in September 1819.

Later, when he was using forceful measures against Kabyle rebels, the British consul stubbornly refused to hand over to him the Kabyle servants whom he employed. The dey retorted by expelling the consul, so Great Britain sent a fleet to bombard Algiers in June 1824. The effects of these reprisals were slight.

The affair of France's debt to the Jewish merchants Bacri and Busnach and the dey himself, which had been simmering long before Ḥusayn had come to power, occupied him for the whole of his reign and caused his downfall. It was in connexion with this affair that he struck the French consul Deval with his fly-whisk on 30 April 1827 in the course of a very animated interview. As he refused to make the apologies demanded by the French government, the French fleet set up a blockade along the Algerian coast. Then there came the incident of 3 August 1829, when the Algerine coastal batteries fired upon the vessel bearing a French plenipotentiary. Ḥusayn had not given the orders for this, but refused to satisfy French demands for reparation. As a sequel the French government decided to organize an expedition to destroy the power of the deys, and on 4 July 1830 Ḥusayn was handed the capitulation proposals from the commander of the French expeditionary force. He set his seal upon them on the morning of the 5th.

He left Algiers for Italy, where he lived for several years, then retired to Alexandria, where he died in 1838.

AL-ḤUSAYN B. ʿALĪ [see IBN MĀKŪLĀ; AL-MAGHRIBĪ; AL-ṬUGHRĀʾĪ].

(AL-)ḤUSAYN B. ʿALĪ B. ABĪ ṬĀLIB, grandson of the Prophet and son of Fāṭima [q.v.], famous because of his revolt which ended tragically at Karbalāʾ on 10 Muḥarram 61/October 680.

Childhood and youth. (Al-)Ḥusayn was born at Medina, according to the majority of the sources in the beginning of Shaʿbān 4/January 626. He was thus still a child when the Prophet died and could therefore have very few memories of his grandfather. A number of *ḥadīth*s mention the affectionate phrases which Muḥammad is said to have used of his grandsons, e.g., "whoever loves them loves me and whoever hates them hates me" and "al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn are the *sayyid*s of the youth of Paradise" (this statement is very important in the eyes of the Shīʿīs, who have made of it one of the basic justifications for the right of the Prophet's descendants to the imāmate; sayyid shabāb al-djanna is one of the epithets which the Shīʿīs give to each of the two brothers); other traditions present Muḥammad with his grandsons on his knees, on his shoulders, or even on his back during the prayer at the moment of prostrating himself (Ibn Kathīr, viii, 205-7, has collected a fair number of these accounts, drawn mainly from the collections of Ibn Ḥanbal and of al-Tirmidhī). A number of traditionists have added to these life-like and charming little pictures some details which, to the non-Muslim, appear curious or, when they include angels, fanciful, but which do not appear so to Muslims, with their belief in the frequent visits of Djibrīl to Muḥammad; it is in other accounts, on which see below under The Legend of Ḥusayn (col. 611a), that the Shīʿī influence is apparent. During his youth, Ḥusayn lived in the shadow of his father, obeying his orders (see, e.g., al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj, iv, 271, 279, 281 etc.) and taking part in his campaigns.

Attitude towards Muʿāwiya. Even after the death of ʿAlī, Ḥusayn still does not stand out as a personality; an example of this is seen in his relationship with Muʿāwiya: he reproached his brother Ḥasan for having renounced power, but himself submitted to the fait accompli, accepting an appanage of one or two million dirhams; he also went often to Damascus where he received further largesse. Several times, even before Ḥasan's death, the Shīʿīs suggested that he should revolt (e.g., Ḥudjr b. ʿAdī [q.v.]), but the reply was always the same: "so long as this man [Muʿāwiya] lives, nothing can be done ... the directive is to think continually of future revenge, but to say nothing about it" (al-Balādhurī, 634r-v, 636r, etc.). Muʿāwiya, although informed by his governor at Medina, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, of how the Shīʿīs frequented Ḥusayn, was not alarmed by it; he prudently counselled Marwān to avoid a clash with Ḥusayn and sent the latter a letter in which he mingled generous promises with the advice not to provoke him. The incident closed with a proud written reply from Ḥusayn, which seems not to have worried Muʿāwiya (Ibn Kathīr, viii, 162). There were only two occasions when Ḥusayn acted boldly: when he defended against some powerful Umayyads his right to certain possessions (Aghānī, xvi, 68-70) and when Muʿāwiya asked the high officials of state to recognize his son Yazīd as his successor; Ḥusayn was then among the five persons who refused to submit to this claim, which introduced a new principle in the succession to the caliphate [see WALĪ ʿAHD].

Further refusal of the bayʿa to Yazīd after the death of Muʿāwiya and consequences of this. Immediately after the death of Muʿāwiya (Radjab 60/March-April 680), the governor of Medina, al-Walīd b. ʿUtba b. Abī Sufyān, on the orders of Yazīd, invited to the palace at an unusual hour Ḥusayn and ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr [q.v.] with the intention of obliging them to pay homage to the new caliph. Both of them realized that Muʿāwiya was dead and, having decided to stand by their refusal to make the bayʿa, feared for their lives. Whereas Ibn al-Zubayr fled the following night to Mecca, Ḥusayn went to the palace, but accompanied by his supporters, and, after offering his condolence, asked that the bayʿa should be delayed, under the pretext that, in order to be valid, it must be made in public; he succeeded in delaying it for two days and finally escaped at night with his family to Mecca, without however taking an indirect route. Al-Walīd b. ʿUtba, although urged by Marwān to resort to violence, was unwilling to take serious measures against the grandson of the Prophet and paid for his inactivity with dismissal from his office. The situation created in Mecca by the arrival of Ibn al-Zubayr and Ḥusayn cannot have been a very easy one. The inhabitants of Mecca liked to attend on Ḥusayn, and Ibn al-Zubayr, who was already harbouring secret ambitions, was suspected of jealousy towards him (see al-Ṭabarī, ii, 276).

The sources on al-Ḥusayn's revolt and on his tragic end. Unless some of the manuscripts in the Berlin Library attributed to Abū Mikhnaf [q.v.] (see Ahlwardt, 9028-9, 9031-8)—which the author of this article is in the process of examining—prove to be entirely or partly authentic, the most important texts on Ḥusayn's enterprise and its tragic sequel at Karbalāʾ remain al-Ṭabarī and al-Balādhurī. The former relates (1) a great number of traditions on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf (d. ca. 157/774) with isnāds going back to contemporary witnesses; (2) other fairly numerous traditions of Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, most of them received from his master Abū Mikhnaf; (3) a small number of traditions transmitted with their isnāds by other traditionists, which, however, add few variants to the preceding ones and most of which are unimportant. Al-Balādhurī almost always used the same sources as al-Ṭabarī, but often made résumés of them, introducing them by ḳālū; and he provides some additional verses and details. Al-Dīnawarī, al-Yaʿḳūbī, Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, etc. add almost nothing to our knowledge since they based almost the whole of their continuous accounts on Abū Mikhnaf. So great was the respect accorded even among the Shīʿis to the work of this sympathizer of Ḥusayn that it is chiefly from his collection of traditions that their earliest writers (e.g., al-Mufīd, d. 413/1022), or those endowed with enough critical faculty to enable them to eliminate fantastic additions (e.g., the modern Uways), have drawn their narrative of Ḥusayn's enterprise (their Shīʿism showing itself elsewhere). It was only much later (apparently beginning in the 7th/13th century) that the narrative of Ḥusayn's enterprise was partly modified by the introduction of romantic accounts (single combats in which the enemies of Ḥusayn were killed by the dozen, Ḥusayn defending himself like a lion and slaughtering his assailants, and other such fables). The exaggerations and the misrepresentations of the Shīʿis were severely criticized by Ibn Kathīr (viii, 201 f.).

Invitation from the Kūfans. Mission of Muslim b. ʿAḳīl to Kūfa. The news of the death of Muʿāwiya was greeted with satisfaction at Kūfa, the majority of whose inhabitants were Shīʿis. Soon there were sent out from there letters and messengers inviting Ḥusayn to make his way to this town which could no longer tolerate the Umayyad régime, which they regarded as guilty of having seized the fayʾ [q.v.], allowed the possessions of Allāh to pass into the hands of the powerful and the rich, and killed the best men (an allusion to Ḥudjr b. ʿAdī and his supporters) while allowing the worst to remain alive (see letter of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzāʿī and of other Shīʿis: al-Ṭabarī, ii, 234 f., etc.). Ḥusayn replied that he understood their hope of uniting themselves, thanks to him, in the right way and in the truth. "The Imām", he added, "must not be other than a man acting according to the Book of God, taking [his subjects' money] with honesty, judging with truth, devoting himself to the service of God." Nevertheless, before making a decision he thought it prudent to send his cousin, Muslim b. ʿAḳīl [q.v.], to Kūfa to test the ground. Muslim soon gathered thousands of pledges of support and was even able to preside over an assembly from the minbar in the mosque (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 257 f.; al-Dīnawarī, 252). But his intrigues were reported to the caliph Yazīd who, no longer trusting the governor of the town, al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī, gave the control of Kūfa to the son of Ziyād, ʿUbayd Allāh [q.v.], then already governor of Baṣra, with orders to go there himself immediately to quell the disturbances. Ibn Ziyād arrived at this destination in disguise and took energetic measures which terrified Ḥusayn's sympathizers. Muslim, after attempting in vain to organize an immediate revolt, fled and went into hiding; he was discovered and put to death (9 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 60/11 September 680). Unfortunately for al-Ḥusayn, he had written a very optimistic letter on the success of his propaganda and, it seems, had even sent to him the thousands of pledges signed by the inhabitants of Kūfa.

Ḥusayn's departure for Kūfa. Already Ibn al-Ḥanafiyya at Medina (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 220 f.), then ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUmar and ʿAbd Allāh b. al-ʿAbbās, when they met him on the road from Medina to Mecca (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 223), and others also, had warned Ḥusayn against the dangers of a revolt: Ibn ʿAbbās had reiterated his advice, and with great insistence, at Mecca (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 274 f.; al-Balādhurī, 638v-639r, etc.). Even ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr had attempted to dissuade him from the enterprise, but hypocritically, since he was in fact very pleased that Ḥusayn should leave the field free for him at Mecca (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 274-6, etc.). In spite of all this advice, Ḥusayn did not abandon his project. He performed the ʿumra [q.v.] instead of the ḥadjdj and took advantage of the absence of the governor, ʿAmr b. Saʿīd al-Ashdaḳ [q.v.], who was completing the rites of the Pilgrimage on the outskirts of the town, to slip away together with his own group: about fifty men—relatives and friends able to bear arms—women and children (8 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 60/10 September 680, the day of the tarwiya). The names of the places where he stopped on the way from Mecca to Kūfa are all recorded by al-Ṭabarī and al-Balādhurī; Wellhausen has noted them.

Informed of Ḥusayn's departure, ʿAmr b. Saʿīd sent in pursuit of him a party of men under the command of his brother Yaḥyā, but all that took place between the two groups was a clash with whips and sticks. At al-Tanʿīm, not far from Mecca, Ḥusayn met a caravan coming from the Yemen and considered that he had a right to seize its load which consisted of cloaks and plants for dyeing destined for the caliph. On the way, Ḥusayn met several people: the poet al-Farazdaḳ who, when questioned, told him frankly that the hearts of the ʿIrāḳīs were for him but that their swords were for the Umayyads (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 277 and 278, etc.), and his cousin ʿAbd Allāh b. Djaʿfar who, having obtained from the governor ʿAmr b. Saʿīd a letter granting him amān, had come to read it to him. But Ḥusayn's decision was unshakeable; his replies to any who attempted to deflect him from his enterprise were always more or less in the same vein: "God does as He wishes .... I leave it to Him to choose what is best .... He is not hostile to him who purposes the just cause (al-ḥaḳḳ) ...". Zuhayr b. al-Ḳayn al-Badjalī, who was a supporter of ʿUthmān, and while journeying had avoided pitching his tents at the same place as Ḥusayn, did on one occasion have to make his camp near to him; invited by Ḥusayn to visit him, he changed his opinion during the interview with him and from then on became one of the most enthusiastic supporters of Ḥusayn.

ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād had stationed men on the roads leading from the Ḥidjāz to Kūfa (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 285 and 288) and had given orders forbidding all persons to enter or leave the territory bounded by them. Ḥusayn learned of this order from the Bedouins, but was not alarmed by it and continued his journey. It was at al-Thaʿlabiyya that he first heard, from some travellers, the news of the execution of Muslim and of Hāniʾ b. ʿUrwa [q.v.] at Kūfa. He would then have turned back, but the sons of ʿAḳīl, determined either to avenge their brother or to meet the same fate, made him change his mind. Then, at Zubāla, he learned that his messenger (Ḳays b. Mushir al-Ṣaydāwī or ʿAbd Allāh b. Yaḳṭur, his foster brother: al-Ṭabarī, ii, 288, 293, 303), sent from al-Ḥādjiz to Kūfa to announce there his imminent arrival, had been discovered and killed. Ḥusayn then read to his supporters a proclamation in which, after informing them of the doleful news he had received and of the treachery of the inhabitants of Kūfa, he invited them to leave him. Those who had joined his group during the journey did depart, and there remained with him only those who had followed him from the Ḥidjāz.

Parties of horsemen were scouring the region. When they appeared on the horizon, Ḥusayn changed his direction towards Dhū Ḥusm (or Ḥusam) and there pitched his tents The horsemen, who were under the command of al-Ḥurr b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī al-Yarbūʿī, approached and, as the weather was hot, Ḥusayn gave orders for them to be given water. The situation at this time was still so free of tension that al-Ḥurr and his squadron took part that day in two prayers led by Ḥusayn (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 297, 298) and, later, four Shīʿīs who had come from Kūfa were able to join the insurgents in spite of al-Ḥurr's attempt to oppose this (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 302 f.). After each of the two prayers, Ḥusayn explained to his adversaries the motives which had caused him to set out: "You had no imām and I should have been an instrument of union in the hand of God ... We are more qualified to govern you than those others who claim things to which they have no right and who act unjustly ... But if you have changed your minds ... I shall go away" (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 297 f.). Al-Ḥurr knew nothing of the letters which the inhabitants of Kūfa had sent to Ḥusayn but he did not change his attitude when the latter showed him two sacks full of them; he had received the order to take the rebel, without fighting, to Ibn Ziyād and he endeavoured to persuade Ḥusayn to follow him; when Ḥusayn continued his march, he did not dare to oppose him but instead made some suggestions to him: to follow a route leading neither to Kūfa nor to Medina and to write to Yazīd or to Ibn Ziyād; at the same time, he himself would write to Ibn Ziyād in the hope that he would receive a reply which would allow him to avoid a painful ordeal. But Ḥusayn would not agree to his proposals and al-Ḥurr therefore followed him closely, uttering warnings from time to time: "I remind you of God for your own sake ... if there is a battle you will be killed ...". But Ḥusayn did not fear death. When a halt was made in the district (nāḥiya) of Nīnawā (forming part of the Sawād of Kūfa) a horseman arrived from Kūfa; without greeting Ḥusayn, he gave al-Ḥurr a letter from Ibn Ziyād ordering him not to allow the rebels to make a halt except in a desert place without fortifications or water. Zuhayr b. al-Ḳayn then suggested that Ḥusayn should attack al-Ḥurr's small detachment and occupy the fortified village of al-ʿAkr, but Ḥusayn refused to open the hostilities.

On 2 Muḥarram he made his camp at Karbalāʾ [q.v.], a place belonging to the nāḥiya of Nīnawā; on the 3rd the situation worsened: there arrived from Kūfa an army of 4,000 men under the command of ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳāṣ who, appointed nāʾib by Ibn Ziyād at Rayy, was to have gone to Dastabā to put down a revolt of Daylamīs, but had been recalled by Ibn Ziyād in order to subdue Ḥusayn. He had tried in vain to escape from the hateful task, but, threatened with the loss of his post, was finally forced to obey. Having arrived at Karbalāʾ, he learned, through a messenger, that Ḥusayn now intended merely to retreat, but Ibn Ziyād, on receiving this information from him, insisted that all the rebels should render homage to Yazīd; meanwhile they were to be prevented from reaching the river. ʿUmar b. Saʿd placed ʿAmr b. al-Ḥadjdjādj al-Zubaydī with 500 horsemen on the route leading to the Euphrates, so that for three days Ḥusayn and his party suffered terribly from thirst; a daring group led by Ḥusayn's brother al-ʿAbbās made a sortie to the river, but succeeded in filling only a few water-skins. Meanwhile Ibn Saʿd was still trying to reach an agreement and was holding talks at night with Ḥusayn; although there was nobody present at these talks it was rumoured that Ḥusayn had made three proposals: that he should be permitted either to go and fight against the infidels as an ordinary soldier in a frontier region, or to rejoin Yazīd, to whom he would accord the bayʿa in person, or to return whence he had come (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 287, 314, 436; al-Balādhurī, 644r, etc.). On this occasion Ibn Ziyād was given evil advice by Shamir [q.v.] (usually known as Shimr by the Shīʿīs) b. Dhi 'l-Djawshan (an ex-supporter of ʿAlī who had fought with him at Ṣiffīn: al-Ṭabarī, i, 3305); the governor would otherwise have been accommodating, but he was persuaded that he ought to force Ḥusayn to submit to him, Ibn Ziyād, since he had arrived in the territory which was under his jurisdiction. Ibn Ziyād therefore gave orders to Ibn Saʿd either to attack the rebel, if the latter refused to comply with the conditions laid down, or to hand over the command of the troops to Shamir, who was the bearer of this order (al-Ṭabarī, 315 f.). He is said even to have added that, if Ḥusayn fell in the fighting, his body was to be trampled on, because the man was "a rebel, a seditious person, a brigand, an oppressor and he was to do no further harm after his death" (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 316). Ibn Saʿd cursed Shamir, accusing him of having envenomed an affair which otherwise would have ended peacefully; he was sure that Ḥusayn would not submit, for "there is a proud soul in him".

On the evening of 9 Muḥarram, Ibn Saʿd advanced with his men towards the group of insurgents. Ḥusayn was seated in front of his tent, leaning upon his sword, his head nodding drowsily; he had a vision in which the Prophet announced that he would soon be joining him. Warned by his sister Zaynab that the soldiers of Ibn Saʿd were advancing, he sent his brother al-ʿAbbās to find out the reason for their approach. While the messenger's return was awaited, warnings, reproaches and insults were hurled from both sides. When al-ʿAbbās returned, Ḥusayn, having learned Ibn Ziyād's demand, requested a respite of one night; this being granted, he delivered to his relatives and supporters a discourse which his son ʿAlī, the only male of his family to escape from the massacre, was later to recall: "I give praise to God Who has honoured us with the Prophethood and has taught us the Ḳurʾān and the religion . . . I know of no worthier companions . . . than mine nor a more devout family than mine . . . May God reward you all. I think that tomorrow our end will come . . . I ask you all to go away. I do not hold you back. The night will cover you. Use it as a steed . . ." (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 320 f.). With a few exceptions, his supporters showed a complete devotion to his cause. Ḥusayn, after reviving and comforting his sister Zaynab, who had fainted in despair, went out to prepare the defences: the tents were brought close together, and tied to one another with ropes, wood and reeds were heaped up in a ditch ready to be set alight when necessary to prevent an attack from behind, and they passed the rest of the night in prayer (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 317-24, 326). The next day, after the ṣubḥ, hostilities commenced.

The battle of Karbalāʾ. Main episodes. If we accept that Ibn Saʿd tried to oblige the rebels to surrender by forcing them to suffer thirst and to capture the Ṭālibīs by surrounding them (which is what an impartial study of the traditions would seem to suggest), we may accept also that the battle of Karbalāʾ was prolonged from dawn until the afternoon in a series of single combats, of attacks and partial repulses, of periods of inaction, of skirmishes in defence of the tents, etc., and that it was not until nearly sunset that Ibn Ziyād's troops, exasperated by the rebels' resistance, and determined to put an end to it, fell upon the surviving Ṭālibīs and massacred them. In such an encounter, which began as a sort of deadly tournament with only a small number of combatants and a large number of spectators and soldiers on guard, some of the dialogues between adversaries which the sources recount could have taken place. Lammens (Le califat de Yazīd Ier, 169) attributes great importance to a concise tradition of Abū Mikhnaf according to which the fighting lasted as long as a siesta (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 374 f., etc.) and from this he deduces that: "The tragedy of Karbalāʾ instead of lasting for weeks consisted of only one action and was over in an hour . . .". Now among the accounts given by Abū Mikhnaf there are certainly some which are invented, but taken all together they form a coherent and credible narrative; consequently to select one single tradition in so far as it differs or appears to differ from the bulk of others is a critical method of disputable value, particularly as, in the present case, the traditionist is the same and as the tradition in question may be interpreted either as the boasting of a combatant before the caliph or as the description of the last act of the tragedy.

On the morning of 10 Muḥarram, Ḥusayn drew up his supporters (32 horsemen and 40 foot-soldiers with Zuhayr b. al-Ḳayn in command of the right wing and Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir of the left) in front of the tents, and having entrusted the standard to his brother al-ʿAbbās, ordered them to set fire to the heaps of wood and reeds. He had had pitched for himself a tent inside which he coated himself with a depilatory paste and perfumed himself with musk diluted in a bowl. Then, on horseback and with the Ḳurʾān in front of him, he invoked God in a long and beautiful prayer (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 327) and pronounced a discourse to his enemies in which, having declared that God was his walī—and God protects the devout—he invited them to consider well whether it was lawful for them to kill him, reminded them of Muḥammad's statement that he and his brother were the lords of the youth of Paradise, reviewed the great merits of the family of the Prophet, once again reproached the inhabitants of Kūfa for having summoned him, and asked to be allowed to make his way to a country which would offer him safety. When it was repeated to him that first of all he must submit to his cousins, he replied that he would never humiliate himself like a slave (other, longer, versions of his discourse are given in Muḥsin al-Amīn, 255-60). He then dismounted and commanded that his horse should be hobbled, intending by this to signify that he would never flee.

If the numerous accounts of episodes of secondary importance are removed, the phases of the battle can be followed fairly clearly. After Ḥusayn's speech, it was Zuhayr b. al-Ḳayn who exhorted their adversaries to follow Ḥusayn; as he received in reply only insolence and threats, he requested them not to kill him (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 331 f.). Then they began to shoot arrows and duels took place (ibid., 335-7); the right wing of the government troops, led by ʿAmr b. al-Ḥadjdjādj, attacked, but withdrew on meeting resistance, and the leader ordered his men not to engage in any more single combats (ibid., 337, 342 f.); they preferred to go on shooting arrows from a distance. An assault and an encircling manoeuvre made by the left wing on the orders of Shamir led to losses, and the commander of the cavalry asked Ibn Saʿd for help from the foot-troops and archers (ibid., 344); Shabath b. Ribʿī, a former supporter of ʿAlī who in this action was in command of Ibn Ziyād's foot-troops, when asked to attack, made it plain that he had no wish to do so (ibid., 344 f.) and it was the cavalry on armoured horses and 500 (sic) archers who went into action. Ḥusayn's horsemen, having hamstrung their horses, fought on foot (ibid., 345). As Ḥusayn and the Ṭālibīs could be approached only from the front, Ibn Saʿd sent some men towards the tents, from the right and from the left, to dismantle them, but the supporters of Ḥusayn, slipping in among the tents, defended them energetically. Ibn Saʿd then gave orders to burn the tents and this was done, at first to the advantage of Ḥusayn because the flames prevented the attackers from advancing on that side (ibid., 346). Shamir, who had approached the tent of Ḥusayn and his wives, would have set fire to this also, but even his comrades reproached him for this and he went away ashamed (ibid., 346 f.).

At noon, Ḥusayn and his followers performed the prayer of the ẓuhr according to the rite of the ṣalāt al-khawf [q.v.] (ibid., 347 f., 350). It was in the afternoon that Ḥusayn's party became narrowly encircled; his supporters fell fighting in front of him (ibid., 351-4, 355 f.) and the way lay open through to the Ṭālibīs who, until this moment, had not entered the field of action, and their massacre began. The first to be killed was ʿAlī al-Akbar, the son of Ḥusayn (ibid., 356 f.), then it was the turn of a son of Muslim b. ʿAḳīl (ibid., 357 f.), of the sons of ʿAbd Allāh b. Djaʿfar and of ʿAḳīl, then of Ḳāsim, the son of Ḥasan, whose death is related in touching terms: he was young and beautiful; mortally wounded, he called for help to his uncle who swooped like a falcon on the assailant and struck him with his sword; but it was not Ḥusayn who killed the attacker but the horses of Ibn Ziyād's soldiers who knocked him down and trampled him with their hooves. When the dust cleared, Ḥusayn could be seen to take the corpse of his nephew in his arms, cursing his murderers, and to carry him in front of his tent, where the bodies of ʿAlī al-Akbar and other victims were already laid (ibid., 358 f.).

The details of the death of al-ʿAbbās, Ḥusayn's brother, are not given in the texts of al-Ṭabarī or of al-Balādhurī, who limit themselves to relating (the former on p. 361, the latter on fol. 657r) that Ḥusayn, overcome by thirst, made his way towards the Euphrates, but was prevented from reaching it; he then prayed to God that he who had prevented him from achieving his object should die of thirst (and of course his prayer was answered); wounded in the mouth and on the chin, he cast upwards towards heaven the blood which he had collected in his cupped hands, complaining to God of the suffering which was being inflicted on the son of the daughter of His Messenger. But there must certainly have existed also some traditions concerning al-ʿAbbās, who definitely also fell at Karbalāʾ, and al-Mufīd (240) links them with that concerning Ḥusayn; he relates that the two brothers went forward together towards the river, that al-ʿAbbās, surrounded by enemies and separated from Ḥusayn, fought courageously and was killed on the spot where later his tomb was erected (al-Mufīd, 243).

By now Ibn Ziyād's soldiers were quite close to Ḥusayn, but for some time nobody dared to raise a hand against him. Finally a Kindī, Mālik b. al-Nuṣayr, wounded him in the head, and Ḥusayn's hood was filled with blood. While he replaced it by a ḳalansuwa, wrapping a turban round it, Mālik seized the burnous, but it did him little good, for he was followed for the rest of his life by poverty and disgrace (ibid., 359). Another pathetic episode is the death of a child whom Ḥusayn had placed on his knees (al-Yaʿḳūbī, 290 f., explains the presence of this child on Ḥusayn's lap at such an unsuitable moment by the fact that it had just been born). An arrow pierced the child's neck and Ḥusayn on this occasion also collected the blood in his cupped hands and poured it on the ground, invoking God's wrath against the evil-doers (ibid., 359 f.).

The slaughter continued. Finally it was Shamir, the cursed of the Shīʿīs, who advanced with a small group of soldiers against Ḥusayn, but even he did not dare to strike him, and there merely ensued an altercation between the two of them (ibid., 362 f.). At this moment Ḥusayn emerged from his inertia and prepared to fight (when considering the reason for his unwarlike attitude it should be remembered that he was nearly fifty-five years of age and that he had been ill). A boy placed himself bravely beside him, deaf to the order to return to the tent and to Zaynab's calling him back, and had his hand cut off by the stroke of a sword; Ḥusayn comforted him, assuring him that he would soon meet his ancestors in Paradise. There were not more than three or four rebels surviving, and Ḥusayn attacked the enemy. He was wearing well-made drawers of a shining material, but had rent them in advance because he feared that they would be looted from him after his death, a precaution which proved useless, for he was to be left naked on the field of battle (ibid., 364, 366). Ibn Saʿd having approached, Zaynab spoke to him: "ʿUmar b. Saʿd, will Abū ʿAbd Allāh (the kunya of Ḥusayn) be killed while you stand and watch?". Tears flowed from the eyes of Ibn Saʿd (ibid., 365). Ḥusayn fought vigorously. There are some sources (al-Yaʿḳūbī, 291, and other Shīʿī sources) which state that he killed many enemies, even dozens, but one tradition states that if his enemies had wished they could have killed him at once (ibid., 365). Finally, in spite of his last threat of Divine vengeance, he was wounded in the hand and the shoulder and he fell with his face to the ground (ibid., 366). It was Sinān b. Anas b. ʿAmr al-Nakhaʿī who, after striking him yet again, cut off his head, since Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Aṣbaḥī, whom he had ordered to do so, was trembling too much to be capable of it. Sinān gave the head to this Khawalī, who then carried it to Ibn Ziyād.

The combat having thus ended, the soldiers turned to pillage; they seized Ḥusayn's clothing, his sword and his baggage, his dye-plants and the Yemenī cloaks, and they seized from the women their ornaments, and their cloaks (ibid., 366). A sick boy was lying in one of the tents and Shamir would have killed him also, but was restrained; Ibn Saʿd came up and forbade anyone to enter this tent (ibid., 367), and this boy, ʿAlī, who was to be given the name of Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn [q.v.], was the only one of Ḥusayn's sons to survive the massacre; as a sign of Divine favour, there were descended from him all the numerous line of the Ḥusaynids. The martyrs of Karbalāʾ or of al-Ṭaff—they are known also by this toponym [q.v.]—numbered 72, 17 of them Ṭālibīs (for a critical analysis of the other figures, see Muḥsin al-Amīn, 352); 88 soldiers of Ibn Ziyād fell on the field of battle (ibid., 368 f.). The latter total is given also by Muḥsin al-Amīn, although it is difficult to reconcile this figure with the notes scattered throughout his book (138, 267, 268, 269, etc.) on the number killed by this or that combatant: 40 by al-Ḥurr, 30 by Burayr, 12 or 13 by Nāfiʿ etc., and a great number killed by Ḥusayn.

Minor episodes of the battle. The account of the battle is filled with a large number of episodes; we give here the references for those which have formed the subject of the longest narratives and which have become fairly well-known (the figures in parentheses refer to al-Ṭabarī, ii): the repentance of al-Ḥurr, his fighting beside Ḥusayn and his death (332-4, 341, 345, 349 f.); the murder of a Kalbī and his wife for Ḥusayn's cause (335, 336 f., 344, 346); death of ʿAbd Allāh b. Ḥawza following a prayer by Ḥusayn (337 f.); Nāfiʿ wounded, taken prisoner and executed (341 f., 350 f.); brothers fighting on opposing sides (341); ʿĀbis, an old and valiant fighter, killed by stones (353 f.); a supporter who fled (354 f.); heroes who fell in duels: Muslim b. ʿAwsadja, a warrior who had taken part in expeditions against the infidels (343 f.), Burayr, the sayyid of the readers of the Ḳurʾān (338-40), Ḥabīb b. Muẓāhir (348 f.), Zuhayr b. al-Ḳayn (349 f.), and others passim.

Events after the battle. Ḥusayn's body, covered with wounds (ibid., 366), is said to have been trampled by the horses of ten men who volunteered to inflict this final indignity on the grandson of the Prophet. After Ibn Saʿd's departure, the headless body was buried with those of other "martyrs" by the Asadīs of the village of al-Ghādiriyya in the spot where the massacre had taken place (ibid., 368) (on the sanctuary which was erected there in their honour, see KARBALĀʾ). Ḥusayn's head, with those of other Ṭālibīs, was taken first to Kūfa, then to Damascus. Ibn Ziyād and Yazīd, when it was placed in front of them, each reacted differently: the former was insulting, knocking out some teeth with his switch, while the caliph, according to most of the traditions, was respectful and appeared to regret the haste with which his governor had acted, going so far as to curse "the son of Sumayya"; he is reported to have declared that if Ḥusayn had come to him he would have pardoned him. The Ṭālibī women and children were also taken first to Kūfa, then to Damascus, where the caliph in the end treated them kindly, although at the beginning of his interview with them he addressed them harshly, to which Zaynab and ʿAlī replied in a similar manner. The women joined Yazīd's wives in their laments for the dead; they received compensation for the property stolen from them at Karbalāʾ and a few days afterwards were sent back to Medina with a reliable escort. ʿAlī, who had run the risk of being executed because it was stated that he was already an adult, was treated by Yazīd with an almost affectionate courtesy and instructed to accompany the Ṭālibī women to Medina.

There are diverse accounts on the place where Ḥusayn's head is buried: (1) beside his father ʿAlī, i.e., at al-Nadjaf; (2) outside Kūfa but not beside ʿAlī; (3) at Karbalāʾ with the rest of his body; (4) at Medina in the Bakīʿ; (5) at Damascus, but exactly where is unknown; (6) at al-Rakka; (7) in Cairo, where it was allegedly transferred by the Fāṭimids [see ʿASKALĀN], and exactly in the place where there was built the mosque which bears his name (Muḥsin al-Amīn, with many details, 390-4).

THE LEGEND OF ḤUSAYN

In the legend of Ḥusayn, a first distinction may be made between those beliefs in which the element of cosmogony predominates and an important part is played by "light", those which have an eschatological character and finally those (the most numerous) in which Ḥusayn remains the historical personality known to us, but endowed with a halo of marvels which elevate him above the common run of human beings. In the first group, Ḥusayn has in general a function linked with that of the other members of the ahl al-bayt [q.v.] and completely equal to that of his brother Ḥasan. For a detailed study of these beliefs, arising from the influence of metaphysical systems of a much earlier date than Islam and elaborated by the extremist Shīʿis (ghulāt), see ISMĀʿĪLIYYA, UMM AL-KITĀB. We give here an example (Ibn Rustam al-Ṭabarī, 59): 7,000 years before the creation of the world, Muḥammad, ʿAlī, Fāṭima, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn, figures (ashbāḥ) of light, praised and glorified the Lord before His throne. When God wished to create their forms (ṣuwar) He forged them like a column (ʿamūd) of light, then threw them into the loins of Adam and made them pass from thence into the loins and the wombs of their forbears. They are not tainted by polytheism or heterodoxy. Among the eschatological accounts is the following (which should perhaps be connected with the beliefs of the Shīʿī sect of the Mughīriyya founded by al-Mughīra b. Saʿīd al-ʿIdjlī, d. 119/737), (Ibn Rustam al-Ṭabarī, 78): Ḥusayn went to the Raḍwā mountains where he will remain on a throne of light, surrounded by the Prophets, with his faithful followers behind him, until the coming of the Mahdī; then he will transfer himself to Karbalāʾ, where all the celestial and human beings will visit him. Others of these eschatological accounts belong to the cycle of those which promise to the members of the ahl al-bayt a privileged position in Paradise; for example (Ibn Shahrāshūb, iii, 229) Muḥammad, during his miʿrādj [q.v.], saw a castle made of white pearl and learned that it was intended for Ḥusayn; as he advanced, he saw an apple, grasped it and cut it in two; from it there emerged a young girl, with the corners of her eyes like those of eagles, also destined for Ḥusayn.

Marvels. (Sigla for the authors cited: Bal. = al-Balādhurī; Ṭ. = al-Ṭabarī, ii; IRṬ = Ibn Rustam al-Ṭabarī; Muf. = al-Mufīd; ISh. = Ibn Shahrāshūb, iii; IKath. = Ibn Kathīr, viii; Muḥs. A. = Muḥsin al-Amīn. Details of later stories of a fabulous nature will be found in the book by Muḥammad Mahdī al-Māzandarānī al-Ḥāʾirī which sometimes mentions as a source the Biḥār al-anwār of al-Madjlisī, but also some recent texts).

Marvels concerning the birth and childhood of Ḥusayn. (IRṬ, 71; ISh., 209, 231, 237) Ḥusayn was born three months prematurely and survived this very early birth—an extraordinary circumstance which occurred only to ʿIsā and, it is said, also to Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyāʾ. (ISh., 209, 239) Muḥammad cared for him for 40 days, putting his thumb or his tongue or his own saliva into his mouth. (IRṬ, 79; ISh., 228 f.; parallel account: IRṬ, 73; ISh., 213) The number of angels who descended from heaven to rejoice, with Muḥammad, at his birth, was about a thousand. (IRṬ, 72; ISh., 209; Muḥs.A., 163) Djibrīl brought to Muḥammad at the same time the congratulations and the condolences of God. (Muḥs. A., 163) He gave him a handful of earth from Karbalāʾ. (ISh., 229) He dandled Ḥusayn while his mother was asleep. (IRṬ, 49; ISh., 228 f., etc.) An angel benefited from Ḥusayn's birth: banished by God to an island as punishment, with his wings broken, he saw passing over him the band of angels on their way to offer their congratulations to Muḥammad; having begged them to take him with them, he mended his broken wings simply by rubbing them against the newly-born child; he was pardoned through Muḥammad's intercession and took his place again in Paradise, from then on being called the mawlā of Ḥusayn. (IRṬ, 79) It is he who takes note of the visitors to Ḥusayn's tomb at Karbalāʾ. (ISh., 234 f.) Muḥammad had on his knees his son Ibrāhīm, and Ḥusayn; having learned through Djibrīl that God would not leave both of them alive and that he could redeem the life of one of them with that of the other, he, in tears, gave up Ibrāhīm in order not to make ʿAlī and Fāṭima weep.

Marvels connected with his death: When Ḥusayn fell on the battlefield (Bal., 661r; Muf., 251; ISh., 212 f.; Muḥs.A., 302 f., 305 f.) the day became dark and the stars were visible, etc., the sky became red etc. (Bal., 660v; Muḥs.A., 303 f.) It rained blood, which left traces on the heads and the garments of people as far as Khurāsān etc. (Bal., 667v; ISh., 212, 218, 238; Muḥs.A., 304 f.) Blood appeared beneath the stones in Syria and elsewhere (similar accounts: ISh., 213, etc.). (Muḥs.A., 304) Blood exuded from the walls. (ISh., 213, 236; IKath., 200 f.; Muḥs.A., 163) On the night of Ḥusayn's death, Umm Salama [q.v.] or Ibn ʿAbbās saw in a dream Muḥammad with his head and his beard soiled with earth, pouring blood into a phial. (IRṬ, 73; Muf., 250 f.; ISh., 213; IKath., 199, 200 f.) The earth of Karbalāʾ which Djibrīl or another angel had given to Muḥammad and which Umm Salama had preserved, turned into blood on the night following Ḥusayn's death. Umm Salama realized that the tragedy was accomplished and cried out; she was the first to cry out at Medina

(all these accounts which show Muḥammad collecting the blood of the martyrs of Karbalāʾ or receiving a handful of the soil of Karbalāʾ etc. are presented in the form of *ḥadīth*s, with different *isnād*s and many variants, especially in the *musnad*s (canonical and non-canonical); for a collection of them arranged by subject see al-Muttaḳī al-Hindī, cited in bibl.). (ISh., 219; IKath., 200, 201; Muḥs.A., 306 f.) The *djinn*s wept and recited poems; the wives of the *djinn*s uttered funeral lamentations; Umm Salama and other women heard them. The angels wept when Ḥusayn's head was taken to Damascus. (ISh., 238) Even the wild beasts and the fishes wept. (Muḥs.A., 164 f.) ʿAlī knew that his son would be killed at Karbalāʾ and, when he passed by this place, halted and wept and recalled Muḥammad's prophecy. He interpreted the name of Karbalāʾ: karb wa-balāʾ (affliction and trial). (IKath., 199) The martyrs of Karbalāʾ will enter Paradise without any accounting for their actions. (Ṭ., 385) An unknown person, heard by all but seen by none, recited during the night before the battle threatening verses.

Marvels of the severed head: (ISh., 217 f.) While the head was being transported, a mysterious quill wrote threatening verses on a wall. The same verses had been written in a church of the Rūm, built 300 years before Muḥammad's mission. The head emitted a perfume; and a monk, impressed by the miraculous light emanating from it, paid a sum of money to be allowed to keep it in his cell; during the night the head spoke and the next day the monk embraced Islam; the dirhams which he had paid changed into stones. A snake crawled into one nostril of the severed head and out of the other. (IRṬ, 77 f., etc.) The head recited verses of the Ḳurʾān. (Ṭ, 369; ISh., 217 f.) Khawalī having taken it to his house on the night of his arrival at Kūfa and having put it under an urn, a column of light descended from the sky and a white bird circled around the urn.

Punishment of those who had insulted and wounded Ḥusayn. All those who had wronged Ḥusayn were visited by some immediate or eventual misfortune: (ISh., 214-6; Muḥs.A., 348-51) there are mentioned: murder, blindness, various maladies (e.g., leprosy, unquenchable thirst, hands as dry as wood in summer, damp in winter), death from burns, stings from scorpions, loss of vigour, poverty, a man driven from his house by his own wife (some of these misfortunes are related by al-Ṭabarī, passim). Those who stole property belonging to Ḥusayn were also punished: he who put Ḥusayn's turban on his own head was afflicted with madness; he who put on his cloak, with poverty; he who used his perfume, his dye-plants and his clothes, with leprosy or the falling out of his hair. The items stolen underwent changes which made them unusable or caused them to lose their value: (ISh., 215, 218) The meat of the camels became bitter or caught fire; the dye-plants and the perfumes changed into blood, the gold into copper or fire in the hands of the goldsmiths; the saffron caught fire. On the marvels of the tombs, see KARBALĀʾ.

Supernatural attributes of Ḥusayn which caused marvels. (ISh., 230) His forehead was so white that people could find their way to him in the dark. He was able to cure sickness: (IRṬ, 77) he caused a white mark between the eyes of a devout woman to vanish by blowing on it; (ISh., 210) he cured a sick person of his fever. He detached the hand of a man which had become fixed to a woman's arm because he had touched her during the rite of circumambulation of the Kaʿba; the *faḳīh*s had already decided to cut off the hand. Ḥusayn's extraordinary faculties also enabled him (ISh., 210 f.) to make a foster-child speak so as to reveal the name of his true father, to allow anyone who asked it of him to be present at events which had happened in the past in very distant places (ʿAlī and Muḥammad in the mosque of Ḳubā), (IRṬ, 75, 77, 78) to obtain for his son grapes and bananas out of season, to make a barren palm bear fruit, to quench the thirst of all his followers by putting his thumb into their mouths, and to feed them with celestial food on the day of the battle, (ISh., 209) to make water spring up, by shooting an arrow, near to the tent of his wives at Karbalāʾ. (IRṬ, 74 and cf. 72) He made a sign towards the sky and a band of angels came down ready to fight for him, but he chose to sacrifice himself. He was able to see into the future and to know secrets. In general it is Muḥammad who had informed those close to him or who informs Ḥusayn in a dream of the fate which awaits him (he told the Five (ISh., 240) that Ḥusayn would be unjustly killed and his brother also and that their descendents would be exempt from the rendering of accounts on the Day of the Resurrection), but it is a wild animal which reveals to Ḥusayn the feelings of the Kūfans towards him. He knew in advance that ʿUmar b. Saʿd would be in command of the enemy troops (and predicted his death (Muf., 251; ISh., 213) shortly after his own), that his own head would be taken to Ibn Ziyād and that the bearer of it would receive no reward; (see also Muf., 251) he forbade a group of his servants to leave on a certain day, and as they did not obey and were killed, he revealed to the governor the names of the murderers.

Names and by-names of Ḥusayn. (IRṬ, 73; ISh., 232) In the Tawrāh God called Ḥusayn Shubayr and in the Gospels Ṭab. Hārūn, the brother of Moses, having learnt the names which God had given to the sons of ʿAlī, gave the same names to his own sons. For a long and interesting list of the by-names of Ḥusayn, in the form of a litany, see ISh., 232. Ḥusayn and his brother are often referred to as the "Proof (ḥudjdja [q.v.]) of God" on earth (see, e.g., Muf., 198).

Verses of the Ḳurʾān interpreted by the Shīʿis as referring to Ḥusayn. For a series of these verses, see ISh., 206 f., 236 f.; cf. Muf., 199. An example is verse XLVI, 14/15, which speaks of the pregnant mother bearing her child with suffering and giving birth to him with pain; it is interpreted as an allusion to Fāṭima, who, having conceived Ḥusayn, was much distressed when she heard from Muḥammad that he had received God's condolences on the fate of his future grandson. The mysterious letters K.H.Y.ʿ.Ṣ., with which sūra XIX begins, had been explained by God to Zakariyyāʾ as follows: K = Karbalāʾ; H = halāk al-ʿitra; Y = Yazīd; ʿ = ʿaṭshuh; Ṣ = ṣabruhu. This explanation is merely a detail in a rather involved narrative (ISh., 237) forming part of a group of curious comparisons between the fate of Ḥusayn and that of Yaḥyā, the son of Zakariyyāʾ (perhaps owing to the motif of the severed heads placed on a dish): Zakariyyāʾ, who had learned the names of the Five from Djibrīl, was astonished by the fact that when he uttered the name of Ḥusayn his eyes filled with tears, while when he uttered the others he felt joy. God then revealed to him the destiny of Muḥammad's grandson, and Zakariyyāʾ wept and sobbed, asking God to give him also a son who could cause him to endure a sorrow similar to that which He was to inflict on his beloved Muḥammad. God granted him a son, Yaḥyā. At each stage of his journey from Mecca to Kūfa, Ḥusayn recalled Yaḥyā. According to another account (ISh., 238, cf. 234), Ḥusayn's blood will boil as that of Yaḥyā had done, and in order to quieten it God will kill 70,000 hypocrites, unbelievers and wicked believers, as he had also done for Yaḥyā.

Judgements on Ḥusayn. Throughout the Muslim world there was sympathy and a high regard for Ḥusayn. It was only the adherents of the Umayyad movement who presented him as a bāghin baʿda inʿiḳād al-bayʿa, that is as a rebel against the established authority, and thus condoned his murder by Yazīd, but their opinion was opposed not only by those who despised the Umayyad régime (for an echo of the protests of the latter and their denial of the validity of the bayʿa to Yazīd, see al-Mukram, 12-6, and Muḥsin al-Amīn, 67), but also by those Muslims who refused to recognize that the murderers had acted according to their consciences and at the same time sought pretexts to refrain from blaming either the rebel al-Ḥusayn or the Companions and the tābiʿūn who had remained neutral in order to avoid civil war (see Ibn Khaldūn, Muḳaddima, Būlāḳ 1284, 177, 181, faṣl fī wilāyat al-ʿahd). In this almost universal exaltation of Ḥusayn due to his descent from the Prophet and to the conviction that he had sacrificed himself for an ideal, it is not possible to make a clear distinction between the opinions of the Sunnīs and those of the Shīʿis, except in the case of certain privileges and attributes which only the Shīʿis accord him. The very favourable attitude of the Sunnīs was probably strongly influenced by the pathetic accounts which Abū Mikhnaf collected, either directly or with a very short isnād, mainly from the Kūfans who repented of their behaviour towards the Prophet's grandson; it was these traditions, suffused with the sentiments of the Kūfans and marked by the notoriously pro-ʿAlid character of Abū Mikhnaf's collection, which formed the basis of the account of the later historians and through them spread throughout the Muslim world.

As there exists no work which can serve as a guide to the ideas of all the groups of Shīʿis concerning Ḥusayn, we limit ourselves here to the following notes: Ḥusayn in his capacity as imām [see IMĀMA] shares the various privileges accorded to the imāms (see Bausani, La religione . . ., 346 f.) by the Twelver Shīʿis [see ITHNĀ-ʿASHARIYYA], the Ismāʿīlīs [see ISMĀʿĪLIYYA], the Zaydīs [see ZAYDIYYA], etc.; like the other imāms, he is a mediator with God for those who call on him; it is through his intercession (tawassul) that his faithful followers obtain guidance and attain salvation. As a member of the holy Five he received the same divine grace as his brother Ḥasan [see AHL AL-BAYT, AHL AL-KISĀʾ. FĀṬIMA, MUBĀHALA, etc.]. As a grandson of the Prophet he had the right to receive reverence (ḥurma). In addition he possessed personal qualities, above all the attribute of piety, demonstrated by his 25 pilgrimages on foot from Medina to Mecca and the 1,000 rakʿas which he performed each day (on this number, which is considered to be exaggerated, see Muḥsin al-Amīn, 124 f.). It was because of his lengthy devotions that he had little time to spare for his wives and consequently had few children. Other qualities which he possessed were generosity (there are several stories to illustrate this), forbearance (ḥilm), humility, eloquence (as a proof of this there are mentioned speeches and poems by him), and finally the qualities which may be inferred from his actions, such as his contempt for death, disdain for a life of humiliation, his pride, etc. (see, e.g., Muḥsin al-Amīn, 125-39, 152, 156 f.). But the basis of the exaltation of Ḥusayn by the Shīʿis is found in the noble motives for which he sacrificed himself and of course in the moving fact of his edifying exploit. From the belief that the imāms know all that was, that is, and that is to come, and that their knowledge does not increase with time, it is inferred that Ḥusayn knew in advance the destiny which awaited him and his followers; he thus set off from Mecca towards Kūfa aware of his imminent sacrifice and yet without any hesitation or any effort to escape from God's will. A tradition according to which he was invited by God to choose between sacrifice and victory (helped by an angel) gives yet more value to his enterprise, since it makes of it a voluntary action, and hence of great significance. The question arises as to his aim in thus sacrificing himself. The Shīʿī texts are very clear on this point: Ḥusayn gave his person and his possessions as an offering to God to "revive the religion of his grandfather Muḥammad", "to redeem it", and "save it from the destruction into which it had been thrown by the behaviour of Yazīd"; furthermore, he wished to show that the conduct of the hypocrites was shameful and to teach the peoples the necessity of revolt against unjust and impious governments (fāsiḳs), in short he offered himself as an example (uswa) to the Muslim community (see, e.g., Muḥsin al-Amīn, 136, 152 f.). The idea that his intention was to redeem men from their sins by his blood and to save them, that his action was a redemptive sacrifice for the salvation of the world, is, in these actual terms, foreign to Shīʿī beliefs; at least the writer of this article has found no trace of it in the texts consulted. It is possible that it penetrated later into the taʿziyas and into recent poems, since the transition from tawassul to this idea is an easy one and it may have been helped by the influence of Christian ideas.

Among western Islamic scholars, Wellhausen and Lammens have formed judgements on the character of Ḥusayn after careful study of the sources available to them. The former, guided by his subtle intuition of historical facts, painted a fine picture of the situation and the characters; he denies that Ḥusayn had any religious motives for his exploit, seeing it merely as the bid of an ambitious man for supreme power. The latter has no sympathy with the adversary of the chivalrous Yazīd; he regards Ḥusayn as a frivolous man (this had also been the opinion of Muʿāwiya: al-Ṭabarī, ii, 197), and completely improvident. Neither of these scholars attached any importance to the speeches and phrases which Ḥusayn is said to have uttered on various occasions, obviously considering them to be later forgeries. But although it is probable that the traditionists have re-cast or modified this material, it must nevertheless be admitted that there emerges from it as a whole and, more important, from the facts themselves, the figure of a man impelled by an ideology (the institution of a régime which would fulfil the demands of the true Islam), convinced that he was in the right, stubbornly determined to achieve his ends, as in general are all religious fanatics, and admired and encouraged by supporters who were also convinced that their cause was just. This interpretation may not be a true picture of Ḥusayn as an individual; it was nevertheless that which the following generation, for motives either of sentiment (respect, pity for his death), or of politics (the campaign against the Umayyads), gave of him, which was shared by the later Arabic historians and which led to his exaltation and his legendary position among the Shīʿis.

(L. Veccia Vaglieri)

AL-ḤUSAYN B. ʿALĪ, ṢĀḤIB FAKHKH, ʿAlid who led a revolt at Medina during the caliphate of al-Hādī ila 'l-ḥaḳḳ [q.v.] and was killed at Fakhkh on 8 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 169/11 June 786 (the date 170 suggested in some sources is incorrect, since al-Hādī died on 16 Rabīʿ I 170/15 September 786, and it is certain that the insurrection took place in the last months of the year). His father was the ʿAlī al-ʿĀbid (or al-Khayr or al-Agharr), famous for his piety and his noble sentiments, who wished to share the fate of ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan al-Muthannā (= ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib [q.v.]) and the group of his relatives when they were imprisoned first in a dār at Medina (140-1/758) and then in a horrible prison at Kūfa (144/762) by the caliph al-Manṣūr, who rightly mistrusted ʿAbd Allāh's sons, Muḥammad, known as al-Nafs al-Zakiyya [q.v.], and Ibrāhīm [q.v.]. ʿAlī al-ʿĀbid was an example to his companions in misfortune by his piety and his fortitude in the prison, where he died in 146/763. (The biography of this ʿAlī b. al-Ḥasan "al-Muthallath" = al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, is to be found in the Maḳātil of Abu 'l-Faradj al-Iṣfahānī, 190-5). Al-Ḥusayn's mother, Zaynab [q.v.], who was also very devout, was the daughter of ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan al-Muthannā. Al-Ḥusayn thus grew up in an atmosphere of extreme piety and of secret hatred for the ʿAbbāsids. There exist many anecdotes about his love for the poor, his charity, his inability to understand the value of money and his boundless generosity (there is a collection of them in the Aʿyān al-shīʿa, 408 f.). The revolt which he led, after having had fairly friendly relations with the caliph al-Mahdī, who gave him sums of money and, on at least one occasion, acceded to his request by freeing an ʿAlid prisoner, had for its immediate motive the insulting treatment which the deputy of the governor of Medina, a descendant of the caliph ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb (often called simply al-ʿUmarī), inflicted on the Ṭālibīs of that town in 169/786 (the governor, Isḥāḳ b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī, had gone to Baghdād to the court of the caliph, who had just succeeded to the throne). Al-ʿUmarī, having learned that some Shīʿī pilgrims (70, it is said) had had secret meetings with al-Ḥusayn and other ʿAlids during their halt at Medina, tried to impose controls on the presence in the town of all Ṭālibīs and decreed that each of them should be vouched for by a relative. Meanwhile the situation was aggravated by the following incident: three men, among them the ʿAlid Abu 'l-Zift al-Ḥasan, son of Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya, were found drinking wine. Abu 'l-Faradj al-Iṣfahānī and Ibn al-Ṭiḳṭaḳā maintain that this was a calumny spread by al-ʿUmarī to serve as a justification for his persecutions, but certain details prove that the accusation was well-founded. After having had them flogged (the ʿAlid, according to the law, received eighty strokes while the others received far fewer, which was in itself an injustice), al-ʿUmarī exposed them to public ridicule and put them in prison. He was, however, forced to set them free because not only al-Ḥusayn, who was at that time the most eminent of the ʿAlids, but also other Hāshimīs showed indignation at this insult to a member of their family. The official whose task it then was to watch the Ṭālibīs more strictly noticed that Abu 'l-Zift did not answer the daily roll-call in the mosque (he had in fact left the town three days before) and his guarantors, al-Ḥusayn and Yaḥyā, a half-brother on the father's side of Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya, were ordered to appear before al-ʿUmarī; the exchange of insults, threats and mockery during this stormy interview are reported in the sources. Yaḥyā as well as al-ʿUmarī uttered oaths, which presumably led to dire consequences. Al-Ḥusayn, after the interview, reproached Yaḥyā for his rashness: "this will ruin our cause" he exclaimed, and al-Ṭabarī explains these words by the fact that an agreement had been made between the ʿAlids of Medina and their foreign supporters to begin the revolt at Minā during the ḥadjdj. By now, however, the situation had become so tense that al-Ḥusayn decided to act immediately.

At dawn of a morning in the first half of Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda, probably the 13th, a group composed of 26 ʿAlids, of a certain number of their mawālī and of ten pilgrims took possession of the mosque and forced the muezzin to pronounce the adhān according to the Shīʿī usage: "Ḥayya ʿalā khayr al-ʿamal"; hearing this call, al-ʿUmarī guessed that a revolt had begun and, after asking for "two grains of water" (ḥabbatay māʾ, whence his family's surname), he fled; he hid himself so successfully that, when people sought him to tell him that Abu 'l-Zift was there, in the mosque, and that Yaḥyā had fulfilled his oath, they could not find his hiding-place. Al-Ḥusayn, after leading the prayer, made a speech and received the homage of the rebels, suggesting that they use the formula of bayʿa which is discussed below. Some Shīʿīs (imāmīs; see Muḥsin al-Amīn, xvi, 404) have attempted to prove that he had no claims to the rank of imām or of caliph, because he merely invited them to obey the Book of God, and the sunna of God's Messenger, and to please the family of the Prophet (ʿalā 'l-kitāb, wa 'l-sunna wa 'l-riḍā min ahl al-bayt), but their argument is not a strong one; al-Ḥusayn even assumed a by-name, al-Murtaḍā, as was the custom of the caliphs and the heirs to the caliphate (al-Ṭabarī, 554). Two ʿAlids refused to support him: one of them was Mūsā b. Djaʿfar [q.v.], the Ḥusaynid known as al-Kāẓim, who is considered by the Twelvers to be the seventh Imām; a similar case had occurred when the Hāshimīs, at a secret meeting, had decided that Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya was to be the future caliph and the most eminent of the Ḥusaynids, Djaʿfar al-Ṣādiḳ, had abstained. This may have been because the Ḥusaynid branch was jealous of the Ḥasanid branch; but there were Ḥusaynids among the followers of al-Ḥusayn Ṣāḥib Fakhkh. It may have been through the conviction that the exploit was destined to fail. This seems to be proved by the words by which Djaʿfar al-Ṣādiḳ advised ʿAbd Allāh not to expose his son Muḥammad to the danger, and those addressed by Mūsā al-Kāẓim to Ḥusayn ("you will be killed").

The revolt was not a general one. It is related that some persons, having come into the mosque for the morning prayer and seen on the minbar al-Ḥusayn wearing a white tunic and turban, guessed what his intentions were and turned back; when the news of the event had spread, a number of the town's inhabitants closed the doors of their houses; 200 of the governor's soldiers and some volunteers who supported the ʿAbbāsids immediately attempted to re-occupy the mosque, and although at first they dispersed because their leader had been killed by Yaḥyā and Idrīs b. ʿAbd Allāh, they later took part in further fighting; hence the whole town did not fall into the hands of the rebels, whose situation became so precarious that, after having provided themselves with food and drink, they camped in the mosque and remained there for eleven days. Abu 'l-Faradj does not mention this active and passive resistance at Medina, nor certain actions of the occupiers of the mosque which shocked other Muslims when they learned of them (the mosque was so filthy that it had to be thoroughly washed out, curtains were cut up to make kaftans), but it is evident that these things did happen. Finally, on 24 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda, al-Ḥusayn decided to extricate himself from this situation, which had reached an impasse, and, at the head of a group of 300 armed men who were joined en route by reinforcements from Mecca, he marched towards that town. Several members of the ʿAbbāsid family (notably al-ʿAbbās

b. Muḥammad, the uncle of al-Mahdī, and his son ʿUbayd Allāh, Sulaymān b. Djaʿfar al-Manṣūr and his sons Muḥammad and Mūsā, Mūsā b. ʿĪsā and his brother Ismāʿīl) were that year in the district of Mecca to perform the Pilgrimage; the group of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān had an escort to protect it from any attacks by Bedouin. Al-Hādī ordered them to assemble all their forces and to march against Ḥusayn, which they did after the ʿumra and a parade in the town, obviously intended to intimidate those who might have considered joining the rebellion. Abu 'l-Faradj al-Iṣfahānī similarly passes over the details of this reaction by the ʿAbbāsids, and our information is found in al-Ṭabarī and other authors (e.g. Ibn Khaldūn).

The battle between al-Mubayyiḍa [q.v.] (= "those clothed in white", ʿAlids and their supporters) and al-Musawwida (= "those clothed in black", ʿAbbāsids and their supporters) took place at Fakhkh, six miles from Mecca. (A curious detail is that some ʿAbbāsid supporters made use of soot to colour their garments black). During the encounter al-Ḥusayn was offered amān, but he refused it proudly and fought until he was killed. More than 100 men fell at his side and for three days their corpses lay a prey to wild beasts. Abu 'l-Zift (or ʿAbd Allāh b. Isḥāḳ b. Ibrāhīm?) who, wounded in one eye, had accepted the amān offered him by his uncle Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, was nevertheless killed by ʿUbayd Allāh b. al-ʿAbbās at the instigation of his father and of Mūsā b. ʿĪsā; this murder led to a great quarrel between Muḥammad and the others. Two ʿAlids, one (Sulaymān) the brother and the other (al-Ḥasan) the son of Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya, were later executed at Mecca. Some supporters of al-Ḥusayn were led as prisoners to al-Hādī, who killed at least three of them and cast others into prison. Al-Ḥusayn's head was first taken to al-Hādī, who showed no pleasure at this, and then sent to Khurāsān to serve as a warning to the Shīʿīs of this region. Many rebels saved their lives by mingling with the pilgrims, notably two ʿAlids who were later to become famous: Idrīs b. ʿAbd Allāh [q.v.] and Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd Allāh [q.v.]. When the news of al-Ḥusayn's defeat reached Medina, al-ʿUmarī emerged from his hiding-place and, having returned to office, burned the houses of the ʿAlids and of some of the supporters of al-Ḥusayn (he even burned some palm trees) and confiscated their possessions as being war booty (ṣawāfī).

Thus ended the revolt which, in the number of ʿAlids killed, was surpassed only at Karbalāʾ. The sources give as its motive the events at Medina mentioned above, except for al-Yaʿḳūbī who connects it with Shīʿī unrest in Khurāsān which was caused, he says, by the harsh measures of the governor appointed by al-Hādī and fomented by the local Ṭālibīs; his information is most probably correct, since it was on reinforcements from the pilgrims going to Mecca that the organizers for the revolt were relying, and an agreement to this end had already been established; but, as there is too little time between the accession of al-Hādī (22 Muḥarram 169/4 August 785) and hence the appointment of his governor, the appeals of Shīʿī pilgrims and the beginning of the revolt at Medina, these troubles and the reaction of the central government must be traced back to the final years of the caliphate of al-Mahdī, particularly since there exists evidence of a reversal of the policy of this caliph, who at first adopted a conciliatory policy towards the Shīʿīs and later became hostile, at least to the Zaydīs; al-Hādī merely pursued this hostile policy more vigorously. The Shīʿī sources (see Muḥsin al-Amīn, xvi, 403) describe al-Ḥusayn's rebellion as "Zaydī", and rightly, in the sense that it had a social character, as did certainly that of the founder of the Zaydī movement Zayd b. al-Ḥusayn [q.v.], killed in 122/740 (whereas that of Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya and his brother was primarily of a legitimist character). There are resemblances between the formula of the bayʿa proposed by this Zayd to his adherents and that which al-Ḥusayn proposed to his: in the former, Zayd promised to defend the oppressed, to give [benefices] to whoever had been excluded from them (al-maḥrūmīn) and—what is more striking—to share fairly the fayʾ [q.v.] (his revenues or the fayʾ itself?); al-Ḥusayn also promised justice and equal shares, and, although he did not specify which resources were to be distributed, it may be guessed that he too was referring to the fayʾ, since one of his first actions in his capacity as imām was to distribute the money which he found in the treasury of the town and 10,000 *dīnār*s which remained from the ʿaṭāʾ. In addition it is interesting to note that, in his bayʿa, the duty of the subjects to obey him depended on his keeping the promises which he had made and that a similar condition is found in the appeal of the founder of the Zaydī state in the Yemen, al-Hādī ilā 'l-ḥaḳḳ (Van Arendonk, 122 f.). Another fact which proves that he intended to make social concessions is that the propaganda of his adherents was addressed also to slaves; it was proclaimed at Mecca that those who joined the revolt would be granted their liberty, and there were some slaves who took advantage of this opportunity; all the same al-Ḥusayn had to return some of them to their masters who demanded them back (since the law did not permit an emancipation of this type).

(AL-) ḤUSAYN B. AL-ḌAḤḤĀK AL-BĀHILĪ, ABŪ ʿALĪ, with the nicknames Ashḳar and, more particularly, al-Khalīʿ "the Debauched", a Baṣra poet who spent almost the whole of his life in the entourage of the ʿAbbāsid caliphs and who can be regarded as the perfect type of court poet, at least at a court dominated by the taste for pleasure, indeed for debauchery. His family, which originated in Khurāsān, had for a long time been connected with the mawālī of the Bāhila when Ḥusayn was born, probably in the 150's, since he could remember an incident that occurred in 160/775. With his childhood friend Abū Nuwās [q.v.] he studied the "classics" in his native town, but, more important, he was present at gatherings of men of letters; he thus learnt the poet's profession, and awaited a favourable opportunity for the realization of the aspiration of all Baṣrans who, if they felt themselves to possess any talent, wished to receive the approbation of the capital. Abū Nuwās was the first to leave to try his fortune in Baghdād, and reports of his success soon spurred Ḥusayn to follow him. He seems quite rapidly to have won sufficient renown to guarantee a secure existence, though he was obliged to content himself with singing the praises of a certain number of exalted persons without ever securing admission to intimate acquaintance with al-Rashīd; however, he entered the service of a dissolute prince, Ṣāliḥ b. al-Rashīd, whose life of pleasure he shared and who thereafter, despite some passing shadows, always remained an active patron of the poet in times of difficulty. At the same time he also attached himself to another of the caliph's sons, Muḥammad, the future al-Amīn, whose constant companion he was until the end. On the latter's death (198/813), in spite of the advice of the probably more astute Abu 'l-ʿAtāhiya [q.v.] to moderate his grief in order to safeguard his future, he allowed it to burst forth in a series of threnodies which caused al-Maʾmūn to take umbrage; this fidelity to the dead caliph—which even included a refusal to believe in his death—and the graceless allusions which he made to the rival at the time of the conflict between the two brothers alienated al-Maʾmūn who, on his entry into Baghdād, struck Ḥusayn off the list presented to him and refused him admittance to the court. Traditions concerning the poet's fortunes during al-Maʾmūn's caliphate are not very clear, but it is certain that al-Khalīʿ returned to Baṣra, where the affluence that he owed to al-Amīn al-Makhlūʿ allowed him to wait for happier days, and he made various attempts to be reconciled with the caliph who did indeed recognize his talent; the intervention of Ṣāliḥ b. al-Rashīd and of various courtiers hardly seems to have influenced him, but it is possible that, as a result of a particularly successful panegyric, al-Maʾmūn gave orders that the regular payment of his pension should be resumed.

On his accession (218/833), al-Muʿtaṣim recalled him to court and rewarded him for his first panegyric by filling his mouth with pearls, which he then had made into a necklace so that no-one might remain unaware of the esteem in which he held the poet. He took him with him to Syria and provided a house for him at Sāmarrā. Ḥusayn was once again a privileged courtier, as is clearly shown on the accession of al-Wāthiḳ whom he saluted with a long ḳaṣīda without joining in the throng of poets who had come forward to proclaim their self-interested praises. He remained in al-Wāthiḳ's service throughout his caliphate, taking his turn of duty both by night and day in response to his master's whims, playing backgammon with him, accompanying him on hunting expeditions, taking part in his royal potations and writing incidental poems on varied but mostly frivolous subjects.

On the accession of al-Mutawakkil (232/847), the poet, who had now reached a very advanced age, seems to have kept aloof from the court, though still continuing to lead a dissolute life; the caliph, who also appreciated his talent, called upon him to give proof of it and was able to affirm that old age had in no way diminished the perversity of his tastes. He survived al-Mutawakkil, whose death he mourned, and himself died shortly afterwards, probably in 250/864, almost a hundred years old.

Ḥusayn al-Khalīʿ maintains with a certain simplicity that all the successive caliphs, from al-Rashīd to al-Wāthiḳ, struck at him, either through jealousy or because he had a pernicious influence on their children, and it can be understood that he should have been looked upon as a dangerous companion for the ʿAbbāsid princes, since he could not fail to encourage the strong tendency that they already possessed towards frivolity and debauchery. Abu 'l-Faradj al-Iṣfahānī, who is certainly lavish with scandalous details, reports numerous anecdotes concerning the dissolute nature of this man who spent the greater part of his time drinking with caliphs, princes or others of exalted rank, listening to singing girls and dallying with young men.

The attraction of Ḥusayn b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk's company resided in his light-hearted and original character, and also in the facility with which he tackled the poetic forms favoured in his day. In the fraction of his work which has survived, we find first of all *ḳaṣīda*s of a "modernist" type in praise of the caliphs; written in relatively simple language, these panegyrics naturally lay stress upon the qualities, whether real or imagined, of the personages to whom they are adressed, and in them can be observed the recurrent idea that God has chosen the best of men to govern Islam. It is only in these circumstances that he mentions the name of God, and one cannot fail to be struck by his utter detachment from matters of religion while noting that, unlike Abū Nuwās and other dissolute poets, he seems to have written hardly any zuhdiyyāt in preparation for the after-life, although he did make the pilgrimage to Mecca. His bacchic poems are not lacking in originality, and tradition has it that Abū Nuwās was sometimes rather put out by them, but, when not shamelessly plagiarizing them, he consoled himself for their success and felicities with the thought that posterity would not fail to attribute to him, Abū Nuwās, the best of his friend's bacchic verses. His *ghazal*s are in general not obscene although he devoted them at least as much to young men as to women, and Abū Nuwās recognizes his talent in this genre. Satire hardly appears in his writings, and as a characteristic example there are only two lines to be quoted, about a female singer whose career was finally broken. On the other hand, the occasional verse and intimate court scenes reveal a sure gift for improvisation, and the descriptions of flowers herald a genre that was to flourish in the following century.

The success of Ḥusayn al-Khalīʿ as a court poet seems to have been entirely deserved, for in those genres which constituted the ornament of princely assemblies he was able to appeal to an original inspiration and to avoid the perils of routine. For proof of this there is the unusually large number of his poems which attracted the attention of singing-girls, were set to music and earned for the writer a detailed notice in the Aghānī. But it should be noted that the critics regarded him as a minor poet and that Ibn Ḳutayba, for example, did not consider him to be worthy of the merest mention.

ḤUSAYN B. ḤAMDĀN B. ḤAMDŪN B. AL-ḤĀRITH... AL-ᶜADAWĪ AL-TAGHLIBĪ, the first member of the Ḥamdānid family [see HAMDĀNIDS] to play an important part in the history of the caliphate at the end of the 3rd/9th and the beginning of the 4th/10th century who, unlike his father Ḥamdān, was active not only locally in the Djazīra but also in Baghdād and in other regions of the empire of the caliphs. At first a Khāridjī, he began his career by an opportunist support of the caliph al-Muᶜtaḍid by giving up to him in 282/895 Ardumusht, whose defence his father had entrusted to him as he fled, and becoming a valued ally of the caliph. In the following year, placed by the latter at the head of a large body of troops, he was chiefly responsible for the capture of the Khāridjī Hārūn al-Shārī, which enabled him to secure the liberation of his father who had been captured, the lifting of a tribute imposed on the Taghlibīs and the command of a body of 500 Taghlibī horsemen.

He next distinguished himself in the operations against the Dulafid of the Djibāl, Bakr b. ᶜAbd al-ᶜAzīz b. Aḥmad b. Abī Dulaf, probably in 283/896; this is alluded to in a verse of the ḳaṣīda which Abū Firās devoted to the glory of the Ḥamdānid family.

During the caliphate of al-Muktafī (289-95/902-8), in 291/903, as lieutenant of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, ṣāḥib dīwān al-djaysh, he gained in Syria a brilliant victory over the Ḳarmaṭī Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh (the Ṣāḥib al-khāl), who fled and was soon afterwards captured. With the same Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, he took part in the re-conquest of Egypt from the last Ṭūlūnid in 292/904-5, as commander of the vanguard. It was he who first made contact with the conspirators who were plotting to rid themselves of the Ṭūlūnid and who pressed him to march on Fusṭāṭ. According to one tradition, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān offered him the governorship of Egypt, but he refused, preferring to return to Baghdād, taking with him a considerable amount of booty.

In 293/905-6, he was put in command of an army sent against the Kalbīs of Syria who had revolted at the instigation of the Ḳarmaṭīs. He forced them to flee to the desert, but was unable to pursue them as they had filled in the wells, and had to return to the Euphrates at Raḥba, which allowed the Kalbīs to advance as far as the Lower Euphrates, where they defeated an army of the caliph at Ḳādisiyya and robbed the Pilgrim caravan, at the end of 906. The Kalbīs and the Ḳarmaṭīs were finally put to flight by an operation directed from Baghdād, and the remnants of their armies, attempting to return to Syria by the Ṭarīḳ al-Furāt (the Euphrates route), were annihilated by Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān (Djumādā II 294/March-April 907).

After this, Ḥusayn had to deal with some rebel Arab tribes, mainly Kalbīs, between the Euphrates and Aleppo, then, in 295/907-8, with the Tamīm who had come to pillage in Djazīra: he drove them back into Syria and defeated them near Khunāsira.

All these operations brought fame to Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān, gaining him respect among the secretaries and putting him in a position to exercise political influence when, in 295/908, the question arose of the succession to al-Muktafī. He gave his support to the group which, having failed to get Ibn al-Muᶜtazz nominated, attempted to substitute him by force for the young al-Muḳtadir (son of al-Muᶜtaḍid) who had been appointed caliph. He undertook, or was instructed, to remove the vizier al-ᶜAbbās b. al-Ḥasan al-Djardjarāʾī who, unlike the secretary Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. al-Djarrāḥ, uncle of ᶜAlī b. ᶜĪsā, had approved al-Muḳtadir's accession. With two other conspirators he attacked and killed al-ᶜAbbās on 20 Rabīᶜ I 296/17 December 908 and tried to assassinate the young caliph, but unsuccessfully, for the latter had already left the hippodrome where Ḥusayn was intending to take him by surprise and had shut himself in the palace. After the conspirators had proclaimed Ibn al-Muᶜtazz caliph, Ḥusayn went to the Ḥasanī Palace to force al-Muḳtadir to leave it, it being assumed that he would readily accept his dethronement. But Ḥusayn encountered the resistance prepared by the chamberlain Sawsan and the two Muʾnis (al-Khādim and al-Khāzin). Although he set fire to the gates of the palace, he was unable to force a way in. Al-Muḳtadir's party triumphed and Ḥusayn fled to Mosul, then to Balad and spent some time wandering with his adherents in the Djazīra. His brother ᶜAbd Allāh Abu 'l-Haydjāʾ was sent in pursuit, but it was Ḥusayn who surprised and defeated his pursuers. Encouraged by this success, Ḥusayn, through his brother Ibrāhīm, asked the vizier Ibn al-Furāt for amān and although, with Muḥammad b. Dāwūd and the ḳāḍī Abu 'l-Muthannā, he had been one of the main conspirators, he was restored to favour; but, to remove him from the capital, he was appointed governor of the districts of Ḳumm and Kāshān in the Djibāl. As governor of this region, he gave support to the caliph's troops under Muʾnis al-Khādim against the Ṣaffārid al-Layth b. ᶜAlī who had made himself master of Sidjistān and of Fārs, then against the latter's general, Subkarā, who, after abandoning al-Layth's party and joining Muʾnis against him, had risen in rebellion at the instigation of his lieutenant al-Ḳattāl. In 298/910-11 the two rebels were defeated and, while Subkarā took refuge with the Sāmānid, al-Ḳattāl was taken prisoner, by Ḥusayn himself according to the ḳaṣīda of Abū Firās.

This same ḳaṣīda states that Ḥusayn was offered the governorship of Fārs, which he refused. In any case he returned to Baghdād. The vizier Ibn al-Furāt, who seems to have mistrusted him, sent him away again, to be governor of the Diyār Rabīᶜa. In this capacity, he waged a campaign against the Byzantines in 301/913-4. For reasons which are not clear, perhaps because the vizier had deprived him of the financial administration of the province, perhaps because Ḥusayn did not fulfil scrupulously his financial obligations, or perhaps because he aspired to independence, a conflict arose between him and the vizier ᶜAlī b. ᶜĪsā and he came out in open rebellion, probably in 302/914-5. A first army sent against him met with defeat, and it was Muʾnis, recalled from Egypt, who took him prisoner while he was attempting to reach Armenia, in Shaᶜbān 303/February 916. He was taken to Baghdād and exhibited dressed in a cap of shame (burnus) and a long brocade tunic, made to ride on a camel all the way from Bāb al-Shammāsiyya to the Palace, and then imprisoned under the guard of Zaydān, the intendant of the Palace. He remained in prison for over two years and was executed in Djumādā I 306/October-November 918, on the orders of the caliph al-Muḳtadir, for reasons which are not clear.

Very probably his execution was connected with the revolt of the governor of Ādharbaydjān and Armenia, Yūsuf b. Abi 'l-Sādj; it also coincided strangely with the dismissal of the vizier Ibn al-Furāt.

It appears that at one point either Muʾnis or the vizier Ibn al-Furāt may have suggested that Ḥusayn be released in order to put him in charge of the war against Yūsuf, which he refused. It may be that the caliph suspected an alliance between Yūsuf and Ḥusayn against him and gave the order for Ḥusayn's execution. Or Ibn al-Furāt may have been involved in a conspiracy designed to further the Shīʿī cause to which both he and Ḥusayn were devoted. Ideas on this matter can only be hypothetical. In any case the caliph must have feared that if Ḥusayn were released he would once again start a revolt, either through a desire for independence or as a Shīʿī. In order to avoid attempts by those (probably numerous) who desired his release to secure it by force, the caliph preferred to take a measure which put a stop to all intrigue.

Among the generals of the caliph of this period, Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān stands out more clearly than the supreme commander Muʾnis or any other military leaders. But his valour and the service he gave by his action in many battles are not enough to cancel the memory of the spirit of rebellion which too frequently possessed him, and his pride and ambition. It appears nevertheless that even in his acts of revolt his motives were disinterested and honourable. He seems to have thought that it was necessary to support Ibn al-Muʿtazz in order to bring about a beneficial change in the system of administration and a reform in the government. Like many who had Shīʿī sympathies at this time, his ambition was to see prevail an ideal Muslim government which for many people the ʿAbbāsids no longer represented and which it was possible to imagine realized only by the imminent or future accession to power of a family glorified by the sacrifice of so many martyrs and endowed with real or imaginary qualities which contrasted with the "vices" of the ʿAbbāsids.

Certain characteristics of Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān show him to have been an unusual man. In addition to the prestige of his Arab birth, which distinguished him among the mawālī of all races, and to the native qualities of his Taghlibī family, he seems to have had an open-mindedness not possessed by the other military leaders, and an understanding of the great ferment of ideas which was disturbing the Muslim world at this time. It was certainly not an accident that he was in communication with the famous mystic al-Ḥallādj and that the latter dedicated a political work to him.

The founder of the Ḥamdānid dynasty was not Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān but his brother, ʿAbd Allāh Abu 'l-Haydjāʾ, but he was the first member of the family who really brought glory to it, inculcating in it the realization of its valour and strength and developing in it the ambition for glory and power. All this is attested in the verses of Abū Firās.

Ḥamdān (ibid., 126-30, 150, 165-7) provides details which are sometimes lacking in the historians. On his political rôle at Baghdād, see also D. AL-ḤUSAYN B. MUḤAMMAD [see AL-RĀGHIB AL-IṢFAHĀNĪ].

AL-ḤUṢAYN B. NUMAYR, of the Kindī tribe of the Sakūn, a general of the Sufyānids. At Ṣiffīn, he fought in the Umayyad ranks. On the accession of Yazīd I, he was governor of the important district of Ḥimṣ. He then had to intervene with Yazīd for Ibn Mufarrigh [q.v.], who had been imprisoned by ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād. When the expedition against the holy cities of the Ḥidjāz was planned, Ḥuṣayn was appointed lieutenant of the commander-in-chief Muslim b. ʿUḳba al-Murrī [q.v.] and, in this capacity, distinguished himself at the battle of the Ḥarra [q.v.]. During the march on Mecca, the dying Muslim, in order to carry out the orders of Yazīd, but unwillingly, entrusted to him the command of the expedition. According to al-Yaʿḳūbī, he massacred some days later all the inhabitants of al-Mushallal (the place were Muslim had died), who were guilty of having dug up the body of the commander-in-chief and stoned it. He laid siege to Mecca for two months, bombarding it with stones and with pieces of rock; it was during this time that the burning of the Kaʿba took place. Ḥuṣayn was about to take Mecca when operations were suspended by Yazīd's death. After attempting in vain to persuade Ibn al-Zubayr to accompany him to Syria in order to have himself proclaimed caliph there, Ḥuṣayn returned there with his army. There he played an important part in the accession to the throne of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, since he persuaded his fellow tribesmen to recognize Marwān instead of the young Khālid b. Muʿāwiya.

Sent to Mesopotamia on the orders of ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād, he defeated at ʿAyn al-Warda the Shīʿīs, who, repenting of their behaviour towards Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, had revolted under the leadership of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad (24 Djumādā I 65/6 January 685). Two years later, he fell at the hands of Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar [q.v.] at the battle of Khāzir (9 or 10 Muḥarram 67/5 or 6 August 686).

A Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr is mentioned by al-Ṭabarī as having pacified the Ḥadramawt during the ridda. H. Lammens (Le califat de Yazīd Ier, 259 n. 3) refuses to accept this as the same person.

According to al-Dīnawarī and Ibn al-Athīr, a Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Tamīmī, whom Müller confused with the Sakūnī, captured, when he was ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād's chief of police, Muslim b. ʿAḳīl [q.v.], the emissary of Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī [q.v.] at Kūfa, intercepted a letter sent by Ḥusayn from Baṭn al-Rumma to the ʿIrāḳīs, and, during the battle of Karbalāʾ, shot Ḥusayn in the mouth as he was drinking.

ḤUSAYN B. AL-ṢIDDĪḲ AL-AHDAL [see AL-AHDAL].

ḤUSAYN ʿAWNĪ PASHA, Ottoman general and Grand Vizier under Sultan ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, was born at Gelendost, a village of the sandjaḳ of Isparta (wilāyet of Konya) in 1236/1820-1; his father was a poor peasant named Aḥmed Agha. He came to Istanbul at the age of sixteen and entered the Mekteb-i Ḥarbiye (Military Academy), from where he was promoted to staff captain in 1264/1848. After a few years of teaching at the same institution, on the outbreak of the Crimean War (1853) he joined the army with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. He distinguished himself on the Balkan front, especially at the battle of Četate and participated later in the Mingrelian campaign as chief of general staff of the serdār-i ekrem ʿÖmer Pasha. On the conclusion of the war (1856), he was appointed director of the Mekteb-i Ḥarbiye; during the war with Montenegro (1862) he commanded a division. Back in Istanbul he was nominated, early in 1863, to the presidency of Dār-i Shūrā-yi ʿAskerī (High Military Council) and promoted to müshīr (general commander) in Ṣafar 1280/July-August 1863; during the second grand vizierate of Fuʾād Pasha [q.v.], he was appointed serʿasker ḳāʾim-maḳāmī (interim War Minister), a position he kept until his dismissal on 5 Shaʿbān 1282/24 December 1865. He was sent to Rumelia in Dhu ʾl-Ḥidjdja 1283/April 1867 as commander of Yanya and Yeñi-shehr, but he left for Crete when, on 16 Djumādā II 1284/15 October 1867, he was entrusted with suppression of the Cretan revolt. His success in crushing the revolt resulted in his nomination, on 29 Shawwāl 1285/12 February 1869, to the office of serʿasker in ʿĀlī Pasha [q.v]'s last cabinet. The military reforms he accomplished on the Prussian model, during his first period of office in the War Ministry which lasted two and a half years, rightly established his reputation as the re-organizer of the army. But the death of ʿĀlī Pasha on 20 Djumādā II 1288/6 September 1871 and the appointment of his enemy Maḥmūd Nedīm Pasha [q.v.] to the grand vizierate, brought about his dismissal and banishment to Isparta. Recalled from exile in Djumādā I 1289/July 1872, he was sent to Izmir in Ramaḍān/November of the same year as wālī of the province of Aydin. Shortly after that, on 26 Dhu ʾl-Ḳaʿda 1289/25 January 1873, he was appointed Minister of the Navy in the cabinet of Müterdjim Meḥmed Rüshdī Pasha and transferred, on 17 Dhu ʾl-Ḥidjdja/15 February, for a second time to the office of serʿasker when Esʿad Pasha became Grand Vizier. A year later, on 27 Dhu ʾl-Ḥidjdja 1290/15 February 1874, he replaced Shirwānīzāde Meḥmed Rüshdī Pasha in the grand vizierate, while continuing to hold the portfolio of War Minister. His period of office was marked by an economic crisis due to bad harvests coupled with financial troubles which were to lead the Ottoman Treasury to bancruptcy in October 1875. He lost both offices on 19 Rabīʿ I 1292/25 April 1875 probably at the instigation of Khedive Ismāʿīl Pasha [q.v.] and was nominated again to the governorship of Aydin. Appointed serʿasker for the third time, on 19 Radjab/21 August, he was dismissed by Maḥmūd Nedīm Pasha when the latter returned to the grand vizierate (25 August). The following year, he was recalled from Bursa, where he had been sent as wālī, and was nominated on 17 Rabīʿ II 1293/12 May 1876 to the office of serʿasker for the fourth time. He played the principal part in the deposition of Sultan ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, which took place on 7 Djumādā I/30 May as a result of his collaboration with the Grand Vizier Müterdjim Meḥmed Rüshdī Pasha, the Shaykh al-Islām Ḥasan Khayr Allāh Efendi and Midḥat Pasha [q.v.]. He was shot dead by a young officer called Čerkes Ḥasan, seemingly for a personal grievance, on the night of 15-16 June 1876, at a ministerial council held in Midḥat Pasha's konak in the Bāyezīd quarter and was buried in the courtyard of the Süleymāniyye Mosque.

An intelligent and authoritarian soldier, he favoured absolutism; his collaboration with the constitutionalist Midḥat Pasha was due to his personal hatred for ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz fostered since his exile in 1871, probably mixed with a sincere desire to save the Empire from misgovernment.

ḤUSAYN BAYḲARA [see ḤUSAYN].

ḤUSAYN DJAHĀNSŪZ [see DJAHĀN-SŪZ].

ḤUSAYN DJĀHID (mod. Turkish HÜSEYİN CAHİT YALÇIN, 1874-1957), Turkish writer, journalist and politician. His parents were from Istanbul. He was born at Balıkesir while his father ʿAlī Riḍā was serving as government accountant in the province. He attended the primary school at Serres in Macedonia and the lycée at Istanbul. On completing his studies at the School of Political Science (Mülkiye) in 1896 he became a civil servant in the Ministry of Education. In the meantime he had taught himself French. He taught Turkish and French in various schools and became the headmaster of the iʿdādī school of Merdjān, one of the leading lycées of the time.

Upon the restoration of the Constitution in 1908, which put an end to ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd II's despotic rule, he entered political life, joined the Committee of Union and Progress, and founded the newspaper Ṭanīn, which he made the organ of the Committee. He was elected a member and later president of the Parliament. During the Mutiny of 31 March/13 April 1909, a counter-revolution by the reactionary elements, his printing-house was raided and destroyed by the rebels and another deputy, mistaken for him, was killed. He later served as creditors' delegate to the Administration of Ottoman Public Debts. Soon after the armistice of 1918 he was exiled to Malta by the British, together with a number of leading Turkish intellectuals and politicians; there he learned English and Italian, and on Gökalp's advice translated historical works (see below). On being released from Malta he resumed the publication of Ṭanīn (1922) and began to criticize violently the new Ankara régime of Mustafa Kemal.

During the first years of the Republic his unsympathetic attitude towards the authoritarian administration of the government, which was carrying out a series of radical reforms, was considered defeatist and he was twice tried by the Tribunal of Independence. His indignation as an 'advocate of freedom and democracy' protesting against the 'arbitrary rule' of the Nationalist government were found 'grotesque' as coming from a man who for years had defended and excused the many abuses and crimes of the Unionist régime of the pre-1918 period. He was first aquitted but in the second trial he was sentenced to banishment to Čorum in Central Anatolia; on being set free in 1926, he retired from politics.

In 1930, during the First Turkish Language Congress which had been proposed by Mustafa Kemal himself in order to initiate the government-sponsored language reform, he was the only prominent writer publicly (and in Atatürk's presence) to oppose the project, maintaining that it would do more harm than good and that the language should be left to its own course of natural development.

Until 1938 Ḥusayn Djāhid's publications were confined to non-political matters. After Atatürk's death he re-entered political life, was a deputy (1939-50) and resumed the publication of his newspaper Tanin. Later he was made the editor of Ulus, the organ of the Republican People's Party. His violent criticisms of the Democrat Party government caused his arrest and imprisonment for a few months (1954), but he was set free because of his advanced age. He died in 1957 in Istanbul.

Ḥusayn Djāhid's career may be divided into two distinct periods, before and after 1908. Before the Second Constitution he was a prominent member of the Therwet-i Fünūn [q.v.] literary movement and was known as a novelist, short-story writer and particularly as a critic. After 1908 he gave up literature and became active as an ambitious politician and a combative journalist, with more tranquil intervals as a prolific translator and author of didactic magazine articles.

As a child Ḥusayn Djāhid was particularly impressed by the novels of Aḥmed Midḥat [q.v.]. At the age of fourteen he wrote his first novel Nādīde, which was a successful imitiation of the 'Master's' genre, with sickly sentimentalism, endless moral exhortations and philosophic remarks. By spending all his savings he was able to publish this enormous volume.

Under the influence of French authors, whom he constantly read and translated, and of his writer friends of the Therwet-i Fünūn, he soon got over this early enthusiasm and became a staunch defender of the modernist movement of the Edebiyyāt-i Djedīde (New Literature). His only other novel Khayāl ičinde (In a Dream, 1901) and his short stories (collected in three volumes: Ḥayāt-i mukhayyel (A Dreamed Life, 1899), Ḥayāt-i ḥaḳiḳiyye ṣaḥneleri (Scenes of Real Life, 1910), and Ničin aldatïrlarmïsh? (Why do they Deceive?, 1924), where realism is mixed with sentimentalism and sympathy for the poor and the weak, cannot be reckoned among the best productions of the school; but they impress by their unadorned, natural language and style, as compared with the very involved, recherché language of the leading members of the movement such as Tewfīḳ Fikret, Djenāb Shehābeddīn and Khālid Ḍiyā. But this characteristic of Ḥusayn Djāhid, shared by his novelist friend, Meḥmed Ra'ūf (and later by Khālide Edīb of the following generation), was not a matter of policy but was due simply to the fact that these writers, having an insufficient background of Arabic and Persian, were incapable of handling the involved Ottoman Turkish. Ḥusayn Djāhid himself confessed that the 'naturalism' of his style, admired by later critics, was due simply to his 'ignorance' (see Edebî hatıralar, 133).

Ḥusayn Djāhid's real contribution to the movement was his articles on criticism, which defined the aims of the Edebiyyāt-i Djedīde writers, and his defence of them against the ceaseless attacks of various hostile groups which accused them of destroying the old dīwān tradition in literature, of being blind imitators of French writers, of ignoring the splendours of the old Arab-Muslim culture, or of being too exclusive, even 'decadent'. Most of Ḥusayn Djāhid's articles on literary criticism, which are of documentary importance for the literary history of the period, have not been published in book form and are scattered in many reviews and newspapers (particularly Mekteb, Ṭarīḳ, Ṣabāḥ, Therwet-i Fünūn and Ṭanīn). Some of his polemics have been collected in the volume Ḳavghalarïm (My Polemics, 1910).

After 1908, Ḥusayn Djāhid gave up his literary interests and became an uncompromising 'Unionist', which he remained all his life, devoting most of his time and energy to defending the principles and actions of the Comittee. Hence his hostile attitude towards the early Republican régime, which liquidated the last vestiges of the Union and Progess Committee.

Ḥusayn Djāhid's contribution to Turkish culture as a translator is remarkable. Apart from hundreds of articles on literary criticism and social and political problems, mostly published in reviews and newspapers, particularly in his weekly Fikir Hareketleri (1933-40, 364 numbers), which he filled single-handed, he translated from French, English and Italian a great number of important works on history, sociology, political science and literature.

Ḥusayn Djāhid is also the author of the first Turkish grammer which is not based on the method of the Arab grammarians (Türkče ṣarf ve naḥw, 1911), an adaptation of the French grammar to Turkish. His biography of the Unionist leader Ṭalʿat Pasha (Talat Paşa) is not unbiased. From the 1930s onwards, apart from his valuable literary memoirs (Edebî hatıralar, Istanbul 1935), Ḥusayn Djāhid serialized his memoirs in various papers and reviews, which have not yet been published in book form: Malta adasında: esaret hatıraları, in Yedigün, nos. 87-121, 1934; On yılın hikâyesi: 1908-1918, in Yedigün, nos. 120-250, 1935-37; Meşrutiyet hatıraları: 1908-1918, in Fikir hareketleri, nos. 71-224, 1935-38; Meşrutiyet devri ve sonrası, in the daily Halkçı, nos. 170-375, 13 June-31 December 1954; Mercan'dan Babıâliy'ye, in Yedigün, nos. 267-81, 1938. These memoirs, although somewhat tendentious because of his 'Unionist' approach to most events and problems, are of great documentary value, as he had first-hand knowledge of Turkish literary and political history during his lifetime.

ḤUSAYN DJAJADININGRAT, see Supplement.

ḤUSAYN Efendi, known as DJINDJI KHODJA, preceptor and favourite of the Ottoman Sultan Ibrāhīm [q.v.], was born at Zaʿfarānborlīsī (Safranbolu, now a kaza of the vilâyet of Zonguldak), the son of a certain Sheykh Meḥmed, son of Sheykh Ibrāhīm; he claimed to be descended from Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Ḳonewī [q.v.]. He came to Istanbul and entered one of the medreses of the Süleymāniyye, supporting himself by practising sorcery, which he had learned from his father at Safranbolu; this gained him the nickname Djindji ("sorcerer"). He was not an able student, but he more than compensated for this failure by the political influence and the material wealth which his skill at sorcery obtained for him (Ewliyā Čelebi, Seyāḥat-nāme, i, 273-4). His mother's claim that he would be able to cure Ibrāhīm's insanity won him the protection of the Sultan's mother, the powerful and unscrupulous Kösem [q.v.], and the confidence of the Sultan himself. He was granted the rank of müderris-i Ṣaḥn, for which he had neither the capacity nor the education, and soon afterwards was appointed khodja to the Sultan. In spite of the opposition of the Shaykh al-Islām Yaḥyā Efendi, he was appointed ḳāḍī of Ghalaṭa with the rank (pāye) of Istanbul, a post for which he was completely unfitted, on 20 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 1054/19 January 1645 (Istanbul, Müftülük arşivi, Galata sicilleri, No. lxii, p. 68; Shaykhī, Waḳāyiʿ al-fuḍalāʾ, Istanbul University Library, MS T 81, pp. 191, 214). In alliance with Sulṭānzāde Meḥmed Pasha (later Grand Vizier, 1053/1644-1055/1645) and the rikābdār Yūsuf Agha (later, as second vizier, commander in Crete, exec. 1055/1646) —"ein mächtiges Triumvirat" (Hammer-Purgstall, v, 323)—he procured the fall of Kemānkesh Ḳara Muṣṭafā Pasha (1053/1644). With the approval of the Sultan he married the daughter of Ḳara-Čelebizāde Maḥmūd Efendi (Kātib Čelebi, Fedhleke, ii, 341; Muḥibbī, Khulāṣat al-āthār, ii, 123). On 12 Rabīʿ I 1054/19 May 1644, he was appointed Ḳāḍī-ʿasker of Anadolu, and proceeded to use this post to amass wealth for himself by the selling of offices. He was removed from the post several times, but for short periods only; on 1 Radjab 1057/2 August 1647, he was dismissed for the fourth time, and exiled briefly to Gelibolu. Upon the accession of Meḥemmed IV in Radjab 1058/August 1648, he was one of the persons whose wealth was marked for confiscation in order to meet the expenses of the accession donatives. After a month's imprisonment in the palace of the Grand Vizier, all his wealth and property were expropriated. He was again sent into exile, to Mikhalič, where he was executed in Shawwāl 1058/September 1648. A few days before his execution, his famous palace in Üsküdar (Ewliyā Čelebi, Seyāḥat-nāme, i, 323, 472) had been given to a princess married to Faḍlī Pasha.

ḤUSAYN (Ḥuseyn) Efendi, known as HEZĀRFENN ("[man of] a thousand skills", i.e., "polymath"), Ottoman man of letters of the 11th/17th century, was the son of a certain Djaʿfer, a native of Cos (Turkish: Istanköy). After completing his education in Istanbul he was for a time in government service as a Treasury official, and then devoted himself to writing and teaching. The generally accepted date for his death, 1103/1691-2, appears to rest solely on a deduction of G. Flügel (Handschriften . . . Wien, ii, 104); since he was already about 70 years old in 1671 (Babinger, 228, n. 2), the date given by Meḥmed Ṭāhir, 1089/1678-9, is more likely.

His works are intrinsically of secondary importance, but Hezārfenn himself is of some interest in that for his History (no. 1 below) he used Greek and Latin sources (as had Kātib Čelebi [q.v.] some years earlier): he had no knowledge of the languages, but persuaded two dragomans of the Porte to translate for him (see TM, x, 368, n. 14). Furthermore he was known to various European diplomatists and orientalists resident in Istanbul: the French ambassador de Nointel and Antoine Galland (1646-1715), the translator of the "Arabian Nights" (Journal d'Antoine Galland, ed. Ch. Schefer, Paris 1881, ii, 150-1 and (?) 58); and Count Marsigli (1658-1730), who used his Talkhīṣ al-bayān (no. 2 below) when compiling the Stato militare del impero ottomano (Amsterdam 1732), spoke of him as "persona che passava per il più letterato di Costantinopoli" (Babinger, 228, n. 2, and E. Rossi, in OM, xi (1931), 416, and cf. 420).

His principal works are: (1) Tanḳīḥ tawārīkh al-mulūk, a fairly short universal history, composed between 1081/1670 and 1083/1673; mainly abridged from the works of Djenābī [q.v. in Supp.], Mīrkhwānd, ʿĀlī, and Kātib Čelebi [qq.v.], it is in nine sections (contents listed in Hammer-Purgstall, ix, 184 f.); the part of section four dealing with the Dānishmandids is translated by A. D. Mordtmann in ZDMG, xxx (1876), 468-71; section five, on the Ottomans, reaches to 1083/1672; section six, on Ancient Rome, contains a chapter on the 'sayings' of the philosophers (see H. F. v. Diez, in Denkwürdigkeiten von Asien, i, 71 ff.); section seven deals with the history of the Byzantine Empire, section eight with China, the East Indies and Ceylon, and section nine (very short) with the discovery of America. MSS are numerous: Babinger, 229-30; Ist. Küt. TCYK, i/1, no. 11; Karatay, nos. 827-33; see also B. Lewis, in Historians of the Middle East, London 1962, 186 f.). The work was used by Demetrius Cantemir (1673-1723) for his History of the growth and decay of the Othman Empire (Eng. tr. from Latin, London 1734) (see F. Babinger, in Zeki Velidi Togan'a armağan, Istanbul 1950-5, p. 56, n. 27).

(2) Talkhīṣ al-bayān fī ḳawānīn Āl ʿUthmān, a memorandum in 13 chapters, composed in 1080/1669-70, on 'good government', partly based on the treatises on the same subject by Luṭfī Pasha [q.v.] and ʿAyn-i ʿAlī and on the Dustūr al-ʿamal of Kātib Čelebi; selections ed. R. Anhegger, in TM, x (1951-3), 365-93; for the MSS, summary of contents, and refs. to Fr. and It. translations, see Babinger, 230 f., and Anhegger, 368 f.; for its place in this genre of writing, see B. Lewis, Ottoman observers of Ottoman decline, in IS, i/1 (1962), 71-87, esp. 81 f.

(3) Anīs al-ʿārifīn wa-murshid al-sālikīn, composed in 1090/1679, is a collection of moral and political precepts illustrated by anecdotes; the unique (?) MS, in the Vatican, is described in E. Rossi (Elenco ..., 76-7). (4) Djāmiʿ al-ḥikāyāt, a collection of 38 tales (Karatay, no. 2773), may be identical with (3). In the field of medicine he wrote (5) Tuḥfat al-adīb al-nāfiʿa (MS: Nuruosmaniye 3466) and (6) Lisān al-atibbāʾ fī lughat al-adwiya, an Arabic-Turkish dictionary of medical terms (see Adnan Adıvar, Osmanlı türklerinde ilim, Istanbul 1943, 137 f.). Bursalī Meḥmed Ṭāhir mentions also Fihris al-arwām (a medical dictionary, similar to (6)), a Terdjüme-i lughāt-i Hindī, and two treatises on mystical subjects, Hezārfenn being an adherent of the Naḳshbandī order.

ḤUSAYN ḤILMĪ PASHA (Hüseyin Hilmi Paşa), twice Grand Vizier of the Ottoman Empire, was born in Mitylene (Midilli) in 1855. He came from a modest background, being the son of Kütahyalīzāde Muṣṭafā Efendi, an ordinary merchant. After receiving a traditional education—first in a medrese, then in a rüshdiye (secondary school), and learning fiḳh (Islamic jurisprudence) and French from private tutors—Ḥilmī entered the local bureaucracy in 1874.

He remained in Mitylene for a further nine years and then saw service in Aydīn (1883), Syria (1885) and Baghdād (1892); he became governor (wālī) of the Yemen in 1898. In 1903 he was appointed Inspector-General of Macedonia, as one of the officials implementing the scheme to reform that province. In this post Ḥilmī won a reputation for honesty, efficiency, independence and liberal ideas, both among Europeans and among the Young Turks.

After the constitutional revolution of 1908 Ḥilmī became Minister of the Interior in Kāmil Pasha's cabinet. But as a protest against the latter's action in dismissing and appointing two ministers without consultation with his colleagues in the cabinet, Ḥilmī resigned on 30 January (O.S.)/12 February (N.S.) 1909. However, Kāmil himself was ousted from power and two days later Ḥilmī became Grand Vizier.

Ḥilmī's first term in office lasted only one month and 27 days. He resigned when an insurrection, engineered by the Liberal Union (Aḥrār Fīrḳasī) and reactionary elements against the Committee of Union and Progress (Ittiḥād we Teraḳḳī Djemʿiyeti [q.v.]), broke out on 31 March (O.S.)/13 April (N.S.) 1909. He was offered, but refused, a post in the new cabinet (Danişmend, 31 Mart vak'ası, 30-31). This insurrection was crushed by an army from Macedonia [see ḤAREKET ORDUSU] and Ḥilmī was restored to office on 22 April (O.S.)/5 May (N.S.) 1909. His second term as Grand Vizier was as inauspicious as the first. This time the Committee and the army obstructed his government, and he therefore resigned on 15/28 December 1909, after making a vain attempt to establish his independence from the Committee (Uşaklıgıl, ii, 29-30).

Ḥilmī Pasha spent the next two and a half years in the political wilderness. He made a brief return as Minister of Justice in Ghāzī Aḥmad Mukhtār Pasha's cabinet in July 1912, but resigned because he considered its anti-Unionist policy to be inexpedient while the Empire was at war with Italy and faced the threat of war with the Balkan states. He was then appointed ambassador to Vienna. It seems that the Sultan wanted to recall Ḥilmī Pasha to the Grand Vizierate after the assassination of Maḥmūd Shewket Pasha [q.v.] on 29 May/11 June 1913, but the CUP objected and their will prevailed (Danişmend, Kronoloji, 406). Ḥilmī remained in Vienna throughout the war and died there on 21 March/3 April 1922.

It has been said that Ḥilmī Pasha's career suffered because of his modest background and education (Inal, 1965). Yet the evidence hardly bears this out; he rose to high position under both the Palace and the constitutional régimes. His career was, however, handicapped by his non-partisan and independent political attitude. As Inspector-General he antagonized the Palace and the conservatives; under the new régime his political aloofness lost him the support of all groups. Ḥilmī Pasha's detachment would have been a great asset in less turbulent times, but in the chaos which followed the re-establishment of the constitution, his many talents were destined to be wasted and go unrecognized.

ḤUSAYN KĀMIL (1853-1917), Sultan of Egypt under the British Protectorate from December 1914 to October 1917. A son of Khedive Ismāʿīl [q.v.], he was born in Cairo. When he was eight years old, he entered the school at the Manyal Palace specially opened by his father for his sons and the sons of notables. In 1867, he accompanied his father to Istanbul on a visit to the Ottoman Sultan. Soon afterwards he visited Paris, and stayed at the court of Napoleon III. He returned briefly to Egypt for the official opening of the Suez Canal in 1869, after which he was sent on a diplomatic mission to Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, in Florence. In 1870, he returned to Egypt for good and was given a succession of posts in the administration. As Inspector of the Delta, he lived for a while in Ṭanṭa and supervised the improvement of irrigation canals in that area. He also served at various times in the ministries of Education, Waqfs, Public Works, Interior and Finance.

In 1879, upon the deposition of his father, Ḥusayn Kāmil went with him into exile to Naples, where he stayed for three years. He returned to Egypt after the revolt of ʿUrābī Pas̲h̲a [q.v.] in 1882.

During the reigns of Khedive Tawfīḳ (1882-92) and of his nephew Khedive ʿAbbās II (1892-1914) he devoted most of his time to his private business and agricultural interests. He served on the boards of many foreign companies such as the Delta Railways. His greatest contribution, however, was to the improvement of Egyptian agriculture. He founded the Khedivial Agricultural Society, which played an important rôle in the organization of the Ministry of Agriculture in 1913. Earlier, he had organized agricultural exhibitions in Alexandria (1896) and Cairo (1898), as well as a joint industrial-agricultural exhibition in 1900. With the help of privately subscribed funds, he opened an industrial trade school in Damanhūr. He was also active in the organization of agricultural syndicates. He served briefly as President of the Consultative Legislative Council and the General Assembly, but resigned from both in 1909 over the crisis regarding the extension of the Suez Concession. Until his appointment as Sultan of Egypt in December 1914, Ḥusayn Kāmil was occupied primarily in the management of his extensive agricultural holdings and his work for several charitable organizations such as al-D̲j̲amʿiyya al-K̲h̲ayriyya al-Islāmiyya and D̲j̲amʿiyyat al-Isʿāf.

Turkey, the suzerain power over Egypt, declared war on Great Britain in November 1914. Suspicious of the young Khedive ʿAbbās II's sympathies with Turkey and familiar with his past activities in support of anti-British nationalists in Egypt, the British authorities proceeded on 18 December 1914 to declare a Protectorate over Egypt [see ḤIMĀYA]. With this declaration, Turkish sovereignty over Egypt was for all practical purposes terminated. At the same time, Britain deposed ʿAbbās, then in Turkey, from the Khedivial throne of Egypt, and appointed Prince Ḥusayn Kāmil, the oldest male member of the family of Muḥammad ʿAlī, Sultan of Egypt.

The acceptance of the sultanate by Ḥusayn Kāmil in these conditions was, from his point of view, a dangerous political step. It met with the opposition of the nationalist elements in the country who considered Ḥusayn's acceptance of the sultanate under the conditions of a British occupation, military government, and protectorate as constituting a national humiliation. Many among them viewed his acceptance as an act of treason against the Muslim Ottoman Empire at war with infidel Britain. However, Ḥusayn's refusing the post could have endangered the survival of the ruling house in Egypt.

This situation, together with the difficulties of wartime conditions, led to a deterioration of public security in the country. A series of terrorist political acts aimed against members of the Egyptian government and the Sultan himself were committed in 1915. Both the Sultan and the wartime Egyptian government of Ḥusayn Rus̲h̲dī Pas̲h̲a were considered by the extreme nationalists as mere tools in the hands of the British occupation authorities to be used for the prosecution of the War. They were viewed, moreover, by these nationalists as having left the pale of the Islamic community and its consensus (k̲h̲arad̲j̲ū min al-id̲j̲māʿ). As greater hardships and privations caused by the necessities of war affected greater numbers of Egyptians, especially in 1916-7, so the public became increasingly alienated from this government and from the Sultan.

Soon after his assumption of the duties of Sultan, Ḥusayn Kāmil proceeded to remove the remaining vestiges and institutional manifestations of Turkish sovereignty in Egypt. Thus, when he was presiding over a meeting of the Egyptian Council of Ministers on 21 December 1914, the decision was taken to abolish the office of Ḳāḍī of Egypt (the Ḳāḍī had always been appointed by the Ottoman Sultan in Istanbul).

Yet Ḥusayn Kāmil's relations with the British authorities in Egypt were not always amicable or close. The British in Egypt looked askance at the Sultan's frequent visits to schools and institutions of higher learning, and at his tours of the provinces, suspecting that he sought to strengthen his links with a nationalist movement. The Sultan on his part felt that the material and human demands of the British military authorities and the burdens which they placed upon the country were too great and that they caused undue hardship to a poor people. Another cause of this deterioration in the relations between Ḥusayn Kāmil and the British authorities in Egypt was the frustration the Sultan experienced under the strong hand of a wartime British government, that was prompted in its policy perhaps solely by the needs of the Great War. Thus while the British disapproved of the Sultan's attempts to project the image of a popular leader, the Egyptian public disapproved of him as a tool of the British.

Ḥusayn Kāmil's health began to deteriorate in 1916; he was ill for most of 1917, and died on 9 October 1917. Earlier his son, Prince Kamāl al-Dīn Ḥusayn, had publicly renounced his right to succeed to the Egyptian throne. Thus Prince Aḥmad Fuʾād succeeded Ḥusayn Kāmil, later to become King of Egypt (1922-36) [see FUʾĀD AL-AWWAL].

ḤUSAYN AL-K̲H̲ALĪʿ [see (AL-)ḤUSAYN B. AL-ḌAḤḤĀK].

ḤUSAYN NIẒĀM S̲H̲ĀH, the third ruler of the Niẓām S̲h̲āhī sultanate of Aḥmadnagar, reg. 961-72/1554-65. He was the eldest son of Burhān I Niẓām S̲h̲āh, whose example he followed in adopting the S̲h̲īʿa forms of worship (for the political implications of this in the Deccan see NIẒĀM S̲H̲ĀHĪS); he succeeded him as al-Muʾayyad min ʿind Allāh Ḥusayn S̲h̲āh (regnal title from Burhān-i maʾāt̲h̲ir; no coins of this reign are known) without difficulty, having been able to remove other possible claimants from Aḥmadnagar city during his father's lifetine, but was soon faced with further claims on the succession from other sons of Burhān S̲h̲āh, especially ʿAbd al-Ḳādir, who had refused to accept S̲h̲īʿism and was supported by the Dakhnī faction at court. Mīrān S̲h̲āh Ḥaydar, a younger half-brother, also made an attempt to seize the throne, supported by his father-in-law Khwādja Djahān of Parendā; defeated by Ḥusayn, both eventually took refuge with the ʿĀdil Shāhī sultan in Bīdjāpur, whom they induced to attack Aḥmadnagar repeatedly. Eventually the candidature of a fourth prince for the Aḥmadnagar throne, Mīrān Shāh ʿAlī, was espoused by Ibrāhīm ʿĀdil Shāh, who also coveted the fortresses of Kaliyānī and Shōlāpur [qq.v.]. Thus began an almost constant warfare between the ʿĀdil Shāhī and the Niẓām Shāhī sultanates; the other sultanates, Barār, Golkonḍā and Bīdar, were drawn into the conflicts by one side or the other—alliances were flexible—, but more significant was the participation of the ruler of Vidjayanagara, Rām Rāy, brought in by the Bīdjāpur ruler to strengthen his hand against Aḥmadnagar. The excesses of this Hindū ruler and his troops against Islam, and his demands from his allies after each campaign, caused Muslim rivalries to be set aside, and Ḥusayn entered into an offensive alliance with the other Muslim rulers of the Deccan whereby Rām Rāy was beaten, and the Vidjayanagara empire broken up, at the battle of Tālīkōṭa [q.v.] in 972/1565; here the centre was commanded by Ḥusayn, whose courage won the day against enormous odds. Half a year later Ḥusayn died in his capital.

His whole reign was spent in almost continual warfare, mostly with Bīdjāpur, and little could be done to stabilize the internal affairs of the kingdom; he was undoubtedly a courageous and intelligent soldier, and he left behind him a reputation also for piety and justice. There is little evidence of cultural progress in Aḥmadnagar during his reign, although it is known that after the defeat of Vidjayanagara the Aḥmadnagar court was enriched by the migration of poets and painters from Hampī, encouraged no doubt by Ḥusayn's brilliant daughter Čānd Bībī.

ḤUSAYN NIẒĀM SHAH II, the fifth sultan of the dynasty, succeeded his insane father Murtaḍā I in 996/1588, after having brought about his death by confining him in an overheated bathroom. He was a drunkard, debauched and bloodthirsty, and effective power was in the hands of Mīrzā Khān the wakīl. The following year Ḥusayn was deposed in favour of his cousin Ismāʿīl.

ḤUSAYN NIẒĀM SHĀH III, the last sultan, was raised to the throne in 1041/1632 as a boy of ten by the Ḥabshī Fatḥ Khān. He was captured by the Mughals in the fall of Aḥmadnagar and imprisoned in Gwāliyar.

DELI ḤUSAYN PASHA (d. 1069/1659), Ottoman general, was probably born at Yeñishehir (near Bursa). While serving in the Palace as a balṭadjī [q.v.], he attracted the attention of Murād IV by a display of physical strength (Naʿīmā, vi, 399 f.); he became an intimate (muḳarreb) of the Sultan and rose to be first Küčük and then Büyük Mīr-akhōr (Grand Master of the Horse, see MĪR-AKHŌR). On 4 Muḥarram 1044/30 June 1634 he was appointed Grand Admiral (Ḳapudān Pasha [q.v.]), with the rank of vizier, and as such was present on the Erivan (Rewān [q.v.]) campaign of 1045/1635. On the way back, at Diyārbekr, he was appointed governor of Egypt (Djumādā 1045/October 1635, see Ṣolaḳzāde, 763). He was recalled in Rabīʿ I 1047/July-August 1637, charged with maladministration, and his property was confiscated (Silāḥdār, Taʾrīkh, i, 179); but he soon recovered his old influence over the Sultan, who, on the march to Baghdād (1048/1638), appointed him beglerbegi of Anadolu. He distinguished himself during the siege, and after the army's return to Istanbul Murād IV made him a "vizier of the dome" (ḳubbe wezīri [q.v.]) in order that he might continue to enjoy his company. Engaging in the intrigues at the capital he helped to procure the fall of (Ṭabanī-yaṣṣī) Meḥmed Pasha [q.v.], whom he succeeded as ḳāʾimmaḳām ([q.v.], deputy of the Grand Vizier) on 20 Shaʿbān 1049/16 December 1639 (Naʿīmā, iii, 421 ff.). He prudently avoided any action which might arouse the hostility of the Grand Vizier, Kemānkesh Ḳara Muṣṭafā Pasha, and upon the accession of Sultan Ibrāhīm was again appointed Ḳapudān Pasha, in Shawwāl 1049/February 1640 (Kātib Čelebi, Fedhleke, ii, 221), and seven months later military governor of Oczakow (Özi [q.v.]). In 1051/1641 he was in command at the unsuccessful siege of Azov (Azaḳ [q.v.]), then held by the Cossacks. He was thereafter appointed in succession wālī of Bosnia (Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 1051/February 1642), Baghdād (in 1054/1644), and Budin (from Shaʿbān 1054/October 1644).

After the outbreak of the war with Venice he was sent to Crete as muḥāfiẓ of the fortress of Canea (Khānya), where he landed on 15 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 1055/2 January 1645. On the death of the Ottoman commander-in-chief in Djumādā II 1056/August 1646, Ḥusayn Pasha was appointed to succeed him. Before the year was out he captured the important town of Rhethymnos/Resmo, and next spring (Rabīʿ I 1057/April 1647) he embarked on the investment of Candia [see ḲANDIYA], which was to last 22 years. During his thirteen years in Crete he distinguished himself by his personal courage and prudently sought to win over the Greek population of the island. On 2 Djumādā I 1066/28 February 1656 Ḥusayn Pasha was appointed Grand Vizier and the seal of office was despatched to him, but the appointment was cancelled as a result of the Janissary mutiny a week later (the so-called Čınar Waḳʿası, see MEḤEMMED IV), and in late 1068/middle of 1658 Ḥusayn Pasha was recalled from the command in Crete. The Grand Vizier Köprülü Meḥmed Pasha, hoping to rid himself of a popular rival, alleged that he had misappropriated military funds and shown lack of energy in the siege of Ḳāndiya, but Ḥusayn Pasha's own supporters procured his appointment, for the third time, as Ḳapudān Pasha (14 Shawwāl 1068/15 July 1658). On 7 Rabīʿ I 1069/3 December 1658 he was made beglerbegi of Rūmeli, but within weeks, as a result of the intrigues of his enemies, was recalled to Istanbul to face a charge of extortion; he was imprisoned in Yedi-ḳule and executed.

ʿAMŪDJA-ZĀDE ḤUSAYN PASHA (d. 1114/1702), Ottoman Grand Vizier, was a nephew of Köprülü Meḥmed Pasha [see KÖPRÜLÜ], his nickname ʿAmūdja-zāde, T. ʿAmdja-zāde "uncle's son", being given to him by his cousin Fāḍil Aḥmed Pasha. He was present on the campaign against Vienna in 1094/1683 (Silāḥdār, Taʾrīkh, ii, 67), but after the defeat and execution of the Grand Vizier Ḳara Muṣṭafā Pasha he, with other officials, was sent under guard to the Porte (op. cit., ii, 123); he was appointed governor of Shehr-i Zūr (op. cit., ii, 125), but very soon afterwards was transferred as military governor (muḥāfiẓ) of Čardaḳ, opposite Gallipoli. In Shaʿbān 1100/May 1689 he was appointed muḥāfiẓ, with the rank of vizier, of Sedd al-Baḥr at the entrance to the Dardanelles (op. cit., ii, 433). In Shaʿbān 1102/May 1691 he was summoned to Istanbul to act as ḳāʾimmaḳām ([q.v.], deputy for the Grand Vizier) (op. cit., ii, 570); in Djumādā I 1103/January-February 1692 he was dismissed and sent back to his Dardanelles post, but was recalled to serve as ḳāʾimmaḳām again from Djumādā I-Shawwāl 1105/January-June 1694 (op. cit., ii, 738).

In Djumādā I 1106/December 1694 he was appointed Ḳapudān Pasha (Grand Admiral) and ordered to proceed immediately to recover Chios (T. Saḳïz [q.v.]), recently occupied by the Venetians (Ṣafwet, Ḳapudān Mazamorṭa Ḥusayn Pasha, Istanbul 1327, 87 f., 93 ff.; Silâhdar Fındıklılı Mehmet Ağa, Nusretnâme, ed. I. Parmaksızoğlu, i/1, Istanbul 1962, 10). In two engagements fought off the Ḳoyun Adaları (Spalmadori Islands) in the Bay of Chios in Djumādā II-Radjab 1106/February 1695 he defeated the Venetians, who immediately abandoned the island (M. Galibert, Histoire de Venise, Paris 1847, 431 f.; Nusretnâme, i/1, 11-18). At the end of Ramaḍān 1106/May 1695, Ḥusayn Pasha was appointed muḥāfiẓ of Chios, but a few months later (in Rabīʿ I 1107/November 1695) was sent as governor to Adana and after one year (in Rabīʿ I 1108/September-October 1696) he appears as muḥāfiẓ of Belgrade. The advice which he gave in the council of war held there in Muḥarram 1109/August 1697 was overridden; but after the disastrous battle of Zenta [q.v.] and the death of the Grand Vizier (Elmās) Meḥmed Pasha [q.v.], Muṣṭafā II summoned him to the Ottoman camp to succeed him.

Next year, while the peace negotiations were proceeding at Carlowicz [see KARLOFČA], Ḥusayn Pasha remained with the army at Belgrade, prepared for action in case of a breakdown in the discussions. After the conclusion of peace (Radjab 1110/January 1699), Ḥusayn Pasha remained in office for less than three years: the growing influence over the Sultan of Fayḍ Allāh Efendi [see MUṢṬAFĀ II] and his own poor health led him to resign office on 11 Rabīʿ II 1114/4 September 1702. He retired to his estate at Silivri, where he died very shortly afterwards (29 Rabīʿ II/22 September).

The sources agree that Ḥusayn Pasha was an honest and efficient statesman (P. Lucas, Voyage au Levant, The Hague 1709, ii, 154; Marquis de Bonnac, Mém. hist. sur l'ambassade de France à Constantinople, ed. C. Schefer, Paris 1894, 114, 116) and a patron of learning (to whom Naʿīmā [q.v.] dedicated his History). His summer residence (yalï) at Anadolu Ḥiṣār (see H. Saladin and R. Mesguich, Le yali des Keupruli à Anatoli-Hissar, Paris 1915), the oldest surviving wooden residence of Istanbul, forms one of the sights of the Bosphorus. He built a mosque and a medrese at Sarādjkhāne in Istanbul (Ḥadīḳat al-djawāmiʿ, i, 91 f.), beside which he is buried; the library of this foundation (456 MSS) is now kept at the Süleymaniye.

(ORHAN F. KÖPRÜLÜ)

ḤUSAYN PASHA (KÜČÜK ḤÜSEYIN PASHA) (1758-1803), Ottoman Ḳapudān Pasha of Circassian origin. Since he was 46 years old at his death in 1803, he must have been born in 1758. He was presented to Sultan Muṣṭafā III by the Silāḥdār Ibrāhīm Pasha, in 1181/1767-8. Although it has been asserted that he was the foster-brother of Selīm III (Kharīṭa-i Ḳapudānān-i deryā, 105), it seems more likely that his first duty in the palace was in the service of Prince Meḥmed (b. 1767), the brother of Selīm III (Wāṣif, Taʾrīkh, MS Ali Emiri (Millet Kütüp.) 609, fol. 197a; Djewdet, Taʾrīkh, vii, 266).

Küčük Ḥüseyin was for a long period one of the servants of the sultan's Privy Chamber and was then transferred to the treasury department. On the day of Selīm III's accession (7 April 1789), he was transferred to the Privy Chamber as chamberlain (mābeyndji) and six months later became Head Valet (Bash čoḳadār). Attracting the attention of Selīm III during the course of the discussions with the French Ambassador, Sébastiani, and Isḥāḳ Pasha about the establishment of the "New Order" (Niẓām-i djedīd [q.v.]) Ḥüseyin Agha was appointed Lord High Admiral with the rank of vizier in place of Giridli Ḥüseyin Pasha on 10 March 1792. On 29 May 1792 he married Esmā Sulṭān, the daughter of ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd I.

During the twelve years in which Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha held the office of Ḳapudān Pasha, he strove to reform the Ottoman navy. He brought about a classification of the flagships, an increase in captains' salaries, an ordering of the hierarchy of ranks, a system for the education of non-commissioned officers, who remained on the ships in the winter season, the creation of a body of skilled workmen and the training of captains in navigation and naval science. With the help of English and French engineers and technicians he endeavoured to make the Ottoman navy and dockyards comparable to those in Europe. For all this he has been accounted the founder of the new Ottoman fleet.

Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha is remembered also for the struggle which he waged against the Mediterranean pirates, who molested Turkish merchantmen and from time to time attacked the western Anatolian coasts. He set out with the fleet in spring 1792 to the Aegean for the purpose of bringing to account Lambro Canziani (Katsoni), a Knight of St. George, who was operating in the Mediterranean with 15 ships. Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha intended to catch him at Lagia (Porte-Kale). His first encounter on this expedition was with one of the pirates, Kara-Katzanis (Ḳaraḳačan), in the neighbourhood of the islands of Milos (Değirmenlik) and Hydra (Čamlïdja) (Nejat Göyünč, Kapdan-i derya Kücük Hüseyin Paşa, in Tarih Dergisi, ii/3-4 (1952), 35-50). Having taken prisoner Kara-Katzanis and 23 of the pirates with him, he then blockaded Lambro on the coast of Maina in the Morea, but was unable to take the pirate chieftain, who escaped to the island of Cerigo (Čuha). Finally, at the end of September 1792, he returned to Istanbul with some pirate ships, equipment and prisoners. Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha pursued these activities in the Mediterranean until the autumn of 1797. During the course of the battles with the corsairs of Malta in the neighbourhood of Crete, he attacked many of the small islands as well.

Although Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha was much in favour with the sultan and the people, his harsh, rough temperament annoyed the Grand Vizier ʿIzzet Meḥmed Pasha and certain other leading men, who procured that he was sent away from Istanbul, as commander of the forces at Vidin against the rebel Pāzvandoghlu ʿOthmān [q.v.] (10 April 1798). Under his command on this expedition were some of the leading men of Anatolia, such as Ḳara ʿOthmānoghlu and Djabbār-zāde, as well as the wālīs of Rumelia and Anatolia, and Tepedelenli ʿAlī Pasha. Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha first captured the places in the vicinity of Vidin which had fallen into the hands of Pāzvandoghlu and finally besieged Vidin itself, both by land and, with a small fleet, from the Danube. He met with unexpected resistance, however, and through lack of men and supplies and inability to receive money in time, he failed to bring the siege to a successful conclusion. Finally, when Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha was himself wounded and no longer able to prosecute the siege of Vidin because of the French landing in Egypt, Pāzvandoghlu ʿOthmān offered his submission to the Ottoman government. Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha then returned to Istanbul. He sailed to Alexandria, with the fleet which he had prepared, in the summer of 1799. Although not showing much activity at first, he joined with the British fleet in the next year in transferring troops to Egypt; and following the signing of the agreement of 20 June 1801, whereby the French were to evacuate Egypt, he entered Cairo on 10 July 1801. He caused the khuṭba to be read in the name of Selīm III and was active in the punishment of some Mamlūk beys. Although this latter activity lead to coolness in his relations with some of the British admirals, the affair was closed by his return to Istanbul.

Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha went out on Mediterranean campaigns in 1802 and 1803, but in November of the latter year illness forced him to return to Istanbul. He died on 7 December 1803, in the residence of Esmā Sulṭān at Ḳuručeshme on the Bosphorus, and was buried by the tomb of Mihrishāh Wālide Sulṭān in Eyyūb. His epitaph was written by the chronicler Wāṣif Efendi. Küčük Ḥüseyin Pasha built a fountain (česhme) in Ḳāsimpasha in 1797.

AGHA ḤUSAYN PASHA, Ottoman vizier noted for his leadership in the suppression of the Janissaries in 1826, was born at Edirne in 1190/1776-7. His father, Ḥādjdjī Muṣṭafā, believed to be from Rusčuk [q.v.], moved to Bender [q.v.], where Ḥusayn enlisted in the 9th Janissary bölük [q.v.] and reached Istanbul in 1203/1788-9. He had begun his career as a porter, then took part in the campaign against Russia in 1807-12. Ḥusayn became an usta (sergeant) and associated with (Silāḥdār) ʿAlī Pasha, who recommended Ḥusayn to Maḥmūd II between 1811 and 1817 when ʿAlī was the sultan's swordbearer (Djewdet, Taʾrīkh, xii, 72; Sidjill-i ʿOthmānī, ii, 561-2). Thanks to ʿAlī Pasha's influence and despite the enmity of Ḥālet Efendi [q.v.], Ḥusayn became zaghardji bashi [q.v.] and colonel of the 64th regiment, i.e., the third most senior of the Janissaries, on 23 Ṣafar 1238/10 November 1822, three days before Ḥālet Efendi's dismissal. Benefiting from Maḥmūd II's promotion of trustworthy officers, he rose to be ḳul ketkhudāsi on 10 Rabīʿ II 1238/25 December 1822 and Agha (commander) of the Janissaries on 14 Djumādā II 1238/26 February 1823. Ḥusayn had great influence as Agha during the Grand Vizierate of his patron Silāḥdār ʿAlī Pasha (from 10 March-13 December 1823). He soon banished, retired or executed many subversive Janissaries, and won others to his cause. Made a Vizier for these services in the autumn of 1823, he became known as Agha Pasha. To shield him from reprisals by the Janissaries, Maḥmūd II replaced him as Agha on 20 Ṣafar 1239/26 October 1823, and appointed him governor of Bursa and Kodjaeli and commander of the European Bosphorus forts, so that he was available nearby in case of need.

Ḥusayn strongly supported reform, including Maḥmūd II's abortive Eshkindji [q.v.] reorganization of the Janissaries in May-June 1826. He led the loyal artillerymen and infantry who quickly shattered the resistance of the Janissaries along Dīwān Yolu and at their barracks in Et Meydānī, and finally put an end to their uprising on Thursday 15 June 1826.

Ḥusayn, retaining his positions, also became serʿasker [q.v.] of the new army (ʿasākir-i manṣūre-i muḥammadiyye) whose formation was decreed simultaneously with the Janissaries' abolition on 11 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 1241/17 June 1826. Replaced as serʿasker by Khusrew Pasha [q.v.] on 9 May 1827, Ḥusayn regained command on 20 May 1828 and set out with the new army for the Russian front four days later. He defended his headquarters at Shumla, but was unable to prevent the loss of the forts of the lower Danube to Russia. Reshid Meḥmed Pasha took command in the spring of 1829, when Ḥusayn became muḥāfiẓ (fortress commander) of Rusčuk, then governor of Edirne. He was again serʿasker (with the style of "governor of Egypt, Abyssinia and Crete") from 12 April to 31 August 1832, but was dismissed after his forces were defeated by Ibrāhīm Pasha [q.v.] of Egypt at Ḥimṣ on 8-9 July and at the Baylān [q.v.] pass on 29 July 1832. As he was friendly with Milosh of Serbia, he served twice as muḥāfiẓ of Vidin, from 4 August 1833 to early February 1844, and from October 1846 until his death on 25 April 1849. In October 1839 Ḥusayn sought his guest H. von Moltke's advice on new fortifications there. After 1878, his son ʿAlī Shewket Pasha had his remains removed from the fortress of Vidin and reburied in the Topkapu cemetery in Istanbul.

Ḥusayn was powerfully built, fearless and intelligent, and, despite his illiteracy, favoured reform. Among the buildings he commissioned are the Serʿaskerate fire tower (now in the grounds of Istanbul University), military hospitals in Edirne and Vidin, a fountain in Khāṣṣköy, a stone clock tower at Mirgūn, the water system and a stone bridge at Shumla, and a mosque and school in Silistre.

(H. A. REED)

ḤĀDJDJĪ ḤUSAYN PASHA, known as MEZZOMORTO, Algerian corsair and Ottoman admiral (d. 1113/1701); he owes his Italian nickname "half-dead" (in Turkish 'mezemorṭa') to the fact that as a young man he had been wounded, apparently fatally, in a sea-fight with the Spaniards.

Nothing certain is known about his origin: according to A. de La Motraye (Voyages, La Haye 1727, i, 206) he was born in Majorca. He first appears, as a well-known corsair, in 1674 (Grammont, *Relations entre la France et la Régence d'Alger au XVII*e siècle, Algiers 1955, 52), and gradually made himself one of the most prominent figures of Algiers. When the French fleet under Duquesne bombarded Algiers in the summer of 1683, Ḥusayn, with other corsair captains, was handed over as a hostage by the Dey (dayî) Baba Ḥasan, but he persuaded the French admiral to send him back on shore. He led an insurrection against Baba Ḥasan, killed him, and had himself elected Dey. Opening fire on the French fleet, he obliged Duquesne to raise the blockade; in 1684 he made peace with Louis XIV (Grammont, 83; E. Plantet, Correspondance des Deys d'Alger avec la cour de France, 1579-1833, Paris 1889, 84; Zinkeisen, GOR, v, 51 f.).

In 1686 the Ottoman government summoned him, as beglerbegi of Algiers, to send ships for the campaign in the Morea. The peace with France was soon broken, and when the French fleet bombarded Algiers again in 1688, Ḥusayn retaliated by attacking the French coasts and shipping. In 1689, the Porte had decided to appoint Ḥusayn Pasha Grand Admiral of the Ottoman fleet (Ḳapudan Pasha [q.v.]); but before the summons reached Algiers, Ḥusayn Pasha's power there had been seriously shaken by internal dissensions; he was obliged to flee to Tunis, and thence to Istanbul (and the post of Ḳapudan Pasha was given to Mîṣîrlîzāde Ibrāhīm Pasha).

In 1101/1690 Ḥusayn Pasha was appointed to command the Danube fleet, with orders to support the operations for the recovery of Vidin [q.v.]; he later commanded in the Black Sea; and in 1104/1691, a time when anxiety was growing over the threat of Venetian action in the Aegean, was made sandjaḳ-begi of Rhodes, with command of the Imperial galleons (ḳalyūn). When in 1106/1694 the Venetians occupied Chios (Turkish: Saḳîz [q.v.]), Ḥusayn Pasha played a prominent part in the two engagements (Radjab 1106/February 1695) which led to the recovery of the island (Ṣafwet, Ḳoyun Adalarî öñündeki deñiz ḥarbi ve Saḳîzîñ ḳurtarîlîshî, in TOEM, i/3 (1326), 150-77).

In Ramaḍān 1106/May 1695 Ḥusayn Pasha was rewarded with the post of Ḳapudan Pasha, in succession to (ʿAmūdjazāde) Ḥusayn Pasha [q.v.] (Silâhdar Fındıklılı Mehmet Ağa, Nusretnâme, ed. I. Parmaksızoğlu, i/1, Istanbul 1962, 28-9), and turned all his efforts to the expulsion of the Venetians from the Aegean: in Ṣafar 1107/September 1695 he defeated, off Lesbos (Midilli), a Venetian fleet bound for Chios and Cos; in the course of operations in the Morea in 1696 he brought the Venetian fleet to battle between Andros and Euboea; on 15 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 1108/5 July 1697 he defeated a Venetian fleet under Alessandro Molino off Tenedos and again, on 14 Ṣafar 1109/3 September 1697, off Andros. On 15 Rabīʿ I 1110/21 September 1698 he brought the Venetian fleet under Giacomo Cornaro to battle off Lesbos: Western sources (Zinkeisen, GOR, v, 183) depict the engagement as a Venetian, Turkish sources (Silāḥdār; Rāshid, ii, 440) as an Ottoman victory.

Ḥusayn Pasha did not live long after the conclusion of the peace of Carlowitz: in 1113/1701 (the exact date is uncertain; his successor as Ḳapudan Pasha, ʿAbd al-Fettāḥ Pasha, was appointed in Rabīʿ I 1113/August 1701) he died on the island of Paros and was buried on Chios (Istanbul, Başvekâlet Arşivi, Mühimme defteri no. 111, p. 644; A. de La Motraye, i, 210).

Ḥusayn Pasha's services to the Ottoman Empire were not confined to the winning of battles; he also played an important part in the reform and strengthening of the Ottoman fleet and in the regularizing of the naval service by a code of regulations (ḳānūn-nāme) which he drew up (see I. H. Uzunçarşılı, Osmanlı devletinin merkez ve bahriye teşkilatı, Ankara 1948, 498-9, 523, etc.).

ḤUSAYN RAḤMĪ, in modern Turkish Hüseyin Rahmi Gürpinar (1864-1944), Turkish novelist and short story writer, who although outside all the literary currents and movements of his time, remained the most popular writer from the 1890's until the late 1920's.

Ḥusayn Raḥmī was born in the Ayaspaşa quarter of Istanbul on 17 August 1864, the son of Meḥmed Saʿīd Pasha, an aide to Sultan ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. The family came originally from Aydîn. He lost his mother at the age of three, when his father was serving in Crete. He attended primary and secondary schools in Istanbul and later the Makhredj-i aḳlām, where government clerks were trained. At the same time he was taught French by a private tutor. In 1878 he entered the School for Political Science (Mülkiye), but left after two years because of ill-health. He became a government official and served in the Ministries of Justice and Public Works until 1908, when he resigned to devote all his time to literature. In 1912 he moved to Heybeliada, where later he built a villa from the income of his novels (an unprecedented event in the Turkish world of letters); there he lived a secluded life until his death in 1944, interrupted only by a trip to Egypt in 1933 and by occasional periods in Ankara, where he was a deputy between 1936-43.

Ḥusayn Raḥmī began his first experiments as a writer at the age of twelve and saw his first writing in print at the age of twenty (Bir genč ḳîzîñ āvāze-i shikāyeti, in Djerīde-i Ḥawādith, of 24 November 1884). He published his first short story, Istanbulda bir Frenk in the same paper, on 29 November 1889.

He wrote his first novel Shîḳ in 1886 and sent the first part to Aḥmed Midḥat, the leading popular novelist, publicist and journalist of the time, who immediately recognized his talent and invited him, by a flattering open letter published in his newspaper Terdjümān-i Ḥaḳīḳat, to come and see him in his office. He urged him to complete the novel, which was serialized in the newspaper in 1887 and then published in book form in 1889. Aḥmed Midḥat took him onto the staff of his newspaper and the young writer began to fill the columns of the paper with a flood of articles (mainly didactic), short stories and novels, mostly translated from the French (Paul Bourget, Emile Gaboriau, Paul de Kock, etc.). In 1894 Ḥusayn Raḥmī left the Terdjümān-i Ḥaḳīḳat and joined the staff of the Iḳdām, where several of his novels were to be serialized.

After the publication of his novel Mürebbiye in 1897 in Iḳdām his distinct literary personality was recognized by the critics and his popularity was secured. This occurred, strangely enough, just at the time when the exclusive and fashionable Therwet-i Fünūn [q.v.] literary movement with its slogan 'art for art's sake' was at its zenith.

Ḥusayn Raḥmī is the author of some 40 novels, several volumes of short stories, a few minor plays and a number of translations. Most of his articles, polemics, criticisms and a few short stories and novels published in various newspapers have not yet appeared in book form. His major novels, typical of his genre are: (1) Shîḳ (The Snob, 1888), his first novel, a sketch on the type of some of his later novels (nos. 4, 6, 8) where the 'Westernizing snob', the blind imitator of European manners and customs, is ridiculed; (2) ʿIffet (1897), the story of a well educated young girl who, falling into great poverty, struggles to save her honour in the face of most difficult circumstances; (3) Muṭallaḳa (The Divorcee, 1898, German translation Die Geschiedene by Imhoff Pascha, 1907), describes the tragic consequences of chronic quarrels between a daughter-in-law and her mother-in-law; (4) Mürebbiye (The Governess, 1898): Dehrī Efendi, a retired civil servant and a blind admirer of 'Western ways of life' hires a Frenchwoman to 'educate' his two sons and his grandson. She settles in his sea-side villa and soon dominates and disrupts the whole household by seducing all the male members of the family, ending up with Dehrī Efendi himself; (5) Bir Muʿādele-i Sewdā (A Love Equation, 1899) is a strong social criticism directed against the traditional custom of parents choosing their future sons- and daughters-in-law without regard for their children's wishes; (6) Metres (The Mistress, 1900), another satire against 'Westernizing snobs' of the turn of the century with the unusual inclusion of a woman snob; (7) Teṣādüf (Chance Meeting, 1900) exposes with satirical humour all the tricks of the traditional fortune-teller who used to pester the lower and lower-middle class families of Istanbul; (8) Shîpsevdi (Always in Love, serialised partly in Iḳdām in 1901, suspended by the censor, published in full in Ṣabāḥ in 1908, first published in book form 1912, German translation Der Liebeskranke Bey by Muhsiné, 1916) usually considered his masterpiece, is a further development of the theme already treated in his earlier novels. This is a powerful character study of a snob. Meftūn Bey is a flippant young man. On his father's death, his rich uncle sends him to Paris, where he learns only to live the life of Parisian idlers. When his uncle dies, he has to rush to Istanbul, to be the head of a crowded konak in the country. He immediately begins to reorganize the house alla franca ('Alafranga' was the original title of the novel when it was first partly serialized in Iḳdām in 1901) and to re-educate the whole houshold, imposing on them European dress, food, manners, etc.; (9) Ghūl Yabānī (The Ogre, 1912) and (10) Djadî (The Witch, 1912), both satirizing the superstitious beliefs and naive credulity of some people of the period; (11) Tebessüm-i Elem (A Sad Smile, serialization in Iḳdām suspended in 1914, published in book form 1923), an interesting analysis of awkward relations between men and women of the period; (12) Son Ārzū (The Last Wish, 1918), the unhappy life of a young girl forced to marry a man she does not love; (13) Djehennemlik (The Damned, 1919), against the marrying of young girls to elderly men; (14) Ḥaḳḳa Sîghîndîk (God Preserve Us!, 1919), the sufferings of the lower and lower-middle classes during the years of the 1914-18 War in Istanbul; (15) Tutushmush Gönüller (Hearts Aflame, 1922) and (16) Billūr Ḳalb (A Heart of Crystal, 1924), both on the problem of the emancipation of women in post-war Istanbul; (17) Meykhānede Ḥanîmlar (Ladies in a Tavern, 1924), a warning against the 'excesses and misunderstanding' of the emancipation of women; (18) Ben Deli Miyim? (Am I Mad?, 1925) where most of the controversial philosophical topics of the post-war period are discussed; (19) Utanmaz Adam (The Shameless Man, 1930), a social satire in the form of a character study of a man who succeeds in life by completely ignoring all rules of the moral code.

Ḥusayn Rahmī's short stories (about 70) have been collected in eight volumes.

Ḥusayn Raḥmī occupies a unique place in the history of pre-Republican Turkish literature. Unlike most of his contemporaries he did not follow any earlier Turkish or French model; but assimilating very soon various influences he developed a powerful independent literary personality. As an admirer of the prolific popular writer Aḥmed Midḥat (1844-1912) he owes a great deal in his narrative technique, conversation, imitation of the minorities, handling of certain episodes, even for the preference of certain topics, to the traditions of the Turkish popular arts and literature (i.e. karagöz, meddāḥ, ṭulūʿāt technique in ortaoyunu and folk tales of various kinds). Whereas in Aḥmed Midḥat these elements are used freely and loosely with a mixture of such French influences as Alexandre Dumas père, Ḥusayn Raḥmī polishes them and assimilates them for his own purpose, blending them successfully with the technique of the French realists and naturalists, particularly Maupassant and Zola. This combination of the cólourful Turkish popular tradition of story telling, the careful study of the naturalist technique, an accurate observation of the life and types of Istanbul lower and lower-middle class families, a penetrating analysis of the burning social problems of his time, an acute sense of humour and satire, made Ḥusayn Raḥmī the most original of all Turkish novelists until the 1930's.

Ḥusayn Raḥmī's novels and short stories are almost of documentary value. The everyday life of families and individuals and their development witnin the disintegrating Ottoman society and all the social problems arising from the impact of western ideas and customs are meticulously studied, with the addition of humorous, satirical and grotesque elements. The tendency to imitate blindly everything Western, the inferiority complex vis-à-vis Europe, the demoralizing influence of Levantine Beyoğlu (Pera), and social problems of every type are all treated many times in his works.

Ḥusayn Raḥmī's technique is unequal. Most of his novels consist of a series of powerful sketches loosely connected by (mostly irrelevant) passages of philosophical or didactic remarks and observations which rather spoil the unity of the narrative. This is the only important weakness in the manner of Aḥmed Midḥat which he has not been able to cast out. His style, too, although much more polished than that of Aḥmed Midḥat, suffers from the same defect: when he reproduces direct speech he is masterly. He uses the most natural, fluent spoken Turkish, but when he begins to argue or elaborates some social or philosophical theory he falls back to the type of flowery style which he himself condemned in his various writings. However, he noticed this shortcoming in the 1920's, after the triumph of the 'New Language' movement and, like most of his contemporaries, began to simplify the style of his novels and short stories in their later editions. His complete works are being edited with some alterations in the language, in the light of recent changes, and there are signs that a revival of Ḥusayn Raḥmī's popularity is possible in spite of the radical change in theme and scope in the Turkish novel since the 1930's.

ḤUSAYN SHĀH (1), Sayyid al-Sādāt ʿALĀʾ AL-DĪN Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Shāh Ḥusayn Sulṭān (to quote his full titles) B. AL-SAYYID ASHRAF AL-ḤUSAYNĪ AL-MAKKĪ, the founder of the Ḥusayn-Shāhī dynasty of Bengal, claimed descent from the Sharīfs of Mecca. His father migrated from Tirmidh [q.v.] and settled in Rāḍh, a small village in the district of Čāndpūr, where he received his education from the local ḳāḍī, whose daughter he later married. After completing his education he entered the service of the Ḥabshī Sultan Shams al-Dīn Muẓaffar Shāh (reg. 897/1491-899/1493) and by dint of his ability and personal character rose to the rank of minister. Leading a revolt against his tyrannical master, he succeeded in defeating and killing him after a four-month siege of the fortress of Gaur (cf. Niẓām al-Dīn Aḥmad, Ṭabaḳāt-i Akbarī, Bibl. Ind., iii, 270; Firishta's statement (Lucknow ed., ii, 585) that Muẓaffar Shāh perished in a sortie from the citadel is not supported by other authorities). On Muẓaffar's death in 899/1493 he succeeded to the throne of Bengal. For reasons of state he transferred his capital from Gaur to Ikdālā, and commenced his reign by ruthlessly punishing refractory soldiers, 12,000 of whom were said to have been put to the sword (cf. Riyāḍ al-salāṭīn, 132). Next he disbanded and dispersed the payks, i.e., the Hindu palace-guards, who had grown insolent and unreliable and were suspected of having secret loyalties to the fallen royal family whom they had long served. He then turned to the next possible danger to the throne, the ḥabshīs, who had grown unruly and powerful during the previous régime, and banished them from his kingdom. In 900/1495 Ḥusayn Shāh Sharḳī [q.v.] of Djawnpūr, on his final defeat by Sikandar Lōdī (reg. 894-923/1517), fled from his retreat in Bihār and sought refuge in Bengal, whose ruler was his kinsman. The Sharḳī Sultan was hospitably received by Ḥusayn Shāh and lived at Kahlgāōṅ (Colgong) in retirement till his death in 905/1500. Ḥusayn Shāh shrewdly forestalled a possible invasion of Bengal by Sikandar Lōdī by entering into a non-aggression pact with the invader. The work of internal consolidation over, he embarked on a campaign of conquest in 904/1498 against the neighbouring kingdoms of Kāmrūp and Assam, which were both soon overwhelmed. He then extended his dominions as far as Orissa (the exact date of its conquest is yet to be established). An enlightened and liberal ruler, he treated his Hindu subjects with generosity and appointed many of them to high offices. He built mosques, alms-houses, madrasas and other buildings of public utility, for whose maintenance he created endowments. He "was unquestionably the best, if not the greatest of the medieval rulers of Bengal ... and had almost become a national institution...". He died in 926/1519 and was succeeded by his son Nuṣrat Shāh.

ḤUSAYN SHĀH (2), b. Maḥmūd Shāh Sharḳī (reg. 840/1436-862/1458) was the last of the line of the Sharḳī Sultans of the independent kingdom of Djawnpūr [q.v.], who ascended the throne in 863/1458 after the death, in an armed conflict, of his elder brother Muḥammad Shāh, at that time engaged in hostilities against Buhlōl Lōdī [q.v.], the king of Delhi. Ḥusayn, immediately on his accession, concluded a four-year truce with Buhlōl. He utilized the respite by leading a powerful army into Tirhut and Orissa, both of which he reduced, compelling the Hindu ruler of Orissa to pay a huge ransom. In 871/1466 he laid siege to the fortress of Gwāliyar [q.v.] held by the Rādjpūt prince Mān Singh, who also purchased peace by paying an indemnity. Urged by his favourite queen Bībī Khʷunza (not Djalīla, as given by the Camb. Hist. of Ind., iii, 231, 255, which is a misreading for ḥalīla, cf. Firishta, Lucknow ed., ii, 602), entitled Malika-i Djahān, a daughter of the fugitive Sayyid king of Delhi, 'Alā' al-Dīn, to regain her father's lost possessions, he marched against Delhi in 878/1473, taking advantage of Buhlōl's absence in the Pandjāb. Buhlōl, his army vastly outnumbered, sued for peace, but this offer was contemptuously rejected by Ḥusayn. In the ensuing conflict the scales turned against him and he had to flee for his life, the ladies of his ḥarīm, including the queen, falling into the hands of the victor. In order to avenge his defeat he attacked Eṭāwah, held by Ḳuṭb Khān Lōdī, in 879/1474. He again suffered defeat; a third attempt met with the same fate. In 883/1479 Ḥusayn by his skilful military tactics succeeded in defeating the Lōdīs. But while the victorious army was retreating, Buhlōl fell upon it from behind and compelled Ḥusayn to cede Kāṅplī, Paṭiālī and certain other towns in the Doāb. Smarting under the blow Ḥusayn soon after engaged Buhlōl at Sunhar (dist. Eṭāwa) in 892/1486 but suffered a crushing defeat. Djawnpūr was captured and entrusted first to Mubārak Khān and later to Buhlōl's son Bārbak Shāh. In utter despair Ḥusayn had to flee into Bihar, closely pursued by Buhlōl, who chased him as far as Haldī on the Ganges. From his retreat in Bihar he continued to indulge in intrigues trying to sow discord between Bārbak Shāh, who held Djawnpūr, and his brother Sikandar Lōdī [q.v.], who now occupied the throne of Delhi. Sikandar, however, outmanoeuvred and overcame Bārbak, who was taken captive, and absorbed his principality into the Lōdī kingdom of Delhi. Ḥusayn, losing all hope of recovering his lost possessions, repaired to Kahlgāōṅ (Colgong) in Bengal where he continued to enjoy the protection and hospitality of his relative the Pūrbī Sultan, 'Alā' al-Dīn Ḥusayn Shāh [q.v.], as Firishta calls him, till his death in 905/1500. With him the Sharḳī line of kings of the independent kingdom of Djawnpūr came to a close. In accordance with his will, his coffin was transferred to Djawnpūr and interred in the family grave-yard, within the khānḳāh of Shaykh 'Īsā Tādj b. Aḥmad 'Īsā, close to the Great Mosque of Djawnpūr "al-Djāmi' al-Sharḳ". This mosque, completed during Ḥusayn Shāh's reign in 852/1448, is the best specimen of Sharḳī architecture.

A liberal patron of the fine arts, Ḥusayn Shāh was himself a great musician. He is credited with having invented the melody known in Indian musical terminology as the Khayāl, in addition to many other compositions, e.g., Djawnpūrī Tōḍī, Djawnpūrī Basant, Djawnpūrī Asāwrī, Ḥusaynī Kānhṛa. His skill and proficiency in music, both instrumental and vocal, earned him the title of Nā'ik, i.e., a master musician (cf. Ta'rīkh Shīrāz-i Hind Djawnpūr, 548-55).

ḤUSAYN SHĀH ARGHŪN (also known as Mīrza Shāh Ḥasan) b. Shāh Bēg Arghūn, the founder of the Arghūn dynasty of Sind, was born in 896/1490 most probably at Ḳandahār which was then held by his father. On Bābur's occupation of Ḳandahār in 913/1507 Shāh Bēg came to Sind and occupied the adjoining territories of Shāl and Sīwī (modern Sibī). In 921/1515 Ḥusayn Shāh fell out with his father and joined the service of Bābur, with whom he remained for two years. The domestic quarrel having been patched up he returned to his father. In 926-27/1519-20 he was deputed by Shāh Bēg to help Djām Fīrūz, the ruler of Ṭhaṭṭa, whose territory had been invaded by his rival Djām Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, whom he defeated and killed in battle. On the death of his father in 928/1521 Ḥusayn Shāh was proclaimed the ruler of upper Sind at Naṣrpūr where he was then camping. Soon afterwards he marched against Ṭhaṭṭa, as Djām Fīrūz had refused to recognize his suzerainty, defeated him in a closely contested battle and occupied the town. The Djām fled to Gudjarāt [q.v.] where he died in exile.

In 931/1524 Ḥusayn Shāh marched against Multān [q.v.], capturing and destroying the forts of Siwrāʾī, Maʾū and Uččh [q.v.] on the way. The latter place was given to plunder and the timber and débris of the fort carried to Bhakkar [q.v.]. Hearing of the invasion Maḥmūd Khān Langāh, the ruler of Multān, marched out to meet the enemy with an army 80,000 strong but at the very first stage of the expedition fell ill and died. His successor Sultan Ḥusayn Langāh II [q.v.] considered it prudent to make peace with the invader. Frustrated and baulked of his booty Ḥusayn Shāh marched against the desert fort of Ḍērāwar (in the former Bahāwalpūr state) which was said to contain a huge hidden treasure. After a stiff resistance the fort surrendered and the treasure was secured. Burning with ambition and anxious to extend his rule Ḥusayn Shāh again thought of conquering Multān. Towards the end of 932/1526 he set out on his campaign and laid siege to the town which dragged on for a year. Unable to stand the terrible famine during which even dogs and cats were used as human food, the garrison ultimately surrendered. The city was ruthlessly devastated; all the inhabitants between the ages of seven and seventy were either made prisoners or put to the sword and a very large booty fell into the hands of the invader. According to Firishta (Gulshan-i Ibrāhīmī, ii, 321), Ḥusayn Langāh was also taken prisoner and the government of Multān entrusted to Khʷādja Shams al-Dīn Māhūnī (cf. Taʾrīkh-i Maʿṣūmī, 160).

After his victorious return to Bhakkar, Ḥusayn Shāh learnt that Rāy Khaṅgār of Kutch (Kačhčh) was preparing to attack Ṭhaṭṭa. Ḥusayn Shāh immediately left for that town, engaged the enemy in battle and completely routed him. Humāyūn [q.v.] on his arrival in Sind in 947/1540, after his defeat at the hands of Shēr Shāh Sūr [q.v.], sought the help of Ḥusayn Shāh in the hope that as a former servant of his father he would not hesitate to come to his help. Ḥusayn Shah, however, doubting Humāyūn's intentions and sincerity, procrastinated. Enraged at his cold behaviour Humāyūn occupied the fort of Bhakkar [q.v.] and appointed his uncle Yādgār Nāṣir Mīrzā, as its commandant. On a rapprochement being effected Ḥusayn Shah agreed to render some help to Humāyūn but as soon as the latter left Sind, he promptly drove Yādgār Nāṣir Mirzā out of Bhakkar and reoccupied the fort.

In 962/1554 the Arghūns and Tarkhāns of Ṭhaṭṭa conspired and rose in revolt against Ḥusayn Shāh, who had been ailing for long and was unable to discharge the functions of state. A compromise was, however, effected and the revolt consequently fizzled out. Enfeebled and paralysed Ḥusayn Shāh did not live long and died at the village of ʿAlīpōtō on 12 Rabīʿ I 962/4 February 1555 after a rule of 34 years, aged 66.

He was first buried under a dome in the Maklī necropolis, near Ṭhaṭṭa, but after a lapse of two years the coffin was transferred to Mecca where it was interred near the grave of his father. A grand building was erected over his grave which is no more in existence.

A brave and cultured ruler, Ḥusayn Shāh was well-versed in the traditional sciences and held the mashāʾikh, ʿulamāʾ and scholars, on many of whom he had settled stipends, in great esteem. A poet in Persian, he used to compose verses occasionally under the nom de plume of Sipāhī. He had two wives, one of whom was his cousin Māh Bēgam, a daughter of his uncle Muḥammad Muḳīm Mīrzā b. Shāh Bēg. Her daughter Čūčak Bēgam was married to prince Kāmrān, who had been blinded by Humāyūn, and in spite of her father's entreaties, remained firm in her resolve to accompany her ill-starred husband to Mecca, where he had been exiled.

Nāṣir al-Dīn ḤUSAYN SHĀH ČAKK [see kashmīr].

ḤUSAYN SHĀH LANGĀH I, son of Rāy Sahrā entitled Ḳuṭb al-Dīn, the founder of the Langāh dynasty of Multān, who had usurped the throne by treacherously ousting his son-in-law, Shaykh Yūsuf Ḳurayshī, succeeded to the rule on the death of his father in 874/1469. Adventurous by nature, he began his reign by launching a succession of campaigns against the neighbouring forts of Shōr (modern Shorkōṭ), Činiōṭ [q.v.] and Kahrōṛ (modern Kahrōṛ Pucca), which he easily reduced. At this time Shaykh Yūsuf Ḳurayshī, who had taken refuge with Buhlōl Lōdī, the king of Delhi, persuaded his protector to march against Ḥusayn Langāh and assist him in recovering his lost kingdom. Buhlōl set out twice from Delhi with the intention of conquering Multān, but had to abandon the attempt owing to the threatened invasion of his capital on both the occasions by the Sharḳī sulṭāns, Maḥmūd and Ḥusayn Shāh [q.v.]. It is difficult to fix the exact dates of these two abortive attempts as the authorities widely differ. The third time, when Ḥusayn Langāh was occupied with quelling the rebellion of his brother, who had assumed the title of Shihāb al-Dīn and proclaimed himself king at Kahrōṛ, which had been assigned to him, Buhlōl deputed his son Bārbak Shāh to reduce Multān. He was joined en route by the forces of Tātār Khān Lōdī, the governor of the Pandjāb. Ḥusayn Langāh, hearing of the invasion and having completely crushed the revolt of Shihāb al-Dīn, reached Multān by forced marches and gave battle to the invaders, who suffered a crushing defeat and fled to Delhi. It was during his reign that Ismāʿīl Khān and Fatḥ Khān, the two Balūč brothers and founders respectively of Ḍēra Ismāʿīl Khān and Ḍēra Fatḥ Khān [see ḍēradjāt] came from Mukrān [q.v.] and joined his service. This event marks the settlement of the Balučs in large numbers in the neighbourhood of Multān. In his old age Ḥusayn

Langāh abdicated in favour of his son Fīrūz, a dissolute and worthless youth, who was poisoned by the prime minister ʿImād al-Mulk to avenge the death of his son Bilāl whom Fīrūz had executed. Ḥusayn resumed the reins of power and in his turn avenged the death of his son by executing ʿImād al-Mulk. On the death of Buhlōl Lōdī in 895/1489 he sent his condolences to his son and successor Sikandar Lōdī and concluded a treaty of peace with him, thus putting an end to the designs of Shaykh Yūsuf, the pretender to the throne of Multān.

A cultured and accomplished man, Ḥusayn Langāh promoted education and learning by erecting colleges staffed by such eminent scholars as the brothers ʿAbd Allāh and ʿAzīz Allāh of Ṭulanba, a small village near Multān. A contemporary of Djām Niẓām al-Dīn alias Ninda, the ruler of Thaṭṭa, he was on very good terms with him and both the rulers often exchanged gifts and presents. He died in 908/1502 after a rule of 36 years.

ḤUSAYN SHĀH LANGĀH II, son of Maḥmūd Langāh (reg. 904/1498-9—931/1524-5), the ruler of Multān, was still a minor when he succeeded to the throne on the death of his father in 931/1524-25. Taking advantage of the ruler's minority and prompted by Bābur [q.v.], Ḥusayn Shāh Arghūn [q.v.], the ruler of Sind, set out against Multān. Maḥmūd Langāh marched out to defend his kingdom, but while he was only one or two stages away from his capital he suddenly died, poisoned, it was believed, by Langaŕ Khān Langāh, the commander of his army, who later deserted to Ḥusayn Shāh Arghūn. Ḥusayn Langāh, a boy of only three who had been proclaimed king, was protected by the regent and prime minister, Shudjāʿ al-Mulk Bukhārī, a son-in-law of Maḥmūd Langāh, who decided to resist Ḥusayn Shāh Arghūn, and against the advice of his commanders, decided to stand a siege which dragged on for more than a year. The city, after suffering a terrible famine and untold misery, vividly described by both Niẓām al-Dīn and Firishta, fell to the invader in 932/1526. The young ruler was taken prisoner, his uncle Shudjāʿ al-Mulk Bukhārī was insulted and tortured to death, the famished inhabitants were ruthlessly massacred and those who escaped the sword were indiscriminately taken prisoner. These included the well-known scholar of the day Shaykh Saʿd Allāh Lāhorī and his aged father, both eyewitnesses of the great siege. Multān was annexed to Sind and one Khʷādja Shams al-Dīn Māhūnī was appointed governor, who was shortly afterwards removed by the traitor Langaŕ Khān, who in his turn was replaced by Mirzā Kāmrān, the second son of Bābur. The independence of Multān was lost for ever and it became, shortly afterwards, a dependency of the Mughal empire.

ḤUSAYN WĀʿIẒ KĀSHIFĪ [see kāshifī].

ḤUSAYNĀBĀD, called Ḥusaynābād the Great (buzurg), is to be distinguished from two other Ḥusaynābāds, one of which existed in the modern Murshidabad district and the other in the 24 Parganas. Ḥusaynābād the Great was a town, now in the Malda district of West Bengal, which flourished during the times of the Bengal sultans Ḥusayn Shāh, Naṣrat Shāh, Fīrūz Shāh and Maḥmūd Shāh III. The name appears on the coins and inscriptions of Ḥusayn Shāh, but only on the coins of the other three sultans. It is not certain if it was identical with Gaur, in which case it was named after Ḥusayn Shāh, or if it was a suburb of the city actually built by the Sultan himself. The latter opinion, however, appears to be more probable. According to Ghulām Ḥusayn Salīm, Ḥusayn Shāh transferred his seat of government to Ekdālā adjoining the city of Gaur. This Ekdālā was situated near the village of Ramkeli on the western outskirt of the city. It is possible that this Ekdālā was later re-named by Ḥusayn Shāh as Ḥusaynābād the Great. Besides being the metropolis during Ḥusayn Shāh's reign, Ḥusaynābād the Great also appears to have been the capital of the western region (iḳlīm) of the kingdom. The capital of the eastern region was probably Muʿaẓẓamābād (near Mymensingh).

ḤUSAYNĪ DĀLĀN, a Shīʿī shrine in the old city of Dacca, seems to have been originally built in 1052/1642 by one Sayyid Murād during Prince Shudjāʿ's governorship of Bengal. Prince Shudjāʿ, although himself a Sunnī, was eager to preserve and patronize Shīʿa institutions. The tradition is that Sayyid Murād, having seen al-Ḥusayn in a vision erecting a taʿziya-khāna (house of mourning), was inspired to raise the building, which he named Ḥusaynī Dālān. The original building may have been a small structure, expanded to its present form in later times. It was repaired in 1807 and in 1810 by the East India Company, and a portion of the building was reconstructed after the earthquake of 1897.

The building stands on a high platform ascended by a flight of steps on the east side, and consists of two main halls placed back to back. The shirnī hall, facing south, is coloured black to indicate sorrow and mourning for the death of al-Ḥusayn, and the khuṭba hall, facing north, has a minbar with seven wooden steps. In the latter hall are hung several religious symbols. To these two halls have been added subsidiary halls in two storeys on the right and left, probably meant for women. The southern façade of the building is flanked by two three-storey polygonal hollow towers, crowned by domes. The parapet of the building consists of coloured merlons, and over its four corners are four kiosks. The building, as a whole, gives a modern appearance with remnants of older architecture here and there.

From the first to the tenth day of Muḥarram, the Ḥusaynī Dālān becomes the chief attraction of the city. Mourners, including Sunnī Muslims, assemble there, listen to sermons and join in passion plays [see TAʿZIYA]. On the ʿĀshūrāʾ [q.v.], a great procession parades through the main streets of the city to a place in the western part of the city called Karbalāʾ.

ḤUSAYNĪ SĀDĀT AMĪR, popular name of ḤUSAYN B. ʿĀLIM B. ABI 'L-ḤASAN AL-ḤUSAYNĪ, an eminent mystic writer and a distinguished disciple of Shaykh Bahāʾ al-Dīn Zakariyyāʾ of Multān [q.v.]. Born at Guziv, a village in Ghur, he subsequently migrated to Harāt. He came to Multān with his father and joined the Suhrawardī order. According to a tradition quoted in Laṭāʾif-i Ashrafī, Shaykh Bahāʾ al-Dīn married one of his daughters to him. Djamālī says that he visited Delhi with his spiritual master during the reign of Iletmish (606-633/1210-35). Owing to disturbed conditions in his homeland, he seems to have spent a considerable time in Multān during the reigns of Balban (664-86/1266-87) and Djalāl al-Dīn Fīrūz Shāh Khaldjī (689-95/1290-96) (some of his verses in praise of the latter are given in Rāhnumā-ye Kitāb, see Bibl.). He died in Harāt after 729/1328 (the date given by Djāmī, 16 Shawwāl 718/November 1318, is obviously wrong, as he completed his work Zād al-musāfirīn in 729/1328) and was buried near the tomb of ʿAbd Allāh b. Djaʿfar Ṭayyār.

Ḥusaynī was a notable mystic thinker; he, ʿIrāḳī and Awḥadī form that famous Suhrawardī trio which played a very prominent part in popularizing mystic ideas through their works—Lamaʿāt, Tardjīʿ and Zād al-musāfirīn. Dawlat Shāh calls him a second Djunayd in scholarship and eminence; a modern literary critic places him next to Saʿdī and Rūmī in the history of Persian literature (Rāhnumā-ye Kitāb). He possessed a unique gift of communicating mystic ideas through the medium of stories and fables. His works embody mystic reactions to the social and moral anarchy that came in the wake of the Mongol invasions. Of his works, the Nuzhat al-arwāḥ (Mudjtabāʾī Press, Delhi; commentaries by ʿAbd al-Wāḥid Ibrāhīm Bilgrāmī, MS Bodleian 1257; and by Bahāʾ al-Dīn Buddh, MS personal collection), the Ṭarab al-madjālis (MS I. O. Ethé no. 1829), the Zād al-musāfirīn (Newal Kishore 1884, where the name of the author is wrongly given as Mullā Ḥusayn Wāʿiz al-Kāshifī), and the Kanz al-rumūz (MSS Brit. Museum, Rieu, CPM, ii, 845 b; I.O. nos. 1830-31) are well known. A poetical collection Haft gandj has recently come to light (Rāhnumā-ye Kitāb). Copies of other works, like the dīwān, Ṣirāṭ al-mustaḳīm, ʿAnḳāʾ mughrib, Rūḥ al-arwāḥ and Sirrnāma, probably perished as the result of the Mongol cataclysm. (K. A. NIZAMI)

ḤUSAYNIDS, a dynasty which reigned in Tunisia from 1705 until 25 July 1957, when the Tunisian republic was proclaimed. The founder of the dynasty was al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī [q.v.] who came to power in 1705, after the defeat and capture by the Algerians of the Bey Ibrāhīm al-Sharīf. Proclaimed Bey and later recognized as Beylerbeyi (governor) of the province of Tunisia by the Ottoman Sultan Aḥmed III, Ḥusayn persuaded his Council of military leaders to adopt a system of hereditary succession within his family by primogeniture on the male side. The greater part of his reign passed without problems, but the end was troubled by the successful revolt of his nephew, ʿAlī, who, with the help of the Algerians, dethroned him and was created Bey in his place (1735-56).

For nearly twenty years, ʿAlī Pasha ruled without incident but in 1752 he was faced with the revolt of his son Yūnus, and, more serious, in 1756 with that of his cousin Muḥammad, son of Ḥusayn, who conquered Tunis with the help of Algerian troops. These sacked the town which was poorly defended by native soldiers whom ʿAlī Pasha had recruited in the place of the Turkish Janissaries.

Muḥammad (1756-9) was succeeded by his brother, ʿAlī Bey (1759-82), who returned to the earlier policy of recruiting his forces in the Levant. While recognized by the Ottoman Sultan only as Governor of the province of Tunisia, the Bey, in fact, enjoyed an autonomy close to complete independence; for the Turkish government did not interfere at all in Tunisian internal affairs, at any rate until 1835, and the Bey was able himself to sign treaties with European powers. Differences of opinion between Tunisia and France first arose under ʿAlī Pas̲h̲a in 1741-2 concerning the Africa Company and, much more seriously, in 1769-70, under ʿAlī Bey, in connexion with the annexation of Corsica by France and the monopoly of coral-fishing. Thanks to the intervention of the Bey's son-in-law and Chief Minister, Muṣṭafā K̲h̲od̲j̲a, the dispute was settled, and from that time on a French Consul-General was established in Tunis.

The next Bey, Ḥamūda Pas̲h̲a (1783-1814), found himself in violent conflict with the Venetians (1784-92), who bombarded Sousse and Goletta, and with the Algerians, who twice, in 1807 and 1813, invaded Tunisian territory. In Tunis itself, Ḥamūda Pas̲h̲a had to deal with a revolt of the Janissaries. With the help of Yūsuf, ṣāḥib al-ṭābaʿ (guardian of the state seals) and in effect Chief Minister, he was able to put down the rising and finally dissolved the Corps of Janissaries (1811). Ḥamūda Pas̲h̲a was responsible for the construction of the Dār al-Bey near the ḳaṣba, as well as of the palace of Mannūba.

After the brief reign of ʿUt̲h̲mān Bey (September-November 1814), his brother Maḥmūd (November 1814-March 1824) returned to the practice of recruiting Janissaries in the Orient in order to repel the Algerian attacks; finally, however, he made peace with the od̲j̲āḳ of Algiers in 1821. Most important of all, he had to suppress the privateer raids upon the demands of the European powers after the Congresses of Vienna and of Aix-la-Chapelle (1819); this meant an important loss to the Tunisian economy. Ḥusayn Bey (1824-35) supported the Ottoman Empire in the various phases of the "Eastern Question", the result of which was the destruction of the Tunisian fleet at Navarino [q.v.]. He thought also of intervening in Tripolitania following the incidents which occurred there between 1832 and 1835, but when the Turkish government once again made Tripolitania a province directly administered by Ottoman officials, he gave up these pretensions. Under Muṣṭafā Bey (1835-37) and Aḥmad Bey (1837-55), tension grew between Tunis and Istanbul. The Sultan, supported by Great Britain, tried to bring Tunisia back to more strict obedience, while Aḥmad Bey, upheld by France, endeavoured to protect its autonomy. Finally, the Bey succeeded in his refusal to pay the tribute claimed by the Porte, received the titles of wālī and mus̲h̲īr, but was obliged to continue the practice of receiving firmans of appointment to office and confirmation in it. Furthermore, Aḥmad Bey showed his allegiance to the Sultan by sending a Tunisian expeditionary force to Turkey during the Crimean War. He was also the first to introduce certain reforms into Tunisia and to launch great public works. All this involved enormous expense, and caused the Bey to contract debts, which mainly profited European businessmen and the Minister of Finance, Muṣṭafā K̲h̲aznadār, and involved levying new taxes. In addition, Aḥmad Bey abolished slavery and did away with the statute which had kept Tunisian Jews in an inferior position.

Muḥammad Bey (1855-59) and his brother Muḥammad al-Ṣādiḳ (1859-82) were determined reformers, but often badly advised. The first instituted the mad̲j̲bā, a poll tax, and issued the "Pacte Fondamental" (Fundamental Law) on 10 September 1857, on the model of the Ottoman K̲h̲aṭṭ-i hümāyūn of February 1856 [see TANẒĪMĀT]. This pact gave all Tunisians equality, liberty of conscience, and freedom in commercial matters. It also allowed foreigners to acquire property in Tunisia and to take part in every kind of economic activity. The administration was re-organized on the European model and in 1861, Muḥammad al-Ṣādiḳ promulgated a constitution [see DUSTŪR, i] which made the country a hereditary monarchy ruled by the Bey with the assistance of a Legislative Council of sixty; in addition, regular law-courts were established. The disastrous state of the country's finances, combined with the malpractices of Muṣṭafā K̲h̲aznadār, led the Bey in 1863 to seek a loan from the banker Erlanger, at an excessive rate of interest. Lacking the means of repaying this, Muḥammad al-Ṣādiḳ decided to double the mad̲j̲bā; this action provoked in 1864 a revolt of the central tribes and then of the cities of the Sahel under the leadership of ʿAlī b. G̲h̲adāham. The rebellion was suppressed, but Tunisia was ruined. Muḥammad al-Ṣādiḳ contracted a new loan in 1865 on terms as heavy as the first. Near to bankruptcy, he was obliged in 1869 to consent to the creation of an international financial commission (Tunisia, France, England and Italy) which brought to light at last the nefarious behaviour of Muṣṭafā K̲h̲aznadār.

The attempts of the new Chief Minister, K̲h̲ayr al-Dīn, to strengthen again the ties between Tunisia and the Ottoman Empire were cancelled out by the opposition of France and Italy. French pressure grew stronger and stronger and after the Treaty of Berlin (1878) the intervention of France became inevitable, despite some tardy efforts on the part of Italy. Using as their pretext the incursions of the K̲h̲roumir tribes into Algeria, the French government on 4 April 1881 decided to send a punitive expedition into Tunisia, despite Turkish protests and Muḥammad al-Ṣādiḳ's attempts at conciliation. On 12 May 1881, French troops arrived at the Bardo and Muḥammad al-Ṣādiḳ was obliged to sign the treaty of Ḳaṣr-Saʿīd, by which he gave up his external sovereignty to France and was forced to accept the presence of a resident French minister. Two years later, the Convention of La Marsa (8 June 1883), imposed on ʿAlī Bey (1882-1902), established the Protectorate in full. Following successive encroachments on the part of the French administration, the Beys Muḥammad al-Hādī (1902-6), Muḥammad al-Nāṣir (Naceur Bey, 1906-22) and Muḥammad al-Ḥabīb (1922-9) were reduced to more or less honorary positions, although Muḥammad al-Nāṣir had supported the activity of the Destour party in order to give Tunisians a greater part in the political life of the country. After 1934, it was the Néo-Destour party under Ḥabīb Bourguiba (Abū Ruḳayba) which gave new strength to the strong political feelings of the country, while Aḥmad Bey (1919-42) followed the directives of the Residents-General.

However, during the Second World War, Munṣif (Moncef) Bey (19 June 1942-13 May 1943) retrieved some of the prestige of the Beys' throne by putting himself at the head of the nationalist movement, at that time deprived of its other leaders. During his short reign, he showed himself an energetic sovereign, who rallied the bulk of the population around him and caused his dynasty to be regarded as a kind of guarantee and repository of national sovereignty.

Munṣif Bey was forced to abdicate shortly after the reconquest of Tunis by the allied armies and was replaced by his cousin, al-Amīn (Lamine) Bey (13 May 1943-25 July 1957). He did not possess his cousin's strength and energy of character, and after the war political initiative returned to Ḥabīb Bourguiba and the other leaders of the Néo-Destour. From 1952 to 1954, Lamine Bey tried rather timidly to resist French demands, and his passive resistance, combined with the militant behaviour of the Néo-Destour, brought the French government to agree first to internal autonomy (3 June 1955) and then to full independence (20 March 1956).

A short time after this, the family of the Beys ceased to enjoy any special privileges and, by a decree of 3 August 1956, the exercise of power was taken away from the Bey and given to the First Minister. On 25 July 1957, the Constituent Assembly proclaimed the fall of the Ḥusaynid dynasty and the establishment of a republican régime. For a short time placed under house arrest near Tunis, Lamine Bey was later given complete freedom. He died in 1964.

The Ḥusaynid dynasty, although of foreign origin, was able at times to give—though never to a very marked degree—the impression of being the national dynasty of Tunisia. Turkish in origin, it preserved the traditions of the Ḥanafī school of law, marriage to Ottoman princesses, and recognition (until 1881) of the suzerainty of the Ottoman Sultan.

ḤŪSH, country of the *djinn*s, beyond the sands of Yabrīn, into which no human ventures, and also a fabulous kind of camels, which are the issue of a cross between ordinary camels and djinn stallions or descended from the camels of the Wabār [q.v.], whose country they alone occupy. At times the males leave these desert wastes to attack herds and mate with female domestic camels; it is thus, it is thought, that famous species such as the mahriyya [see IBIL] or the ʿasdjadiyya are born.

Ḥūsh appears to be a doublet of waḥsh [q.v.] "wild", and ḥūshī/waḥshī is a technical term in rhetoric [see MAʿĀNĪ WA-BAYĀN].

HŪSHANG, mythical king of Iran who appears in several of the Yasht of the Avesta; the first lawful king and the protégé of the gods, he reigned over the seven climes of the world, over the demons and the sorcerers; according to these texts, he resided in the countries situated to the south of the Caspian Sea. His place in the series of the mythical kings (Pīshdādiyān) is vague: sometimes he is the contemporary of Ṭahmūrath [q.v.], sometimes his successor; sometimes Gayumard comes before both of them. The Pahlavi texts add little to the Avestan texts. The Arabic texts, which supply much detail, also disagree over the place of Hūshang in the series of the Pīshdādiyān, but recognize him as the first civilizer: al-Ṭabarī-Balʿami, then al-Thaʿālibi, attribute to him the initiative in the building of houses, the working of mines and the use of iron, in the foundation of Babylon, Susa and Rayy, and in the organization of agriculture. According to an anecdote related by al-Bīrūnī (and, later, by Firdawsī), he was the inventor of fire. These various aspects of his activity, mentioned also by the later Arab writers, probably have for their source the Khʷatāy-nāmak, as re-cast by Ibn al-Muḳaffaʿ, whereas Firdawsī bases himself on the early Iranian edition of this work [see FIRDAWSĪ, col. 918b]. Thus the recension followed by the Arabic authors attributes to him a reign of forty years, whereas Firdawsī has only thirty. Firdawsī makes him the grandson of Gayumard (the first man) and the avenger of his own father Siyāmak; to the enterprises of Hūshang mentioned above, he adds the creation of canals to water the land; he is the only one to relate the details and circumstances of the discovery of fire, as a result of the clash of two stones, one of which was thrown by Hūshang at a dragon "and he gave orders that prayers should be said facing a fire, saying: It is the spark given by God (Īzad); worship it if you are wise"; completely contrary to this account, Abu 'l-Maʿālī, the author of a Bayān al-adyān in Persian (485/1092), declares (perhaps under the influence of Islam) that Hūshang was a promoter of idolatry, because he went into a state of contemplation before a statue of his deceased daughter. Al-Ṭabarī and other early writers in Arabic wished to introduce Gayumard and Hūs͟hang into the genealogy of the personages of Biblical antiquity, the former being Adam and the latter Mahalaleel (Genesis, v, 12-7) or his son, or else Heber the descendant of Noah. Some writers stressed the proofs of wisdom given by Hūs͟hang, to whom they attributed a collection of moral sayings (D̲j̲āvidān k̲h̲irad, "The eternal wisdom").

Bibliography: A. Christensen, Les types du premier homme et du premier roi dans l'histoire légendaire des Iraniens, 1st part, in Archives d'études orientales Lundell, Stockholm 1917, has made a detailed study of Hūs͟hang with citations of Avestan, Pahlavi, Arabic and Persian texts; Abu 'l-Maʿālī, Bayān al-adyān (ed. HŪS͟HANG S͟HĀH G͟HŪRĪ, ruler of Mālwā [q.v.] from 808/1405 to 835/1432. He is first mentioned as Alp K͟hān, the eldest son of Dilāwar K͟hān [q.v.], by Firis͟hta, who represents him as ambitious for Mālwā's independence from Dihlī and resentful of his father's homage to Maḥmūd K͟haldjī of Dihlī when the latter was a fugitive in Dhār from the Tīmūrid invasion in 801/1398; indeed, during Maḥmūd's presence at Dhār he withdrew from the court to Māndū [q.v.] where he put in order the fortifications of the old Paramāra stronghold, and after Maḥmūd's return to Dihlī in 804/1401 he encouraged his father to assert his independence. When Dilāwar K͟hān died suddenly in 808/1405 Alp K͟hān succeeded to the throne as (al-sulṭān al-aʿẓam) Ḥusām al-Dunyā wa 'l-Dīn Abu 'l-Mud̲j̲āhid Hūs͟hang S͟hāh (cf. H. N. Wright, Catalogue of the coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta, Oxford 1907, ii, 246-7); suspecting that Dilāwar K͟hān's sudden death was the result of poison administered by orders of his son, Muẓaffar I of Gud̲j̲arāt marched on Mālwā the following year to avenge his death, captured Hūs͟hang, and took him off prisoner to Gud̲j̲arāt. Hūs͟hang was later restored to his kingdom, but found a cousin, Mūsā K͟hān, had usurped his power in Māndū; but he regained that stronghold by collecting the revenues of the kingdom before Mūsā had the chance to do so, and thus deprived Mūsā of the means of paying an army.

After his restoration (at the hands of Aḥmad K͟hān, the grandson of Muẓaffar I of Gud̲j̲arāt; later Aḥmad S͟hāh I) he was soon engaged in repeated hostilities with Gud̲j̲arāt from 813/1410 to 819/1416. In 820/1417 Hūs͟hang supported Naṣīr K͟hān of K͟hāndēs͟h [q.v.] against his younger brother Ḥasan in that divided kingdom (he had previously married their sister); Ḥasan was championed by Aḥmad I of Gud̲j̲arāt, whose dominions were invaded by Naṣīr at Hūs͟hang's instigation. Hūs͟hang gave Naṣīr only lukewarm support, and the latter was obliged to swear fealty to Aḥmad; on discovering Hūs͟hang's complicity Aḥmad retaliated by invading Mālwā in 822/1419 and 823/1420, effecting little but the plunder of some outlying districts, but at the same time convincing Hūs͟hang of Gud̲j̲arāt's superiority in arms.

It was thus most probably to reinforce the strength of the army that Hūs͟hang set out on his most adventurous expedition, in 824/1421, against the rād̲j̲ā of D̲j̲ād̲j̲nagar in Uṛīsā [q.v.] in order to obtain elephants. The story of Hūs͟hang's strategy, in the disguise of a horse-coper, is told in full by Firis͟hta (Eng. tr. Briggs, iv, 178-9). During Hūs͟hang's absence Aḥmad S͟hāh again invaded Mālwā, but on this occasion the superiority was with the Mālwā army, and Mālwā thereafter experienced no trouble from Gud̲j̲arāt. (A Hindū source, the Śivavilāsam of Kommana, claims a victory over the 'sultan of Dhārā' by the Reḍḍi general Allāḍa, an ally of the rād̲j̲ā of Uṛisā; this probably refers to the skirmish in which Hūs͟hang relieved the rād̲j̲ā of his elephants. See N. Venkataramanayya, The Gajapati Bhānudeva IV, in Proc. Ind. Hist. Cong., xiii (1950), 161).

It seems to have been on his return from Uṛisā that Hūs͟hang overcame the Gōnd rād̲j̲ā of Khērlā [q.v.], a small principality to the north of Barār, and exacted tribute; this seems to have been Hūs͟hang's first serious attempt to extend his possessions. In 825/1422 he turned his attention to the north, capturing first Gāgrawn (24° 38′ N., 76° 12′ E., in south-east Rād̲j̲āsthān) and then besieging Gwāliyār [q.v.] until it was relieved by Mubārak S͟hāh the Sayyid king of Dihlī. In 831/1428 Hūs͟hang's new tributary the rād̲j̲ā of Khērlā was attacked by Aḥmad S͟hāh Bahmanī; Hūs͟hang marched to his relief, and pursued the retreating Bahmanī army for three days until the latter turned to give battle. Hūs͟hang at first succeeded, but an ambush put the Mālwā army to flight.

In 834/1431 Hūs͟hang attacked the town of Kalpī [q.v.] on the river D̲j̲amnā, a nominal possession of the Sayyid kings of Dihlī, simultaneously with Ibrāhīm S͟harḳī of D̲j̲awnpur who later withdrew. Hūs͟hang accepted the surrender of Kalpī from Ḳādir K͟hān, the governor, whom he appointed as his own governor. The details of his career after this are not clear, but it is known that he spent some time superintending the destruction of the Bhōd̲j̲asāgara dam at Bhōd̲j̲pur near Bhōpāl (the lake is said to have taken three years to empty, and its waters added an enormous area of fertile land to Mālwā), and it is assumed that at about this time he founded the city of Hōs͟hangābād in Barār. He died on 9 D̲h̲u 'l-Ḥid̲j̲d̲j̲a 835/7 August 1432, and was first entombed in Hōs͟hangābād (note by Briggs to his translation of Firis͟hta, iv, 190).

Hūs͟hang's reputation rests on the military achievements of his twenty-seven years' reign, which saw the Mālwā territories extended northwards to Kalpī and southwards to Khērlā, involving conflict with Dihlī, D̲j̲awnpur and the Bahmanī kingdom as well as the old rival Gud̲j̲arāt. He had a fine taste for architecture, which made Māndū a magnificent city (for his works there, especially the D̲j̲āmiʿ masd̲j̲id, the Dihlī darwāza, and his own tomb, see MĀNḌŪ) as well as an impregnable stronghold. He was well served by his ministers (especially his cousin Malik Mug͟hīt͟h and Mug͟hīt͟h's son Maḥmūd K͟hān, the later Maḥmūd I K͟haldjī [qq.v.]), seems to have been an impartial ruler (for the dedication of D̲j̲ayn images in his reign see Campbell, op. cit. below, 163), and was popular with his subjects, his tomb acquiring sanctity after his death with a yearly ʿurs in his honour, still held in 1844 when the 'Bombay subaltern' was writing.

He was succeeded by his eldest son G͟haznī K͟hān as Muḥammad S͟hāh, who exterminated his collaterals and alienated his nobles and was promptly poisoned; for a few days his son Masʿūd K͟hān was raised to the throne, but Maḥmūd K͟hān, having first offered the crown to his father Malik Mug͟hīt͟h, ascended the throne himself, and the G͟hūrī line came to an end

(for the nisba Ghūrī, see under DILĀWAR KHĀN).

AL-ḤUṢRĪ, the name of two men of letters of the same family, who take their nisba from al-Ḥuṣr, a village near Ḳayrawān: I.—ABŪ ISḤĀḲ IBRĀHĪM B. ʿALĪ B. TAMĪM AL-ḲAYRAWĀNĪ, died near Ḳayrawān at al-Manṣūriyya in 413/1022. Little is known of his life, which appears to have been passed peacefully at Ḳayrawān, then a flourishing centre of Arabic culture. A famous poet and man of letters, he became a central figure for the young people of Ḳayrawān—especially Ibn Rashīḳ and Ibn Sharaf [qq.v.]—who profited from his vast erudition in matters of literary tradition and from his ideas concerning the concept of adab. Although we possess a number of his verses which, incidentally, mainly reveal his technique but which are not without a fine sensibility, his fame rests chiefly on his prose works, entitled Zahr al-ādāb, Djamʿ al-djawāhir, Nūr al-ṭarf wa-nawr al-ẓarf, and Kitāb al-Maṣūn fī sirr al-hawā al-maknūn.

1. Zahr al-ādāb wa-thamar al-albāb was printed first on the margin of the ʿIḳd and then edited by Zakī Mubārak; ʿAlī Muḥ. al Badjāwī finally published a more complete and reliable edition in Cairo in 1372/1953. This work is an anthology, in which al-Ḥuṣrī, faithful to the fundamental principle of adab, which involves instructing but never boring the reader, used only varied and relatively short texts, so that they could be better learned and used as models. The book passes from serious to pleasant matters, and from poetry to prose, although prose forms the main subject-matter. The author strives, however, to achieve a certain homogeneity, especially in his constant endeavour to draw almost exclusively on representative extracts of the rich and "flowery" style in the works of the "moderns". The book was put together in 405/1014-5 at the request of a secretary to the Chancellery, Abu 'l-Faḍl al-ʿAbbās b. Sulaymān, to whom also the two following works seem to have been dedicated, and who had brought back from the East a vast collection of contemporary literary data. The author recognized that his function was limited to making a choice from this, but this nevertheless indicates the qualities of the man who made it and reveals a -Ḥuṣrī's individual conception of the literary form, adab, and his own didactic methods. He ignores everything that is too well-known and, like Ibn ʿAbd Rabbih, confines himself to eastern material, which he wanted first to reveal and then to make familiar to his young disciples. This too-much neglected work was known in Spain and formed part of the curriculum of literary studies (see Ibn Khayr, Fahrasa, i, 380; H. Pérès, Poésie andalouse, 28 and index; Ibn Barrī, among others, made an abridged version of it).

2. Djamʿ al-djawāhir fi 'l-mulaḥ wa 'l-nawādir, first published in Cairo under the title Dhayl Zahr al-ādāb, then in 1372/1953 by ʿAlī Muḥ. al-Badjāwī under its real name, is comparable to the Zahr al-ādāb in the method followed, but differs from it by the choice of material, which is more limited and homogeneous, although it comes from the same collection brought from the east by al-Ḥuṣrī's patron. It is, in fact, essentially a collection of anecdotes, of "bons mots", jokes and tales about fools, from which, however, anything indecent is omitted, the author's aim being to teach the art of conversation which is amusing and refreshing, without ever causing offence or becoming boring.

3. Nūr al-ṭarf wa-nawr al-ẓarf (Escurial², 392, Gotha 2129; Kitāb al-Nawrayn according to Yāḳūt), is conceived in the same spirit and drawn from the same sources as Zahr al-ādāb, which it could replace for a reader with too little time or knowledge to use it. Far from merely repeating themselves, these works form a real trilogy which shows admirably al-Ḥuṣrī's conception of the literary form adab. Although this is on the whole identical with that of traditional adab, for him it is more strictly defined in its characteristics, and above all in its practical and didactic aim. Djamʿ al-djawāhir, in fact, fills a lacuna in Zahr al-ādāb, in which the pleasant, light, indeed sometimes licentious side of this literary form was thought to be incompatible with the seriousness of the "great" work (al-kitāb al-kabīr). Furthermore, the student, the apprentice adīb, the future writer, needs to be prepared gradually for a fruitful use of this perfect work; Nūr al-ṭarf, written like Djamʿ al-djawāhir after Zahr al-ādāb, answers mainly practical and didactic needs.

4. Kitāb al-Maṣūn fī sirr al-hawā al-maknūn (Leiden Or. 2593/463), which might, to a certain extent, be linked with adab because of the literary detail in which it abounds, reveals an aspect of Ibrāhīm al-Ḥuṣrī's literary activities hitherto unknown. The work deals with the sentiment of love in general and principally with its manifestations in a thousand different aspects in spite of a desire, conscious or not, to conceal it. It is a monograph of encyclopaedic character, which endeavours to be "technical" or even scientific on matters concerning love. In contrast to al-Ḥuṣrī's other works, where information and subject-matter are for the greater part second-hand, the development of the theme here, apart from quotations in prose and verse, is the author's own work. The authorities cited are not all Arabs—names of Greek thinkers, scholars and philosophers recur frequently—and the whole conception of the work in dialogue form suggests Hellenistic inspiration. Al-Ḥuṣrī also contemplated a work on the "classes" of poets, probably of Ḳayrawān, but he seems to have abandoned the project after the virulent protests of Ibn Rashīḳ, who, as the youngest, did not want to be "classed" last.

By his direct teaching, by the didactic aspects of his work, the originality of his concept and his method in dealing with adab, above all by his vast knowledge, Ibrāhīm al-Ḥuṣrī while still young—he was to die in the prime of life—asserted himself as a master whose influence transcended the limits of Ifrīḳiya and, in a short time, had a profound effect on the astonishing progress in the art of letters in the Muslim West in the 5th/11th century. His example as a writer and his anthologies, which are not unlike those of al-Thaʿālibī [q.v.], contributed to the spread of a taste for a compressed and artistic prose style. He introduced into Ifrīḳiya the literary form of the maḳāma, which was soon to be developed so successfully by at least one of his pupils, Ibn Sharaf. His project, too quickly abandoned through a weakness of character manifested in other ways, of a work on the "classes" of poets, probably inspired the Unmūdhadj of another of his pupils, Ibn Rashīḳ. Finally, it seems very likely that the Kitāb al-Maṣūn had a direct influence, whether profound or not, on the Ṭawḳ al-ḥamāma of Ibn Ḥazm of Cordova. But traditional adab, based on respect for its ancient Arabian core, was to triumph in that same 5th/11th century and al-Ḥuṣrī little by little fell into obscurity, the victim of his own revolutionary impulsiveness (cf. al-ʿUmarī who quotes Ibn Bassām. See Bibl.).

II.—Abu l'-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Ghanī al-Fihrī, celebrated blind "reader" and poet, born at Ḳayrawān about 420/1029. Probably the nephew, rather than the cousin of al-Ḥuṣrī, he left his native city in 449/1057-8, at the time of the invasion of the Banū Hilāl and, after a stay in Ceuta, went to Spain about 462/1069-70 in response to a long-standing invitation from al-Muʿtamid Ibn ʿAbbād, ruler of Seville, and lived there until approximately 468/1075-6. Courted by the mulūk al-ṭawāʾif, who outbid one another in generosity towards him, and fleeing the envy and numerous enemies aroused by the favour of princes towards him, his poetic talent, the extent of his knowledge, his arrogance, his little-disguised contempt for Spain and some of its petty kings, its people and its scholars, not to mention aggressive and bitter satires, he moved from one place to another in the peninsula. He stayed mainly in Malaga, Dénia, Valencia, Alméria and Murcia, before finally settling in 483/1090-1 in Tangiers, where he died in 488/1095.

He was well-versed in the Ḳuʾrānic sciences, which he taught all his life and in which he acquired the reputation of a great master (al-ustādh al-aʿlā according to Ibn Diḥya in particular). He was a letter-writer, a talented poet of astonishing virtuosity, combining all this with a vast knowledge of Arabic and complete mastery of versification. ʿAlī al-Ḥuṣrī is thus considered one of the greatest representatives of the startling literary progress which took place under the Zīrids, whose brilliance he, along with other Ifrīḳiyan exiles, helped to spread into Spain, where he was regarded as a literary leader (zaʿīm djamāʿa, according to Ibn Bassām).

His works, apart from his epistles (most of which have been lost), consist of the following:

1. A didactic poem of more than 200 lines on the Ḳurʾān "readings" of Nāfiʿ (in ms. at Tunis, according to Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥuṣrī, 67, n. 4. See Bibl.).

2. al-Mustaḥsan min al-ashʿār, a collection of his panegyrics of al-Muʿtamid, which he offered in a supreme and touching homage to his former patron when this deposed king passed through Tangiers in 484/1091-2 on his way to exile. (This might perhaps be the Kitāb al-Ḳaṣāʾid which Ibn Ḳunfudh attributes to him).

3. al-Muʿashsharāt (this is No. 5 in Brockelmann attributed wrongly, as is also No. 4, to Ibrāhīm; published in Abu'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥuṣrī, 212-40); it consists of "ten line stanzas" in which each letter of the alphabet is used for the rhyme and for the beginning of the ten lines which make up each of these 29 short poems, lām-alif counting as one of the letters. ʿAlī al-Ḥuṣrī is said to have invented this form. The poet here laments an unhappy love in the pure tradition of the perfect udhrī lover; a great sense of desolation emanates from these poems, caused by the infidelity of a beautiful woman. The unity of tone and subject-matter and the evident sincerity of the sentiments, seem to point to the abandonment of the ageing poet by his young and beautiful wife, whom he loved passionately. If this is so, because of their personal lyricism and despite the dazzling technical virtuosity of their art, these "ten-line stanzas" form one of the most beautiful love-poems in all Arab poetry.

4. Iḳtirāḥ al-ḳarīḥ wa-'djtirāḥ al-djarīḥ (published in Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥuṣrī, 256-490) was written upon the death of his favourite son, which probably occurred in 475/1082-3 after a grave illness, and the flight of his mother, the unfaithful wife. It was put together five years later. This work includes, apart from three introductions: (a) one part in ornate prose (confused by the authors of Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥuṣrī with the third introduction): there is a homily, sermon and expression of hope in God after his heavy trials; (b) another part in verse comprising poems ingeniously arranged by the rhyme according to the letters of the alphabet; there are about 2,600 lines and they are the only ones of his enormous production which al-Ḥuṣrī decided to collect for preservation. These poems are a most valuable documentary source for the biography of the author. By their extent, their moving expression of the father's profound sorrow, these poems, where the poetic skill of al-Ḥuṣrī, without stifling his sensibility, reaches its highest point, are likewise the most successful examples of the poetic form of threnody and, together with al-Muʿashsharāt, assure ʿAlī al-Ḥuṣrī's place as one of the greatest of Arabic elegiac poets.

5. Among the fragments and poems preserved in books of adab (collected partly in Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥuṣrī) appears the most famous of all, Yā layl al-ṣabb, which has continued to inspire imitators up to the present day. Finally, Ibn Sanāʾ al-Mulk (Dār al-ṭirāz, 39) includes him as one of the writers of muwashshaḥāt; but these, like the greater part of his satires and panegyrics, have not come down to us.

The extraordinary virtuosity ʿAlī al-Ḥuṣrī showed in the construction of his poems, the structure of his lines, his use of the inexhaustible resources of the Arabic language in ornate style and complicated rhymes, have caused him to be compared with al-Maʿarrī. Like him, al-Maʿarrī was a blind poet whose Luzūm mā lā yalzam he imitated extensively in matters of rhyme and in his defiant attacks, in the form of charades in verse, on the scholars of his time.

AL-ḤŪT [see NUDJŪM; YŪNUS; ZĪDJ].

AL-ḤUṬAYʾA, nickname of the Arab poet DJARWAL B. AWS, who traced back his genealogy sometimes to the ʿAbs, sometimes to the Dhuhl, but who, in reality, was probably the natural son of a woman named al-Ḍarrāʾ; his nickname probably derives from his ugliness and appears to signify "deformed". He belonged to the mukhaḍramūn [q.v.], and Ibn Sallām places him in the second class of the poets of the djāhiliyya; since he is regarded as the rāwī of Zuhayr b. Abī Sulmā [q.v.], he must have been born about forty years before the hidjra, and his earliest poetic activities probably date from a time well before Islam, but the major part of his surviving work belongs to the Islamic period. His conversion to Islam appears to have been merely superficial, since he apostasized at the time of the ridda [q.v.] which took place during Abū Bakr's caliphate; his reconversion scarcely seems to have been sincere, if we are to place any credence in traditions regarding his "testament", which depict him as refusing to follow the Islamic rules in respect of the apportionment of inheritance between boys and girls.

The character of al-Ḥuṭayʾa is presented in a very unfavourable light; his avidity (see Ibn Rashīḳ, ʿUmda, i, 50), avarice (he ranks as one of the four Arab misers [see BUKHL]) and venality constitute the principal elements motivating his literary career; his malice was so dreaded that men gave him gifts to safeguard themselves from it. Passing from tribe to tribe, and changing his genealogy according to whether he was satisfied or displeased with the treatment accorded him, he appears as an itinerant mendicant poet, lavishing dithyrambic poems on any liberal patron but threatening the less generous with his vituperation.

During the ridda he violently attacked Abū Bakr, and later, under the caliphate of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, he poured invective upon the governor of Medina, al-Zibriḳān b. Badr, though not without also attacking the caliph, who threw him into prison and released him only on the intervention of Ḳuraysh notables; at the same time he heaped panegyrics upon an eminent member of the Banū Anf al-Nāḳa, Baghīḍ b. ʿĀmir. It is not known with certainty in what year he died, but his connexion with Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ, governor of Medina after 41/661, confirms the tradition that he survived into the reign of Muʿāwiya.

Arab critics place great emphasis upon the talent of al-Ḥuṭayʾa and his skill in the successful handling of invective, panegyric, personal glorification and nasīb; the author of the Aghānī held him in high esteem, Ibn Sharaf regarded him as an immortal poet, and later poets looked on him as a distinguished precursor (see ZDMG, xlvi, 41; al-Kumayt, ed. Horovitz, no. 4, v. 11; Bahāʾ al-Dīn Zuhayr, ed. Palmer, 217) and he has been held up as a model for imitation in modern times, since critics recognize that his poetry, which he wrote with great ease, is flawless.

Ḥammād, the grandson of Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, wrote his biography under the title Akhbār al-Ḥuṭayʾa, but this work is lost, while the works of philologists of the 2nd and 3rd/8th-9th centuries who set out to collect his Dīwān have survived in part. The recension of Abū ʿAmr al-Shaybānī and Ibn al-Aʿrābī, which dealt very leniently with the apocryphal parts of the Dīwān which had suffered from interpolations at an early date, notably by Ḥammād al-Rāwiya, has survived in its entirety, while the recension of Abū Ḥātim al-Sidjistānī, who took a stricter attitude towards suspect passages, has survived only in fragments.

The Dīwān of al-Ḥuṭayʾa was published in Istanbul in 1890, and subsequently by I. Goldziher (in ZDMG, xlvi-xlvii and reprint, Leipzig 1893) with an introduction and explanatory notes; Aḥmad al-Shinḳīṭī produced a new edition in Cairo in 1905 with al-Sukkarī's commentary and glosses; the edition of ʿĪsā Sābā, Beirut 1951, although providing notes, is rather more commercial, while that of N. A. Ṭāhā, published in Cairo in 1958, with the commentaries of Ibn al-Sikkīt, al-Sukkarī and al-Sidjistānī and notes partly based on the apparatus criticus of Goldziher, is of an informed scientific character.

There were at least two persons in the 6th/12th century who bore the name al-Ḥuṭayʾa (see al-Subkī, Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya, iv, 234, 279).

HUTAYM is properly the name of a pariah tribe with its main centre in northwestern Arabia, but Hutaym is also used imprecisely at times as a designation for any of the pariah tribes in the eastern Arab lands. The definite article prefixed to the name Hutaym in some Arabic and Western sources is incorrect; the initial radical is h, not ḥ as in EI[1], iv, 512; the usual pronunciation in Arabia is ihtēm; and the plural is Hitmān rather than the forms given in EI[1], ii, 348.

None of the many versions explaining the origin and lineage of Hutaym seems particularly plausible. About the only statement that can be made with certainty is that the noble Arab tribes unanimously hold that members of Hutaym are not aṣīl, i.e., they are outside the accepted Arab system of pure descent from Ḳaḥṭān or ʿAdnān [see *EI*², i, 544-6]. This, however, does not rule out the possibility that Hutaym may have originally been of Arab stock, as is suggested by the story that their lowly status goes back to a crime of incest committed by their ancestor Hutaym, presumably an Arab, with his mother [see *EI*¹, iv, 512 for a similar story on the origin of the pariah tribe of Ṣulayb].

Members of Hutaym acknowledge close kinship with the pariah tribe of the Sharārāt [q.v.]. These two tribes are generally considered to occupy a somewhat higher position in Arabian society than Ṣulayb [q.v.]. This distinction may derive from the fact that Hutaym and the Sharārāt raise excellent breeds of camels, whereas Ṣulayb with rare exceptions are primarily ass nomads. There is a tradition that Hutaym and the Sharārāt are descended from Banū Hilāl [see HILĀL].

The main body of the tribe of Hutaym proper lives in the vicinity of Khaybar north of Medina. The eastern part of the large lava field stretching from Khaybar towards Ḥāʾil is called Ḥarrat Hutaym (wrongly given by Doughty and *EI*¹, ii, 348 as Ḥarrat al-Ethnān). Doughty, who travelled with *rafīḳ*s of Hutaym through this area in 1877-8, provides our most intimate account of the tribe. Beyond this centre elements of Hutaym spread southwards into Tihāma in the region of Mecca and Djudda, while others are found as far north as the sandy desert of the Great Nafūd. Some are settled in oases such as al-Mustadjidda south of Ḥāʾil.

Further research is needed to determine the exact relationship of two pariah tribes in eastern Arabia, the ʿAwāzim [q.v.] and the Rashāyida, to the main body of Hutaym. In the time of Doughty there were ʿAwāzim in the west, "an old Heteym kindred", but they were nearly extinct (Ar. Des., ii, 194-5). He was told of members of Banū Rashīd of Hutaym established near Kuwait (ibid., ii, 305).

Further research is also needed to fix the identity of people called Hutaym outside Arabia. In Sinai the Djibāliyya, retainers of the monastery of St Catherine, are reckoned among their number; some of these retainers are said to be of Bosnian or Wallachian extraction. The name Hutaym occurs along the shores and on the islands of the Red Sea, in Lower and Upper Egypt, and in the eastern Sudan, where Hutaymīs have been engaged in the camel trade between Kasala and Egypt and Hutaymīs are reported to be intermingled with the Bedja [q.v.].

Doughty found Hutaym in their homeland "commonly more robust than the hunger-bitten Beduw, and their women are often beautiful" (Ar. Des., ii, 241). On the other hand, "They are not of so cheerful a temper, and they lack the frank alacrity of mind and the magnanimous dignity of Beduins" (Ar. Des., ii, 86). Although a British source states that the men of Hutaym "are reputed to be timid and of no value as fighters", this source appears to contradict itself by telling of the "open resistance" of Hutaym to Ibn Rashīd with raids up to the gates of Ḥāʾil (Admiralty, Handbook, i, 91 & 379). In hunting, Hutaym and the Sharārāt are regarded as more skilled than the Bedouins of noble descent but not quite up to the mark of Ṣulayb.

Members of Hutaym raise large flocks of sheep and goats as well as camels, and those near the Red Sea are expert fishermen. They sell livestock, cheese, butter, milk, honey, and fish in the towns of al-Ḥidjāz. Arabs of noble race, such as the neighbouring folk of ʿAnaza, Ḥarb, and Shammar, do not intermarry with Hutaym. Although Hutaym in turn are not supposed to intermarry with negroes, Doughty found violations of this rule in certain villages of Nadjd.

The head of the section of Āl Barrāk, who in 1963 was Nāhī Ibn Barrāk, is the paramount chief of the tribe. Among the other sections are Āl Ḳalādān, Āl Shumaylān, the Maẓābira, the Nawāmisa, and the Fuhayḳāt.

HUWA HUWA, literally "he is he", or "it is it", means:

A. in logic: what is represented as entirely identical, e.g., "Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh" and "the Prophet". (Peano and the modern logicians express this equation by the sign $\equiv$);

B. in mysticism: the state of the saint whose perfect personal unity testifies to divine unity in the world.

AL-ḤUWAYDIRA [see AL-ḤĀDIRA].

AL-ḤUWAYṬĀT, tribe with its main centre in northwestern Saudi Arabia and southern Jordan. The tribal range extends from the vicinity of al-Karak in the north to the vicinity of Taymāʾ [q.v.] in the south, and from the Red Sea in the west to Wādī al-Sirḥān and al-Djawf [qq.v.] in the east. The eastern part of this range is properly the homeland of Banū ʿAṭiyya, with whom the Ḥuwayṭāt as good allies share watering and grazing rights. This whole area corresponds in a general way to that occupied by the tribes of ʿUdhra and Djudhām [qq.v.] in the late Djāhiliyya and the early days of Islam [see the map in *EI*², i, 891].

According to a story current in the tribe, mankind originally consisted of three professions: tentmakers, farmers, and raiders, with the raiders being the Ḥuwayṭāt. The suggestion that the Ḥuwayṭāt are descendants of the Nabataeans [q.v.] seems to stem largely from the fact that the tribal range is roughly identical with ancient Nabataea. Equally improbable is the suggestion that the Ḥuwayṭāt are *sharīf*s of the lineage of the Prophet. The genealogical table given by Oppenheim for the tribe shows the eponymous ancestor as Ḥuwayṭ b. Barakāt, Barakāt [q.v.] being a name common among the *sharīf*s of al-Ḥidjāz. More weight may be given to the tradition that Ḥuwayṭ was an Egyptian who came to al-ʿAḳaba as a pilgrim and became associated with Banū ʿAṭiyya. Some members of the Ḥuwayṭāt name Ḥām rather than Barakāt as the father of their ancestor. It is not, however, likely that an Egyptian strain is dominant in the Ḥuwayṭāt of Arabia and Jordan. Despite the various suggestions of a non-Arab origin, the Ḥuwayṭāt are not classified as pariahs like the Sharārāt [q.v.], some of whom roam in their range, or Hutaym [q.v.] in the area southeast of Banū ʿAṭiyya.

Since the 12th/18th century the Ḥuwayṭāt have been split up into several branches, which at times have come into conflict with each other. In the late Ottoman period the branch known as Ḥuwayṭāt Ibn Djāzī camped along the Syrian pilgrim route in the region of Maʿān in summer and farther east, in the region of Djabal al-Ṭubayḳ and Wādī al-Sirḥān, in winter. The Ottoman authorities paid these Bedouins to maintain security along their stretch of the pilgrim route, and the inhabitants of Kāf in Wādī al-Sirḥān, of al-Djawf, and of Taymāʾ paid them khāwa [q.v.] to refrain from raiding their oases.

The ʿAlāwīn, semi-nomads north and east of al-ʿAḳaba, used to protect Egyptian pilgrim caravans part of the way when they came overland. This branch of the tribe is also known as Ḥuwayṭāt Ibn Nidjād (wrongly given by Shuḳayr, Jaussen, Musil, etc. as Ibn Djād) after the name of its paramount chief. South and east of al-ʿAḳaba is the branch of Āl ʿImrān, along the coast where the port of Ḥaḳl lies. Its chief, Ibn Maḳbūl, owns palms in al-ʿAḳaba, as does Ibn Nidjād.

The southernmost branch is Ḥuwayṭāt al-Tahama (not al-Tihāma as in EI[1], ii, 349). Its members hold the coast of northern Madyan and the highlands of Ḥismā facing the sea; its shaykh, Abū Ṭuḳayḳa, has his headquarters in the Red Sea port of Ḍabā. In this area the Ḥuwayṭāt have almost entirely supplanted Banū ʿUḳba, descendants of Djudhām. Bordering the area to the south is the range of the tribe of Balī, traditional enemies of the Ḥuwayṭāt, but even here the aggressive Ḥuwayṭāt are sending immigrants in. Other old foes are Shammar to the east and Banū Ṣakhr to the north [qq.v.].

The Saʿīdiyyūn of the depression of al-ʿAraba south of the Dead Sea, now a virtually independent tribe, reveal their origin in their war-cry: Ṣubyān al-Ḥuwayṭāṭ (see Oppenheim, ii, 299 for the connection with the line of Ḥuwayṭ).

Even though the Ḥuwayṭāt may think of themselves as the world's first raiders, there are indications that the conversion of the bulk of the tribe to nomadism took place fairly recently. Doughty found some of the tribesmen subsisting as nomad herders, but others as "husbandmen of palms and sowers of grain". In his eyes the Ḥuwayṭāt resembled Syrian villagers much more than "the lithe-limbed and subtle-brained and supple-tongued Arabians of land-inward Nejd". After feasting with Ibn Nidjād and his men, Doughty thought that he "had not ever seen such a strange thick-faced cob-nosed cobblers' brotherhood" (Ar. Des., i, 275, 276, 85).

When the Ḥuwayṭāt adopted nomadic ways, they did so with a vengeance. Two decades before the outbreak of the First World War, the chieftainship of Ibn Djāzī was challenged by the clan of the Tawāyiha. ʿAwda b. Ḥarb Abū Tāyih, who became head of the clan in 1325/1907, won fame as the most formidable Bedouin raider of modern times. T. E. Lawrence described him in 1917 as "tall and straight, loosely built, spare and powerful ... His lined and haggard face is pure Bedouin: broad low forehead, high sharp hooked nose ... The Howeitat pride themselves on being altogether Bedu, and Auda is the essence of the Abu Tayi. His hospitality is sweeping ..., his generosity has reduced him to poverty, and devoured the profits of a hundred successful raids. He has married twenty-eight times, has been wounded thirteen times, and in his battles has seen all his tribesmen hurt, and most of his relations killed. He has only reported his 'kill' since 1900, and they now stand at seventy-five Arabs; Turks are not counted by Auda when they are dead. Under his handling the Toweihah have become the finest fighting force in Western Arabia. He raids as often as he can each year ... and has seen Aleppo, Basra, Taif, Wejh, and Wadi Dawasir in his armed expeditions" (Secret dispatches, 112-3; cf. Seven pillars, 222-3).

Among the Ḥuwayṭāt, all the sections siding with one another in battle form an ʿilm, at the head of which is an ʿalīm. ʿAwda was the ʿalīm of one ʿilm, and Ibn Djāzī the ʿalīm of another.

In 1335/1917, before the capture of al-ʿAḳaba, ʿAwda joined the sharīf Fayṣal of Mecca in the Arab Revolt against the Turks and distinguished himself as a dashing commander in the field from then until the fall of Damascus in 1337/1918.

ʿAwda died in 1342/1924, not long after he had shown a leaning towards the cause of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Āl Suʿūd of Nadjd. When the Ikhwān of Nadjd thrust close to ʿAmmān less than a month after ʿAwda's death, Ḥuwayṭāt of Jordan joined in opposing them, and a nephew of ʿAwda's fell in the fight. The Jordanian Ḥuwaytāt continued to be embroiled with the forces of Āl Suʿūd for some years thereafter. In 1351/1932 Abū Ṭuḳayḳa of the southern Ḥuwayṭāt joined Ibn Rifāda of Balī in an unsuccessful rebellion against King ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz.

In Sinai the range of the Ḥuwayṭāt is a wedge of inland territory southeast of Suez in the vicinity of Djabal al-Rāḥa. Of all the Arabs in these parts, the Ḥuwayṭāt are regarded as the most recent immigrants and they are said to be swarthier than the rest, perhaps because of a negro admixture (Murray, 243). The Ḥuwayṭāt of Sinai have especially close ties with the Ṭuḳayḳāt of Ḥuwayṭāt al-Tahama. In the dichotomy of Sinai tribes (Saʿd and Ḥarām) the Ḥuwayṭāt belong to the faction of Ḥarām, in which they are allies of the Ṭuwara, the Uḥaywāt, and the Tarābīn. The Tayāhā and others belong to the faction of Saʿd.

Elements of the Ḥuwayṭāt are scattered about in different places in Egypt. Some are nomads in the rugged country south of the road from Cairo to al-Ismāʿīliyya, while others have become fellahs near Ṭanṭā. The Ḥuwayṭāt of al-Ḳalyūbiyya were formerly suppliers of camels to the Egyptian pilgrim caravans, and the guides for these caravans hailed from this group. In Upper Egypt there are Ḥuwayṭāt in al-Fayyūm. If members of the tribe have penetrated into the Sudan, they would appear to have lost their identity there.

The Ḥuwayṭāt are not among the great camel-raising tribes, but in the past they have been active as camel merchants. One of their busy routes crossed the mouth of the Gulf of al-ʿAḳaba from the port of al-Shaykh Ḥumayd on the Arabian side to al-Nabak on the Sinai side, whence the journey to Suez took ten days or so.

ḤUWAYZA [see ḤAWĪZA].

HUWIYYA is one of the abstract words that were coined in order to express in Arabic the nuances of Greek philosophy. It has been translated in a number of ways, in mediaeval Latin as well as in modern European languages. "Ipseity" would seem to be the term with which it most precisely corresponds. In modern Arabic it is retained with the meaning "identity".

Huwiyya is formed from the pronoun huwa and the normal abstract termination -iyya, according to the explanation given by Ibn Rus͟hd. He attributes this formation to a desire to avoid the ambiguity of the word mawd͟jūd, translating τὸ ὄν, as the Arabic participle has the original meaning of "found" (cf. Munk, Mélanges de philosophie juive et arabe, 242, note 2, referring to Abrégé de Métaphysique, beginning). The term was established early by the translators, for it already occurs frequently in the translation of Aristotle's Metaphysics and is found also in the so-called Theology attributed to the same author. One, at least, of the translations of the Metaphysics was made by Usṭāt͟h for al-Kindī (Walzer, Greek into Arabic, Oxford 1962, 187). A curious passage in a Risāla of al-Kindī (ed. Abū Rīda, i, 161-2) exhibits the word assimilated into the language in the form of a triliteral root H W Y, which possesses a fifth form verb, with a maṣdar, sometimes given a plural, and a passive. The discussion concerns the One; among sensible things, a being is both one and many. "... If there were no unity there would be no multiplicity. Thus every multiple (being) is made what it is (or: is made itself) by unity: tahawwī kull kat͟hīr huwa bi-'l-waḥda. If there were no unity the multiple would have no huwiyya (ipseity)". "The flux of unity that comes from the first and true One is the tahawwī of every sensible being", its establishment as an individual being, as it were. It is thus the One that is "the creator of all the mutahawwiyāt (all the beings that are constituted as individual beings, that are characterized). There is thus no huwiyya (ipseity), except because of the unity that is in it". Cf. also p. 123, line 5, and the explanation given at 129, note 4: "... a huwiyya, that is to say a thing subsisting by itself", and so a substance (referring to huwa huwa).

In the Liber de Causis, ed. Bardenhewer, 89, huwiyya is used in the singular and the plural with the meaning of "being", ens and entia (reference given by S. Afnan, Philosophical terminology in Arabic and Persian, Leiden 1964, 123, but four out of seven of the references indicated in notes are incorrect). The word is applied to "the first huwiyya, which established the things that have no limit", then to the intellectual and the sensible huwiyyāt; in other terms, to the first Being, to the beings that are pure intelligences and finally to the beings that possess sensibility.

The so-called Theology of Aristotle, the texts of which are now identified with long fragments of the Enneads (cf. Plotini opera, ii, ed. P. Henry and H.-R. Schwyzer, Plotiniana arabica, with English translation by G. Lewis, Paris-Brussels 1959), also uses huwiyya, generally translated by "identity", and more rarely by "own self" (383) and "being" (393). "Identity" translates ταυτότης, huwiyya, which is opposed to g͟hayriyya, "otherness", ἑτερότης (Lewis, 271, rendering Theology, ed. Dieterici, 109, lines 7-8, ed. Badawi, 112, line 11). At the beginning of chapter X of the Theology, however, the account of the first huwiyya, the huwiyya of intelligence, is not suited to the translation of αὐτός by "identity" (Lewis, 291, Dieterici, 136, Badawi, 134), for the accent is on the action produced by a substance. This is more precisely stated subsequently (Lewis, 293, Dieterici, 137, lines 13-16, Badawi, 135, lines 13-15), and it is difficult to allow the transposition: "The true One originates the identity of the mind because of the intensity of its repose. When that identity looks at the true One ...", etc. The discussion obviously concerns a substantial form, which is engendered by the true One and contemplates it. "Ipseity" therefore seems preferable.

In the translation of Aristotle's Metaphysics which accompanies the Commentary of Ibn Rus͟hd, huwiyya is commonly used to render τὸ εἶναι and τὸ ὄν, "being"; in the plural, "beings" (cf. ed. Bouyges, Index C a, principaux sujets traités, pp. (38) and (97-8), and Index D a, termes de sciences philosophiques, p. (270), with references to the text and the commentary). These usages totally disregard the idea of identity, being concerned either with being, the supreme abstraction: al-huwiyya wa 'l-wāḥid, being and the one, translating τὸ ὄν καὶ τὸ ἕν (1001 a 4), or with beings, τὰ ὄντα, al-huwiyyāt, engendered from the elements (1001 a 16). In Metaphysics 1017 a 22, εἶναι, huwiyyāt is said to assume as many meanings as Aristotle has Categories (ed. Bouyges, 555, 2). The translator thus adopts it in order to render all the meanings of the word "being", whether applied to substance or to accidents. "Ipseity indicates what a thing and its truth are, al-huwiyya tadull ʿalā inniyyat al-s͟hayʾ wa-ḥaḳīḳatihā" (1017 a 31, where the much-discussed term anniyya or inniyya is used to translate τὸ ἔστιν)

Ibn Rus͟hd states that the word is applied to the Categories like the word mawd͟jūd (559, 15). It is, then, not an ism mus͟htarak, an aequivocum noun, giving several meanings according to what is generally understood by it, but a kind of is͟htirāk al-ism, indicating here a relationship founded on reality, since the categories exist only through substance (805, 5-11; Ibn Rus͟hd's expressions are very close to those of Metaphysics Γ 2, 1003 a 33-5). He points out another analogous use: "The noun huwiyya that denotes the essence of a thing is something different from the noun huwiyya that denotes what is true (actual, existing). It is the same with the word "being", mawd͟jūd" (561, 5). In other words the word has a conceptual, logical meaning, and an actual meaning, as explained by the commentator (739 d and 740 g) on Metaphysics 1027 b 18, trans. 736, 12, where he demonstrates the difference between the huwiyyatayni.

Ibn Rus͟hd later uses huwiyya in an abstract meaning, different from that given by the translator. Lafẓat al-huwiyya denotes the use of the pronoun huwa as a copula. This is in connexion with huwa in the phrase "Socrates is not-white" (1017 a 34), translated as: ... laysa huwa abyaḍ. Ibn Rus͟hd here distinguishes between lafẓat al-huwiyya indicating "the copula that is in the spirit, and (the word) indicating the essence that is external to the spirit", and so actual (561, last line—562, line 1). But contrary to the interpretation of S. Afnan (op. cit., 122), the word huwiyya is not used as a copula, this role being reserved for the pronouns huwa, hiya, etc. Study of the passages indicated in Bouyges's Index is fundamental for determining the meaning of the word.

The terms that express identity are translated in the Metaphysics by huwa huwa or even al-huwa huwa, but not huwiyya. Sometimes the word is omitted: thus ταυτότης (995 b 21) does not appear, and only ἐναντιότης is rendered by al-mutaḍādda, contrariety (172, 14); the commentary does not rectify this omission, but later (178, 5-6) writes al-huwa huwa wa-'l-ghayr, "the same and (the) other". The fragment corresponding with another use of the same word (1018 a 7) is missing in the translation. The expressions ὁ αὐτός and τὸ αὐτό are always translated by huwa huwa or hiya hiya, for example in chapter I 3 (1054 a and b; trans. 1286-92), and the commentary follows this. Shay' wāḥid, the same thing (346, 2-3), is also found, but never huwiyya.

The Arabic-speaking philosophers thus found this word already well established. They used it without explaining it as Ibn Rushd was to do subsequently. Al-Fārābī begins his Fuṣūṣ with a distinction between conceptual essence and essence actualized in an existing individual: "We have accepted that every existing thing has a quiddity (essence) and an ipseity, māhiyya wa-huwiyya, but its quiddity is not its ipseity or even an integral part of it. If man's quiddity were his ipseity, the concept of man's quiddity would be the concept of his ipseity, and by conceiving what man is, mā 'l-insān, you would conceive: huwa 'l-insān, he is the man (in the sense of: there is a man), and you would recognize his existence". For al-Fārābī, then, huwiyya expresses man as nature actualized and existing. A. Nader gives "ipseity" as the translation of huwiyya, p. 158 of the glossary accompanying his edition of the Kitāb arā' ahl al-madīna al-fāḍila, another work of al-Fārābī (Beirut 1959). The same translation is given by Gardet, La pensée religieuse d'Avicenne (Paris 1951, 167). But, quoting the Liber de Causis where the word is applied to the first Cause, he writes "l'Existant pur", "the pure Existing Being" (ibid., 63-4).

From the examination of a certain number of uses of huwiyya in the texts of Ibn Sīnā, of which eleven are noted in A.-M. Goichon's Lexique de la langue philosophique d'Ibn Sīnā, no. 735, the most precise equivalent of the term would seem to be "subject-substance, first substance, as opposed to māhiyya, quiddity, which denotes second substance, predicative substance. Its abstract form expresses 'being a first substance'". Again, huwiyya denotes "a concrete being considered universally" (introduction to the French translation of the Ishārāt of Ibn Sīnā, 48; cf. also 305 and 307, n.). The meaning "ipseity" is confirmed by al-Ghazālī in a line of argument designed to prove that the soul subsists by itself (Tahāfut, ed. Bouyges, Index C no. 826, and p. 321, 5).

he glossary accompanying the critical edition of the Metaphysics of the Shifā' (Cairo 1960, 477) gives three renderings of the word according to the mediaeval translation: Id quod est, essentia, identitas. This last seems somewhat ill-chosen in the following chapter heading: "Consequences of unity consonant with huwiyya (identitas) and its divisions . . ." (303). In the extant fragment of the Latin translation of the Logic it is also translated as identitas (Index ed. Cairo 1952, p. 157, on Madkhal, 13, 5 and 7). However, al-huwiyya is here joined with al-waḥda, and is thus connected with the usages considered above, where being and the one are inseparable; identitas, then, is unjustified. Huwiyya does not appear in the indices to the other volumes. According to that of the Sophistics (Shifā', Manṭiḳ, vii, 132), the idea of identity is rendered by huwa huwa, with or without the article.

The ancient meaning of huwiyya refers to the peculiar characteristics of that being which is huwa, exclusively itself, rather than to a recognition, a comparison or an identification of such a being. The modern meaning does not involve an incorrect usage. Huwiyya is habitually used to translate into Arabic the expressions "identity card", biṭāḳat al-huwiyya, and "identity papers", awrāḳ al-huwiyya [see TADHKIRA]. 'Urifa huwiyyatuhu, "to be identified", is also used. The modern meaning correctly refers to the idea of subject-substance, in order to denote precisely the person who exists specified by the card.

HUWWĀRA [see HAWWĀRA].

ḤUWWĀRĪN or Ḥawwārīn, place in Syria between Damascus and Palmyra, half way between Ṣadad and al-Ḳaryatayn. On the site of an antique town, Ḥuwwārīn is known mainly for the fact that the Umayyad caliph Yazīd I had his residence, died and was buried there, as is attested by the poets of the period. A building still existing there, and still known today as Ḳaṣr Yazīd, may be considered as the partial remains of the residence of the caliph, who is known to have planned to irrigate the fertile area round Ḥuwwārīn by means of a canal which was never completed. Some vestiges of this canal, which according to the sources was intended to permit the development of the high plain of Saḥṣaḥān, have been identified within the boundaries of the region of Ḥims.

ʿIBĀD [see NAṢĀRĀ].

IBADAN, town in the Western Region of Nigeria, originated during the 1820's on the site of an Egba village as a war encampment set up by groups of wandering Yoruba soldiers from the old Oyo Empire, Ile Ife and Ijebu. Those were times of great upheavals in Yorubaland. The Oyo Empire had been rapidly disintegrating as a result of serious internal cleavages and mounting external pressure. The Fulani had been pushing southward, using Ilorin as a base, and eventually in 1837 they forced the evacuation of old Oyo, whose inhabitants fled southward. Some of the refugees built up the new city of Oyo, about 100 miles to the south, while others settled in Ibadan. In southern Yorubaland a fierce strife went on among the Yoruba states over the capture of slaves and the control of trade routes to the coast.

Ibadan grew rapidly, as more and more refugees from both the north and the south of Yorubaland sought the protection of its hills and the military might of its soldiers. By the middle of the 19th century its population was estimated at between 60,000 and 100,000. In the 1911 census the population reached 175,000 and in that of 1952 459,196. To-day Ibadan is the largest city in tropical Africa. Except for a relatively small number of migrants from other ethnic groups (only about 5% in 1952) all of its population are Yoruba [q.v.], hailing from different sections of Yorubaland. Ibadan has often been described as a "city-village" because a large proportion of its population live from farming in the surrounding countryside.

In the course of the 19th century Ibadan developed an elaborate political constitution which was geared to war and defence and which differed markedly from that of the typical traditional Yoruba kingdom. By its military prowess and strong defences Ibadan succeeded in halting the Fulani onslaught and in repulsing all pressure on it from the southern Yoruba states and eventually became a great power in its own right with many vassal states around it.

That period of continual warfare came to an end when the British extended their control northwards from the coast and finally, in 1893, imposed a treaty, on Ibadan. Peace and British power undermined the authority of the city's chiefs. But with the development of Indirect Rule, the British placed Ibadan under the legal and spiritual authority of the Alafin of Oyo who, in collaboration with the British Resident, controlled the appointment of the chiefs. However, this subservience of Ibadan to a small and weak Oyo could not last for long, and in 1936 Ibadan became finally independent of Oyo and the Bale assumed the new title of 'Olubadan'. In 1952 Ibadan became the capital of the Western Region of the Federation of Nigeria.

Islam penetrated into Ibadan from the north early in its history through the activities of Muslim traders and itinerant malams. During the 19th century its military chiefs appointed Muslim imāms so that these would use their magic, prayers, charms, and blessing to secure victory in war. But the massive conversion to Islam in the city began only when the British came; it has since been progressing rapidly and peacefully, often at the expense of better organized and more adequately financed Christian churches and missions.

Apart from a relatively small number of people who are affiliated to the Aḥmadiyya sect, all the Muslims of the city are Sunnīs who follow the Mālikī school. Some of these Muslims have adopted the Ḳādiriyya order but many more have joined the Tidjāniyya order [qq.v.]. There are in the city several formally organized Islamic associations, most of which are mainly concerned with the development of Islamic schools and the establishment and maintenance of mosques. There are also some Islamic missionary organizations. A council of ʿulamāʾ supervises and administers the affairs of the city's Central Mosque and selects the Chief Imām and his two assistants, though the formal appointment of the Chief Imām is officially made by the Olubadan in a special ceremony.

The Friday mid-day prayer at the Central Mosque is regularly attended by many thousands of men. Between 1942 and 1952 a series of bitter disputes arose between the city's Imāmate and the migrant Hausa community, when the latter decided to secede from the predominantly Yoruba Central Mosque and to hold the Friday prayer in a special mosque within their Quarter, which is locally known as 'Sabo'. Despite sustained opposition by the Olubadan and by the British officials, the Hausa have continued to hold a separate Friday prayer. A few other Muslim groupings have since done the same. To-day the only occasion on which all the Muslims of the city gather together is the massive, colourful, but brief ceremony held in the open just outside the city on the morning of the first day of each of the two Muslim feasts. This division of the Friday ritual congregagion, which is unknown in the Islamic cities of northern Nigeria, is symbolic of the fact that Islam in Ibadan is not formally associated with political authority.

Bibliography: Most of the publications which deal with the history of the Yoruba contain sections on the history of Ibadan. See S. Johnson, The history of the Yorubas, London 1921. A small book by the present Olubadan, I. B. Akinyele, The outlines of Ibadan history, Lagos 1946, is useful. Ibadan, edited by S. O. Biobaku, I.O. Dina and P. C. Lloyd, Ibadan 1949, contains some informative papers that were delivered at the Third International West African Conference (Ibadan). G. Parrinder, Religion in an African city, Oxford 1953, discusses various aspects of religion in Ibadan and gives some detailed information on the development and organization of Islam in the city. Akin Mabogunje, The growth of residential districts in Ibadan, in The Geographical Review, lii/1 (1962), 56-77, provides very useful information about the morphology of the city. Two Ph.D. theses deal directly and systematically with the history of Ibadan: B. Awe, The rise of Ibadan as a Yoruba power in the nineteenth century, Oxford University 1964; and G. Jenkins, Politics in Ibadan, Northwestern University 1964, the latter beginning where the former leaves off. Both are now being prepared for publication. A collection of scholarly papers by a number of specialists dealing with many fields of life in the city, including one dealing specifically with Islam, is now published: P. C. Lloyd, A. Mabogunje, and B. Awe (eds.), The city of Ibadan, Cambridge 1967.

ʿIBĀDĀT (pl. of ʿibāda), submissive obedience to a master, and therefore religious practice, corresponds, together with its synonym ṭāʿa, in the works of fiḳh, approximately to the ritual of Muslim law (we do not say "cult", see below), as opposed to the muʿāmalāt which include more or less all the rest (but which, in the strict sense, correspond to synallagmatic contracts only). The distinctions are elusive, as so often in these matters. Ṣalāt is quite certainly an ʿibāda, but some affirm that marriage is also one (which is the more remarkable in that the Muslim marriage does not imply any religious ceremony), and here it must be understood that it is a matter of a "pious practice". Moreover, distinctions between the different sections of muʿāmalāt are also discussed by the authors (see W. Heffening, Zum Aufbau des islamischen Rechtes, in Festschrift P. Kahle, Leiden 1935). In treatises of fiḳh, subjects are not set out in any uniform order, except that the ʿibādāt always appear at the beginning, while in treatises of ʿamal (judicial practice) this subject is obviously absent.

If we translate ʿibādāt as "cult" we are committing something of a theoretical error (Tor Andrae), for it has quite correctly been said that, strictly speaking, Islam knows no more of a cult, properly speaking, than (Snouck Hurgronje) it does of law; nor, we should add, of ethics. Fiḳh is, in fact, a deontology (the statement of the whole corpus of duties, of acts whether obligatory, forbidden or recommended, etc.) which is imposed upon man. Therefore, what we call "cult" is a part of the duties prescribed by Allāh and formulated in minute detail by learned writers in the works of fiḳh, whereas in other religions the object of the cult there is to bring the believer closer to the divine and into contact with it; it is not concerned solely, or even principally, with carrying out the divine will. This is purely theoretical; speaking sociologically and from the psychological point of view, the matter appears to be far less clear-cut: from both these points of view Islam is certainly familiar with a cult or forms of worship: to be convinced of this one need only interrogate, for example, the pilgrims who have performed the ṣalāt around the Kaʿba, an observance which, incidentally, in that place, is curiously enough not an obligation of the ḥadjdj (this demonstrates once again the difference between theory and reality; here, on two grounds).

In the books of fiḳh, the ʿibādāt precede the muʿāmalāt; questions of ritual purity (ṭahāra), a necessary condition for the valid performance of prayer, appear at the beginning. The remainder almost always come afterwards in the following order: prayer, zakāt, fasting, pilgrimage. The first "pillar" of Islam, the shahāda, which has to be pronounced at the time of prayer, is so simple a matter that the books of fiḳh make no mention of it.

In connexion with the ʿibādāt other subjects are dealt with, about which we must say a few words. Circumcision is, in theory, no more than recommended, although the sociological reality is quite different, and the scholars barely refer to it when considering the ʿibādāt. Here too may be mentioned the proper way of fulfilling natural needs, the veiling of nudity, and the attentions that have to be given to dress and body for the Friday prayer, etc. Everything relating to funerals is examined in relation to prayer (since prayer for the dead is considered in a special section). The spiritual retreat, or iʿtikāf, is studied in connexion with fasting. It is also possible to link with ʿibādāt, as scarcely belonging to the muʿāmalāt: the provisions relating to food and drink, whether licit or illicit, those dealing with hunting and ritual slaughter, vows and oaths (together with methods of expiation in the case of perjury). To give only one example, in the Tanbīh of al-Shīrāzī (Shāfiʿī), oaths in general are studied in connexion with repudiation (on account of such matters as liʿān, etc., which are linked with it). The holy war is not a farḍ ʿayn (it is an obligation which falls only on the community in general, provided that there are enough volunteers), nor is it one of the five fundamental obligations of Islam, but it has an obvious religious character. In the above-named work it occurs at the end (after criminal law); in the Mukhtaṣar of al-Khalīl (Mālikī), on the other hand, it occurs among the ʿibādāt.

In their general outline, the provisions relating to ʿibādāt are the same, not only in the four Sunnī schools but also in the Shīʿī and Ibāḍī schools. There is thus no necessity to discuss them further in this general article on ʿibādāt. So much for the theory.

In regard to actual social practice, one of the most urgent and interesting present-day tasks that is still to be undertaken in this field, and indispensable for religious sociology in general, consists of studying the extent (which is extremely variable) to which the practices of a religion, in this case Islam, do in fact correspond to the requirements laid down by theory, in this case by fiḳh on the subject of ʿibādāt; this is to be done, particularly, according to the methods first demonstrated, for Catholicism, by Le Bras. In this field, from the start, facts of a qualitative kind will be discovered, and they will show us what the religious life there really is. Some of these studies, even the early ones, still retain their value—Lane, Manners and Customs of the modern Egyptians, for example, and Snouck-Hurgronje's Mekka, which are admirable. For Indonesia, one may consult G.-H. Bousquet, L'Islam indonésien, in REI, 1939. But, for future work, this stage ought to be regarded as superseded, as indeed it is. It is the quantitative, statistical stage that must now be reached. In this respect, Muslim sociology is very backward (some indications in this direction, though cautious and inadequate, can be found in G.-H. Bousquet, concerning religious practice in North Africa, especially Morocco, in Études d'orientalisme . . . Lévi-Provençal, ii, 1962, 495-502). As a very rough approximation, it can be suggested here that (1) ritual practice, considered as a whole, varies less from one country to another than does the practice of these duties envisaged singly; (2) in fact, in certain regions a fundamental obligation may be very much neglected, while in other parts it is scrupulously observed (for example, fasting in Java and North Africa respectively); (3) in backward regions, in the process of Islamization, practice comes to conform more closely with the standards of the Law; (4) on the other hand, it is relaxed in those countries where European civilization is developing (for example, increasing disregard of fasting in North Africa). Of course, external piety is only an indication, and often an insufficiently accurate one, of internal piety. However, religious sociology in general is not yet in a position, in this last instance, to be of assistance to Islamic studies.

Bibliography: The regulation of ʿibādāt has its somewhat restricted basis in the Ḳurʾān. It is developed very fully in the Sunna (cf. Wensinck's Handbook for the various terms used above). The same is true of the books of fiḳh of the various schools and in works of ikhtilāf. A more detailed bilbiography can be found by consulting such articles as ṢAWM, ḤADJDJ, etc. A general, clear, but necessarily brief survey is given in G.-H. Bousquet, Les grandes pratiques rituelles de l'Islam, Paris 1949.

(G.-H. BOUSQUET)

AL-IBĀḌIYYA, one of the main branches of the Khāridjīs [q.v.], representatives of which are today found in ʿUmān, East Africa, Tripolitania (Djabal Nafūsa and Zuagha) and southern Algeria (Wargla and Mzab). The sect takes it name from that of one of those said to have founded it, ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibāḍ al-Murrī al-Tamīmī. The form usually employed is Abāḍiyya; this is true not only of North Africa (e.g., in the Djabal Natūsa, cf. A. de C. Motylinski, Le Djebel Nefousa, Paris 1898-9, 41 and passim), where it is attested in the 9th/15th century by the Ibāḍī writer al-Barrādī (Kitāb Djawāhir al-muntaḳāt, Cairo 1302, 155), but also of ʿUmān (Niebuhr, Voyage en Arabie, 1780, ii, 198); nevertheless, the contemporary Ibāḍī writers often use the first form as being more correct (cf., e.g., Muḥammad b. Yūsuf Aṭfiyyash al-Mīzābī, Risāla shāfiya fī baʿḍ al-tawārikh, Algiers, n.d., 49). Yet another form of the name is known: Ibāḍa (al-Hamdānī, Ṣifat Djazīrat al-ʿArab, ed. D. H. Müller, Leiden 1884-91, i, 88). According to Neibuhr (op. cit., ii, 198, 200, 201), the Ibāḍīs of ʿUmān had also the name of Béiasi, Beïasi or Béiadi (cf. also Badger, History of the Imâms and Seyyids of Omân by Salîl-ibn-Razîk, London 1871, 387). It appears that the last name (for Bayāḍī) is connected with Mubayyiḍa, a name given to the Khāridjīs in general (see Brünnow, Die Charidschiten unter den ersten Omayyaden, Leiden 1884, 30, n.). The Ibāḍīs also give themselves the name of Shurāt [q.v.], which in fact refers to the first Khāridjīs or al-Muḥakkima (al-Barrādī, op. cit., 175; A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghir, in Actes du XIVe Congrès Intern. des Orient., Algiers 1905, 81; cf. also al-Yaʿḳūbī, Buldān, 352).

According to the tradition recorded towards the middle of the 2nd/8th century by Abū Mikhnaf, this sect appeared in 65/684-5, when ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibāḍ broke away from the Khāridjī extremists over the attitude to be adopted towards the other ahl al-tawḥīd (Brünnow, op. cit., 60-1; Wellhausen, Die religiös-politischen Oppositionsparteien im alten Islam, Berlin 1901, 28-9), but in fact the origins of the Ibāḍiyya seem to be much older than modern scholars have thought. The present author's view is that the pre-history of this sect, together with that of another moderate Khāridjī sect, the Ṣufriyya [q.v.], should be connected with that group of the ḳaʿada (quietist, see Brünnow, op. cit., 29; Wellhausen, op. cit., 29) Khāridjīs which grew up towards the middle of the 1st/7th century at Baṣra around one of the men most venerated by the Khawāridj, Abū Bilāl Mirdās b. Udayya al-Tamīmī. Ibāḍī tradition mentions Abū Bilāl among the precursors of the Ibāḍiyya, or even among the first *imām*s of the sect (al-Shammākhī, Kitāb al-Siyar, Cairo 1301, 66 ff; al-Barrādī, op. cit., 167 ff.; al-Sālimī, Kitāb al-Lumʿa al-murḍiya, 1326, 187; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, University of Lwow, MS no. 1082, ii, 135, 664-5; it should be mentioned that the other writers have considered Abū Bilāl to be the imām of the Ṣufriyya, see, e.g., al-Isfarāʾinī in Haarbrücker, asch-Schahrastâni's Religionpartheien und Philosophenschulen, Halle 1850, ii, 406). This tradition seems very probable, particularly if it is remembered that among Abū Bilāl's intimate friends there were several who were to become outstanding scholars of the Ibāḍiyya, as, for example, the real organizer of the sect, Djābir b. Zayd (see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 79) and al-Walīd al-ʿAbdī, one of the leaders of the moderate Khāridjīs who broke away from the extremist Nāfiʿ b. al-Azraḳ (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 79). Furthermore, the doctrines preached by Abū Bilāl, such as, for example, the defence of istiʿrāḍ (Wellhausen, op. cit., 25-6), are in large measure identical with Ibāḍī theories.

After the death of Abū Bilāl, who led a revolt in 61 and was killed in a battle one year later, it was probably ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibāḍ who became the leader of the moderate party (he is mentioned among the chief Khāridjī personalities in 64; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 77; cf. Wellhausen, op. cit., 27), making a complete break with the Azraḳīs in 65. The extremists pronounced a khurūdj against the Zubayrids and left Baṣra, while Ibn Ibāḍ, after some hesitation, remained there with his supporters (al-Barrādī, op. cit., 155-6). Thus began the first period in the history of the Ibāḍiyya, which can be called the period of the kitmān (= secret, on this term see below and al-Barrādī, op. cit., 156). Very little is known of ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibāḍ. According to the Ibāḍī writings, he was the first scholar of the sect (Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 74, 108). He is often called in Ibāḍī sources imām ahl al-taḥḳīḳ, imām al-muslimīn or imām al-ḳawm (see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 77; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 108, 111; al-Barrādī, op. cit.; P. K. Hitti, al-Baghdādī's Characteristics of Muslim Sects, Cairo 1924, 87). It seems that this title belongs only to the period in which Ibn Ibāḍ took part in the defence of Medina (64/683-4); the state of kitmān in which the Ibāḍīs lived after 65 seems to exclude the possibility of the existence of an imāmate in the political sense of the word. Perhaps also there should be seen in this title an allusion to his rôle as president in a sort of secret theocratic Ibāḍī government known as djamāʿat al-Muslimīn, which is mentioned by historians of the sect. This was a council composed of a number of the most important *shaykh*s (among them al-Walīd al-ʿAbdī) which may be compared to the council of the ʿazzāba of the North African Ibāḍīs after the collapse of the imāmate of the Banū Rustam. The ḳuʿūd (quietism) of Ibn Ibāḍ was probably prompted by the hope of reaching an understanding with the new Umayyad caliph ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān (65-86/685-705). In fact, be succeeded in entering into correspondence with this ruler, and there are preserved in the Ibāḍī chronicles two naṣāʾiḥ (letters of good advice) from Ibn Ibāḍ which bear witness to their friendly relations; one of these letters is a reply from the Ibāḍī leader to a communication which had been sent to him by ʿAbd al-Malik through the intermediary of a certain Sinān b. ʿĀṣim (see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 77; al-Barrādī, op. cit., 156-67; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 445-55; Sachau, Religiöse Anschauungen der Ibaditischen Muhammedaner, in MSOS As., ii, 52-9). The first of these letters must have been written after 67/686-7, since it mentions the defeat of al-Mukhtār by Muṣʿab, the brother of ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Zubayr, which took place in that year (al-Barrādī, op. cit., 163; cf. Brünnow, op. cit., 86-90). The letters of Ibn Ibāḍ contain a brief account of Ibāḍī principles, which is the first of this type (see also on Ibn Ibāḍ's relations with ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, R. Rubinacci, Il califfo ʿAbd al- Malik b. Marwān e gli Ibāḍiti, in AIUON, n.s. v (1954), 99-121). According to al-Shammākhī (op. cit., 77), Ibn Ibāḍ was also the author of munāẓarāt (polemical writings) against the extremist Khāridjis. The date of his death is not known; the Ibāḍī biographies reveal only that he belonged to the second ṭabaḳa of scholars. The opinion of al-Shahrastānī (Milal, ed. Cureton, 100) and of al-Ḳazwīnī (ʿAdjāʾib, ed. Wüstenfeld, i, 37) that Ibn Ibāḍ was still alive as a very old man under Marwān b. Muḥammad (127-34/745-52) does not seem very convincing.

Ibn Ibāḍ's policy at Baṣra towards the Umayyad caliphs was continued by his successor Abu 'l-Shaʿthāʾ Djābir b. Zayd al-Azdī, the chief scholar of the Ibāḍī sect and an eminent traditionist. This scholar, who came from ʿUmān, from near the town of Nazwā (see Siyār al-ʿUmāniyya, 675; Yāḳūt, ii, 243-4), is considered by the Arab authors to be one of the chief Khāridjis of the early period (al-Shahrastānī, op. cit., 102). His probable date of birth was 18/639, and the date of this death is given as 93, 96 or 103 (see al-Barrādī, op. cit., 155; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 77; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 172; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 686). He was thus the contemporary of ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibāḍ. Djābir b. Zayd was one of the best friends and disciples of ʿAbd Allāh b. al-ʿAbbās [q.v.], from whom he received a number of traditions (Yāḳūt, ii, 156-7, 243-4; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 70, 96; al-Barrādī, op. cit., 151). It was probably owing to this fact as well as to his profound scholarship that Djābir was held in great esteem by all the Muslims of his time; al-Shammākhī (op. cit., 70) mentions in this connexion the opinion of Mālik b. Anas. He was probably the author of the earliest collection of traditions. His work, called Dīwān and consisting of five parts, is now lost; the only copy of it was found in about the 3rd/9th century in the libraries of the ʿAbbāsids at Baghdād (al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 184; E. Masqueray, Chronique d'Abou Zakaria, Algiers-Paris 1878, 181-5).

Among the pupils of Djābir there were several Sunnī traditionists, and Yāḳūt (loc. cit.) even calls him aḥad aʾimmat al-sunna. On the other hand, Djābir carried on a controversy with the Khāridjī extremists and he gave its definitive form to Ibāḍī doctrine (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 76). It is because of this that the Ibāḍī sources refer to him as ʿumdat al-Ibāḍiyya or aṣl al-madhhab (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 70; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, passim). He is also referred to as imām al-Muslimīn (Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 111). It was probably he and not Ibn Ibāḍ who was really responsible for the organization of the sect. It can thus be seen that this eminent Ibāḍī scholar and traditionist, who was revered by all Muslims, was, so to speak, predestined to accomplish the task begun by his predecessor, that is to win over the caliphs to the Ibāḍī doctrine.

Indeed, the first years of Djābir's presidency were very favourable for the Ibāḍiyya. Djābir succeeded in forming friendly relations with the powerful governor of ʿIrāḳ, al-Ḥadjdjādj (76-95/695-714) [q.v.], through the good offices of the latter's secretary, the Khāridjī Yazīd b. Abī Muslim (al-Shammākhī op. cit., 71, 74; al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 56). He even received from him a salary. This was just at the time when al-Ḥadjdjādj was fighting against the Khāridjī extremists. For a long time relations between Djābir and al-Ḥadjdjādj were excellent. Even at a period after the foundation of the town of Wāsiṭ (83-6/702-5), the attitude of the governor of ʿIrāḳ towards Djābir was still very friendly (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 74).

But towards the end of the 1st/7th century relations between them deteriorated. It appears that one of the causes of this change was the death of the caliph ʿAbd al-Malik (86/705), who was, as mentioned above, fairly well disposed towards the Ibāḍis. Another was that the Ibāḍiyya of Baṣra entered into dealings with the family of the Muhallabids, which the powerful governor of ʿIrāḳ detested. In fact among the most fervent Ibāḍis of Baṣra was ʿĀtika, the sister of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, the former governor of Khurāsān, who had been deposed through al-Ḥadjdjādj's efforts and imprisoned by him in 86/705; among the Muhallabids converted to Ibāḍism there was another woman, Halbiyya, who lived at Mecca in about the first half of the 2nd/8th century (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 88, 117; J. Périer, Vie d'al-Hadjdjadj ibn Yousof. Paris 1904, 221, 232). In addition to these two facts, a third should be mentioned: the increasing radicalism of the Ibāḍis of Baṣra, among whom the revolutionary elements gained control, that is the supporters of the khurūdj who wished to change their position as ḳaʿada for that of shurāt. From the writings of the sect we know the name of one of the leaders of the revolutionary party: Bisṭām b. ʿUmar b. al-Musīb al-Ḍabbī, known also as Maṣḳala, a former Ṣufrī and supporter of Shabīb [q.v.], who, after Shabīb's defeat in 77/696, embraced Ibāḍism and settland at Baṣra. He was not only a famous warrior but also a mutakallim (theologian). It appears that the Ibāḍī zealots of Baṣra took part in the revolt of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath in 81-2/701-2; in fact we find in ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's army a detachment composed of men from Kūfa and Baṣra and under the command of one Bisṭām b. Maṣḳala (probably identical with our Maṣḳala) who died in a battle with all his men (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 111; Wellhausen, op. cit., 46-7; Périer, op. cit., 173, 176, 184, 191-3). The activity of these Ibāḍī zealots led to the withdrawal of al-Ḥadjdjādj's support. The immediate cause of his definite break with Djābir was probably the murder, at Djābir's instigation, of one of al-Ḥadjdjādj's spies (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 75). He began a cruel persecution of the Ibāḍis. The majority of the Ibāḍī leaders and notables were either exiled to ʿUmān (Djābir himself, for example, and another important Ibāḍī shaykh, Hubayra; cf. al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 76, 81) or imprisoned (on this see also Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 250). Among the Ibāḍī leaders imprisoned was the most scholarly of Djābir's pupils and his future successor as president of the Ibāḍī djamāʿa at Baṣra, Abū ʿUbayda Muslim b. Abī Karīma al-Tamīmī (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 87), who was probably the greatest, both as scholar and as statesman, of all the Khāridjī leaders known to us and who played an important political rôle under the last Umayyads.

Abū ʿUbayda was probably of Iranian origin (according to Aghānī, xx, 97, his personal name was Kūdīn; and according to al-Djāḥiẓ, al-Bayān, i, 133 and ii, 126, it was Karzīn or Kūrīn) and mawlā of the Arab tribe of the Banū Tamīm (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 83). He studied with Djābir and also with other famous Ibāḍī shaykhs of the second ṭabaḳa, such as Djaʿfar b. al-Sammāk al-ʿAbdī and Ṣuḥār al-ʿAbdī (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 79, 81). After the death of al-Ḥadjdjādj (95/714), who was succeeded by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, Abū ʿUbayda was released from prison with the other Ibāḍis and appointed leader of the Ibāḍī community in Baṣra (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 87). The Ibāḍī writers refer to him as imām al-Muslimīn (Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 111), but he seems in reality to have been, as was his predecessor

Djābir, only the president of the djamāʿat al-Muslimīn of Baṣra and the muḳaddam (leader) over the other members of this council such as Ḍummān b. al-Sāʾib, Abū Nūḥ and even over his former teacher, Djaʿfar b. al-Sammāk (see Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 672). Abū ʿUbayda was an eminent scholar and the author of a collection of the *ḥadīth*s transmitted by Djābir b. Zayd, Djaʿfar b. al-Sammāk and Ṣuḥār al-ʿAbdī (Lewicki, Une chronique ibāḍite, in RÉI, 1934, 72; see also al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 83; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 185). The Ibāḍiyya from all parts of the Muslim world came to study with him (see ʿAbd Allāh b. Yaḥyā al-Bārūnī, Risālat sullam al-ʿāmma wa 'l-mubtadiʾīn ilā maʿrifat aʾimmat al-dīn, Cairo 1324, 6-8). Abū ʿUbayd's policy at first conformed completely with Ibn Ibāḍ's tendency to come to an understanding with the Umayyads. This was facilitated by the benevolent attitude of the new governor of ʿIrāḳ, Yazīd b. Muhallab, who was closely linked with the Ibāḍīs of Baṣra through his sister ʿĀtika, a fervent Ibāḍī as mentioned above. The hopes of the Ibāḍī *shaykh*s of winning the Umayyads to their cause increased with the accession to the throne of the devout caliph ʿUmar II (99-101/717-20). Abū ʿUbayda sent to this ruler an embassy, among whose members were Sālim al-Hilālī and the scholar shaykh Djaʿfar b. al-Sammāk who, because of his great learning, is referred to in the Ibāḍī sources as imām al-Muslimīn. This mission was still at the court of ʿUmar II at the time of the death of his son, ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿUmar (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 79-80; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 111, 665, 666). It should be added that the Ibāḍīs were not the only ones wishing to reach an agreement with ʿUmar II. It is known that another Khāridjī group, whose leader was Shawdhab (on him see Wellhausen, op. cit., 48) and which lived in the district of Rabīʿa in Mesopotamia, sent a mission to this ruler (see Masʿūdī, Murūdj, v, 434-5). The results of this Ibāḍī mission are not known; it may have been due to it that the Ibāḍī Iyās b. Muʿāwiya was appointed ḳāḍī of Baṣra (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 81). But this favourable state of affairs for the Ibāḍiyya did not last long. ʿUmar II died in 101/720, and his successor Yazīd II was unfavourably disposed towards the Muhallabids, the patrons of the Ibāḍīs of Baṣra. Details of the fortunes of the Ibāḍiyya of Baṣra during the first two decades of the 2nd/8th century are not known; there certainly took place at this period a complete change in their attitudes and there even appeared some revolutionary tendencies. Leaders of the revolutionary party which favoured direct action were Abū Nūḥ, the supporter of a definitive rupture with the caliphate, and a famous khaṭīb, Abū Muḥammad al-Nahdī, who, in his sermons delivered in the mosques of Baṣra, overtly incited the crowd to revolt against the governor of ʿIrāḳ, Khālid b. ʿAbd Allāh (105-20/723-38) (see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 88, 97; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 185). The activities of the zealots of Baṣra were facilitated by the attitude of indifference of the governor of this town, Bilāl b. Abī Burda al-Ashʿarī (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 97). Abū ʿUbayda was at first opposed to direct action since he still hoped to win the caliphs to Ibāḍism. He also saw that the chances of an Ibāḍī khurūdj similar to the revolts of the Azraḳī extremists were very slender; but in the end, after consulting the important members of the sect, he was obliged to change his attitude through fear of a khilāf (schism) among the Ibāḍiyya of Baṣra, the majority of whom wished to move from the position of ḳuʿūd to that of ẓuhūr (see below; cf. al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 83-8). Yet he adopted a line of action completely different from that of the other Khāridjī leaders. He did not wish the Ibāḍīs of Baṣra to leave the town in order to found an imāmate somewhere outside the capital, following the example of Nāfiʿ b. al-Azraḳ; on the contrary, he planned to make use of the rich and numerous Ibāḍī community of Baṣra only as a base for Ibāḍī propaganda, which should embrace the whole of the Muslim world. He decided to provoke Ibāḍī insurrections in the various provinces and to create a universal Ibāḍī imāmate on the ruins of the Umayyad caliphate. In order to achieve this, Abū ʿUbayda formed a kind of revolutionary government in which he himself was in charge of everything concerning religious action and missions, and another eminent Ibāḍī shaykh of Baṣra, Ḥādjib al-Ṭāʾī, dealt with matters of war and of finance (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 92, 114; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 665). A bayt al-māl was formed; its assets must have been considerable since it is stated, for example, that a single rich Ibāḍī merchant, Abū Ṭāhir, paid a net sum of 10,000 dirhams (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 114-5). There was created at Baṣra a centre of learning where Abū ʿUbayda secretly trained for the task of being missionaries students who came to him from all the Muslim provinces. These missionaries were then sent out in teams (ḥamalat al-ʿilm, "bearers of learning", or naḳalat al-ʿilm). At the head of such a team Abū ʿUbayda placed the candidate for the dignity of imām and the future ḳāḍī. These ḥamalat al-ʿilm were to spread propaganda in the various provinces of the caliphate and, after gaining a certain number of adherents, to pronounce the state of ẓuhūr (see Masqueray, op. cit., 19, 20, 21; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 124; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 676; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 185). According to the Ibāḍī historians, Abū ʿUbayda sent such teams to the Maghrib, the Yaman, Ḥaḍramawt, ʿUmān and Khurāsān (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 114; al-Sālimī, loc. cit.). The operation had a tremendous success; in the midst of the general disorder which preceded the fall of the Umayyads, the influence of the Ibāḍī agitators spread widely. After only a few years, there broke out in various Muslim countries, the Maghrib, the Ḥaḍramawt and ʿUmān, several Ibāḍī revolts which constituted a greater threat to the caliphate than did the Azraḳī movements (see below).

During this period of Ibāḍī expansion, the Ibāḍiyya of Baṣra continued to live in a state of kitmān, keeping their beliefs secret. The advent of the ʿAbbāsids did nothing to change this situation except that the Ibāḍiyya succeeded in gaining the protection of some influential members of the family of the new caliphs. Among these should be mentioned especially the aunt of the caliph al-Mahdī (158-69/775-86) and her husband ʿAbd Allāh b. Rabīʿ, whose son even became an Ibāḍī (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 107-8) It appears also that the caliph Abū Djaʿfar (136-58/753-75) was for a time fairly well disposed towards the Ibāḍīs; it is known, for example, that he was much in sympathy with Ḥādjib al-Ṭāʾī (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 91). Abū ʿUbayda and Ḥādjib both died during Abū Djaʿfar's reign (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 83, 91). The statement of the 5th/11th century Ibāḍī historian Abū Zakariyyāʾ Yaḥyā b. Abī Bakr al-Wārdjlānī that Abū ʿUbayda died during the reign of the Rustamid imām ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (168-208/785-823; cf. Masqueray, op. cit., 51) should in our view be rejected.

After the death of Abū ʿUbayda there began the decline of the Ibāḍī community of Baṣra, as, if we may believe the sectarian sources, had already been observed by the caliph Abū Dja'far (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 91). Nevertheless, under the presidency of al-Rabī' b. Ḥabīb al-Baṣrī, who had succeeded Abū 'Ubayda as the spiritual leader of the Ibāḍiyya, the grand council of the sect still remained in Baṣra and there were even sent out from there new ḥamalat al-'ilm to 'Umān (Siyar al-'Umāniyya, 667; al-Sālimī, Lum'a, 186). The mashāyikh of Baṣra were arbitrators in the affair of the schism of al-Nukkār (see below) towards the end of the 2nd/8th century. This town remained a centre of Ibāḍī culture during the reign of the imām 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who bought books there for the sum of 1,000 *dīnār*s (al-Sālimī, Lum'a, 195). But soon after the affair of al-Nukkār, al-Rabī' and the other Ibāḍī *shaykh*s of Baṣra emigrated to 'Umān, where already al-Rabī''s successor, Abū Sufyān Maḥbūb b. al-Raḥīl, was resident (on al-Rabī' and Abū Sufyān see Siyar al-'Umāniyya, 667; al-Sālimī, Lum'a, 185, 186; Masqueray, op. cit., 74, n. 2, 136-7; Lewicki, Une chronique, 70-2; idem, Notice sur la chronique ibāḍite d'ad-Darǧīnī, in RO, xi, 159-60).

THE IBĀḌĪ GROUPS OUTSIDE BAṢRA

(a) At Kūfa. In spite of the opinion of Wellhausen that the Khāridjīs of Kūfa disappeared completely after the massacre of 59/679, the available sources enable us to establish that the Ibāḍiyya remained in this town during at least the whole of the 2nd/8th century. In fact it was from Kūfa that there came the founder of the Ibāḍī sect of al-Ḥārithiyya (see below), which existed in the first half of the 2nd century. Among the Ibāḍī-Wahbī *faḳīh*s of Kūfa may be mentioned Abu 'l-Muhādjir al-Kūfī, one of the doctors of the second half of the 2nd/8th century (see Masqueray, op. cit., 139 n.; al-Shammākhī op. cit., 121; Wellhausen, op. cit., 24).

(b) In the rest of 'Irāḳ, Ibāḍiyya, belonging to various groups of this sect, probably lived in villages on the road from Baṣra to al-Mawṣil (see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 120-1).

(c) At al-Mawṣil Ibāḍīs were to be found. Among the Ibāḍī doctors of this town there should be mentioned, on the evidence of the Ibāḍī sources, one Abū Bakr al-Mawṣilī. It seems very probable that there were also some Ibāḍiyya among the Khawāridj mentioned by the authors of the 4th/10th and 5th/11th centuries in the province of al-Djazīra, to the west of al-Mawṣil (al-Sālimī, Lum'a, 180; Siyar al-'Umāniyya, 667; al-Mas'ūdī, op. cit., v, 230-1; Ḥudūd al-'ālam, 140).

(d) Ḥidjāz. It appears that the Ibāḍīs were fairly numerous at Medina and Mecca and that even in the 2nd/8th century there were Ibāḍī djamā'as in these towns. Mecca was probably in the 2nd century one of the centres of very vigorous Ibāḍī propaganda. Remnants of the Ibāḍiyya still existed in Mecca in the 6th/12th century. Among the Ibāḍī doctors of Ḥidjāz in the 2nd and 3rd centuries were: Abu 'l-Ḥurr 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn al-'Anbarī, Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb, Muḥammad b. Salma and Ibn 'Abbād al-Madanī (see Masqueray, op. cit., 64, 121-3, 147; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 97-9; al-Sālimī, Lum'a, 183; Siyar al-'Umāniyya, 679).

(e) Central Arabia. Abū 'Ubayda seems to have sent ḥamalat al-'ilm towards the centre of the Arabian peninsula, perhaps to the Yamāma where there had existed shortly before a Khāridjī imāmate of the al-Nadjdiyya sect, linked to the doctrines of Ibn Ibāḍ (see al-Bārūnī, Sullam, 7; Wellhausen, op. cit., 29-32; Brünnow, op. cit., 61).

(f) Ḥaḍramawt and Yemen. The origins of Ibāḍism in the Ḥaḍramawt and the Yemen are rather obscure. They should perhaps be connected with activity by the first leader of the Ibāḍī sect, 'Abd Allāh b. Ibāḍ, who died, according to Ibn Ḥawḳal (i, 37), in the canton of al-Mudhaykhira in the south-west of the Yemen. Ibn Ibāḍ's arrival in the Yemen was probably connected with the conquest of southern Arabia by the Khāridjīs, which took place between the years 65 and 73/685-92. The Khawāridj's control of this country did not last long and ended in 73. It appears, however, that Khāridjī tendencies persisted in southern Arabia, culminating, at the time of the decline of the Umayyad caliphate, in an Ibāḍī revolt. This revolt had been prepared by Ibāḍī agitators from Baṣra who excited the anti-Umayyad feeling which prevailed in southern Arabia under the régime of al-Ḳāsim b. 'Umar (Ḳuwaysim in the Ibāḍī chronicles), who had been installed as governor of Ṣan'ā' by the caliph Marwān b. Muḥammad, and that of Ibrāhīm b. Djabala b. Makhrama al-Kindī, the Umayyad governor of the Ḥaḍramawt and the subordinate of al-Ḳāsim b. 'Umar. The leader of the dissidents was 'Abd Allāh b. Yaḥyā al-Kindī, known as Ṭālib al-Ḥaḳḳ, ḳāḍī to the governor of the Ḥaḍramawt and a devout and energetic man. He made an agreement with Abū 'Ubayda Muslim b. Abī Karīma, who encouraged him to revolt against the Umayyad government. This appears to have taken place towards the end of 127 or the beginning of 128. At the same time, Abū 'Ubayda Muslim sent to 'Abd Allāh b. Yaḥyā a group of prominent Ibāḍīs from Baṣra who were to help him to organize an imāmate in the Ḥaḍramawt; at their head were Abū Ḥamza al-Mukhtār b. 'Awf al-Azdī and Baldj b. 'Uḳba al-Uzdī. Having arrived in the Ḥaḍramawt, the Ibāḍī emissaries recognized 'Abd Allāh b. Yaḥyā as imām, thus establishing the first Ibāḍī imāmate. The rebels occupied the capital of the Ḥaḍramawt and later, in 129/746-7, the town of Ṣan'ā', the capital of the whole of southern Arabia. Then 'Abd Allāh b. Yaḥyā decided to occupy the two Holy Cities, Mecca and Medina. The Ibāḍī army, only 900 or 1,000 strong, and under the command of Abū Ḥamza al-Mukhtār, took Mecca with ease, and then Medina. The Arab chronicles have preserved the text of two *khuṭba*s which Abū Ḥamza al-Mukhtār pronounced in these two towns. After occupying the Ḥidjāz, the Ibāḍīs became an immediate threat to Umayyad rule in Syria, the centre of the caliphate, so that Marwān b. Muḥammad was forced to act with all speed against this aggression. He sent against the Ibāḍīs a strong army composed of 4,000 Syrian soldiers under the command of 'Abd al-Mālik b. 'Aṭiyya al-Sa'dī, who re-conquered Medina and then Mecca. Abū Ḥamza al-Mukhtār was killed. On receiving news of this, 'Abd Allāh b. Yaḥyā came from Ṣan'ā' at the head of the Ibāḍīs to prevent the Syrian army from penetrating into the Yemen. Not far from Djurash there took place an encounter between the two armies which ended in total defeat of the Ibāḍīs and the death of Ṭālib al-Ḥaḳḳ. The rest of the Ibāḍīs took shelter in the fortified town of Shibām. Some time afterwards 'Abd al-Mālik b. 'Aṭiyya received from Marwān b. Muḥammad an order to return to Mecca. He was thus forced to conclude a peace with the Ibāḍīs of the Ḥaḍramawt (he even agreed to recognize their independence). After the death of Ṭālib al-Ḥaḳḳ, it was 'Abd Allāh b. Sa'īd al-Ḥaḍramī who was considered as the successor of this imām by the Ibāḍīs of the Ḥaḍra-mawt and by the Ibāḍī mashāyikh of Baṣra. The Ibāḍī imāmate still existed in the 5th/11th century. According to al-Hamdānī, it was the town of Dawʿan (Dōʿan) which was the capital of this state in the 4th century. The last mention of the Ibāḍīs of the Ḥaḍramawt belongs to the second half of the 5th century.

Of the history of the Ibāḍīs of the Yemen after the defeat of the imām ʿAbd Allāh b. Yaḥyā almost nothing is known. Crushed in 130/748 by the army of ʿAbd al-Mālik b. ʿAṭiyya, they then became subjects of the ʿAbbāsid state. Several Ibāḍī groups still existed in the Yemen at least until the middle of the 6th/12th century, according to the geographer al-Idrīsī. It seems that in the Middle Ages the population of Mahra, on the coast between the Ḥaḍramawt and ʿUmān, also professed the Ibāḍī doctrine. The population of this country paid tithes to the imām of ʿUmān at about the beginning of the 3rd century. There were also Ibāḍīs outside the former imāmate of Ṭālib al-Ḥaḳḳ, on the island of Socotra, whose inhabitants were related to those of Mahra. According to al-Hamdānī, there was on this island a group of al-Shurāt (which is what this writer calls the Ibāḍīs) who were hostile to the Sunnīs of Socotra (on the history of the Ibāḍiyya of southern Arabia, see T. Lewicki, Les Ibāḍites dans l'Arabie du Sud au moyen âge, in Folia Orientalia, i (1959), 3-18).

(g) ʿUmān. Another region in which the Ibāḍīs were active in Arabia was ʿUmān. Not much is known of the origins of the Ibāḍiyya in this country. The prehistory of Ibāḍism there appears to be closely linked with the activity of the pre-Ibāḍī Khāridjī group of Abū Bilāl. It is known in fact that, towards the second half of the 1st/7th century, the inhabitants of ʿUmān were fervent admirers of this Khāridjī hero. Moreover, for some time until the year 73, ʿUmān belonged to an imāmate formed in Arabia by the Khāridjī sect of the Nadjadāt. From the end of the 1st/7th century, the Khāridjism of the inhabitants of ʿUmān took on a purely Ibāḍī character, perhaps owing to the activity of Djābir b. Zayd, as well as to the influences of other Ibāḍī doctors of Baṣra who had been exiled there by al-Ḥadjdjādj. The modern Ibāḍī scholar Aṭfiyyash is thus right in stating that the history of the Ibāḍiyya in ʿUmān begins with the period of the Tābiʿūn; but it is only in the first half of the 2nd/8th century that the more serious preaching of Ibāḍī doctrines begins, probably owing to the ḥamalat al-ʿilm who were sent there at this time by Abū ʿUbayda. These missionaries were helped by a famous faḳīh of ʿUmān, one Khiyār b. Sālim al-Ṭāʾī, and another doctor of the country, Mūsā b. Abī Djābir al-Azkānī. As a result of this preaching, an Ibāḍī revolt broke out in ʿUmān in 132/750. At the head of the rebels was the descendent of the former princes of the country, al-Djulandā b. Masʿūd (referred to by al-Barrādī as al-Kuland b. al-Djuland), who was elected imām. This Ibāḍī imāmate, which extended also to the Ḥaḍramawt and the Yemen, lasted only a short time and collapsed in 134/752 as the result of an ʿAbbāsid expedition led by the general Khāzim b. Khuzayma; the imām was killed in a battle. The Ibāḍiyya of ʿUmān seem to have been considerably weakened by this defeat, although the ʿAbbāsid governor placed in the country by al-Saffāḥ appears to have been tolerant towards the sect's doctrine. But already towards the second half of the 2nd/8th century, as a result of new ḥamalat al-ʿilm (in particular the famous al-Bashīr b. al-Mundhir) sent to this province by Abū ʿUbayda's successor, al-Rabīʿ b. Ḥabīb, and of the activities of Mūsā b. Abī Djābir, the Ibāḍīs rose up again and recommenced their activities in ʿUmān. The centre of this new movement was the town of Nazwā and it was there that, in 177/793, in a council held under the presidency of Mūsā b. Abī Djābir al-Azkānī, there was proclaimed imām of ʿUmān Muḥammad b. ʿAffān (known also as Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī ʿAffān or Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAffān), a member of the Azdī tribe of Banū Yaḥmad. It seems that under the reign of his successor, al-Wārith b. Kaʿb al-Kharūṣī (179-92/795-808), the mashāyikh of Baṣra transferred themselves to ʿUmān, which thus became the spiritual centre of the Ibāḍiyya. On the considerable rôle of ʿUmān in the history of the Ibāḍiyya this Ibāḍī saying is significant: bāḍa 'l-ʿilmu bi-'l-Madīna wa-farrakha bi-'l-Baṣra wa-ṭāra ilā ʿUmān, "Knowledge was laid in Medina, hatched in Baṣra and flew to ʿUmān" (see al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 183). It should be added that the identification of al-Wārith b. Kaʿb al-Kharūṣī with al-Wārith b. Kaʿb al-Ḥaḍramī, the Ibāḍī imām of the Ḥaḍramawt who lived in the second half of the 2nd/8th century, is very possible. Among the other Ibāḍī imāms of ʿUmān should be mentioned Ghassān b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Yaḥmadī al-Azdī (died 207/822-3), ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥāmid (who reigned for 18 years), and al-Muhannaʾ b. Djaʿfar (226-37/841-52). During the latter's reign, the Ḥaḍramawt formed part of the kingdom of ʿUmān. His successor, al-Ṣalt b. Mālik, reigned until 273/887. One other Ibāḍī imām of ʿUmān of this period is known: Rashīd b. al-Naḍr, who reigned immediately after al-Ṣalt b. Mālik. There had now already begun the period of discord and internecine strife (the war between the Nizārī and the Hināwī tribes). During the 3rd/9th century, certain Ibāḍī chiefs of ʿUmān bore the title of wālī (governor) or of mutaḳaddim (chief), since during this period it was the Rustamids who were recognized as universal imāms of the Ibāḍiyya. Nevertheless, these Ibāḍī rulers of ʿUmān were elected by the inhabitants of the country and not appointed by the imāms of the Maghrib. ʿUmān was divided into several districts with governors in charge of them. The imāms or the *mutaḳaddim*s lived at Nazwā. In 280/893 ʿUmān was reconquered by the ʿAbbāsids following a victory won by the ʿAbbāsid general, Muḥammad b. Nūr, who was killed. ʿUmān's dependence on the ʿAbbāsid caliphate was only superficial; in actual fact the Ibāḍī imāmate continued to exist there without interruption. The Ibāḍī sources mention the names of several imāms who reigned in the 4th/10th century. During the first part of this century the Imāms of ʿUmān continued to exercise their authority over the country of Mahra. For the later history of the Ibāḍīs of ʿUmān reference may be made to the plentiful literature on this subject which is cited at the end of this section. It should be mentioned that the chronology of the facts mentioned above is not always certain and there will be found some discrepancies between facts given here and those in earlier works by this author.

Little is known on the precise distribution of the Ibāḍīs in ʿUmān during the Middle Ages. From the chronicles of the country, such as Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, Kashf al-ghumma, etc., it can be established that the most important Ibāḍī groups in ʿUmān were found to the south of an imaginary line drawn between the towns of Ṣuḥār and Tawwām (now al-Tawwām or al-Bereyma). The Ibāḍiyya occupied particularly the district of al-Bāṭina and the surroundings of Rustāḳ, where are situated the majority of the Ibāḍī cantons and districts mentioned in the sources. Among these places were: the former Ibāḍī capital of ʿUmān, Nazwā, with its suburbs ʿAḳr Nazwā and Samad Nazwā, then Azkā, Bahlā, Farḳ (the native town of Djābir b. Zayd), Manḥ, Faldj, Nakhl, Samāʾil, al-Ḥadjar and, on the coast opposite to Nakhl, the town of Wadām. There was also a fairly dense Ibāḍī population on the south-east coast of ʿUmān at Masḳaṭ, Ḳaryāt, Ṭaywa, Ḳalhat and in the southern cantons, Kharūṣ and Riyām. Almost nothing is known of the extreme south of ʿUmān; it seems that the main mass of the Ibāḍiyya did not extend much to the south of the borders of the districts of Kharūṣ and Riyām. In northern ʿUmān it is chiefly the canton of al-Sirr and the town of Djulfār (Djullafār) which are mentioned in the sources as having an Ibāḍī population. It will thus be seen that the limits of the area occupied by the Ibāḍīs were much narrower than those of ʿUmān itself, especially during its greatest period in the 3rd/9th century. Today Ibāḍism is the religion of the main fractions of the ʿUmān tribes of Ghāfirī and Hinā (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 78, 93 and passim; al-Dardjīnī, Kitāb Ṭabaḳāt al-mashāyikh, MS no. 275 of the Cracow collection, f. 14v-15r; al-Barrāḍī, op. cit., 170; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 174, 219, 277, 667, 676, 677 and passim; Masqueray, op. cit., 136-43; al-Sālimī, Tuḥfat al-aʿyān bi-sīrat ahl ʿUmān, i-ii, Cairo 1347, passim; al-Ṭabarī, iii, 78, 81, 484, 501; Salîl b. Lewicki, Les Ibāḍites dans l'Arabie du Sud, passim; several references to the Ibāḍīs of ʿUmān are found also in the works of many Sunnī Arab geographers and historians).

(h) East Africa. The origins of the Ibāḍiyya on the east coast of Africa (the Bilād al-Zandj of the mediaeval Arabic authors) are unknown; the first to preach Ibāḍism there were probably merchants from ʿUmān, beginning apparently in the 3rd/9th century. Among the Ibāḍī shaykhs of the 6th/12th century is found an East African doctor, al-Walīd b. Bārik al-Kilwī al-Ibāḍī, from the town of Kilwa. The Ibāḍī element in the Bilād al-Zandj appears to have grown in the 11th-12th/17th-18th centuries when the major part of the east coast of Africa was linked with ʿUmān. Today, the majority of the Ibāḍīs of East Africa live in Zanzibar (Salîl b. Razîk, op. cit., 92, 205; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 671).

(i) Kishm. The inhabitants of this island, which was referred to by the mediaeval Arabic authors as Djazīrat Ibn Kāwān and is situated near to the coast of Kirmān opposite Ras Masandam, were still Ibāḍīs in the 6th/12th century (al-Idrīsī, tr. Jaubert, i, 158).

(j) Persia. From the beginning of the 2nd/8th century, there existed an Ibāḍī group of considerable size in Khurāsān as a result of the activity of the ḥamalat al-ʿilm sent there by Abū ʿUbayda, and particularly of Hilāl b. ʿAṭiyya al-Khurāsānī, the first Ibāḍī missionary of this country. Among the other Ibāḍī doctors and scholars who were natives of Khurāsān should be mentioned in particular Abū Ghānim Bishr b. Ghānim al-Khurāsānī (3rd/9th century), the author of the famous work known under the title of al-Mudawwana. Ibāḍīs are also found at about the beginning of the 2nd/8th century in Fārs. It is not known whether the Ḥamziyya, whose existence in Persia is mentioned by al-Masʿūdī, were followers of the Ibāḍī sectarian Ḥamza al-Kūfī (see below) or were a sub-branch of the ʿAdjārida (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 87, 88, 113, 116, 118, 119; Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya, 667; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 185, 186; al-Masʿūdī, op. cit., v, 230-1; al-Shahrastānī, tr. Haarbrücker, i, 144-5; A. de C. Motylinski, Le nom berbère de Dieu chez les Abadhites, in RAfr., (1905), 146).

(k) India and China. The Ibāḍī chronicles of ʿUmān mention contingents of Indian (Hind) soldiers in the army of the imāms of this country from an early period. It was probably through these Indians as well as through merchants from ʿUmān, Persia and the Djazīrat Ibn Kāwān, that Ibāḍism penetrated into Sind. Remnants of the Ibāḍiyya still existed at al-Manṣūra, the capital of this province, in 445/1053, during the reign of Rāshid b. Saʿīd, the imām of ʿUmān, who sent them a sīra (letter); it is not known whether they were able to obtain political independence. The Khāridjīs whose existence in the coastal region between Kirmān and Sind in the 4th/10th century is attested by al-Masʿūdī may have been identical with these Ibāḍīs. It is also quite probable that there were Ibāḍīs among the Muslim colonists settled in China, a large number of whom came from the countries where Ibāḍism was a dominant belief, for example ʿUmān, the Ḥaḍramawt, etc. The books of the Ibāḍī sect mention two persons from ʿUmān and Baṣra who were at the same time merchants and Ibāḍī scholars, Abū ʿUbayda ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Ḳāsim al-Ṣaghīr and al-Naẓar b. Maymūn, who went to China in the 2nd/8th century (al-Masʿūdī, op. cit., v, 231; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 183; Salîl Ibn Razîk, op. cit., 35; Lewicki, Les premiers commerçants arabes en Chine, in RO, xi, 173-86).

(l) Egypt. At a comparatively recent period, the Ibāḍī doctrine was spread also in Egypt, which soon became one of the main centres of Ibāḍī learning together with Baṣra and Medina. The Ibāḍī sources mention several scholars who were natives of Egypt, as for example, Muḥammad b. ʿAbbād (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 122; al-Sālimī, Lumʿa, 186).

(m) Ifriḳiya and the Maghrib. The Ibāḍī groups of North Africa played for a certain period a predominant rôle in the history of this sect. The first to preach the Ibāḍī doctrines there was Salāma b. Saʿīd (Salma b. Saʿd), a shaykh of Baṣra who appeared towards the beginning of the 2nd/8th century at Ḳayrawān accompanied by the Ṣufrī missionary ʿIkrima, a mawlā of Ibn ʿAbbās (d. 107/725-6; cf. Masqueray, op. cit., 3-4; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 98; al-Dardjīnī, op. cit., fol. 4v.). Salāma's activity appears to have been fairly successful, since we find in Tripolitania, about twenty years later, a fairly large Ibāḍī group under the leadership of a certain ʿAbd Allāh b. Masʿūd al-Tudjībī. This leader drew his support at first from the Berber tribe of the Hawwāra [q.v.], which in the Middle Ages occupied Tripoli and the region to the east of it as far as the sebkha of Tāūrgha. The authority passed next to two Ibāḍī chiefs, ʿAbd al-Djabbār b. Ḳays al-Murādī and al-Ḥārith b. Talid al-Ḥaḍramī. Under these two leaders, who also depended on the Hawwāra, the remainder of what is now Tripolitania came under the control of the Ibāḍiyya. Among the Berber tribes converted to Ibāḍism at this period were the Zanāta of western Tripolitania and the Nafūsa who were settled on that part of the Tripolitanian Djebel which today still bears their name. Al-Ḥārith is said to have been proclaimed imām al-aḥkām, but it is more likely that al-Ḥārith and ʿAbd al-Djabbār reigned together (Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, Futūḥ Miṣr, ed. Torrey, 244; al-Barrādī, op. cit., 170; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 175, 597; T. Lewicki, La répartition géographique des groupements ibāḍites dans l'Afrique du Nord au moyen-âge, in RO, xxi (1957), 308; Ibn Khaldūn, Histoire des Berbères, tr. de Slane, i, 219). After the deaths of al-Ḥārith and of ʿAbd al-Djabbār, who killed each other in 131/748-9 (or in 132/749-50), it was Ismāʿīl b. Ziyād al-Nafūsī (also known as Abu 'l-Zādjir Ismāʿīl) who was elected leader by the Ibāḍī Berber tribes of Tripolitania with the title of imām al-difāʿ (imām of defence). He captured the town of Ḳābis (Gabès) in 132 at the time of the accession of the ʿAbbāsids to the caliphate, but he was killed near this town in an encounter with the troops of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥabīb, the Arab governor of Ḳayrawān. His death took place soon after his election (T. Lewicki, Études Ibāḍites nord-africaines, part I, Warsaw 1957, 23, lines 1-2 and 127-8). It was probably at this time that there appeared the Ibāḍī (of Berber origin) ʿUmar b. Īmkaten. According to the early Ibāḍī chronicles he was the first to teach the Ḳur'ān in the Djabal Nafūsa, having learned it himself on the great coastal road which linked the Maghrib to the East, in the region of Maghmadās (the Macomades Syrtis of antiquity and the present day Marsa Zaʿafrān; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 142; Lewicki, Études ibāḍites nord-africaines, 55). After the death of Ismāʿīl b. Ziyād al-Nafūsī, the Ibāḍī state of Tripolitania collapsed, but the population remained Ibāḍī. It was from Tripolitania or from the neighbouring districts of southern Tunisia that, in the years after 140/760, several Berbers came to Baṣra to study under the president of the Ibāḍī mashāyikh there, Abū ʿUbayda al-Tamīmī. Among these persons, who later returned to preach the Ibāḍī faith in Tripolitania, were a certain Ibn Maghṭīr (Ibn Mughṭīr), a Nafūsī who was still alive in about 196 (Strothman, Berber und Ibāḍiten, in Isl., xvii, 266; Lewicki, Études berbères-nord-africaines, 93, 95), ʿĀṣim al-Sadrātī, later mentioned among the Ibāḍī generals of the Maghrib (d. 155-772; Lewicki, op. cit., 77), Abū Dāwūd al-Ḳibillī of Nafzāwa in southern Tunisia and Ismāʿīl b. Darrār al-Ghadāmisī. The last three, with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam, a Persian who had originally settled at Ḳayrawān, and with an Arab from the South, Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. al-Samḥ al-Maʿāfirī al-Ḥimyarī (who was a mawlā of the tribe of al-Maʿāfira, cf. Bayān, i, 317), formed a team of missionaries (ḥamalat al-ʿilm) similar to those sent by Abū ʿUbayd to ʿUmān and Khurāsān. They received from Abū ʿUbayda orders to form the Ibāḍīs of Tripolitania into an imāmate, and with his usual prescience he nominated Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb as the future imām. The activities of the ḥamalat al-ʿilm met with great success. In 140, the Ibāḍī dignitaries of Tripolitania, assembled in a secret council held at Ṣayyād, near Tripoli, raised Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb to the office of imām. The Ibāḍī Berber tribes of Hawwāra and Nafūsa and others, led by the new imām, conquered the whole of Tripolitania, together with the town of Tripoli, which became the residence of the imām, then, in Ṣafar 141/June-July 758, captured the town of al-Ḳayrawān, the Arab capital of Ifrīḳiya which was then in the possession of the Ṣufrīs of the Berber tribe of Warfadjdjūma. As a result of these successes of Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb there arose a fairly important Ibāḍī state, which included the whole of Tripolitania from the western frontier of Barḳa, Tunisia and the whole of the east of present-day Algeria, including the country of the Ketāma in the north of the department of Constantine. It even seems that Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb also exercised a certain influence over the Ṣufrīs of Sidjilmāsa (Masqueray, op. cit., 34; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 130 and passim; al-Bakrī, Kitāb al-Masālik wa-'l-mamālik, ed. de Slane, 149, tr. 285-6; Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 375; H. Fournel, Les Berbers, Paris 1875-81, i, 357; Lewicki, Études ibāḍites-nord-africaines, 112-4).

The imāmate of Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb did not last long. It was destroyed in 144/761 by the ʿAbbāsid army under the command of Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath al-Khuzāʿī, the governor of Egypt, following a battle at Tāwarghā (Tāūrgha) to the east of Tripoli. Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb and several thousand of his supporters fell, and Ibn al-Ashʿath re-took al-Ḳayrawān (Masqueray, op. cit., 37-8; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 132; al-Bakrī, op. cit., text 7, tr. 22; Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 220, 374-5; Fournel, op. cit., i, 358-60; Lewicki, Études ibāḍites-nord-africaines, 113-4).

The remnants of the Ibāḍiyya either withdrew into the interior of Tripolitania or crossed into the central Maghrib. Gradually there arose new centres of resistance against the ʿAbbāsids. Thus ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam, the former Ibāḍī governor of Ḳayrawān and one of the ḥamalat al-ʿilm, fleeing from the Arab army which had re-taken Ifrīḳiya, went (by way of Sūf Adjdjādj to the west of the Bilād al-Djarīd, where there had collected several Ibāḍī scholars from Tripolitania) towards the west of the present-day Algeria, where he founded (or rather rebuilt) the town of Tāhert. Soon several Berber Ibāḍī fractions (most of them probably emigrés from Ifrīḳiya), such as the Lamāya, the Lawāta and the Nafzāwa, rallied to this leader. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam seems to have been fairly powerful, since the leader of the Ibāḍiyya of Tripolitania after the death of Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb, the Hawwārī Abū Ḥātim al-Malzūzī, for a time sent him the zakāt, thus acknowledging his supremacy. In addition to these two leaders, there were others in North Africa at this time, as for example ʿĀṣim al-Sadrātī, who is even referred to as imām by the Ibāḍī writers, and al-Miswar al-Zanātī (Masqueray, op. cit., 40-2; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 133, 135, 138, 141; al-Bakrī, op. cit., text 68, tr. 140; Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 220, 221, 375, 380; Fournel, op. cit., i, 371).

As a result of the activity of these various leaders, there broke out in North Africa, in 151/768, an Ibāḍī revolt which the Ṣufrīs also joined. At the head of the rebels was Abū Ḥātim, who took the title of imām al-difāʿ. The Arabic sources provide details of this revolt, the most famous episodes of which were the capture of al-Ḳayrawān by Abū Ḥātim, who took it from the Arabs, and the siege of Ṭubna in the Zāb. After some years of fighting, Abū Ḥātim yielded to the army of the ʿAbbāsid general Yazīd b. Ḥātim, which had attacked him in the east of Tripolitania, and he died in 155 (Masqueray, op. cit., 41-9; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 135-8; Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 221-3, 379-85; al-Barrādī, op. cit., 173; Fournel, op. cit., i, 364-80).

After the defeat of Abū Ḥātim and the collapse of the Ibāḍī imāmate of Tripolitania, there took place a migration towards the west of the Berber Ibāḍī fractions of Tripolitania and Tunisia. It was probably as part of this migration that some Khāridjī fractions from Ifrīḳiya crossed into the country of the Ketāma in 156, as mentioned by Ibn Khaldūn. These emigrants probably joined ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam, and the headquarters of the North African Ibāḍiyya became the town of Tāhert. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam was elected imām in 160 or 162 (Masqueray, op. cit., 49 ff.; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 138 ff.; A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghir, 63-4). With this there began the consolidation of all the Ibāḍī groups of North Africa around the imāms of Tāhert. It was under the two successors of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam, namely ʿAbd al-Wahhāb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (168-208/784-823) and al-Allaḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb (208-58 ?/823-72 ?), that the Ibāḍism of the Maghrib reached its peak. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb succeeded, after long campaigns, in reuniting under his rule, towards the end of the 2nd/8th century, all the Berber Ibāḍī tribes of North Africa. It even appears that he almost conquered Ifrīḳiya proper. In fact it seems that the uprising of Nuṣayr b. Ṣāliḥ al-Ibāḍī, from the tribe of the Nafzāwa, which took place in Ifrīḳiya in 171-787-8 and in which 10,000 Ibāḍīs lost their lives (Ibn ʿIdhārī, Bayān, i, 82; Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 224; Fournel, op. cit., i, 384), had as its aim the annexing of this country to the kingdom of Tāhert. It was perhaps the failure of this revolt which led the imām of Tāhert to conclude a peace with Rawḥ b. Ḥātim, the Arab governor of al-Ḳayrawān on behalf of the ʿAbbāsid caliphs. Indeed, the negotiations between Tāhert and al-Ḳayrawān began immediately after the disaster to the Ibāḍīs of Ifrīḳiya in the same year, 171 (Fournel, op. cit., i, 387). As a result of these negotiations, peace was restored in North Africa. The governors of al-Ḳayrawān and the Aghlabid amīrs took care not to disturb the Berber Ibāḍī tribes, who had been ruled by the Rustamids for about half a century. At this period, the boundaries of the imāmate of Tāhert included, according to Ibn al-Ṣaghīr (17, tr. p. 73), all the country between Tlemcen and Tripoli. To the west, the Rustamid state included the district around Tāhert, as well as the territory of Sersū inhabited by the Ibāḍī fractions of the Berber tribes of Lamāya, Sadrāta, Mazāta, Lawāta, Hawwāra, Nafūsa, Zawagha, Matmāta, Miknāsa, Azdādja and Ghumāra; the majority of these tribes abandoned Ibāḍism towards the end of the 3rd/9th and the beginning of the 4th/10th century. To the north-west, the frontier of the state of Tāhert reached the Mediterranean near to Marsā Farrūkh and Marsa 'l-Kharaz (between Arzew and Mostaganem, now La Calle) or near to Marsa 'l-Dadjādj (between Algiers and Bougie). To the south, the Rustamid imāmate included the oases of Wādī Rīgh and Wargla. A strip formed by a part of the Hodna and of the Zāb and the Djabal Awrās, and inhabited by Ibāḍīs, linked the western sections of the imāmate of Tāhert with the Ibāḍī districts of the present-day Tunisia and Tripolitania. These eastern domains of the Ibāḍī state included, at the beginning of the 3rd/9th century, the whole of southern Tunisia, that is Ḳafṣa (Gafsa), the district of al-Sāḥil (present-day Sahel), the Bilād al-Djarīd (referred to by the mediaeval Ibāḍī writers as al-Ḳuṣūr) with its cantons: Ḳaṣṭīliya (Tozeur), Ḳanṭrāra, Nafzāwa and Ḥarth-Nafātha, the mountains of south-eastern Tunisia and the whole of Tripolitania, except for the town of Tripoli itself. It can thus be seen that the possessions of the Rustamid imāmate encircled the Aghlabid state on all sides. Aghlabid power was limited, still in the first quarter of the 3rd/9th century, to northern Tunisia and north-eastern Algeria.

It was not until 224/839 that the Aghlabids succeeded in breaking the Rustamid blockade and in partially occupying the Ibāḍī strip linking Tāhert with Tripolitania, that is the districts of Ḳafṣa, al-Sāḥil and Bilād al-Djarīd, by means of an expedition led by the Aghlabī general ʿĪsā b. Rayʿān al-Azdī. Ibn ʿIdhārī, who provides this information, says nothing on the doctrines professed by the Berbers of southern Tunisia, but merely states that they belonged to the tribes of Lawāta, Zawāgha and Miknāsa. In a battle which took place between Ḳafṣa and Ḳasṭīliya, these tribes were massacred, and this put an end to the Rustamid domination in southern Tunisia and caused the Ibāḍī territory of the Maghrib to be divided into two separate parts (A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghir, tr. 74, 78, 102, 122; al-Bakrī, op. cit., text, 55, 70, 72-3, 81-2, tr., 117, 144, 148, 164, 166; al-Dardjīnī, op. cit., fol. 102v; al-Wisyānī, Taʾlīf, MS 277 of the collection of Cracow, 33-4, 58, 140; al-Yaʿḳūbī, Buldān, 346, 352, 353, 355, 356; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 154, 159, 161-5, 181, 194, 196, 203, 214, 275, 590, 596, 597; Ibn Khurradādhbih, text, 88-9, tr. 63; Ibn al-Faḳīh, al-Buldān, 79; M. Vonderheyden, La Berbérie orientale, Paris 1927, passim; T. Lewicki, La répartition géographique des groupements ibāḍites dans l'Afrique du Nord au moyen-âge, in RO, xxi (1957), 301-43; idem, Les Ibāḍites en Tunisie au moyen-âge, Rome 1959; idem, Un document ibāḍite inédit sur l'émigration des Nafūsa du Ǧabal, in Folia Orientalia, i/2 (1960) 175-91, ii (1950), 214-6).

Outside North Africa, the Ibāḍī groups of Baṣra and throughout the East also recognized the supremacy of Ibn Rustam and of his successors and "dated with his name their books and their testaments" (Masqueray, op. cit., 53; A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghir, tr. 65-71). This was probably the reason why the Ibāḍī rulers of ʿUmān sometimes, in the 3rd/9th century, bore the title of wālī (governor) or of muṭaḳaddim (leader) together with that of imām (see above).

Towards the second half of the 3rd century, the imāmate of Tāhert, split by the political schisms of al-Nukkār, of the Khalafiyya, of Ibn Maṣṣāla (who created an independent Ibāḍī state bear Tāhert) and others (see below), and cut into two separate parts because of the success of the Aghlabids in conquering the whole of southern Tunisia, was approaching ruin. Rustamid influence in Tripolitania was completely destroyed in 283/896, when the Aghlabid army defeated in the famous battle of Mānū (between Tripoli and Ḳābis) the powerful Ibāḍī Berber tribe of the Nafūsa, which had been the main support of the Rustamid state in Ifrīkiya (cf. al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 267-9; al-Dardjīnī, op. cit., fol. 31v; Masqueray, op. cit., 194-202; Ibn ʿIdhārī, op. cit., i, 129; Fournel, op. cit., i, 575; Vonderheyden, op. cit., 44-5). The remains of the state of Tāhert continued to exist until 296/909, when it finally fell before the armies of Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Shīʿī, who founded on the ruins of the Aghlabid, Rustamid and Midrārid states of Sidjilmāsa the new and powerful Fāṭimid kingdom. After Tāhert had been taken by the Fāṭimid army, the last Rustamid imām, Abū Yūsuf Yaʿḳūb, fled, with his family and with the most important scholars and men of influence from Tāhert, to Sadrāta (in the oasis of Wargla) on the southern borders of the state of Tāhert, where for a time they dreamed of re-establishing the Ibāḍī imāmate in this locality (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 365; Masqueray, op. cit., 251-8; Fournel, op. cit., ii, 52-95). This idea was abandoned, perhaps as the result of a Fāṭimid expedition in the direction of the oasis of Wargla (Masqueray, op. cit., 220-3). Moreover, a new Ibāḍī imāmate was already being formed in the Djabal Nafūsa, where the Fāṭimid army did not penetrate until very much later.

There should be mentioned here the activities of Abū Yaḥyā Zakariyyā' al-Irdjānī. This leader, who is given in the Ibāḍī sources the title of ḥākim or of imām mudāfiʿ, and who lived in the Djabal Nafūsa, ruled for about fifteen years. This is the only example known of a North African Ibāḍī-Wahbī chief taking the title of imām after the fall of the imāmate of the Banū Rustam. His power did not extend beyond the limits of the Djabal Nafūsa, but he nevertheless succeeded in preserving the independence of this territory from the Fāṭimids. He died in 311/923-4. His successors, who bore the title of ḥākim, were also in fact independent of the Fāṭimid state. Later, one of the ḥākims of the Djabal Nafūsa was forced, in about 430-50, to recognize the supremacy of the Zīrids. The semi-independent Ibāḍī ḥākims (and later shaykhs) of the Djabal Nafūsa still existed in the 8th/14th century (T. Lewicki, Ibāḍitica, 2: Les Ḥākims du Ǧabal Nafūsa, in RO, xxvi (1962), 97-123).

In the first half of the 4th/10th century, there took place a further unsuccessful attempt to re-establish the Ibāḍī state in North Africa. This time it was a member of the Nukkārī sect, Abū Yazīd Makhlad b. Kaydad (d. 335/946-7), who rallied round him the Ibāḍī tribes of Tripolitania, the Zāb and the other districts of the Maghrib (see EI[1], suppl., AL-NUKKĀR). Twenty years later, the Ibāḍiyya of the Maghrib made a further attempt, and declared in 358 a khurūdj against the Fāṭimids. This revolt, which broke out in the Bilād al-Djarīd, was led by two Ibāḍī-Wahbī shaykhs of the tribe of the Banū Wisyān: Abu 'l-Ḳāsim and, after his death, Abū Khazar (according to Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., ii, 542: Abū Djaʿfar al-Zanātī); it achieved for the Ibāḍīs temporary domination of Tripolitania, of southern Tunisia, of the island of Djarba, of the Zāb and of the oases of the Rīgh and of Wārdjlān (Wargla). The wilāyat al-difāʿ was proclaimed, governors were appointed for all the provinces and it was even contemplated that they might enter into relations with the Umayyads of Spain. Abū Khazar assembled an enormous army, the tribe of the Mazāta alone providing him with 12,000 horsemen. But this insurrection also failed, and, after the rout of the rebels at Bāghāy, the Ibāḍiyya of North Africa had to submit to the Fāṭimids (Masqueray, op. cit., 288-310; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 346-62; Fournel, op. cit., ii, 349).

After this revolt, the Ibāḍīs of North Africa made no further attempts to restore an imāmate and they returned to the state of kitmān. Nevertheless, in the various parts of the Maghrib and Ifrīḳiya there were formed small Ibāḍī-Wahbī political organizations, independent or semi-independent of the Fāṭimids and of the Sunnī North African dynasties. There have been mentioned above the Ibāḍī ḥākims of the Djabal Nafūsa and the author has dealt in a special study (T. Lewicki, La répartition géographique des groupements ibāḍites) with the Ibāḍī groups of Tripolitania and of the Fezzān which survived from the Rustamid rule (which however in the majority of these provinces came to an end towards the middle of the 3rd/9th century). The history of the Ibāḍī groups in Tunisia at this time has been dealt with in T. Lewicki, Les Ibāḍites en Tunisie au moyen-âge. The oasis of Wargla was governed, towards the 4th/10th century, by a council of notables (wudjūh, aʿyān, akābir; cf. al-Dardjīnī, op. cit., fol. 38v; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 365). Later, in the 5th/11th century, there appeared among the Ibāḍiyya of North Africa (alongside the ḥākim, the muḳaddam and the ra'īs) a new form of government: a theocratic government formed by councils of recluses (al-ʿazzāba) presided over by a shaykh who exercised authority over the entire life of the Ibāḍī groups [see ḤALḲA].

As a result of civil wars and of the defeat of the rebels by the Fāṭimids, followed by the repression of these rebels by the Fāṭimids and other Sunnī rulers of North Africa, there began a decline of North African Ibāḍism which seems to have been accelerated after the migration of the Banū Hilāl. The North African Ibāḍīs withdrew, from the 6th/12th century onwards, into a few barely accessible regions where they have continued to exist until the present day. Thus the Ibāḍīs escaping from the central Maghrib at first joined the Ibāḍī groups in the oasis of Wargla and the Rīgh and thereafter even founded new colonies in the Mzab, to which there came later the remnants of the Ibāḍiyya of Wargla and of the Rīgh. The Ibāḍīs of Tripolitania were concentrated towards the end of the Middle Ages in the Djabal Nafūsa. Today Ibāḍism is practised in North Africa only in Mzab, in two-thirds of the island of Djerba, at Zuara on the coast of western Tripolitania and in half of the Djabal Nafūsa. They are still divided there into two main sects: the Wahbīs and the Nukkārīs, the last remnants of a once-powerful population which formerly played a very considerable rôle in the history of North Africa.

The Ibāḍī imāms and doctors of North Africa maintained fairly active relations with the mashāyikh of Baṣra and Mecca and with the scholars of ʿUmān. There are preserved in the Ibāḍī chronicles of the Maghrib several fragments of the letters exchanged by the North African Ibāḍiyya and their co-religionists in the East (cf., e.g., Masqueray, op. cit., 65-6). Also the Eastern Ibāḍīs often travelled or sent embassies to the Maghrib, especially during the rule of the Banū Rustam, e.g., the journey made to the Maghrib by the Khurāsānī doctor Abū Ghānim (A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghir, tr. 65-71; Masqueray, op. cit., 51-3, 63-7, 74-5, 136-41). Conversely, scholars from the Maghrib often travelled to the East (Masqueray, op. cit., 180-5; A. de C. Motylinski, op. cit., tr. 112). After the fall of the Rustamid imāmate, relations between the Ibāḍīs of North Africa and those of the East became less close. Nevertheless, as late as the 7th/13th century, the mashāyikh of ʿUmān sent to the Maghrib several Ibāḍī works written in the East, and one of the most important North African Ibāḍī writers, al-Dardjīnī, was commissioned to write a history of the North African Ibāḍiyya for the use of those of ʿUmān (T. Lewicki, Notice sur la chronique ibāḍite d'al-Darǧīnī, in RO, xi (1936), 156). Still later, towards the beginning of the 10th/16th century, the Ibāḍī biographer of the Maghrib, al-Shammākhī, was in contact with a scholar of ʿUmān, a certain al-Samā'ilī (T. Lewicki, Une chronique ibāḍite, in REI (1934), 66).

(n) Western and central Sudan. In his important article Sur la diffusion des formes d'architecture religieuse musulmane à travers le Sahara, in Travaux de l'Institut de Recherches Sahariennes, xi (1954), 11-27, J. Schacht has demonstrated that it was the Ibāḍīs of southern Tunisia, of Wargla and of the Mzab who brought the characteristic features of Muslim religious architecture across the Sahara to the Hausa, the Kanuris and the Fulbe (Peuls). Thus the "staircase minaret" reached the Sudan from southern Tunisia via Wargla, the rectangular miḥrāb came from the Mzab, and the absence of a minbār among the Fulbe is due to the influence of the Ibāḍis. According to J. Schacht, it was the Ibāḍis also who introduced Islam itself into part of "Black Africa". The mediaeval Arabic sources, and especially the North African Ibāḍī sources, provide in fact many interesting and credible proofs of the activity of merchants, and probably also of Ibāḍī missionaries, in western and central Sudan, from the 2nd/8th to the 8th/14th century. The town of Tāhert, the capital of the Rustamid state, had become in the second half of the 2nd/8th century, soon after its foundation, the centre of intensive trade with the Sudan (probably with the towns of Awdaghust and Ghāna) and, during the reign of the Rustamid imām Aflaḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb (208-58), there was even an Ibāḍī ambassador at the court of the king of Ghāna or of Gao. According to a passage in the Kitāb al-Siyar of al-Wisyānī (MS no. 277 of the Cracow collection, 59), Aflaḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb even wished, during the lifetime of his father (hence before 208/823), to make a journey to the district of Djawdjaw (Gogo, Gao) in the Sudan, but the journey did not take place, as it was forbidden by the imām, ʿAbd al-Wahhāb. Following the direction of the trade route which passed mainly through the town of Sidjilmāsa and across the western Sahara, Ibāḍism first took root in Awdaghust (now Tagdaoust, in the south east of the present-day Mauritania), where there were found, towards the 4th-5th/10th-11th century, fractions of the Berber tribes of Nafūsa, Lawāta, Nafzāwa and Zanāta; it is known that these were Ibāḍī tribes. The mediaeval Ibāḍī sources mention several Ibāḍī merchants, most of them from the Bilād al-Djarīd, who went to Ghāna during the 4th/10th and 5th/11th centuries. One of these merchants, the scholar Abū Mūsā al-Wisyānī, arrived, by way of the oasis of Wargla, at the town of Ghayāra (Ghayaro, Goundiourou, near to the present-day Kayés on the Senegal), where he died among "idolatrous people", as is stressed in the Ibāḍī chronicles. It is not impossible that the Muslim missionary who converted to Islam the pagan king of Mallel (Mālī) before 400 was an Ibāḍī. There may perhaps also be some truth in the anecdote related by al-Dardjīnī (7th/13th century) and al-Shammākhī (10th/16th century) on the activity of the Ibāḍī missionary, ʿAlī b. Yakhlaf al-Nafūsī, a native of the Bilād al-Djarīd, who converted to Ibāḍism the pagan king of Mālī "in the heart of Ghāna" in 575/1179-80. One effect of these contacts was the existence, as late as 753/1352, of an Ibāḍī group among the "whites", that is the Berber inhabitants, of the locality of Zaghārī (between Walāta and the Niger, the present-day Dioura or Ture-ssangha, south-south-east of Bacikounou).

It appears that there were also in the 3rd/9th century commercial relations between the Djabal Nafūsa and Takrūr, a negro kingdom situated in what is now Senegal (al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 273).

A whole series of data on the commerce between the North African Ibāḍīs and the Sudan in the 4th/10th and 5th/11th centuries concerns the trade expeditions directed towards Tādemekket (Tādmekka), an important centre of trade in the southern Sahara, situated in the Adrar of the Ifoghas, to the north-east of the bend of the Niger. The ruins of this town still exist, and are known as al-Sūḳ, "the market". It was there that there was born, in the second half of the 3rd/9th century, Abū Yazīd Makhlad b. Kaydād, the future leader of the revolt of the Ibāḍī sect of the Nukkārīs against the Fāṭimids. According to al-Bakrī, the route from Tādmekka to al-Ḳayrawān, which was very important for Saharan trade, went through the (Ibāḍī) oasis of Wargla and through southern Tunisia, which also had a very numerous Ibāḍī population, as is known from other sources. There was also a caravan route which linked Tādmekka to the town of Tripoli and which passed through Ghadāmes, a town which still had an Ibāḍī population in the 8th/14th century. The North African Ibāḍī chronicles provide various details particularly on the commercial relations between the oasis of Wargla, the Bilād al-Djarīd and the Djabal Nafūsa on the one side and Tādmekka on the other.

As for commercial relations between Ibāḍīs and the central Sudan (the environs of Lake Chad) those mainly interested were the merchants of Tripolitania and the Fezzān, particularly those of the Djabal Nafūsa and of the little Fezzān state of Zawīla (present-day Zouila), which had an Ibāḍī population as early as 145/762 and which was still Ibāḍī in the time of al-Yaʿḳūbī, the second half of the 3rd/9th century. Zawīla was considered as the gateway to the central Sudan, and it held a near monopoly of the slave trade in this country. Relations between the Ibāḍīs of the Djabal Nafūsa and the negro populations of the basin of Lake Chad were very close. The governor of the Djabal Nafūsa on behalf of the Rustamid imāms, Abū ʿUbayda ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Djanāwunī (first half of the 3rd/9th century), spoke, in addition to Berber and Arabic, the Kanemi language, probably Kanouri. These commercial relations were in operation along a very ancient route which led across the Fezzān and the Kawār. According to modern Ibāḍī writers (al-Barūnī, Risāla al-ʿāmma wa 'l-mubtadiʾīn, Cairo 1324, 23-4), there were still supporters of Ibāḍism in the Sudan towards the end of the 19th century (J. Schacht, op. cit., passim; T. Lewicki, Quelques extraits inédits relatifs aux voyages des commerçants et des missionaires ibāḍites nord-africains au pays du Soudan occidental au moyen-âge, in Folia Orientalia, ii (1960-61), 1-27; idem, L'État nord-africain de Tāhert et ses relations avec le Soudan occidental à la fin du VIII^e et au IX^e siècle, in Cahiers d'Études Africaines, ii/4 (1962), 513-35; idem, Traits d'histoire du commerce transsaharien. Marchands et missionaires ibāḍites en Soudan occidental et central au cours des VIII^e-XII^e siècles, in Etnografia Polska, viii (1964), 291-311).

(o) Spain and Sicily. From the Maghrib, Ibāḍism penetrated at a comparatively late date into Spain. Among the six members of the shūrā of Tāhert who had to choose the imām in 168/784-5, after the death of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Rustam, there were two of Spanish origin: Masʿūd al-Andalusī and ʿUthmān b. Marwān al-Andalusī (Masqueray, op. cit., 54-9; al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 145). Remnants of the Ibāḍiyya still existed in Spain in the 5th/11th century (Ibn Ḥazm, Fiṣal, iv, 179, 191). Similarly, there was an Ibāḍī-Wahbī colony in Sicily in the 4th and 5th centuries (al-Wisyānī, op. cit., 159-60).

DOCTRINE

The Ibāḍiyya, together with another Khāridjī sect, the Ṣufriyya, form the moderate branch of the Khawāridj. They differ from the Khāridjī extremists, represented by the Azraḳīs [see AZĀRIḲA], on several points, the most important of which is the belief that non-Khāridjī Muslims are regarded as kuffār (infidels) and not mushrikūn (polytheists), as is believed by the Azāriḳa. The consequence of this belief is the rejection of the isti'rāḍ ([q.v.] assassination for religious reasons) widely used by the Khāridjī extremists, who considered it lawful to kill the wives and children of the heterodox. Similarly, it is not permitted to seize their goods, except for their arms. Marriage with non-Ibāḍīs is also permitted; it is known in fact that, for example, the daughter of the Ibāḍī imām ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was married to the Ṣufrī prince of Sidjilmāsa (see Ibn Khaldūn, op. cit., i, 262). As for the political theories of the Ibāḍiyya, it should be stressed that, in conformance with the theories of the Muḥakkima (the first Khāridjīs), they considered that the existence of an imāmate was not indispensable. The condition in which they were to do without one, because of unfavourable circumstances, was called by the Ibāḍī authors al-kitmān (the "secret"; cf. al-Dardjīnī, op. cit., fol. 3r.). To this condition, Ibāḍī doctrine opposes al-ẓuhūr ("manifestation"), that is the proclamation of the imāmate (al-Dardjīnī, loc. cit.). The transition from the state of kitmān to that of ẓuhūr depends on the decision of the Ibāḍī mashāyikh of the country (Masqueray, op. cit., 144, n.). An imām elected in the normal way was known as imām al-bayʿa (there exists one reference to imām ẓuhūr; see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 138), while an imām invested by the ahl al-kitmān (the people living in a state of secrecy) to defend them in misfortune was known as imām al-difāʿ (Imām of defence), and his reign was called wilāyat al-difāʿ (cf. al-Dardjīnī, loc. cit.; al-Bārūnī, Risālat sullam ahl al-ʿāmma, 10, n. 2). In addition to these titles there are found also the definitions imām al-aḥkām and imām ahl al-taḥḳīḳ. The Ibāḍī imāms were also often called amīr, amīr al-muʾminīn, amīr al-muslimīn (cf. Masqueray, op. cit., 43, 53; A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghīr, tr. 131; Wellhausen, op. cit., 14; cf., however, al-Shahrastānī, Milal, ed. Cureton, 100) or even khalīfa (cf. al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 262; Ibn Khurradādhbih, op. cit., Ar. text, 87; Ibn al-Faḳīh, op. cit., 79). The Berber Ibāḍīs of North Africa even gave their imāms the title malik ("king"; cf., e.g., Abū Zakariyyāʾ, Kitāb al-Sīra, MS of the Cracow collection, fol. 12v.; cf. al-Barrādī, op. cit., 170 on the question of mulk among the Ibāḍiyya); it must be stressed that this latter title is completely contrary to Khāridjī dogmas, according to which the idea of mulk (royalty) is impious. The imām was elected by a council of important lay persons or of shaykhs, held in camera, and was thereafter proclaimed before the people; the first imāms were usually nominated by the mashāyikh of Baṣra, the spiritual leaders of the sect, as for example Abū Ḥamza al-Mukhtār b. ʿAwf al-Azdī al-Sulamī, the emissary of Abū ʿUbayda Muslim b. Abī Karīma of Baṣra, nominated the imām Ṭālib al-Ḥaḳḳ (Masqueray, op. cit., 21-3, 51; A. de C. Motylinski, Chronique d'Ibn Ṣaghīr, tr. 63-4; Badger, op. cit., 30-1; Lewicki, Les Ibāḍites dans l'Arabie du Sud au moyen-âge, 7). Often the election was limited to one tribe or to one family (cf., e.g., the Banū Rustam of Tāhert). The imām had to rule according to the Ḳurʾān, the Sunna of the Prophet and the example of the first imāms. An imām al-bayʿa was at the same time leader in war, judge and theologian. He reigned as an absolute ruler, applying the dogmas without changing them at all. Anyone trying to limit his power by sharṭs (conditions) was considered a heretic; this was how the affair of the schism of al-Nukkār came about. The imām could be deposed if he did not observe the dogmas; the judges who had to decide whether he was conforming with the doctrine were probably the mashāyikh, especially those of Baṣra (Masqueray, op. cit., 144-5, n.). It seems that custom allowed several Ibāḍī imāms to exist simultaneously in the different countries of the Muslim world; indeed, there were at the same time Ibāḍī imāms at Tāhert, in ʿUmān, the Ḥaḍramawt, etc. This principle was clearly expressed in the doctrine of the Ḥamziyya, a branch of the Khāridjī sect of the ʿAdjārida, according to which the simultaneous existence of several imāms was permitted until the whole world has been finally converted (see al-Shahrastānī, tr. Haarbrücker, i, 145). Nevertheless, there had been a tendency for the Ibāḍī world to form itself into a universal imāmate, which did in fact succeed towards the end of the 2nd/8th century, though only for a rather short period. We are referring here to the Rustamid imāms, who were recognized for a certain period by all the Ibāḍī groups of the west and the east, although of course, because of their distance from one another, these groups could neither unite nor achieve uniformity (Masqueray, op. cit., 51, 74-5). From the historical accounts, although they are rather uneven, it can be concluded that in addition to the imāmate there was also practised in certain cases another form of government—a sort of condominium, as in the case of al-Ḥārith and of ʿAbd al-Djabbār, who were, according to the expression of al-Barrādī (op. cit., 170) mushtarikān fi'l-mulk. It is true that this fact, which was a denial of the cardinal principles of Khāridjism, was an embarrassment to the doctors of the sect (see al-Barrādī, op. cit., 170-2).

In general, the dogma and the politico-religious theories of the Ibāḍiyya resemble on certain main points those of the Sunnīs. The Ibāḍiyya differ from the Mālikīs on only a few points, among which their theory on the creation of the Ḳurʾān in the time of the Prophet must be considered as the most important (see Z. Smogorzewski, Un poème abāḍite sur certains divergences entre les Mālikites et les Abāḍites, in RO, ii, 260-8). There has also been pointed out the very close affinity between Ibāḍī dogma and that of the Muʿtazila (Goldziher, Dogme, 163, 281; C. Nallino, in RSO, vii, 455-60). Unfortunately the existing sources do not provide a clear outline of the historical process by which the Muʿtazilī elements mingled with the Ibāḍiyya. It must, however, be mentioned that this Muʿtazilī influence on Ibāḍī doctrine was so considerable that the Arab geographer al-Bakrī refers to the Ibāḍī sect as al-Wāṣiliyya-Ibāḍiyya (op. cit., Ar. text, 72). The relations between these two sects even led to the foundation of a number of mixed sects.

It should be added that the Ibāḍīs were also eminent theologians. The earliest mutakallim known was an Ibāḍī of Baṣra, Bisṭām b. ʿUmar b. al-Musīb al-Ḍabbī (see above), who worked there between 77 and 81 (see al-Shammākhī, op. cit., 111; on the Ibāḍī mutakallims of the early period, cf. also ibid., 83); the Muʿtazilī mutakallims considered by the Islamic scholars as the earliest do not appear until the 2nd/8th century (see Goldziher, op. cit., 80). On Ibāḍī doctrine, see, in addition to the works mentioned in this section: al-Shammākhī, Kitāb al-Īḍāḥ, 1309, i-iv; al-Djayṭālī, Ḳanāṭir al-khayrāt, 1307, 1-iii; al-Sadrātī, Kitāb al-Dalīl wa-'l-burhān, 1306; ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (of the Beni Isguène), Kitāb al-Nīl, 1305, i-ii; Aṭfiyyash, Sharḥ Kitāb al-Nīl; Zeys, Législation

IBĀḌĪ SECTS

The religious and political unity of the Ibāḍī sect was broken at a fairly early date by a number of schisms (iftirāḳ) and heresies (khilāf, mukhālafa), which resulted in the formation of numerous semi-political, semi-theological subdivisions (firḳa). These schisms were at first, during the period of kitmān, of a purely dogmatic nature. Later, from the first half of the 2nd/8th century, there arose other sects which were the result of political crises, which, in a theological system like that of the Ibāḍiyya, always appear as schisms. Among the political causes of the Ibāḍī schisms, two appear to have been of especial importance: the question of the condominium exercised by al-Ḥārith and ʿAbd al-Djabbār and, later, the affair of the *sharṭ*s (conditions imposed on the imām), which was the cause of the schism of the Nukkār, one of the main subdivisions.

The most important secondary branch of the Ibāḍiyya appears to be the sub-sect called al-Ibāḍiyya al-Wahbiyya. The Wahbī Ibāḍīs of the Maghrib call themselves ahl al-madhhab, "people of the vocation". Al-Ibāḍiyya al-Wahbiyya was the most numerous and the most important of all the Ibāḍī subdivisions, and it is this sect which has been almost the only one of all the Khāridjī branches to continue to exist until the present day. It forms the moderate branch of the Khawāridj.

Another Ibāḍī subdivision was the sub-sect of al-Ḥārithiyya. The founder of this sect must be considered to be a certain Ḥamza al-Kūfī, who lived towards the first half of the 2nd/8th century. He broke away from Abū ʿUbayda, the president of the Ibāḍī mashāyikh of Baṣra, by accepting Muʿtazilī opinions on the question of ḳadar. Among other Ibāḍī doctors who shared Ḥamza's opinions should be mentioned a certain al-Ḥārith b. Mazyad al-Ibāḍī, to whom the Ḥārithiyya owes its name.

Besides al-Ḥārithiyya, yet another Ibāḍī sect provides evidence of the influence of Muʿtazilī doctrine on the Ibāḍīs. This is the sect of "those who accept an obedience which is not directed towards Allāh", founded at a period after the middle of the 3rd/9th century.

In the period of Abū ʿUbayda there arose yet another difference of opinions among the Ibāḍīs: the heresy of an Ibāḍī mutakallim named Ṣāliḥ b. Kuthayr.

Nothing definite is known about the doctrines preached by a certain Sufyān, who revolted against the Ibāḍī doctrine of Abū ʿUbayda, but later repented.

Another sub-sect, the Ṭarīfiyya, was founded in southern Arabia by ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭarīf, one of the companions of the imām Ṭālib al-Ḥaḳḳ, ca. 129/747. Its adherents were found mainly in the East, where it was, in the first half of the 3rd/9th century, one of the three main branches of the Ibāḍiyya in this region, the others being the Wahbī Ibāḍīs and the Shaʿbiyya (Nukkāris).

The Nukkāris [see AL-NUKKĀR] were one of the main branches of the Ibāḍiyya, who played an important rôle in the Middle Ages. They organized in North Africa, towards the end of the 3rd/9th century, an imāmate which was separate from that of Tāhert. There is even known the name of a Nukkārī imām who lived at this time: Abū ʿAmmār ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Aʿmā, the master of Abū Yazīd Makhlad b. Kaydād. Later Abū ʿAmmār was succeeded by Abū Yazīd, who was elected by the Nukkārīs "shaykh of the true believers", and who ruled the Nukkārī imāmate with a council of twelve ʿazzāba. Abū Yazīd departed from Ibāḍī doctrine by authorizing istiʿrāḍ, or assassination for religious reasons, following the example of the Azraḳīs and the Maghribī Ṣufrīs. In the Arabic sources the Nukkārīs have also other names: Shaʿbiyya, Yazīdiyya or Mistāwa. The adherents of this sect called themselves al-Maḥbūbiyyūn. They were numerous in the Maghrib but were found also in ʿUmān and in southern Arabia. Among their most outstanding doctors was a certain Hārūn b. al-Yamanī, referred to by Ibāḍī authors as Hārūn al-Mukhālif; a polemical writing by him against the Wahbiyya is preserved in the Ibāḍī collection from ʿUmān known as the Siyar al-ʿUmāniyya.

The Ibāḍī sub-sect of al-Nafāthiyya (or al-Naffāthiyya) originated at Ḳanṭrāra in the Bilād al-Djarīd, probably towards the beginning of the 3rd/9th century. Its founder, Nafāth (or Naffāth), accused the Rustamid imām Aflaḥ b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb of neglecting the war against the Musawwida, that is the Aghlabids, and of leading a life of luxury. According to Nafāth, the khuṭba was an innovation and ought to be rejected. Nafāth's doctrines were set out in a work which was later refuted by Mahdī al-Nafūsī, an important Wahbī-Ibāḍī doctor of Ifriḳiya. Unfortunately neither of these works has survived. Adherents of Nafāth existed in the Djabal Nafūsa in the 5th/11th century and in the extreme south of Tunisia in the 8th/14th century. Remnants of this sect are found today in the Gharyān and in the Djabal Nafūsa under the name of Naffātī.

The Ibāḍī subdivision of al-Khalafiyya, which was purely political in origin, was founded in Tripolitania towards the end of the 2nd/8th century by Khalaf b. al-Samḥ, a descendant of the imām Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. al-Samḥ al-Maʿāfirī al-Ḥimyarī; it was not until later that it assumed the character of a schism over dogma. This branch had many adherents, especially in north-western Tripolitania.

In the 3rd/9th century there took place another political schism among the Ibāḍīs of the Maghrib. This was concerned with the usurper Ibn Maṣṣāla al-Ibāḍī, of the tribe of the Hawwāra, who founded an independent Ibāḍī state in the neighbourhood of Tāhert.

The Ibāḍī sect known as al-ʿUmariyya was founded probably in the first half of the 2nd/8th century by ʿĪsā b. ʿUmar (or ʿUmayr). The ʿUmariyya differed considerably from the Wahbī Ibāḍīs and, according to Abū Zakariyyāʾ al-Wardjlānī, the doctrines of these two sub-sects differed completely. In matters concerning the Ḳurʾān, the ʿUmarīs followed the text of ʿAbd Allāh b. Masʿūd. Their adherents were found only in North Africa.

Some of the doctrines of al-ʿUmariyya were similar to those of the Ibāḍī branch of al-Ḥasaniyya (or al-Ḥusayniyya). The name of this sub-sect, which was widespread only in North Africa, derives from its founder, Aḥmad b. al-Ḥusayn (al-Ḥasan) al-Aṭrābulusī al-Ibāḍī, who appears to have lived in the first part of the 3rd/9th century. His dīwān was known at Wargla towards the beginning of the 4th/10th century. Adherents of this branch still existed in the 6th/12th century in some districts to the east of the Dj̲abal Nafūsa.

In the first half of the 4th/10th century, there was formed the Ibāḍī branch of the Fart̲h̲iyya. Its founder, Sulaymān b. Yaʿḳūb b. Aflaḥ, a descendent of the Rustamid imāms who lived in the oasis of Wargla, forbade the eating of the large intestines of sheep (fart̲h̲), hence the name of the sect. It may be that Sulaymān's opinions were also influenced by the dīwān of Aḥmad b. al-Ḥusayn al-Aṭrābulusī.

Nothing is known of the period when Sakkāk, the founder of another Ibāḍī sect, the Sakkākiyya, was teaching. This doctor considered that the communal prayer and the call to prayer were innovations; he also rejected the Sunna. The Wahbī Ibāḍīs described the Sakkākīs as mus̲h̲rikūn. The adherents of this sect, which disappeared entirely towards the end of the 5th/11th century, were never very numerous; they seem to have been limited to the district of Ḳanṭrāra in the Bilād al-Dj̲arīd.

The adherents of the Ibāḍī subdivision of the Ḥafṣiyya, founded at an unknown period by Ḥafṣ b. Abī 'l-Miḳdām, maintained that between īmān "belief" and s̲h̲irk "polytheism" there exists maʿrifat Allāh "knowledge of God".

The sub-sect of the Yazīdiyya, adherents of Yazīd b. Abī Anīsa (or Yazīd b. Unays), and to be distinguished from another Ibāḍī subdivision of the same name which is identical with the Nukkārīs, held as one of their principal beliefs that God will reveal a new Ḳurʾān to a Persian prophet. It can thus be seen that Yazīd carried to great lengths the theory of the faḍāʾil, "eminent qualities", of the Persians and the Berbers in comparison with the Arabs, the seeds of which are found also among the Wahbī Ibāḍīs.

Relations between these various Ibāḍī subdivisions were in the main hostile. The Ibāḍī historians often mention wars waged by the different branches, particularly the Nukkārīs, the Banū Maṣṣāla and the K̲h̲alafīs, against the Rustamids. Nevertheless, there can be noticed from time to time, after the collapse of the imāmate of Tāhert, attempts at a reconciliation between several Ibāḍī branches. Thus, for example, the population of the district of Zīzū on the western coast of Tripolitania, composed of the adherents of the Ibāḍī subdivisions of the Wahbiyya, the Nukkār, the K̲h̲alafiyya and the Naffāt̲h̲iyya, lived peacefully together under the direction of a common council, at the head of which in the first half of the 4th/10th century, was a Wahbī who had entrusted juridical decisions to a Nukkarī, the Ramaḍān prayers to a K̲h̲alafī and the call to prayers to a Naffāt̲h̲ī (T. Lewicki, Les subdivisions de l'Ibāḍiyya, in Stud. Isl., ix (1958), 71-82).

(T. Lewicki)

IBĀḤA (I) (A.), a verbal noun meaning originally "making a thing apparent or manifest", with the implication that the beholder may take it or leave it, and then "making a thing allowable or free to him who desires it"; it has become a technical term with several connected meanings in the religious law of Islam; istibāḥa, taking a thing as allowed, free, or lawful; mubāḥ (the contrary of maḥẓūr), "indifferent", i.e., neither obligatory or recommended, nor forbidden or reprehensible; it is to be distinguished from its near synonym djāʾiz, "unobjectionable, valid, permitted"; the concept ḥalāl, i.e., everything that is not forbidden, is wider.

The root does not occur in the Ḳurʾān. The earliest use of the word as a technical term, from S̲h̲āfiʿī onwards, seems to have been with regard to those things which every one is permitted to use or appropriate; this meaning of ibāḥa is expressed, though still without using the term, in a tradition from the Prophet according to which "the Muslims have equal rights to three things, water and fodder and fire" (Ibn Mādja and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal; an earlier variant, in Abū Dāwūd, can be dated in the generation of Aʿmash, d. 147 or 148/764-5). This has become a general rule of Islamic law, and also an article in the Madjalla [q.v.]. In a narrower sense, the term may denote the authorization, given by the owner, to consume (part of) the produce of his property; this excludes appropriation and disposal in favour of a third person by the beneficiary; this rule, too, appears in the Madjalla.

Ibāḥa with regard to acts is defined as "permission to carry out an act as the agent wishes" (Djurdjānī) or "a ruling which is not a request but gives the choice of acting or not" (Tahānawī); the performance of these acts is not meritorious, nor is their omission reprehensible. The details have been the subject of several controversies which in the works on uṣūl al-fiḳh are often discussed in the sections devoted to the interpretation of the Ḳurʾān (an arrangement already apparent in the Kitāb Mafātīḥ al-ʿulūm of Khuwārizmī, 2nd half of the 4th/10th cent.). The earliest of these controversies centred round the question whether the consumption of foodstuffs which had not been explicitly forbidden in the revelation was to be considered lawful or not. A tradition in Abū Dāwūd (Aṭʿima, 30) makes the Prophet say: "The pagans used to eat certain things and to abstain from certain things because they considered them unclean; now Allāh has sent His Prophet, has revealed His book, and has declared lawful and unlawful what is to be lawful and unlawful; therefore what He has declared lawful is lawful and what He has declared unlawful is unlawful, and what He has said nothing about is a lawful concession;" then he recited: "Say: I do not find in what has been revealed to me anything forbidden", etc. (Ḳurʾān, VI, 145). Also Ḳurʾān VII, 31 is taken to imply that all food and drink which has not been explicitly forbidden is lawful. Bukhārī, in the heading of a chapter (Iʿtiṣām, 27), without directly contesting the principle, makes the point that prohibitions enunciated by the Prophet must be taken to be declarations of unlawfulness unless it can be shown that the act in question is mubāḥ.

A similar stage of doctrine is represented by the doctrines of the Khāridjis, and in particular the followers of Nadjda among them (al-Ashʿarī, Maḳālāt, i, 90, 10-15, 127, 4-6); they were of the opinion that for religious duties to be incumbent, they must have been proclaimed by a Prophet, and that the individual could regard as lawful everything the prohibition of which had not been proved to him, so that he was excused if he was ignorant of the prohibition; the group of the Bayhasiyya went so far as to say that wine was originally permitted and there was nothing (in the Ḳurʾān) to forbid drinking it, even to the point of drunkenness (ibid., 117, 6f.).

In the controversies raised by the Muʿtazila [q.v.], this became a general discussion of the abstract quality of human acts, i.e., whether human acts, before revelation (or in the interval between two revelations), were to be regarded, in principle, as allowed or forbidden. The Muʿtazila, starting from their premise that reason decided whether acts were good (useful) or bad (harmful), were divided on the question of how to consider acts in which the qualifications of good and bad were evenly balanced, so as not even to lead to a preference for performing or avoiding them; the majority, it seems, regarded them as indifferent (mubāḥ), others as forbidden (maḥẓūr), and others as left in abeyance (mawḳūf) until their qualification was settled by revelation; nevertheless, these acts, not being positively bad, might be regarded as belonging to the category of good (in a wider meaning of the term). Ibn Ḥazm [q.v.], too, together with "all Ẓāhirīs and groups among the followers of ḳiyās", concluded on the basis of Ḳurʾān X, 59 and XVI, 116 that the qualification must be left in abeyance. The opinions within the orthodox schools of law and theology, which in any case hold that the religious and legal qualities of goodness and badness are known not by reason but only by revelation, and thereby deny the very basis of the reasoning of the Muʿtazila, are divided; sūra V, 1 and 4 are adduced in favour of the opinion that the acts in question are, in principle, forbidden, and sūras II, 29 and XX, 50 in favour of the opposite opinion; the majority of the Ḥanafīs hold that they are allowed; the prevailing opinion among the Mālikīs and the Shāfiʿīs is that it is meaningless to apply those categories before revelation; the Ḥanbalīs are divided.

All are agreed, however, that in the actual law of Islam, generally speaking, everything which is not positively forbidden (or reprehensible) and does not, on the face of it, involve causing damage, is mubāḥ. This general rule has often found expression, from an early period onwards, in sayings of the most highly esteemed authorities, although it does not play a significant part in the doctrine of uṣūl al-fiḳh. But al-Djāḥiẓ uses the principle that "everything that is not forbidden in the Ḳurʾān or in the sunna of the Prophet is lawful and unrestricted" (mubāḥ muṭlaḳ) in an amusing way in order to show as legitimate the entertainment of male companies by singing slave-girls (Risālat al-Ḳiyān, ed. Finkel, Cairo 1926, 56; transl. Pellat, in Arabica, x (1963), 125).

IBĀḤA (II) "permission", a term commonly applied to antinomian teachings (or actions), especially as asserted among certain Shīʿī and Ṣūfī groups. Antinomian trends were strong among the more radical Shīʿī circles from an early date. "Allowing the forbidden", ibāḥat (or taḥlīl) al-maḥārim, is a constantly recurring accusation against certain groups on the fringe of the Shīʿa; it served, among other criteria, to class them among the Ghulāt [q.v.]. The heresiographers mention many such groups as belonging to, or splitting off from the movements tracing the imāmate through Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyya or through Muḥammad al-Bāḳir.

Among these groups, knowledge of the imām, usually understood as gnosis of his true nature, was the most essential religious obligation, and so important as to reduce all other obligations to insignificance. The Ḳurʾānic legal injunctions were then often interpreted (taʾwīl) as signifying some act of loyalty to the imām or to the community of true believers, while the prohibitions referred to religious enemies. Or the legal prescriptions might be considered as "chains and burdens", as a punishment for those who refused to acknowledge the true imām. The charges of libertinism which were invariably levelled against such groups by the upholders of the sharīʿa have to be viewed with reserve.

Early Ismāʿīlism varied this pattern by holding that the era of Muḥammad and the validity of his law had come to an end with the appearance of the Ḳāʾim, Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl, the master of the seventh era. The Ḳurʾān and its law were interpreted according to their inner meaning (bāṭin), which, in contrast to their exterior, literal meaning (ẓāhir), was of eternal validity. But this early antinomianism was strongly opposed by the official Fāṭimid daʿwa, which consistently maintained that both ẓāhir and bāṭin, sharīʿa and taʾwīl, works and knowledge, were obligatory. It reappeared in movements which split off later from the Fāṭimid daʿwa, notably the Druze and the Nizārīs. (W. Madelung)

Among Ṣūfīs, antinomianism seems to have been later in developing; early Ṣūfīs were commonly rigorists in the cult and tutiorists in points of conscience. But when Islamic spiritual life began to flow largely through Ṣūfī channels, antinomian thinking appeared there too. Sometimes Ṣūfīs probably fell heir to the experience and even the language of earlier Shīʿī traditions.

For Ṣūfīs, as for Shīʿīs, the texts of Ḳurʾān and Ḥadīth concealed a bāṭin, a secret spiritual meaning; and some Ṣūfīs felt that following the bāṭin dispensed one from the literal prescription. But whereas Shīʿī antinomianism reflected the historical role of the imām and the élite community of his adherents, Ṣūfī mysticism, like any mysticism, suggested a more personal rejection of literally formulated prescriptions. The bāṭin was not an arbitrarily allegorical meaning of the letter, but rather an inner spirit to which the letter was an approximation, symbolization, or even exemplification, adapted to less spiritual minds. Accordingly, it could be expected that once this inner spirit was entered into, the actual letter was superfluous—the spirit would of itself call forth whatever act was needed.

This point of view took several forms. If God enlightened consciences directly, the scholastic interpretation of rules by sharʿī scholars was artificial in comparison; hence, even those Ṣūfīs who upheld the norms worked out by the ʿulamāʾ tended to argue on the basis of loyalty and exemplary zeal rather than claim that the sharʿī ʿulamāʾ really understood God's will better. Then Ṣūfīs believed that the advanced mystical devotee was the friend of God; and just as some Shīʿīs felt that whoever was devoted to the imām, even though not actually dispensed from sharʿī rules, would be forgiven his transgressions, so some Ṣūfīs believed that the friend of God was free—that even if he still ought to perform God's commands, he did them out of uncoerced love; and if he slipped, he would be forgiven. Some held that the perfected Ṣūfī saint could by his nature do no sin: whatever action he seemed to do must be understood otherwise.

Ṣūfī discipline itself made for tension with the sharīʿa. The devotee who had reached high spiritual states might be so wholly in God's hands that he was not responsible for his own actions: if he did perform the ritual worship, it might be unawares—God took care of his enraptured worshipper. Especially illegal utterances (shaṭḥiyyāt) were held blameless under these circumstances. In any case, the novice must agree to obey his pīr implicitly; many would add, even in seeming contravention of the sharīʿa. Moreover, Ṣūfī ways of worship often seemed opposed to the sharīʿa—music and dance; even, eventually, taking drugs, or gazing at beautiful figures. Ṣūfī apologists claimed that what was for a devotional purpose was exempted from the rules. Some of the Malāmatiyya [q.v.], who made a point of concealing their virtues and not their vices, seem to have adopted vices on purpose to display them.

In all these cases, it was ordinary Ṣūfī teaching which, however cautiously couched, at the least gave to a Ṣūfī's obedience to sharʿī rules a distinctive flavour. But all Ṣūfīsm was esoteric: only the initiate could know the real truth behind what was taught. Hence radicals readily concluded that the sharīʿa rules did not really apply to initiates at all. (Moreover, as Ṣūfīs came to see all religions as equally legitimate—if not equally perfect—ways of approaching God, the rules of any one religion could seem little more than transient expedients.) Such radicals ranged from those who asserted antinomianism only as an esoteric principle, not to be actually practised, to those who, alleging some religious pretext, ignored social standards of all sorts. Normally, ibāḥa meant not unethical interpersonal behaviour, but the rejection of sharʿī norms for ceremonial acts and personal regimen (eating, sex, etc.). The upholders of the sharīʿa among the Ṣūfīs attacked all who accepted any sort of ibāḥa (sometimes under the name "ibāḥiyya").

Some *ṭarīḳa*s were noted for insisting on the sharīʿa—for instance, the Naḳshbandiyya and the Ḳādiriyya [qq.v.]; others, such as the Bektāshiyya [q.v.], notoriously flouted conventional standards. Such *ṭarīḳa*s were called, in Persian, bī-sharʿ. For some centuries, certain extreme antinomian dervishes were referred to as *Ḳalandar*s [q.v.]. But even within sharīʿa-observant *ṭarīḳa*s, individual *shaykh*s might take a bī-sharʿ position.

Shīʿī antinomianism sprang from chiliastic hopes: the hypocritically unjust world was to be transformed and filled with justice by God's agent; what mattered was to dissociate oneself from the world and its ways and to stand ready to support the new order. Ṣūfī antinomianism sprang rather from a mystical experience and vision, in which an inner ethical responsiveness made all external rules seem trivial or arbitrary. But the two sorts of vision, chiliastic and mystical, were often combined, especially in the later medieval period, when a S̲h̲īʿī sect like the Nizārī Ismāʿīlīs took on the aspect of a Ṣūfī ṭarīḳa, while more than one Ṣūfī ṭarīḳa was adopting a S̲h̲īʿī and more or less chiliastic outlook.

Bibliography: Most Ṣūfī writings, while upholding the s̲h̲arīʿa, have displayed one or more of the tendencies toward ibāḥa cited; D̲j̲alāl al-Dīn Rūmī's Mat̲h̲nawī exemplifies most of them. G̲h̲azālī's polemic against the Ahl al-ibāḥa is edited and translated, with a useful introduction, "Der Antinomismus der islamischen Mystik", by Otto Pretzl, Die Streitschrift des Ġazâlī gegen die Ibâḥîja, Munich 1933 (SB Bayer. Ak., Phil.-hist. Abt., Jahrgang 1933, Heft 7).

IBĀḤATIYA, Hindu sect. The Ibāḥatiya were, by some writers on Indo-Muslim history, confused with the Ibāḥiyya or Aṣḥāb al-Ibāḥa. As the Ismāʿīlīs are included among the latter, these writers have thought that the term Ibāḥatiya applies to them. A closer examination of the evidence, however, leads to the conclusion that the references are to a Hindu Tāntric sect, which was also known as Vāma-mārgī or Vāma-čārī ("followers of the left hand path") and formed a sub-section of the S̲h̲āktas. The Tāntras form the scriptures of the *Vāma-mārgī*s. The essential requisites of Tāntric worship are the five *mākara*s, wine, flesh, fish, mystical gesticulations and sexual intercourse. They worship the female principle. The form of this worship is promiscuous intercourse in the form of communal orgies. The women place their *čolī*s (bodices) in a jar. The male worshippers pick out a čolī at random and have intercourse with its owner (H. H. Wilson, Religious sects of the Hindus, 245-63). The ceremony is called Bhairavī-čakra (S. H. Hoḍīvālā, Studies in Indo-Muslim history, i, 342). The followers of this sect were specially strong in Orissa during the period of Muslim rule.

The Futūḥāt-i Fīrūzs̲h̲āhī mentions that the Ibāḥatiya made an image and worshipped it. This was probably a symbolic representation of the female sexual organ. The Sīrat-i Fīrūzs̲h̲āhī (p. 146) says that the Ibāḥatiya "have an appointed day when they gather at a place fixed for the purpose. They plaster the ground with cowdung and, in accordance with the custom of the idolaters, scatter rice and flour on it. They then ask the person whom they want to turn into a follower to prostate himself on the ground, and teach him formulas of infidelity to repudiate Islam and to say that he has become their follower. That night they collect their daughters, wives, mothers and sisters and give them pork to eat and wine to drink. Then the lamp is put out and they take off the garments of the women. Every one then pulls out a garment and cohabits with the woman to whom the garment belongs, even though she may be his own mother, sister or daughter". This is precisely what the *Vāma-mārgī*s did. The text clearly says later (p. 59) that the inhabitants of D̲j̲ād̲j̲nagar (Orissa) "all are Ibāḥatīs, worship images and have temples in every town, their main place of worship being the temple of D̲j̲agannāth". In those days Vāma-mārgī Tāntrism seems to have been very strong in Orissa.

IBĀḤIYYA [see IBĀḤA (II)].

IBB, formerly the capital of the *ḳaḍā*ʾ of the same name in the sand̲j̲aḳ of Taʿizz in the Yemen; now, since 1946, a separate *liwā*ʾ, comprising the *ḳaḍā*ʾs Ibb, ʿUdeyn, D̲h̲ī Sufāl, Ḳuʿtaba and Yerīm. Besides the pronunciation with i peculiar to the Yemen, we find also Abb (in Niebuhr: Aebb). At an earlier period the walled town, with a population estimated at 4,000, belonged to the territory of D̲h̲ū D̲j̲ibla. It is situated on the 'upper road' leading from ʿAdan to Ṣanʿāʾ. According to the proposals of the A. Beneyton mission of 1911 for the construction of a railway from al-Ḥudayda to Taʿizz, it was to form a station on this line, as it is now an important station on the motor-road from Taʿizz to Ṣanʿāʾ. But this project was never carried out, and the later development of motor-traffic made it superfluous. It lies, 2050 m. above sea level, in a fertile region where cereals and fruit are grown, and also coffee, ḳāt, indigo and wars. There are about 60 mosques within the town; the water-supply is provided by an aqueduct bringing water down from the mountains, which are about 3200 m. high. In the vicinity there was at one time a silver mine (photographs in the Islām-Stichting in Leiden).

IBDĀʿ, absolute creation, primordial innovation. — The term itself is not Ḳurʾānic, but the Ḳurʾān calls God Badīʿ, Absolute Creator, Innovator. The two verses II, 117 and VI, 101 assert that God is "Creator (Badīʿ) of the heavens and the earth": we should obviously understand by this, of everything. The commentators emphasize that God is called Badīʿ by virtue of His (absolute) creation of the heavens and the earth, and K̲h̲āliḳ by virtue of His creation (k̲h̲alḳ) of man ("made of clay", LV, 14).

There is another distinction founded on the Ḳurʾān: the text frequently contrasts "the first creation" with "the second", that of the resurrection of the body. In this case it is never the verb badaʿ or its fourth form abdaʿ that is used, but the expression badaʾ al-k̲h̲alḳ, "He began to create" (e.g., X, 4, 34; XXVII, 64, etc.; very frequent). Thus, while the root bdʾ suggests the idea of a "beginning" which involves a continuation, the root bdʿ implies, strictly, not a "first time", but a radical innovation, an absolute bringing into existence.

Taking its meaning from the divine name Badīʿ, the maṣdar of the fourth form comes to express, in the elaboration of Muslim thought, the actual act of God. Ibdāʿ belongs above all to the vocabularies of S̲h̲īʿism (particularly Ismāʿīlism) and falsafa: its meanings here depend on the respective world-views. ʿIlm al-kalām gives it a further technical meaning consonant with the Sunnī idea of "creation".

References to Shīʿī thought. — Ibdāʿ is thought of in connexion with the divine kun, the "Be!" of the Word that brings into existence. "The Creator (Badīʿ) of the heavens and the earth, when He decrees a thing, He says to it only "Be!", and it is" (Ḳurʾān, II, 117). But "the heavens and the earth" of the verse are subject to interpretation. By His ibdāʿ, by His "primordial establishing", as H. Corbin translates it, God brings into existence the higher world of the mubdaʿāt, that is to say Intelligences capable of hearing the divine call, and of answering it (cf. in the 4th/10th century, Abū Yaʿḳūb al-Sidjistānī, Kitāb al-Yanābīʿ, § 40, ap. H. Corbin, Trilogie ismaélienne, Teheran-Paris 1961). Such is the "world of the ibdāʿ", to be distinguished from the lower "world of the khalḳ". More precisely still, the divine ibdāʿ is addressed to the First Hypostasis, al-mubdaʿ al-awwal, in which the intelligible pleroma is contained. One might even say that, for al-Sidjistānī, the formulated and active (or mubdiʿ) ibdāʿ is the First Hypostasis. The same line of thought is found in Nāṣir-i Khusraw.

We later find the Imāmī Mullā Sadra Shīrāzī (10th-11th/16th-17th century) protesting against those who identify the radical Will (mashīʾa) with the divine Essence, and make the ibdāʿ into the First Emanation. For him, referring to the 8th Imām, ʿAlī Riḍā, no distinction exists between radical Will, act of Will (irāda) and ibdāʿ: they are three names for divine Activity. Now, divine Activity is God, but as manifested in the First Cause, Essence being God unmanifested. From the First Cause emanates the "Muḥammadan Reality", "the mass of primordial Light ... from which come the fourteen higher archangelical Lights" (cf. H. Corbin, introduction and notes to Kitāb al-mashāʿir, "Book of metaphysical Penetrations", Teheran-Paris 1964, 83, 121, 168, and passim). These various nuances of Shīʿī interpretation appear to represent various attempts to discern the absolute immediacy of the ibdāʿ, the creative Word kun, in an emanatist cosmogony where "nothing can come from the One but the one".

Falsafa. — Abū Yaʿḳūb al-Kindī, closer in this to the Muʿtazilīs than to other "philosophers", takes ibdāʿ in the sense of temporal creation ex nihilo (Rasāʾil al-Kindī, ed. Abū Rīda, i, Cairo 1369/1950, 207, 270; cf. R. Walzer, Greek into Arabic, Oxford 1962, 188-9). For later falāsifa, Ibn Rushd as well as Ibn Sīnā or al-Fārābī, ibdāʿ denotes the absoluteness of the creative (emanative) act in the production of beings that have no reason for existing in their own essence. Here too we find an emanatism of a neoplatonic kind, and the idea that "nothing can come from the One but the one"; the First Intelligence is the first of the mubdaʿāt (cf. al-Fārābī, ʿUyūn al-masāʾil, apud Alfārābī's Phil. Abhand., ed. Dieterici, Leiden 1890, 58). But while Shīʿī thought as such puts the accent on the divine imperative kun and its immediacy, falsafa, whatever Shīʿī influences it may have undergone, emphasizes above all in the idea of ibdāʿ an absolute production of being. Here, as an example, is a brief analysis of Avicenna's vocabulary.

Two questions are found in Ibn Sīnā: (1) production of being; (2) the method of this production.

(1) — Production of being. In his explanatory and didactic works, Ibn Sīnā certainly uses khalḳ: "Khalḳ signifies first of all to make to receive being, whatever it is" (tisʿ rasāʾil, Cairo 1326, 101). But in the texts that serve as a prelude to his Ḥikma mashriḳiyya, in which he expresses a more personal thought, ibdāʿ seems to him best to denote the absolute innovation, considered non-temporally, of a being not necessary in itself, which is really preceded by nothing, not even not-being, and which takes all that it is from the First; thus Ishārāt, ed. Forget, Leiden 1892, 153. The First created thing, al-mubdaʿ al-awwal (ibid., 431), is the first Hypostasis or the Intellect of the All. More clearly still, the "Commentary" (sharḥ) on the pseudo-"Theology of Aristotle" (ed. A. Badawī, Cairo 1947, 60) takes ibdāʿ as the correlative of inbidjās, the two terms together denoting creative emanation: "This process is called 'gushing out' (inbidjās) when the procession of beings from the first Being is considered, and 'creation' (ibdāʿ) when the relationship of the first Being to the other beings is considered". The accent is still laid on radical coming into existence brought about by ibdāʿ (ibid., 64).

(2) — The method of production (cf. Ishārāt, loc. cit.; Tisʿ rasāʾil, 101-2, etc.). In a more limited sense ibdāʿ denotes the production, without any kind of intermediate pre-existence, of incurruptible and eternal beings, whether above all incorporeal, or corporeal (the celestial spheres): here again we find the "world of the ibdāʿ" (dār al-ibdāʿ) of Shīʿī thought. Khalḳ denotes rather the production, with or without an intermediary, of corporeal beings, whether incorruptible or corruptible; takwīn denotes the production, with an intermediary, of corruptible beings (in a sense that is quite close to that of ṣunʿ, another of Avicenna's words). Finally, iḥdāth should be noted; this term emphasizes the non-necessity of the final product; it could thus be applied to any being that is not necessary of itself, although it preferably implies a temporal beginning (cf. A.-M. Goichon, La distinction de l'essence et de l'existence d'après Ibn Sīnā, Paris 1937, 241-59). Thus, then, in Avicenna's texts, ibdāʿ, khalḳ and iḥdāth suggest above all, but in differing degrees, creative emanation proceeding from the first Being; takwīn and ṣunʿ are reserved for the production ("manufacture") of compound beings from pre-existing elements.

To conclude this brief (and fragmentary) lexicographical study: in Shīʿism as in falsafa, ibdāʿ puts the accent on the absolute power of the creative act (or gushing out). The way in which this term is applied to the beings thus produced, the mubdaʿāt, depends on the particular cosmology or world-view.

ʿIlm al-kalām. — It was apparently after the conflicts with falsafa (e.g., al-Shahrastānī, etc.) that ibdāʿ was fully accepted into the vocabulary of the mutakallimūn. It bears the same fundamental meaning, but its connotations are certainly closer to those it has in al-Kindī than to those it has in Avicenna or the Shīʿīs. For the sake of brevity, we shall confine ourselves to referring to the Taʿrīfāt of al-Djurdjānī (ed. Flügel, Leipzig 1845, 5-6), which summarize with precision the usage of the school in this matter.

Ibdāʿ, then, denotes the bringing into existence (or the location in being, īdjād) of a thing, "without anteriority of matter or of time": such are the (separate) Intellects, the ʿuḳūl, al-Djurdjānī says, adopting the restricted meaning of Avicenna's ibdāʿ. Ibdāʿ is thus placed in correlative opposition to takwīn, defined as the production of being with anteriority of matter and time. The distinction between ibdāʿ and khalḳ is as follows: the former denotes bringing into existence with nothing preceding; the second, bringing into existence from an existing thing. Khalḳ and takwīn are distinguished from one another, in that khalḳ emphasizes the idea of creating, whereas takwīn emphasizes that of forming or fashioning. Al-Djurdjānī does not mention here the general meaning of khalḳ proposed by Ibn Sīnā (and by the most widely used Arabic dictionary). He states in fact that ibdāʿ is "more general" than khalḳ. He cites, in this sense, the verses of the Ḳurʾān (cf. supra) where the divine Name Badīʿ is used for the creation "of the heavens and the earth", and the verb khalaḳa for the creation of man.

IBDĀL (A.), "replacement", "mutation", technical term in Arabic grammar indicating on the one hand morphological features involving a mutation of a phonetic character, the grammatical (naḥwī) ibdāl as in ittaṣala <iwtaṣala* [see HAMZA, NAḤW, TAṢRĪF, etc.] and, on the other hand, in its lexicographical sense, the doublets (badal, muḍāraʿa, muʿāḳaba, naẓīr, etc.) which are very common in Arabic and which differ from each other only by a single consonant: madaḥa/madaha "to praise", ḳaṭaʿa/ḳaṭama "to cut", etc.

This lexicographical (lughawī) ibdāl has intrigued the philologists, who from an early period have studied the phenomenon and especially have drawn up lists of examples, though generally neglecting to indicate their provenance. Two main problems presented themselves: first was the question whether doublets of this type existed in the same dialect with an identical meaning, and the second, whether the quality of the consonants in question played any part in their formation. Not all linguists have seen these problems very clearly and many have limited themselves to listing the examples which may be classed under the same rubric according to the "permutation" in question (t/l, t/f, etc.). A scholar such as Ibn Fāris (d. 395/1004) has no hesitation in stating that the Arabs have a habit (min sunan) of replacing one phoneme (ḥarf) with another (Ṣāḥibī, ed. Chouémi, Beirut 1383/1964, 203-4), and Ibn Sīduh (d. 458/1066) admits the existence of muḍāraʿa in the speech of one single tribe (Mukhaṣṣaṣ, xiv, 19). On the other hand, Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Lughawī (d. 351/962) certainly seems to consider that these doublets are not found within one single dialect (K. al-Ibdāl, ed. ʿIzz al-Dīn al-Tanūkhī, Damascus 1379/1960, i, 261) and he is even more categorical in his introduction, a passage from which has fortunately been preserved by Suyūṭī (Muzhir, i, 273; 2nd ed., i, 460): he does not see the phenomenon of ibdāl as intentional, but as consisting of the appearance of variants (lughāt), of paronyms used in different tribes. He does not, however, consider that this paronymy necessarily implies that the phonemes in question have adjacent points of articulation, for he cites cases of ibdāl which are very far from complying with this condition: dj/ḥ, dj/ṣ, dj/d, etc. Al-Mubarrad (d. 285/898), however, had already considered it essential that they should be adjacent (Kāmil, Cairo 1308, ii, 97); Ibn Djinnī (d. 392/1002) in his Sirr al-ṣināʿa (i, 197) and Ibn Sīduh (Mukhaṣṣaṣ, xiii, 274) followed him on this point.

The examination of doublets was also to lead to the formation of a more general theory on the origin of language; Ibn Djinnī (Khaṣāʾiṣ, i, 46) had already not ruled out the fact that onomatopœic words formed a large part of the vocabulary, but it was Fāris al-Shidyāḳ [q.v.] in particular who developed this theory in his Sirr al-layāl fi 'l-ḳalb wa 'l-ibdāl (Istanbul 1248); he points out that the verbs which imply, for example, an idea of rupture, breaking, etc. offer many examples of doublets, and considers that the onomatopœic biliteral form with a long second radical (verbs known as "deaf") is the earliest (e.g., ḳaṭṭa "to cut") and that the Arabs consciously replaced the second element of the doubled consonant in order to express a different shade of meaning (hence ḳaṭaʿa, ḳaṭama, etc.); obviously one is led to ask whether a biliteral has become a triliteral, and thus the whole question of biliterality is raised.

We cannot investigate in detail here the rules which the philologists have attempted to isolate. For example, al-Farrāʾ (d. 207/822) had stated that before kh, gh, ḳ or ṭ, the sibilant s changed to the emphatic ṣ; al-Sid al-Baṭalyawsī (d. 520/1126) adds to this ʿayn; and al-Ḥarīrī, in the maḳāma ḥalābiyya, delights in collecting doublets in s and ṣ. In addition, the grammarians enumerate very carefully all the phonemes which permute in the type of ibdāl known as naḥwī, but they do not agree as to their number.

From another point of view, it is perhaps not without interest to mention the idea of the editor of the K. al-Ibdāl of Abu 'l-Ṭayyib, who suggests (Introduction, 41-2) the use of doublets to enrich modern terminology and proposes, for example, taʾrīth "demarcation" and taʾrīf "land survey", or mirḍakha "walnut-cracker" and mirḍaḥa "hazelnut-cracker" (which would probably lead to a certain amount of confusion).

After allowances have been made for artifice and error (in particular (taṣḥīf, misreadings which have led to a fair number of badals), it would be useful to collect the examples cited in the monographs, to compare them with the roots of the other Semitic languages and submit them to detailed analysis. This would permit, to the extent that they can be localized, the production of maps showing the linguistic geography of ancient Arabia (cf. C. Rabin, Ancient West-Arabian, London 1951).

Bibliography: grammatical works generally contain a paragraph on ibdāl, but the most complete synthesis is that of Suyūṭī (Muzhir, i, 272-82; 2nd edition, i, 458 ff.) and the most profound study is that of ʿIzz al-Dīn al-Tanūkhī, in his Introduction to K. al-Ibdāl of Abu 'l-Ṭayyib, 5-42; see also B. Bustānī, in F. Bustānī, Dāʾirat al-maʿārif, ii, 84-90, and the bibliography cited there. Besides the K. al-Ibdāl already mentioned, the other ancient monographs which have been preserved are those of Ibn al-Sikkīt, al-Ḳalb wa 'l-muʿāḳaba wa 'l-naẓāʾir, ed. Tanūkhī (in the press).

(ED.)

IBIL (A.), collective noun indicating the two main species of the camelidae, the camelus dromedarius, or dromedary, with a single hump, and the camelus bactrianus, or camel proper, with two humps. The latter species, common in Central Asia, in western China and in northern Persia, was known to the Arabs under the name of fālidj (pl. fawālidj); the crossing of two-humped stallions with Arab female camels (ʿirāb) produced the species called bukht (sing. bukhtī, pl. bakhātī) which did not breed and which was used mainly as a beast of burden (see al-Djāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, index; al-Masʿūdī, Murūdj, iii, 4-5; al-Bayhaḳī, Maḥāsin, 110; al-Damīrī, s.v.; LA, s.v.; Leo Africanus, tr. Épaulard, ii, 556). As the history of the camel-owning tribes in Arabia and in North Africa has been covered at length in the art. BADW (to the bibl. of which should now be added: F. Gabrieli (ed.), L'Antica società beduina, Rome 1959; R. Mauny, Tableau géographique . . ., 287 ff. and bibl. there given), we confine ourselves here to the camelus dromedarius, which lives in the area from the Indus valley to the Sahara and the Congo, and for convenience we shall call it "camel".

Early poetry and works of lexicography bear witness to the extraordinarily rich vocabulary which Arabic possesses to describe this animal, which provided the Bedouin with a large part of his food, his clothing and his shelter, and served as a mount and a means of transport (see, e.g., Ibn Sīduh, Mukhaṣṣaṣ, vii, 1-174; F. Hommel, Die Namen der Säugethiere bei den südsemitischen Völkern, Leipzig 1879, notes more than 160 words); there are terms for the camel at different stages of growth (for the modern period, see, e.g., Jaussen, Moab, 270), many descriptions based on physical characteristics, and equally numerous metaphors, but only four terms are really specific: ibil (fem.) indicates the species and the group, baʿīr, the individual, regardless of sex, nāḳa the female and djamal the male (sometimes used equally with ibil for the species; see Ch. Pellat, Sur quelques noms d'animaux domestiques en arabe classique, in GLECS, viii (25 May 1960), 95-9). There four terms are found in the Ḳurʾān, where nāḳa in particular appears in the edifying stories of Ṣāliḥ, the Thamūd, etc. (see VII, 71, 75, XI, 67, XVII, 61, XXVI, 155, LIV, 27, XCI, 13). Djamal seems to come from Hebrew גמל (gimel being a reminiscence of the form of its neck) and to be itself the origin of Greek κάμηλος and Latin camelus.

The Ḳurʾān certainly says (LXXVIII, 17): "What, do they not consider how the camel (ibil) was created?" but some interpret this verse as an allusion to the clouds. The popular belief that this animal is descended from demons (shayāṭīn) survived into Islam (cf. al-Djāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, i, 297, 343; Ibn Ḳutayba, Mukhtalif al-ḥadīth, 163); moreover, it can happen that djinns take the form of a camel (E. Westermarck, Pagan survivals, London 1933, 6); according to a current legend, the camel urinates backwards because it was "modified" in order not to soil Abraham (see especially H. Massé, Croyances et coutumes persanes, Paris 1938, i, 187). The early Arabs believed that the descendants of the herds which had belonged to the annihilated peoples of ʿĀd, Thamūd, etc. had taken refuge in the country of Wabār [q.v.], where they lived in a wild state (ḥūsh); the males then bred with "Arab" female camels and produced the "méhara" (mahriyya), a species famed for its speed and the slimness of its limbs and body, as well as other less well-known species; this belief is perhaps a survival from the period when the camel lived wild in Arabia. It is worth noting also that the giraffe is considered either as belonging to the camelidae or as being the result of a cross between a camel and a panther or other animals (see al-Djāḥiẓ, Tarbīʿ, index, s.v. zarāfa).

The camel, unlike the horse, played an important rôle in sacrifices; before Islam, camels were ritually slaughtered at the time of the pilgrimage to Mecca (see J. Chelhod, Le sacrifice chez les Arabes, Paris 1955, index s.v. hady). The enucleation of one eye was performed on a stallion as a rule when the herd numbered a thousand, and the second eye suffered the same fate when this number was exceeded (see al-Djāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, i, 17); this practice, intended to ward off the evil eye, to avoid distemper, and to shield the herds from the attacks of hostile tribes, may be compared with the ʿatīra [q.v.]; ignipuncture was practiced on a healthy animal to cure animals afflicted with mange (ʿurr). The reception of guests by a generous host was always marked by the slaughter of a camel, and the unfortunate beast was also the victim in the game of maysir [q.v.]. Closely associated with its Bedouin owner during his lifetime, his camel often followed him in death [see BALIYYA] to serve him as a mount on the Day of Resurrection. Even recently a camel-owning tribe would make the animals take part in mourning by inducing the female camels and their young to emit cries resembling lamentations (see A. Dhina, Nomadisme, 427-8). The camel is one of the animals endued with baraka [q.v.], and to eat its flesh amounted to an act of faith (cf. J. Wellhausen, Reste, 115, n. 2); in Morocco, the Prophet is made to say: "He who does not eat of my camels does not belong to my people" (Westermarck, Survivals, 105-6). Its flesh is indeed perfectly licit, whilst it is abominated by the Jews because its hoof is not cloven (Lev., XI, 4; Deut., XIV, 7). A camel seen in a dream is usually a good omen, but in Persia, if it falls asleep at the door of a house, the owner will die (H. Massé, Croyances, i, 193).

Pre-Islamic poetry gives pride of place to the she-camel, the Bedouins' favourite mount, and the raḥīl of ḳaṣīdas is the occasion for detailed descriptions accompanied by extremely eulogistic epithets; that of Ṭarafa, in his muʿallaḳa, is justly famous (Fr. tr. by Caussin de Perceval, apud L. Machuel, Auteurs arabes, Paris 1924, 45-7; Eng. tr. A. J. Arberry, The seven odes, London and New York 1957, 83-5), but many other poems contain lyrical passages on the camel, which seems to be so intimately linked with the very structure of the ḳaṣīda that some modern poets, who have rarely if ever seen riding-camels, feel that they too must conform artificially with the tradition. What the poets most esteem is the smooth gait, the speed, the sobriety and the endurance of the "ship of the desert" (safīnat al-barr; see I. Goldziher, in ZDMG, xliv (1890), 165 ff., analysed by G. H. Bousquet, in Arabica, vii/3 (1960), 255-6). During their long journeys across the desert, the Bedouins loaded their water-supplies on camels specially kept for this purpose (rāwiya), but they sometimes had to tie up the mouths of some of their animals in order to prevent them from ruminating, and thus be able to find in their stomach, in case of need, water which was still drinkable (faẓẓ; see LA, s.v.); at other times they cut the throat of a sacrificed animal to collect and drink its blood (madjdūḥ) (see Arabica, ii/3 (1955), 327). It was also said that camels prevented blood from being spilt, for they were used to pay blood-money (diya [q.v.]), and it was in camels also that a bride's dowry was paid; thus the ḥadīth (?): "Do not speak ill of camels for in them is found a means of avoiding bloodshed (raḳūʾ al-dam) and of paying the dowry of a woman of noble birth"; according to another ḥadīth: "Camels are a source of power for their owner, sheep a blessing, and good is attached to the forelock of horses until the Resurrection".

The character of the camel, its spiteful disposition (cf. H. Massé, op. cit., 187), and its stubbornness have often been stressed; the rutting stallion (cf. Leo Africanus, ii, 557) has an extraordinary strength and will let no-one approach the herd of which he is the head; he makes the soft palate (shiḳshiḳa) project from his mouth, belling violently. Of the males, only those selected when young for breeding are kept uncastrated; this avoids fights to the death between stallions. Animals destined as mounts and those to be used as beasts of burden are also selected at an early age. Each tribe branded its herds with a red-hot iron, which gave occasion for ceremonies whose significance has somewhat changed in the course of time [see MAWSIM].

The strength of the camel is admired, also the ease with which (thanks to its long neck, which serves as a balance) it can get up from the ground when laden with heavy burdens; in Islamic literary sources it is compared with the elephant, and it is in a sense the symbol of the Arabs just as the elephant is of the Indians.

For transport, the early Arabs used a rudimentary pack-saddle (ikāf) or a ḳatad of the size of the hump, which they placed on cushions (ḥils). The question of the riding-camel and of the position of the rider in relation to the hump has been studied by W. Dostal (in L'antica società beduina, 15 ff.); according to this writer, the practice of sitting behind the hump is earlier than that of placing the saddle directly on the hump, which dates from the beginning of the Christian era; Leo Africanus (i, 35) mentions the use of a saddle between the hump and the neck, corresponding to the raḥla of the present-day "méharistes" (troops mounted on fast camels)—a light saddle placed on the withers of the animal. The early Arabs must sometimes have ridden bareback, but generally they used a saddle (raḥl), which was called riḥāla when it was adorned with skins; this saddle was made of wooden bows (ḳatad) joined together with leather thongs; it was separated from the hump by cushions and was held in place by girths passing under the breast (ghurḍa), the belly (ḥaḳab) and the loins (rabaḍ) of the animal. A rope threaded through a nose-ring (khizāma) made control of the animal easier than when the simple halter (rasan) was used, and a curved stick (miḥdjan) was used to guide it. Women of a certain rank rode in a palanquin (hawdadj) made of hoops arranged to form a dome and draped with hangings to screen the travellers from prying glances; one of these palanquins has remained famous in the history of Islam—that in which ʿĀʾisha sat during the Battle of the Camel [see AL-DJAMAL]. Palanquins of this type are still in use nowadays, particularly during marriage ceremonies, and are called ʿaṭṭūsh, bāṣūr, etc.; moreover modern descriptions of the harnessing of camels correspond very closely with what we know of those used in earlier times, and the terminology itself has scarcely changed (see, e.g., Jaussen, Moab, 272-3). Among the Touareg (Ṭawāriḳ [q.v.]) of the Sahara, apart from the raḥla of the "méharistes" four kinds of saddle are in use: tarik, with a pommel in the form of a cross; tamzak, of the same shape but more luxurious; tahyast, simpler, with a pommel in the form of a rectangular batten; and akhawi, a woman's saddle, wider and heavier and provided with semi-circular hoops attached to the side (see Ch. de Foucauld, Dict. touareg-français, Paris 1951, ii, 547, 723, iii, 1273, iv, 1623).

Among tribes which are at least partly settled, the camel is still used for agricultural work—ploughing, threshing, etc. (see G. Boris, Documents, passim, with illustrations and vocabulary), and Leo Africanus (ii, 40) already mentions the custom throughout Numidia of ploughing with a team consisting of a horse and a camel. Nowadays the peasants of Cape Bon (Tunisia) often harness a camel to a two-wheeled cart, and in the streets of Karachi (Pakistan) tall camels may be seen drawing four-wheeled wagons.

Yet such work does not make the best use of the camel's attributes, which are perfectly adapted to the conditions of life in hot deserts and which are preeminently suitable for journeys across long stretches of desert and for forays [see GHAZW] in regions where the climate and the vegetation are unsuitable for the rearing of horses in great numbers. In the early period of Islam, the camel was used as a mount and as a beast of burden for long or short expeditions; during the conquest of ʿIrāḳ, the Persian commander himself was mounted on a dromedary, but it was on horseback that the warriors were accustomed to face their enemies in single combat; and it was also on horses, which until then had been led, that the mounted fighters formed themselves into line of battle to commence the attack (cf. the verb tanāzala: to dismount from a camel and mount a horse in order to fight). The historians relate that the rebels who went to meet ʿAlī at Baṣra had a certain number of camels [see AL-DJAMAL], but later, as the theatres of operations became more distant, the camel no longer appears except in the baggage-trains, and it is worthy of note that in the characteristic texts assembled by G. Wiet (Grandeur de l'Islam, Paris 1961) the camel is not mentioned after the battle of that name. Even when ʿUḳba b. Nāfiʿ [q.v.] set off on the conquest of Fazzān [q.v.], he assembled a light force of 400 horsemen accompanied by 400 camels carrying 800 skins of water (Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, Conquête de l'Afrique du Nord[2], ed. and tr. A. Gateau, Algiers 1947, 61). Historians and geographers give very large numbers when they speak of the herds of camels of the North African steppes (see R. Mauny, op. cit., 289-91), and Ibn Khaldūn, for example (Berbères, ii, 70), tells how the Almoravids made off with 50,000 animals belonging to the government of Sidjilmāsa; such figures do not seem exaggerated when it is recalled that at the beginning of the 20th century there were 180,000 head of camels in the province of Oran alone. The Andalusians alone among the Arabic-speaking peoples were deprived of the familiar sight of riding- and pack-camels (cf. H. Pérès, Poésie andalouse, index). At the beginning of the 10th/16th century, Leo Africanus devoted a substantial chapter to the camel (Description de l'Afrique, ii, 555-8). He rightly remarks that "all the Arabs who own camels are lords who live in freedom, for with these animals they can remain in the deserts". Some of his statements may be exaggerated, as for example when he says that "the camels of Africa can carry their burdens for forty or fifty days without its being necessary to feed them in the evening; they are unloaded and allowed to graze in the surrounding country on a little grass, thorns and a few branches", or when he gives distances which are patently excessive; he mentions moreover that the camel, after journeying five days without eating, loses the fat of its hump, fat of which the early Arabs were especially fond. He states that the camel drivers urge on the exhausted beasts by singing to them rhythmic chants (ḥidāʾ; see GHINĀʾ), and relates that in Cairo he saw a camel dance to the sound of a drum. Leo Africanus specifies that an animal in bad physical condition sold for a few *dīnār*s, and adds that 1000 ducats represented the value of 100 camels; a more precise figure cannot be expected, for the prices varied according to the condition of the animal, the district, and its suitability as a mount. He gives also some information on caravans [see ḲĀFILA].

The brief notes of Leo Africanus are still relevant today. Nowadays work-camels and pack-camels are still to be seen even in large cities, and these not necessarily on the edge of the steppe; they belong to camel-owning tribes whose stock consists of slow and sturdy transport-camels, while the riding-camel, the "méhari" (mahrī), is confined to the desert where, after a fairly simple training, it is used for swift journeys. The gestation period of the mahriyya is twelve months, and when she has given birth her baby camel is lovingly cared for; for several days a wide belt is put round it to support its intestines and hold in its belly, and it is kept in the tent to accustom it to human company. In spring its hair is cut; only at the end of a year is one of its nostrils pierced—this is later threaded with an iron ring. At the same time a piece of pointed wood is inserted into it so that when it tries to suck, it pricks its mother, is kicked and abandons the udder for fresh grass. At the age of two years its training begins; it is first taught to stand motionless, not moving from one spot, then it is introduced to the saddle and the nose-ring, through which a guiding-rope is passed; it is taught to run as fast as possible by light whipping, and to kneel at the voice of its master. The conditioning of its reflex actions is made very easy by the sensitivity of its skin to the slightest blow. Its life-span is about 25 years. Its speed varies from 5-12 miles an hour, and it can cover 90 miles in 15 or 20 hours, but thereafter it must rest. The pack-camel walks at $2^1/_2$ or 3 miles an hour and covers distances of 15 or 20 miles at a stretch with an average load of 3 cwts. The sobriety and endurance of the "ship of the desert" are legendary; in its five "water buckets", it stores a considerable amount of water, and thanks to the fluctuations of its body-temperature, which ranges from 34° C. to 40.7° C., its perspiration is very slight; thus it can go without drinking for several days, and can suffice with eating only a little poor scrub; but, when it has spent a week without drinking, it has lost more than 200 pounds and it needs about 25 gallons of water, abundant food and a long rest in order to recover. Thus, though the Bedouin do not look after their camels as assiduously as they do their horses, from antiquity they have been constantly preoccupied by the search for pastures and water-places for their camels, and this has not infrequently led to clashes among them.

IBLĪS, proper name of the devil, probably a contraction of διάβολος. A different etymology has been suggested by D. Künstlinger, in RO, vi, 76 ff.; the Arab philologists consider that Iblīs derives from the root bls, "because Iblīs has nothing to expect (ublisa) from the mercy of God". He is also known as ʿAduww Allāh (the enemy of God) and al-ʿAduww (the Enemy). Finally he is given the common name of al-s̲h̲ayṭān [q.v.].

In the Ḳurʾān he appears at two points in the story of the beginning of the world. (1) When God had created Adam [q.v.] from clay and had breathed into him the spirit of life, He ordered the angels to bow down before the first man, but Iblīs refused to bow down before this mortal "created from malleable clay" (XV, 30-3; XVII, 61; cf. VII, 11 and XXXVIII, 73-4); and God cried: "Then go thou forth hence; thou art accursed (rad̲j̲īm)! Upon thee shall rest the curse, till the Day of Doom" (XV, 33-4). At his own request, the punishment promised to Iblīs is then deferred until the Day of Judgement, and he is given power to lead astray all those who are not faithful servants of God. (2) The first of his misdeeds was to tempt Adam and Eve in the Garden, to incite them to disobey God (II, 34-6), and to eat the fruit of the "Tree of immortality" (XX, 116-21). In these two accounts of the sin of Adam and Eve, Iblīs retains his proper name when it is a question of his refusal to bow down before Adam (II, 34; XX, 116); but when he is the tempter, he becomes al-s̲h̲ayṭān, "the demon".

The revolt of Iblīs and the scene in the Garden as described in the Ḳurʾān may be compared with Christian traditions. In the Life of Adam and Eve, § 15 (Kautzsch, Apokryphen), it is stated that the Archangel Michael had invited the angels to worship Adam. The devil objected that Adam was less than they were, and younger; he and his host refused to worship and were exiled to this Earth. According to the Schatzhöhle (ed. Bezold, 15-6 of the Syro-Arabic text), God gave Adam power over all creatures. All the angels therefore bowed before him, with the exception of the devil, who, overcome by jealousy, exclaimed: "It is he who should adore me, who am light and air, whereas he is only earth." He was then driven out from heaven together with his host, and was, from that moment, named Satan, Demon, etc.

Thus until the Day of Judgement God will allow Iblīs to tempt men, but not the true believers, the servants of God (Ḳurʾān, XV, 39-42; cf. XXXIV, 20-1). He is the "sly tempter" who whispers (yuwaswisu) evil thoughts into men's hearts (ibid., CXIV, 4-6). The hātif [q.v.], so well known in Arabic literature, who is heard but never seen, has on several occasions been a manifestation of Iblīs. It was in this form that Iblīs is said to have warned ʿAlī not to wash the body of Muḥammad; but after this another hātif recalled the Prophet's son-in-law to the correct course (al-T̲h̲aʿlabī, Ḳiṣaṣ, 44). This produces the problem of the "distinction of the spirits" on which many Ṣūfīs meditated.

At the end of time Iblīs is to be thrown into the fire of hell, with his host and with the damned: "then they (the false gods) shall be pitched into it, they and the perverse and the hosts of Iblīs, altogether" (Ḳurʾān, XXVI, 94-5; cf., XV, 43). This verse is reminiscent of Matthew, XXV, 41: "Then shall He say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." It is only a few Ṣūfīs of extreme tendencies who envisage a "pardon of Iblīs".

There are two questions which are the subjects of thought or meditation among Muslims.

1. The nature of Iblīs. Is he an angel or a d̲j̲inn [q.v.]? We have seen that there are many Ḳur'ānic texts which seem to count him among the angels: "All the angels bowed together, except Iblīs ...". But an angel is created "obedient" to God, he is endowed by nature with sinlessness (ʿiṣma) according to the most commonly followed tradition. How then can an angel disobey God and be cursed by Him? It is fairly frequently suggested that this is because Iblīs is a d̲j̲inn, *d̲j̲inn*s not being incapable of sin, but some being good and others evil. Thus al-Zamak̲h̲s̲h̲arī (Kas̲h̲s̲h̲āf, on Ḳur'ān, XX, 116) teaches that Iblīs is merely d̲j̲innī and that the term "angel" refers at the same time to "angel" and d̲j̲inn. In fact, verse XVIII, 50, gives this variant: "And when We said to the angels, 'Bow yourselves to Adam', so they bowed themselves, save Iblīs; he was one of the jinns, and committed ungodliness against his Lord's command". Iblīs was thus a d̲j̲inn who happened to be there inappropriately among the angels. According to some commentators, the divine order: "bow down before Adam" was certainly not a "testing of the angels", but it was intended to produce the confusion and damnation of the arrogant d̲j̲inn who had slipped in among them. Furthermore, in another verse (VII, 12), Iblīs, presenting his defence, retorts to God: "I am better than he; Thou createdst me of fire, and him Thou createdst of clay". It is taught in ḥadīt̲h̲ that the angels are created from light (nūr), while the Ḳur'ān states: "He created man of a clay like the potter's, He created the jinn of a smokeless fire (mārid̲j̲ min nār)" (LV, 14-5); or "of fire flaming" (XV, 27). Realizing that he was created from fire, Iblīs, for that very reason, declares himself to be a d̲j̲inn.

This interpretation, however, is far from being generally admitted. Al-Bayḍāwī for example suggests that Iblīs could belong to the angels so far as his hopes were concerned, but that his actions place him among the *d̲j̲inn*s. Others suggest a class of angels capable of sin, and able to propagate their species, as do men and *d̲j̲inn*s. And when Iblīs, in the Ḳur'ānic text, declares himself to be "created from fire" (nār) and not from light (nūr), this is because God intended that, by a lapsus linguae, he should in a sense utter his own condemnation.

Al-Ṭabarī, in his Annales, repeats many, and sometimes diverse, traditions. The *d̲j̲inn*s are a category of angels charged with the supervision of Paradise (al-d̲j̲anna), hence their name (Annales, i, 80). They were made of fire, not light (ibid., 81). In the beginning, they inhabited the earth, but discord broke out among them and led to bloodshed. God then sent Iblīs—who at this time was still called ʿAzāzīl or al-Ḥārit̲h̲—with a legion of angels against the fomenters of trouble, who were thrown back into the mountains. Other traditions present Iblīs as one of the terrestrial *d̲j̲inn*s who was led captive to heaven by the avenging angels, he being still young at this time (ibid., 84). The name of al-Ḥakam is also given to Iblīs before his fall, because God had appointed him judge over the *d̲j̲inn*s. He held this office for a thousand years. Then he became inflated with pride because of this name, and provoked among the *d̲j̲inn*s disturbances which in their turn lasted for one thousand years. God then sent a fire which destroyed them, but Iblīs took refuge in heaven, where he remained a faithful servant of God until the creation of Adam (ibid., 85; Masʿūdī, Murūd̲j̲, i, 50 ff.).

We shall not enumerate all the "accounts" concerning Iblīs, either in the pre-eternity before the creation of man or when he played his part in the Garden of Eden. It can in any case be said that Muslim thought remains undecided as to whether he was an angel or a d̲j̲inn, and does not pronounce an opinion on the possibility of his being a "fallen angel".

2. The sin of Iblīs. On the other hand, tradition has no hesitation concerning the character of Iblīs, his disobedience, the divine curse upon him, and the character of "enemy of God and of mankind", of perpetual tempter, which will be his until the day of the Last Judgement.

The two sins which are constantly attributed to Iblīs are pride and disobedience. The origin of his revolt seems to have been pride: we have seen that he not only declared himself to be superior to Adam and refused to bow down before him, but, according to al-Ṭabarī (i, 83), he considered himself superior to the other angels. It is also said (ibid., 79) that he was an angel and as such reigned over the *d̲j̲inn*s, on earth and in the lower heavens. It was after he had rebelled that he was called by God al-s̲h̲ayṭān al-rad̲j̲īm.

But the question then arises as to how he can have been so blinded by power as to have been confirmed in a perpetual state of disobedience and how he could justify to himself his attitude.

Some mutakallimūn and many Ṣūfīs meditated on the "disobedience of Iblīs": the reason why he disobeyed God and was thus placed among the unfaithful was that he did not submit to the unconditional Will of God, preferring the general Law which had been given ("to worship God alone") to the short-term Commandment "(bow down before Adam"). Al-Ḥallād̲j̲ makes him say: "No, I shall worship only Thee". Some suggest that he believed God was setting a trap for him and that his duty was to evade it by an affirmation of uncompromising monotheism. Even more: he preferred to risk incurring God's curse and to be in hell, and to be, even against God so to speak, the mysterious witness of the absolute Divine Unity. By the expedient of such analyses, Iblīs is accorded a certain grandeur, and there can sometimes be recognized in some of the Ṣūfīs a kind of secret sympathy for the one who was "forced to be disobedient", a victim of the incomprehensible and inscrutable Commandment of God.

But al-Ḥallād̲j̲ nevertheless firmly maintains that this disobedience certainly arose from pride. He devoted to the drama of Iblīs the very beautiful text of the Ṭā sīn al-azal (Arabic text ed. L. Massignon, Kitāb al-Ṭawāsīn, Paris 1913; Fr. tr. apud L. Massignon, Passion d'al-Ḥallāj, Paris 1922, 864-77). Al-Ḥallād̲j̲ composed this text during his imprisonment in Bag̲h̲dād, in response, it seems, to the extremist S̲h̲īʿī al-S̲h̲almag̲h̲ānī. He used it as an occasion to denounce not only the limits but also the unwarrantedness of the proclamation of the Divine Unity (tawḥīd) flourished by Iblīs against God's Commandment; cf. in particular the dialogue between Moses, descending from the mountain where he received the Law, and Iblīs, the objector with a face blackened by God's curse.

IBN (A.), son. The Arab grammarians and lexicographers, who tend to trace all words to three root elements, generally attribute ibn to a root b.n.w.*

and consider that it derives from a hypothetical banaw^{un}* by loss of the 3rd sonant radical. Others state that the root is b.n.y. and that the word ibn comes from the verb banā/yabnī ʿalā "set up [a tent] on", and, by extension, "marry". In reality, we have an ancient semitic biliteral, which is nevertheless triliteralized in the relative adjective banawī and in the abstract noun bunuwwa. The fem. bint, formed with the fem. indicator -t, has a rival in a secondary form ibnat^{un}. In the pl., banūn^{a} and abnāʾ (the latter, however, being specialized [q.v.]) correspond to ibn, banāt^{un} to bint.

The word ibn is constantly employed in genealogical series, and then offers some grammatical peculiarities. On the one hand, the prosthetic alif disappears when it is preceded by the name (ism) of the person and followed by the appellative of his father (except at the beginning of a line), while it is maintained after a kunya or a laḳab and before an appellative referring to the mother or an ancestor of the person quoted immediately before, that is to say when ibn has become the first element of a true patronymic name (see below). On the other hand, the presence of the word ibn exerts a regressive effect on the preceding name; the tanwīn, where there is one normally, disappears (e.g., Muḥammad^{u} bn^{u} Aḥmad^{a} instead of Muḥammad^{un}), as if ibn "defined" this name, while in fact it is in apposition; in the vocative, an analogous regressive effect is optional, in the sense that the first name may be put into the accusative case like ibn itself or remain in the nominative, while a progressive effect is exercised obligatorily on the epithetic adjective, so that the latter need not be in the same case as the noun to which it refers (yā Muḥammad^{a} [or Muḥammad^{u}] bn^{a} Aḥmad^{a} ʾl-ḥakīm^{a} [never ḥakīm^{u}]).

Ibn enters into the composition of a certain number of names of animals or plants: ibn ʿirs, "weasel", ibn awbar, "sand truffle", etc., the pl. then being banāt (though banū is sometimes found). Equally, it is used in a sense similar to dhū or to ṣāḥib: ibn ʿishrīn sana, "20 years old", ibn sabīl, "traveller", etc. In these two uses it appears strongly expressive.

It occurs that certain persons are known by an appellative composed of Ibn and a woman's name; one might see a vestige of matriarchal society in this, but in the Islamic period these designations have a pejorative character and are designed either to humiliate the person so named or to emphasize that his father is unknown (Ibn al-Marāgha for Djarīr [q.v.], Ibn Sumayya for Ziyād [q.v.], etc.). The same principle of "pater incertus, mater certa" requires the use of the mother's, not the father's, name in magical invocations (cf. S. Reich, Quatre coupes magiques, in BEO, vii-viii, 165-6). In contrast, in the name of Ibn ʿĀʾisha for example, the reference is to ʿĀʾisha bint Ṭalḥa [q.v.] and is in no sense pejorative. But if the name is not to be pejorative, it is generally a man's name which appears after Ibn. In fact, a large number of personages who have played a part in the political, literary, or other history of the Arabs are known (maʿrūf bi-) or indeed famous (mashhūr bi-) under an appellative formed of Ibn followed by the ism, laḳab, or nisba of their father (Ibn ʿAbbās = ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbbās) or of an ancestor, sometimes celebrated, as in the case of Ibn ʿĀʾisha, but more often obscure, though a descendant has become famous: Ibn Rushd = Muḥammad b. Rushd, then his son Aḥmad, his grandson Muḥammad, etc. This is called maʿrifa or shuhra and it is in this manner that patronymic names have been constructed. One finds, particularly in Spain but also in the rest of the Muslim world, families known comprehensively under the name of Banū Fulān (e.g., Banū Shuhayd), but of which each member is provided with a patronymic beginning with Ibn (Ibn Ḥazm, Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, Ibn Maslama, etc.), with a kunya and with an ism (Abū Muḥammad ʿAlī Ibn Ḥazm; in this case it is preferable to write Ibn with a capital letter). It is after all only necessary to glance through the pages following this article or vols. ii-iv of the Dāʾirat al-maʿārif of F. al-Bustānī to see that a large number of historical personages may be designated by their maʿrifa or shuhra, although the choice of this appellative may provoke confusion. The authors of biographical collections generally indicate the maʿrifa, where it exists, of the persons forming the subject of the biographies, and take care to refer the reader in an index to the ism under which the biographies in question are placed. In this respect vol. vi of the Lisān al-Mīzān of al-ʿAsḳalānī, for example, is instructive, since it demonstrates the relatively small proportion of customary *maʿrifa*s compared with the *nisba*s and *kunya*s. Although the use of the maʿrifa is ancient, it does not seem to go back to the pre-Islamic period; in fact the clan was then known under the name of Banū Fulān, but each member, instead of calling himself Ibn Fulān, was called Akhū Banī Fulān or by a nisba.

IBN ʿABBĀD, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ ISḤĀḲ IBRĀHĪM AL-NAFZĪ AL-ḤIMYARĪ AL-RUNDĪ, the most important mystic writer of the 8th/14th century in the dominions of the Marīnids. Born in 733/1333 at Ronda, where his father was preacher in the mosque, he emigrated while still young to Morocco, whose famous *madrasa*s attracted many students. He studied first at Tlemcen with the famous al-Sharīf al-Tilimsānī, who played a great part in the restoration of the Mālikī madhhab in the Maghrib; then he went to Fez, where al-Ābilī, al-Maḳḳarī, al-ʿImrānī, al-Fishtālī and others less famous were teaching. The basic works which he studied were the Muwaṭṭaʾ of Mālik, the Tahdhīb of al-Barādhiʿī, and the two *Mukhtaṣar*s of Ibn al-Ḥādjib. In Ṣūfism, which at that time was held in high regard in the religious circles of Fez, he began with the Ḳūt al-ḳulūb of al-Makkī. Inclined to solitude and meditation, Ibn ʿAbbād soon abandoned legal sciences to devote himself to asceticism and mysticism. In about 760/1359 he reached Salé where, according to al-Ḥaḍramī (Salsal), Ṣūfī life flourished round Ibn ʿĀshir, an extraordinary personality whose influence extended throughout Morocco. It was through him that Ibn ʿAbbād's spiritual development was completed. When his master died, Ibn ʿAbbād paid a rapid visit to Tangier where he enjoyed fatḥ with Abū Marwān ʿAbd al-Malik, then returned to Fez where, at the request of his friends Yaḥyā al-Sarrādj and Sulaymān al-Anfāsī, he wrote a commentary on the Ḥikam of Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh of Alexandria, which was a great success. The works of Ibn ʿAṭāʾ had just reached Morocco, and with them the Shādhilī ṭariḳa, whose spread in the Maghrib owed much to Ibn ʿAbbād. He returned once more to Salé, where he wrote almost all of the Letters which were collected and published by Yaḥyā al-Sarrādj. From then he was a Ṣūfī shaykh. In 777/1375, the sultan appointed him imām and preacher at the Ḳarawiyyīn, an office which he occupied until his death, in 792/1390. He was buried at Bāb al-Futūḥ where the place of his burial is still known although the tomb is no longer identifiable.

In addition to the commentary on the Ḥikam, Ibn ʿAbbād left some letters containing spiritual directions and collected in Rasāʾil kubrā, lith. Fez 1320, 262 pp.) and Rasāʾil ṣughrā (ed. P. Nwyia, 1957, 138 pp.) and some unpublished works: Fatḥ al-tuḥfa (a collection of ḥadīths in the form of an manual of devotion); Duʿā bi 'l-asmāʾ al-ḥusnā; a collection of Friday sermons; a versification of the Ḥikam. Ibn ʿAbbād's work marks a return to primitive Ṣūfism (Muḥāsibī), for he did not like Ibn Sabʿīn and only rarely cites Ibn al-ʿArabī.

Bibliography: P. Nwyia, Ibn ʿAbbād de Ronda, Beirut 1961, 1-41, provides a complete list of the sources and studies, among which there should be specially mentioned M. Asín Palacios, Un precursor hispano-musulman de San Juan de la Cruz, in al-Andalus, i (1933), 7-79.

(P. Nwyia)

IBN ʿABBĀD, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbbād b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAbbād b. Aḥmad b. Idrīs, vizier and man of letters of the Būyid period, known as Kāfī 'l-kufāt or more frequently al-Ṣāḥib, an honorific title which he may have owed to his relations with Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-ʿAmīd [see ibn al-ʿamīd, i], but more probably to his loyalty to the amīr Muʾayyid al-Dawla [q.v.]. Born probably at Iṣṭakhr on 16 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 326/14 September 938 (but the sources disagree on his date and place of birth), of a family of high officials (his father at least, known as al-Shaykh al-amīn, had been a kātib and then become vizier to Rukn al-Dawla; see Abū Ḥayyān, Mathālib, index; Ibn al-Djawzī, Muntaẓam, vii; Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, vi, 170-2), he spent his childhood at Ṭālaḳān (near Ḳazwīn), and then settled at Iṣfahān. After the death of his father (334 or 335/946 or 947), he attached himself to Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-ʿAmīd, first as his devoted disciple and later as his secretary. In 347/958 he was chosen to accompany the amīr Abū Manṣūr (Muʾayyid al-Dawla) to Baghdād as a clerk, and it was at this period that his friendly relations with the Būyid prince began. He may even have been at about this time the tutor of another son of Rukn al-Dawla. On the latter's death (366/976), the governorship of Iṣfahān and its dependencies fell to Muʾayyid al-Dawla who confirmed the kātib Ibn ʿAbbād and the vizier Abu 'l-Fatḥ Ibn al-ʿAmīd, the son of al-Ṣāḥib's master [see ibn al-ʿamīd, ii], in their offices. Abu 'l-Fatḥ then began to engage in intrigues and to incite against the vizier the army of Rayy, with the result that Muʾayyid al-Dawla, with the help of ʿAḍud al-Dawla [q.v.], succeeded in getting rid of his vizier and replacing him by Ibn ʿAbbād.

It is not easy to study in detail the vizierate of Ibn ʿAbbād, whose political activity is confused by the chroniclers with that of his masters [see būyids, ʿaḍud al-dawla, fakhr al-dawla, muʾayyid al-dawla]. There does, however, exist a notable account, though unfortunately limited to the reign of Muʾayyid al-Dawla, in the sole surviving volume of the Rasāʾil, which consists exclusively of diplomas of appointment and official letters or of correspondence with the author's eminent personal friends. The matters with which they deal naturally extend beyond a single vizierate and thus cannot be listed here. But it is interesting to note the way in which precision is combined with style in the administrative communications written by Ibn ʿAbbād. The letters of course concern general politics, and also the policy of ʿAḍud al-Dawla, the ruling head of the Būyid family, in his struggles against his cousin ʿIzz al-Dawla Bakhtiyār, and against Fakhr al-Dawla, the Sāmānids, the Kurds, etc.; the letters also cover the matter of the Daylamī vassals of the dynasty and of its changeable relations with its Ādharbaydjānī vassals. Above all, the correspondence demonstrates a constant and efficient preoccupation with exactitude in the management of the finances and the maintenance of public order; on the second of these points the vizier appears to have been hostile to the urban futuwwa [q.v.]; on the first he pays attention to the efficient collection of taxes, but also to the orderliness of their administration and, when circumstances allowed, he was not unwilling to have taxes reduced. In the name of his master he appointed governors, ḳāḍīs, etc., setting out to them their duties; the comparison of the Rasāʾil on this point with, in particular, those of his contemporary, the caliph's secretary Abū Isḥāḳ al-Ṣābiʾ, shows that there was an accepted basic form to which each of them could add only modifications of detail. The volume of the Rasāʾil examined scarcely mentions Ibn ʿAbbād's literary connexions or activities, which nevertheless also formed part of his "policy".

Al-Ṣāḥib's activity as vizier can be divided naturally into two sections, by the reigns of the two sovereigns under whom he served. Under Muʾayyid al-Dawla, he was the vizier of a vassal of ʿAḍud al-Dawla, and took care to make sure of his position by rendering homage also direct to the ruler: it is strange that ʿAḍud al-Dawla, who for himself had always refused to have only one vizier with full powers, should yet have encouraged his brother to grant his favour only to this all-powerful minister, in whom he had absolute confidence. After the death of ʿAḍud, soon followed by that of Muʾayyid, Ibn ʿAbbād acquired more completely autonomous power, his prince, Fakhr al-Dawla, being now the eldest of the family and no longer owing allegiance to anyone; but this prince continued to have full confidence in the vizier, who, after having fought against him while his brothers were alive had, against all expectation, summoned him to succeed the second of them. Ibn ʿAbbād had attempted to make him play the dominant rôle in the dynasty by his interventions first in support of Shams al-Dawla against Bahāʾ al-Dawla, then of the second against the first: this apparent volte-face is explained by the fact that the struggle between the two young princes had resulted in their territorial possessions changing hands and that in al-Ṣāḥib's view Fakhr al-Dawla should support the master of ʿIrāḳ against the master of Fārs, who might covet Iṣfahān. Naturally Fakhr al-Dawla, true to tradition, laid hands on the rich heritage of his minister, who had expected this, and no further member of his family is found among the high officials of the dynasty. But Ibn ʿAbbād himself is remembered as one of the great viziers of Muslim history, even by those who were his adversaries in doctrine (see, e.g., Niẓām al-Mulk, Siyāsat-nāma, xl, 33 and xli, 21-6). Like the latter, he belongs to the category of ministers who, in the service of princes who were either not suited to or were indifferent to the tasks of administration, were able to acquire an almost autonomous personal power and to become temporarily the true masters of the State.

Ibn ʿAbbād would not, however, have gained such wide fame if he had not also occupied a foremost place in the history of Arab literature, as much through his own works as through his patronage of scholars and poets. In addition to being apprenticed in his youth to the profession of kātib, to which he appeared to be destined by his birth, he had the good fortune to have as his mentor Ibn al-ʿAmīd, who possessed a strong traditional cultural background and no slight knowledge of theology and philosophy. During his stay in Baghdād he was able to frequent the literary circles there and to collect many traditions of which he was later able to make use. Finally, in addition to many chance teachers, he was in contact, at al-Rayy, with the grammarian Ibn Fāris [q.v.], modestly calling himself his pupil. These favourable circumstances allowed him to acquire an extensive knowledge in all the fields of Arabic culture, from exegesis and ḥadīth to history, and including grammar, literary criticism and dogmatic theology; like all *kātib*s worthy of the name he was a poet, and he handled prose with a skill which earned him lasting fame.

His very varied works may be classified under the following headings: (I) Dogmatic theology: al-Ibāna ʿan madhhab ahl al-ʿadl bi-ḥudjadj al-Ḳurʾān wa'l-ʿaḳl, a statement of some points of Muʿtazilī doctrine in contrast with other sects and schools (ed. M. Ḥ. Āl Yāsīn, in Nafāʾis al-makhṭūṭāt, i, Nadjaf 1372, 20 pp.); al-Tadhkira fi 'l-uṣūl al-khamsa, a statement of the five Muʿtazilī principles (ed. M. Ḥ. Āl Yāsīn, ibid., ii, Nadjaf 1373, 9 pp.); Risāla fi 'l-hidāya wa 'l-ḍalāla, on predestination (ed. Ḥ. ʿAlī Maḥfūẓ, Tehrān 1374/1955). Among works which are not known to have survived, the following would come into this category: K. Mukhtaṣar asmāʾ Allāh wa-ṣifātih; al-Imāma, in which he proclaimed the superiority of ʿAlī while accepting the imāmate of his predecessors; al-Zaydiyya; al-Ḳaḍāʾ wa 'l-ḳadar; Nahdj al-sabīl fi 'l-uṣūl. (II) History: Risāla fī aḥwāl ʿAbd al-ʿAẓīm al-Ḥasanī, on an important descendant of ʿAlī (ed. M. Ḥ. Āl Yāsīn, in Nafāʾis al-makhṭūṭāt, iv, Nadjaf 1374, 4 pp.); ʿUnwān al-maʿārif wa-dhikr al-khalāʾif, a short history of the life of the Prophet and of those who were proclaimed caliph, up to al-Muṭīʿ (ed. M. Ḥ. Āl Yāsīn, ibid., i, Nadjaf 1372, 29 pp.). Among the works which are lost, the following may belong to this category: al-Anwār; al-Wuzarāʾ; Taʾrīkh al-mulk wa-'khtilāf al-duwal. (III) Grammar, lexicography, etc.: al-Iḳnāʿ fi 'l-ʿarūḍ wa-takhrīdj al-ḳawāfī, a study of Arabic prosody, of the different metres and an explanation of the technical terms (manuscripts of this exist in Cairo, Paris, etc.); al-Farḳ bayn al-ḍād wa'l-ẓāʾ, a study of terms in which there is sometimes confusion between ḍād and ẓāʾ (MS Fatih); al-Muḥīṭ bi 'l-lugha, an Arabic dictionary in ten volumes arranged according to the point of articulation of the consonants (in the following order: ʿ, ḥ, h, kh, gh; ḳ, k; dj, sh, ḍ; ṣ, s; z; ṭ, d, t; ẓ, dh, th; r, l, n; f, b, m; w, ʾ, y; some incomplete manuscripts of this exist: Ahmed III, Baghdad Museum, Dār al-kutub; see J. A. Haywood, *Arabic lexicography*², Leiden 1965, index); al-Amthāl al-sāʾira min shiʿr al-Mutanabbī, proverbs collected from the work of the great poet (the text was published at Beirut in 1950, and it is found also in Ibn Maʿṣūm al-Madanī, K. Anwār al-rabīʿ fi anwāʿ al-badīʿ, in Muḳtaṭaf, xxviii/10-11 and in Thaḳāfat al-Hind, v/1); the K. al-Waḳf wa 'l-ibtidāʾ appears to be lost. (IV) Literary criticism: al-Kashf ʿan masāwī shiʿr al-Mutanabbī, a criticism of the poetry of al-Mutanabbī (the text, forming part of the Yatīma of al-Thaʿālibī, i, 123-45, was printed separately in Cairo in 1349). (V) Poetry: Dīwān (an incomplete manuscript discovered by M. Ḥ. Yāsīn, was published by him, Baghdād 1965; the Aya Sofya MS attributed to Ibn ʿAbbād is in fact not by him); al-Manẓūma al-farīda, a poem taken from the Dīwān; al-Safīna was a poetic anthology. (VI) Belles-lettres: al-Rūznāmadja a collection of literary anecdotes made at Baghdād in 347/958-9 (a manuscript discovered by M. Ḥ. Yāsīn is to be published by him); Akhbār Abi 'l-ʿAynāʾ, a lost work which confirms the importance of Abu 'l-ʿAynā [q.v.]; Rasāʾil, especially the administrative correspondence (see above) (ed. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb ʿAzzām and Shawḳī Ḍayf, Cairo 1953); al-Aʿyād wa-faḍāʾil al-nawrūz (lost). Finally there are a few works which it is impossible to classify precisely; al-Taʿlīl; Djawharat al-djamhara; al-Ḥadjar (?); al-Shawāhid.

The existence of works of a Muʿtazilī character raises the question which religious school Ibn ʿAbbād adhered to. There is no doubt that he was a good Muslim and an Arabophile, in spite of his non-Arab origin, but his biographers, his friends and his enemies disagree completely when it comes to specifying to which school he belonged. Some Shīʿīs like Ibn Bābūya (ʿUyūn akhbār al-Riḍā, 3) and others unhesitatingly claim him as one of them, and the Muʿtazilī ḳāḍī ʿAbd al-Djabbār even accuses him of being a Rāfiḍī; others attach him to the Zaydīs, to the Ḥanafīs, to the Shāfiʿīs, or to the Ḥashwiyya, but in fact he considered himself to be a pupil of the Muʿtazilīs—thus following the example of his father, who had written a K. Aḥkām al-Ḳurʾān—and he admitted that he made propaganda for this school (Rasāʾil, 73); his Ibāna and his Tadhkira provide clear evidence of his opinions. However, like many of the members of the Muʿtazilī school at Baghdād (see Ch. Pellat, in St. Isl., xv, 33) on the question of the imāmate he came down in favour of ʿAlī; furthermore, after having rejected the naṣṣ [q.v.] in the Ibāna, an early work, he came to consider that the caliphate was conferred by virtue of a naṣṣ, and thus allied himself with the Shīʿīs.

Such a contradiction is typical of the character of Ibn ʿAbbād, whose personality is presented by different authors under very different colours; thus Abū Ḥayyān paints a very severe portrait of him, but it is known that he is prejudiced. There is no doubt that he himself, being accustomed to receive praise, had a high opinion of his own worth and that his vanity was agreeably flattered by the "five hundred poets among the employees of the *dīwān*s" who sang his praises; it is even said that 100,000 couplets (some go so far as to say 100,000 poems) were devoted to his praise, but this eulogy was not enough for him, since he also wrote a panegyric on himself and ordered a poet to recite it in his presence. He did, however, possess a fair amount of ḥilm [q.v.] and knew how to behave humbly with those whom he regarded as his masters, and, although accused of avarice, he could on occasion show generosity, at least when he considered it opportune to do so.

As a writer, Ibn ʿAbbād shows a marked taste for rhymed prose, the long sentences in which the figures of badīʿ abound and which are thus very close to poetry, but his prose remains readable and, to a certain extent, light; it is in any case less precious than his poems, in which he makes use of all the ornaments and artificial characteristics of the poetry of the period. With Ibn al-ʿAmīd, al-Hamadhānī [q.v.], and al-Khuwārizmī [q.v.], Ibn ʿAbbād is one of the main representatives of the school of literature which introduced rhymed prose first into the official correspondence and then into all types of writing; a kātib and poet from Spain, Ibn Shuhayd [q.v.], however, omits Ibn ʿAbbād and considers only al-Hamadhānī and Ḳābūs [q.v.] as really representing the new tendency (apud Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, i/1, 202).

Al-Ṣāḥib Ibn ʿAbbād died at Rayy on 24 Ṣafar 385/30 March 995.

Bibliography: Ibn al-Nadīm, the contemporary of al-Ṣāḥib, devotes to him only a brief mention (Fihrist, Cairo ed., 194), but Thaʿālibī gives a good deal more (Yatīma, iii) and Yāḳūt provides a considerable amount of information (Udabāʾ, vi, 168-313; xiv, 206-10; xv, 113-5) partly taken, it is true, from the works of Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī, whose Mathālib al-wazīrayn is now published (ed. Ibrāhīm al-Kaylānī, Damascus 1961; ed. IBN ʿABBĀD [see ʿABBĀDIDS; AL-MUʿTAMID].

IBN AL-ABBĀR, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. ABĪ BAKR B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. AḤMAD B. ABĪ BAKR AL-ḲUḌĀʿĪ, historian, traditionist, littérateur, and poet, belonged to a family which had its origin in Onda, the patrimony of the Ḳuḍāʿīs of Spain; he was born in Rabīʿ II 595/February 1199 at Valencia, where he passed his youth studying under the direction of several teachers whom he quotes in his Muʿdjam. For more than twenty years he was the disciple of the most learned traditionist in Spain, Abu ʾl-Rabīʿ b. Sālim, who persuaded him to complete the Ṣila of Ibn Bashkuwāl. He made several journeys in the Peninsula fī ṭalab al-ʿilm and acted as secretary to the Muʾminid governors of Valencia. This town, after being taken by Ibn Mardanīsh [q.v.], was besieged in Ramaḍān 635/April-May 1238 by James I of Aragon; thereupon Ibn al-Abbār was sent with a deputation to ask for the assistance of the Ḥafṣid sovereign of Tunis, Abū Zakariyyāʾ [see ḤAFṢIDS]; on 4 Muḥarram 635/17 August 1238, he recited a poem rhyming in sīn (see al-Maḳḳarī, Analectes, ii, 651; idem, Azhār, iii, 307) in which he painted a moving picture of his besieged native city. He returned to Valencia, but left it a few days after it was captured by James I on 17 Ṣafar 636/28 September 1238 (Dozy, Notices, 190). Al-Ghubrīnī (ʿUnwān, 183) states that he stopped at Bougie before going to Tunis, where, received favourably by Abū Zakariyyāʾ, he was appointed chief of his chancellery, but was ordered to leave a blank in official documents in the place of the authentication for the ṣāḥib al-ʿalāma to fill in; Ibn al-Abbār did not carry out this instruction and was soon dismissed and put under arrest in his own house. However, he was pardoned and re-instated in his office.

When Abū Zakariyyāʾ died, his successor, al-Mustanṣir, kept Ibn al-Abbār close to him, but his attitude so much irritated the sovereign and his courtiers that he was ordered to be tortured. His writings were confiscated and a satire against the amīr was discovered among them. The reading of this piece enraged the amīr even more and he ordered Ibn al-Abbār to be killed by lance-thrusts. Ibn al-Abbār died on the morning of 20 Muḥarram 658/6 January 1260. On the following day his corpse, his books, his poetry, and his diplomas were burnt together on the same pyre.

We possess a certain number of official letters (Maḳḳarī, Azhār, iii, 211 ff.) and poems (idem, Analectes, i, 658, 868, ii, 762; idem, Azhār, ii, 223 ff.) of Ibn al-Abbār, who is the author of fifteen or so works (forming about 45 volumes) among which the following have been preserved:

(1) K. al-Takmila li-K. al-Ṣila (Continuation of the Ṣila of Ibn Bashkuwāl [q.v.]), ed. Codera, 2 vols., Madrid 1888-9 (BAH, v, vi); a supplement, with variants and indices, was published by Alarcón and González Palencia in Miscelánea de estudios y textos árabes, Madrid 1915, 147-690; the beginning of the work (letters alif-djīm) was ed. by Bel and Ben Cheneb, Algiers 1920. Biographical dictionary finished at Tunis. (2) al-Muʿdjam fī aṣḥāb al-ḳāḍī al-imām Abī ʿAlī al-Ṣadafī, ed. Codera, Madrid 1886 (BAH, iv). (3) K. al-Ḥulla al-siyarāʾ, partial ed. by R. Dozy in Notices sur quelques manuscrits arabes, Leiden 1847-51 (see also idem, Recherches[3] and Scriptorum arabum loci de Abbadidis) and Müller, in Beiträge zur Geschichte der westlichen Araber, Munich 1866-78; ed. Ḥ. Muʾnis, Cairo 1963, 2 vols.; critical analysis and study on Ibn al-Abbār, by ʿAbd Allāh al-Ṭabbāʿ, K. al-Ḥulla al-siyarāʾ, Beirut 1962. Biographies of poets. (4) Tuḥfat al-ḳādim, concerning the poets of Spain, was abridged by Balfīḳī, al-Muḳtaḍab min K. Tuḥfat al-ḳādim, ed. A. Bustānī in Machriq, July-Sept. 1947, and Ibrāhīm al-Ibyārī, Cairo 1957. (5) Iʿtāb al-kuttāb (The secretaries' contentment), ed. Ṣāliḥ al-Ashtar, Damascus 1961. (6) Durar al-simṭ fī khabar al-Sibṭ (on the family of the Prophet and the ʿAlids), edition prepared by A. Ghedira, who has analysed and studied the text in al-And., xxii/1 (1957) 31-54. In it the author shows himself to be violently hostile to the Umayyads and gives signs of Shīʿī tendencies.

IBN AL-ABBĀR, ABŪ DJAʿFAR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD AL-KHAWLĀNĪ, an Andalusian poet who lived among the entourage of the early ʿAbbādids [q.v.] of Seville and died in 433/1041-2. Of his Dīwān only a few poems survive, in particular a panegyric of Ismāʿīl Ibn ʿAbbād, some occasional verse and some descriptions; floral poems seem to have occupied a leading part in his work, which drew its inspiration from the life of the Andalusian aristocracy of the time: wine, pleasures, country-walks, women—these for the most part are his favourite subjects, and an element of sensuality is visible in his poems. His technique is excellent, metaphors and similes abound, and the badīʿ is applied with assurance and felicity.

Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, nos. 934, 2165, 2646 and 5159, appears to confuse this Ibn Abbār with the historian who is the subject of the preceding article.

IBN ʿABBĀS [see ʿabd allāh b. (al-)ʿabbās].

IBN ʿABD ALLĀH, as patronymic of converts [see ism].

IBN ʿABD AL-BARR al-Namarī (al-Numayrī), appellative of a family of Cordovan scholars, the principal representative of which is Abū ʿUmar Yūsuf b. ʿAbd Allāh, born in 368/978. He studied in his native city under masters of repute, engaged in correspondence with scholars of the East and travelled all over Spain "in search of knowledge", but never went to the East. Considered the best traditionist of his time, he was equally distinguished in fikh and in the science of genealogy. After displaying Ẓāhirī tendencies at first, in which he resembled his friend Ibn Ḥazm, he later followed the Mālikī doctrine, not without some inclination towards Shāfiʿī teaching. He held the position of kādī at Lisbon and Santarem under al-Muẓaffar b. al-Afṭas, and died at Játiva in 463/1070.

Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr is the author of a considerable number of works of all kinds, of which there have been preserved especially:—K. al-Istīʿāb fī maʿrifat al-Aṣḥāb, biographies of the Companions of the Prophet, ed. Ḥaydarābād 1318-9, then on the margin of the Iṣāba of al-ʿAskalānī, Cairo 1323-5, and finally ed. ʿAlī Muḥ. al-Badjāwī, Cairo 1957-60, 4 vols. (for the abridgements of this work, see Brockelmann).—Djāmiʿ bayān al ʿilm wa-faḍli-hi wā mā yanbaghī fī riwāyati-hi wa-ḥamli-hi, Cairo 1346.—al-Kāfī fi 'l-fikh, a manual of Mālikī law (see Brockelmann, S I, 297, foot).—al-Tamhīd li-mā fi 'l-Muwaṭṭaʾ min ai-maʿānī wa 'l-asānīd, on the methodology of ḥadīth (see Brockelmann, S I, 298, top, 629).—Kitāb al-istidhkār fī sharḥ madhāhib ʿulamāʾ al-amṣār, a summary of the preceding (see Brockelman S I, 297, foot).—al Istidrāk li-madhāhib al-aʿṣār fī-mā taḍammana-hu 'l-Muwaṭṭaʾ min maʿāni 'l-raʾy wa 'l-āthār, commentary on the Muwaṭṭaʾ.—Kitāb al-Intikāʾ fī faḍāʾil al-thalāthat al-aʾimma al-fukahāʾ, on Mālik, Abū Ḥanīfa and al-Shāfiʿī, Cairo 1350.—al-Inṣāf fī-mā bayn al-ʿulamāʾ min al-ikhtilāf, ed. Cairo, in Madjmūʿat al-rasāʾil al-munīriyya.—al Kaṣd wa 'l-amam fi 'l-taʿrīf bi-uṣūl al-ʿArab wa 'l-ʿAdjam wa man awwal man takallama bi 'l-ʿarabiyya min al-umam, on genealogies, Cairo 1350; French trans. A. Mahdjoub, in RAfr., xcix (1955-7).—al-Inbāh ʿalā kabāʾil al-ruwāh, on the genealogies of transmitters, printed with al-Kaṣd.—Bahdjat al-madjālis wa-uns al-mudjālis, a book of adab composed in verse for al-Muẓaffar and abridged by Ibn Luyūn (see Brockelmann, S I, 629, with other titles).

Bibliography: Ibn Khayr, Fihrasa, index; Ibn Bashkuwāl, Ṣila, ii, 640; Ibn Ḥazm, Risāla (see Ch. Pellat, in al-Andalus, xix/1 (1954), 7-9); A. González Palencia, Literatura, index; F. al-Bustānī, Dāʾirat al-maʿārif, iii, 333-4; Brockelmann, S I, 297, 628-9 (with further bibliography). (Ch. Pellat)

IBN ʿABD AL-HĀDĪ [see yūsuf b. ʿabd al-hādī].

IBN ʿABD AL-ḤAKAM refers to the son and the four grandsons of ʿAbd al-Ḥakam (said to have died in 171/787-88), a wealthy and influential family of legal scholars and historians in 3rd/9th century Egypt. The Banū ʿAbd al-Ḥakam were among those who introduced Mālikism into Egypt. They were also intimately connected with al-Shāfiʿī [q.v.], providing the initial financing of his stay in Egypt. Al-Shāfiʿī is said to have died in their house (Ibn Farḥūn, 134), and he was buried in their family plot. Later, they dissociated themselves from his teaching. Their prominent position brought them the usual share of tribulations. Thus, they suffered persecution during the Muʿtazilī miḥna in 227/842, and in 237/851 they were among those accused of having misappropriated the confiscated property of a former high official that the central government claimed for itself. They were assessed the exorbitant sum of 1,404,000 dīnārs. Although they were speedily exonerated, they seem to have lost their former prominence and influence as a result of this affair.

1. Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, who was born in 155/772 and died on 21 Ramaḍān 214/22 November 829, is said to have had direct contact with Mālik. He wrote a number of textbooks on Mālikī legal teaching. Of his writings, only the biography (sīra or faḍāʾil) of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz is preserved (ed. A. ʿUbayd, Cairo 1346/1927). The work depicts ʿUmar as the ideal Muslim ruler by means of bringing together numerous edifying anecdotes, stories of his dealings with his contemporaries, his sermons, his prayers, and his official correspondence, including a fiscal rescript clarifying his financial policies (H. A. R. Gibb, in Arabica, ii (1955), 1-16). It exemplifies the deep influence of religio-legal thought upon Muslim historiography, and it is particularly valuable as the oldest preserved representative (apart from the Sīra of the Prophet) of Muslim biographical writing on the large scale in monograph form.

2. ʿAbd al-Ḥakam, the eldest of ʿAbd Allāh's sons, died under torture during the misappropriation trial in November 851. Like Saʿd, who appears to have been the youngest of the four brothers, he did not leave much of a permanent mark.

3. Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh was esteemed by his contemporaries as the outstanding member of the family. Born on 15 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 182/27 January 799, he studied with al-Shāfiʿī but later wrote a "Refutation of al-Shāfiʿi where he was in contradiction to the Kurʾān and the sunna." It was he who was summoned to Baghdād to subscribe to the dogma of the createdness of the Kurʾān, but he refused to do so and was sent back to Egypt. His works, none of them preserved, included polemical treatises directed against the ʿIrākīs and against Bishr al-Marīsī, as well as studies of special legal questions. In the manuscripts of his father's biography of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, he is stated to be its transmitter (an addition in his name appears on pp. 121 f. of the edition). The date of his death is variously given as Wednesday, 4 or 15 Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 268/26 May (Thursday) or 6 June (Wednesday) 882, or 269/882-83.

4. Abu 'l-Kāsim ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd Allāh (born ca. 182/798-99, died 257/871) is famous for his work on "The Conquest of Egypt and the West" (Futūḥ Miṣr), the oldest preserved work on the subject (ed. C. C. Torrey, New Haven 1922; another old manuscript in Manisa, General Library 281, 2, cf. A. Ateş, in Revue de l'Institut des Manuscrits Arabes, iv (1958), 20 f.). Two long appendixes deal with the chief judges of Egypt down to the year 246/860 and with the companions of the Prophet who came to Egypt, and the *ḥadīth*s transmitted there on their authority. The main body of the work consists of a history of Egypt that starts out with the legendary early beginnings and ends with the death of ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ, following throughout the chronological sequence of events. It then continues with the recital of the subsequent conquests of Northwest Africa and Spain. The author includes important information on such matters as the historical topography (khiṭaṭ) of Fusṭāṭ and the problems of financial administration. His point of view (like that of his sources) is that of the legal scholar rather than the historian. Characteristically, he begins with the admonition to respect the original Coptic inhabitants of the country. The section on the Western conquests has been translated into French by A. Gateau (Algiers 1942, 2nd ed. 1947 [1948]); for an analysis of this section as a historical source, cf. R. Brunschvig, in AIEO Alger, vi (1942-47), 108-55.

IBN ʿABD AL-MALIK AL-MARRĀKUSHĪ, his full name being ABŪ ʿABD ʿALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD AL-MALIK B. MUḤAMMAD B. SAʿĪD AL-AWSĪ AL-ANṢĀRĪ AL-MARRĀKUSHĪ, chief ḳāḍī in Marrākush under the Marīnids, and author of a biographical dictionary indispensable for a knowledge of the illustrious men of the Muslim West. He was born, probably in Marrākush, on 14 Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 634/9 July 1237 and died in Tlemcen in 703/1303-4. His work, still in manuscript, comprises several volumes and bears the title al-Dhayl wa 'l-takmila li-kitābayni 'l-Mawṣūl wa 'l-Ṣila, that is to say Sequel and Complement to the Kitāb al-Mawṣūl fī taʾrīkh ʿulamāʾ al-Andalus of Ibn al-Faraḍī [q.v.], who died in 403/1012-3, and to the Kitāb al-Ṣila fī akhbār aʾimmat al-Andalus of Ibn Bashkuwāl [q.v.], who died in 578/1182-3. It is one of the sources habitually used by Ibn al-Khaṭīb [q.v.], Ibn al-Ḳāḍī [q.v.], Leo Africanus [q.v.], etc. In the article devoted to him by ʿAbbās b. Ibrāhīm (see Bibl.) will be found a long list of his teachers and pupils and of his other writings, with numerous references, and even the names of some thirty personages who are of importance for the history of Marrākush and whose biographies are provided by Ibn ʿAbd al-Malik.

An edition of the Dhayl is in preparation in Rabat (Morocco).

IBN ʿABD AL-MUNʿIM AL-ḤIMYARĪ (or rather al-shaykh al-faḳīh al-ʿadl ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ MUḤAMMAD ʿABD ALLĀH IBN ʿABD AL-MUNʿIM B. ʿABD AL-NŪR AL-ḤIMYARĪ, author of the important Arabic geographical dictionary entitled Kitāb al-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār fī khabar al-aḳṭār. Nothing is known of this writer apart from the facts that he came from the Maghrib and that he was a jurisconsult (faḳīh) and a ḳāḍī's assessor or notary (ʿadl). E. Lévi-Provençal was responsible for the discovery and the publication of a large part of his work (La péninsule Ibérique au Moyen Age, d'après le Kitāb ar-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār fī ḥabar al-aḳṭār d'Ibn ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Ḥimyarī, Leiden 1938). In this edition, Lévi-Provençal used several manuscripts (of Meknès, Fez, Salé and Timbuktu) dating from the 11th/17th and 12th/18th centuries. To these manuscripts there should be added two others found after 1938: one copy, preserved in the Nuruosmaniye library in Istanbul, written before the year 1045/1635-6, and another, made in 971/1563-4, and in the library of the Shaykh al-Islām at Medina. The Timbuktu manuscript gives the place and exact date of the compilation of the Rawḍ, i.e., Djudda, 866/1461. The full introduction to Ibn ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Ḥimyarī's geographical dictionary reveals that the author used as his main sources three important Arabic geographical works of the 5th/11th and 6th/12th centuries: the Kitāb al-Masālik wa 'l-mamālik of al-Bakrī (ca. 460/1067-8), the Nuzhat al-mushtāḳ fi 'khtirāḳ al-āfāḳ of al-Idrīsī (548/1154) and the geographical treatise entitled Kitāb al-Istibṣār fī ʿadjāʾib al-amṣār (ca. 587/1154), which is in fact only a rewriting of al-Bakrī's work with the addition of some personal observations by the author. It would seem that the Rawḍ might be important for any future edition of the Kitāb al-Masālik wa 'l-mamālik, since the extracts from the latter work which are dispersed in the dictionary of al-Ḥimyarī would, if put in order, give a fuller and at the same time a somewhat different version from that known from the editions of de Slane, Kunik-Rosen and Kowalski. Thus the description of the town of Brāgha (Prague), taken by al-Bakrī from the account of Ibrāhīm b. Yaʿḳūb al-Ṭurṭūshī (ca. 355/965-6), is completely different in the extract given by al-Ḥimyarī from the version published by Kowalski. The extracts from the Nuzhat al-mushtāḳ, which are very numerous especially in the parts of al-Ḥimyarī's dictionary which deal with the Iberian peninsula, could also be used for a complete edition of al-Idrīsī.

The Rawḍ was not entirely unknown before its discovery by E. Lévi-Provençal. In fact it is mentioned, before 1067/1657, in the Kashf al-ẓunūn of Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa (ed. Flügel, iii, 490, no. 6597), under the title al-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār fī akhbār al-aḳṭār, as the work of one Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Ḥimyarī, who died in 900/1494. E. Lévi-Provençal had already suggested that this was the same work as that which he had discovered. This supposition seems to be entirely justified by the fact that the brief description of it given by Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa corresponds exactly to al-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār written in 866/1461 and known thanks to the six manuscripts mentioned above.

The work of Ibn ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Ḥimyarī nevertheless presents a problem not easily solved. In fact, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa lists (iii, 491), immediately after al-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār, as no. 6598, a second work of the same title as that of no. 6597. The name of the writer of this second work—a writer of whom Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa tells us nothing—is almost the same: al-shaykh al-ʿumda Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Ḥimyarī. In his attempt to clarify matters, Lévi-Provençal comes to the conclusion that there must have been two redactions of the Kitāb al-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār written at different times by two members of the Ibn ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Ḥimyarī family. A first redaction, which has now disappeared, dates from the end of the 7th/13th century. This hypothesis is supported by two facts: (1) that among the written sources used by al-Ḥimyarī, the great treatises of the 8th/14th and 9th/15th centuries are lacking; (2) that the majority of the historical events mentioned in this dictionary do not go beyond the end of the 7th/13th century. The second redaction (of 866/1461) is represented by the numerous manuscripts mentioned above. It certainly seems to be the first, hypothetical, redaction to which the citations in al-Ḳalḳashandī (d. 821/1418) refer. It should, however, be stressed that the problem of the writing and of the author of the Kitāb al-Rawḍ still remains open and that it is not likely to be resolved before the publication of a complete critical edition of the work.

It should be mentioned that since 1938, in spite of the continual interest in it since Lévi-Provençal published the passages from it concerning the Iberian Peninsula and southern France (having published also, in 1935, the description of the Pharos of Alexandria), only very brief extracts from al-Ḥimyarī's dictionary have been published. Thus Ch. Pellat published in 1954 a description of Baṣra and in 1956 there appeared that of Crete, published by Lévi-Provençal, and that of the Italian islands and towns, by U. Rizzitano. T. Lewicki published, in 1959-60, the description of Prague (Brāgha) and of the Polish state of Mieszko I (Mishka) and in 1962-3 A. Małecka published that of certain places and coastal regions of East Africa. There should also be added the brief survey given by T. Lewicki in 1960 of all the information on Eastern, Central and Southern Europe scattered throughout the dictionary.

The work acquired a great popularity, albeit almost entirely within the Maghrib. Apart from al-Ḳalḳashandī, who reproduces passages from the earlier redaction, extracts from it are found in al-Maḳḳarī (11th/17th century), in Maḳdīsh (12th/18th century) and in al-Nāṣirī al-Salāwī (13th/19th century). The Djanī al-azhār min al-Rawḍ al-miʿṭār of al-Maḳrīzī (d. 845/1442), however, considered by some to be a rewritten version of al-Ḥimyarī's work, seems, as a result of more recent research, to be rather a résumé of the Nuzhat al-mushtāḳ of al-Idrīsī.

IBN ʿABD RABBIH, ABŪ ʿUMAR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD, Andalusian writer and poet, born at Cordova on 10 Ramaḍān 246/29 November 860, died in the same city on 18 Djumādā I 328/3 March 940. A mawlā of Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, he was one of the official panegyrists of the Marwānid dynasty from the reign of Muḥammad I (d. 273/886) to the middle of that of al-Nāṣir (300/912-350/961). He was mediocre in his laudatory poetry, but showed more originality in the erotic verses which he wrote in his youth and to which in his old age he added ascetic poems in the same rhyme and metre called mumaḥḥiṣāt ("which efface sins"). His very abundant poetic production had been collected for al-Nāṣir, and al-Ḥumaydī (apud Yāḳūt, iv, 215) had seen more than 20 djuz's of it; they included muwashshaḥāt [q.v.] and also a didactic urdjūza on the history of Islam, which is of little value and hardly tells anything new, even on Spain. Ibn ʿAbd Rabbih placed this poem at the end of the 15th book of his principal work, in which he scattered a good number of his own productions, al-ʿIḳd "The Necklace", which copyists have entitled al-ʿIḳd al-farīd "The Unique Necklace". To justify his title he divided the work into 25 books (kitāb), of which each is divided into two djuz's, and gave to each kitāb the name of a precious stone: (1) al luʾluʾa; (2) al-farīda; (3) al zabardjada; etc.; the 13th book is called al-wāsiṭa "the central (jewel)" and the last 12 books bear in inverse order the same names as the first twelve, but followed by al-thāniya; thus the 23rd is called al-zabardjada al-thāniya.

Fundamentally the ʿIḳd is a book of adab, for which the materials are drawn from the works of al-Djāḥiẓ, Ibn Ḳutayba, and other authors who had assembled the elements of Arab culture: it may thus be considered as a sort of encyclopaedia of the knowledge which is useful to a well-informed man and as a more or less successful attempt at orderly classification of the notions which constitute general culture: Book I: Government; II: War; III: Generous Men; IV: Delegations; V: How kings should be addressed; VI: Religious Knowledge and the Principles of Good Conduct (adab); VII: Proverbs; VIII: Homilies and Asceticism; IX: Condolences and Funeral Orations; X: Genealogies and Virtues of the Ancient Arabs;

XI: The Speech of the Bedouin; XII: Replies; XIII: Oratory; XIV: the Epistolary Art; XV: History of the Caliphs; XVI: Ziyād, al-Ḥadjdjādj, the Ṭālibīs, and the Barmecides; XVII: Ayyām al-ʿArab; XVIII: Virtues of Poetry; XIX: Metrics; XX: Music and Song; XXI: Women; XXII: Anecdotes; XXIII: Nature of Man and the Animals; XXIV: Food and Drink; XXV: Diverse Anecdotes.

A basic characteristic of this encyclopaedia is that, apart from a portion of the above-mentioned urdjūza, it contains absolutely no tradition of Andalusian origin and aims simply at acclimatizing in Spain some purely oriental data; the response of the Būyid vizier Ibn ʿAbbād [q.v.] is well known: after reading the ʿIḳd, which had been praised to him, he exclaimed in disappointment: "This is our merchandise which is given back to us!" And it is remarkable that Ibn Ḥazm, in his apologia for Muslim Spain, is completely silent about Ibn ʿAbd Rabbih; though it is true that his compatriot al-Shaḳundī, in his Risāla, makes him a "master of the adab genre" (tr. Luya, in Hespéris, xxii/2 (1936), 149).

There have been several editions of the ʿIḳd: Būlāḳ 1293/1876, Cairo 1303/1885-6, 1305, 1317, 1321, 1346/1927; Muḥammad Shafīʿ prepared indexes and concordances, Calcutta 1935-1937, which have been rendered less useful by the latest edition, of 1940-53, the first to be provided with an index. A certain number of passages relating to the ancient Arabs were translated by Fournel, Lettres sur l'histoire des Arabes avant l'Islamisme, Paris 1836-8. The section on music was translated into English by H. G. Farmer, Music: the priceless jewel, Collection of oriental writers on music, ed. H. G. Farmer, v, Bearsden Scotland 1942.

IBN ʿABD AL-ṢAMAD, Yūsuf b. Abi 'l-Ḳāsim b. Khalaf b. Aḥmad, Abū Baḥr (sometimes called Abū Bakr, though certainly in error), Andalusian poet of the 5th/11th century, panegyrist of al-Muʿtamid b. ʿAbbād [q.v.], king of Seville. We have little information on his life, and the dates both of his birth and of his death are unknown. He belonged to a distinguished family, devoted to literature, which originated in the kūra of Jaen and was descended from al-Samḥ b. Mālik b. Khawlān, one of the first Arab governors (wālī) of al-Andalus. Various members of the family, which was very numerous, occupied important administrative posts in the time of the Mulūk al-ṭawāʾif according to Ibn Bassām, who quotes in this connexion some satirical verses by an anonymous poet, also preserved by al-Maḳḳarī (Analectes, ii, 359). Of his output in poetry and prose, which was very copious (ka'smi-hi, i.e., ka 'l-baḥr, according to Ibn Bassām), only a small portion has survived. When al-Muʿtamid, who had most generously favoured Ibn ʿAbd al-Ṣamad, was deposed and thrown into exile, there began "an eclipse of poetry in Seville" (see E. García Gómez, in al-Andalus, x (1945), 284-343); to this period must belong several verses in which he bemoans the avarice of the new masters—the Almoravids, for whom he was now writing panegyrics—and his wanderings, in which he encountered no friends (Analectes, loc. cit.). The memory of the fallen al-Muʿtamid's generosity was to stay with him all his life and faithful, like Ibn al-Labbāna [q.v.], to the poet-king, he went shortly after the latter's death (488/1095) to Aghmāt, where he was so daring as to kiss his tomb and to recite, on a feast day, before a large crowd which was moved at the sound of his poetry, a long impassioned elegy in which he called him "King of Kings". This anecdote, of which we possess two similar versions (Ibn Khāḳān, Ḳalāʾid, Būlāḳ 1283, 30-1; Ibn al-Khaṭīb, Aʿmāl al-aʿlām, Beirut 1956, 165-7, who has preserved more than a hundred lines) has been used by R. Dozy, Hist. Mus. Esp., iii, 175, and by E. García Gómez, in al-Andalus, xviii (1953), 403-4.

IBN ʿABD AL-WAHHĀB, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, Ḥanbalī theologian, founder of Wahhābism, was born in 1115/1703, in the centre of the Nadjd at al-ʿUyayna, an oasis which at that time was enjoying some prosperity. There had already been several representatives of Ḥanbalism in the Nadjd, and the young Muḥammad belonged to a family which had produced several doctors of the school. His grandfather, Sulaymān b. Muḥammad, had been muftī of the Nadjd. His father ʿAbd al-Wahhāb was ḳāḍī at ʿUyayna during the emirate of ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Muʿammar; he taught ḥadīth and fiḳh in the mosques of the town and left several works of Ḥanbalī inspiration, which in part survive.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb's education was begun under his father's guidance. He learned the Ḳurʾān by heart and first studied Ḥanbalī doctrine in the works of shaykh Muwaffaḳ al-Dīn b. Ḳudāma (d. 620/1223) and in particular in the ʿUmda, which, according to shaykh Ibn Bishr, was regarded in the Nadjd at that period as having great authority (on this author and on the ʿUmda see H. Laoust, Le précis de droit d'Ibn Qudāma, in the series PIFD, Beirut 1950).

The young theologian soon left ʿUyayna, in what circumstances it is not clear. It may be that he had already begun his teaching against the cult of saints and the paganism which was rife among the Bedouin, and that the amīr showed little inclination to follow him in this matter. It is also likely that, as the oasis of ʿUyayna offered relatively few intellectual resources, the young shaykh felt the need to go and complete his education in other centres.

Little is known of the chronology of his journeys "in search of learning". He performed the Pilgrimage, thus going first to Mecca, where he found the teaching disappointing. The stay which he made after this at Medina was decisive in shaping the later direction of his thought. At Medina, he met especially a Ḥanbalī theologian who was to have a decisive influence on him: shaykh ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibrāhīm al-Nadjdī, who had become a supporter of the neo-Ḥanbalism of Ibn Taymiyya and who had himself been the pupil of shaykh ʿAbd al-Bāḳī al-Ḥanbalī (d. 1071/1661); ʿAbd al-Bāḳī, a native of Baʿlabakk, had himself studied under al-Bahūtī [q.v.] and al-

Marʿī; he taught for a long period at Medina and then returned to Damascus, where he continued his teaching at the Umayyad mosque.

At Medina, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb met also, among other ʿulamāʾ, Muḥammad b. Ḥayāt al-Sindī (d. 1165/1751), a Ḥanafī, who does not seem to have had a great influence on him, and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Kurdī (d. 1194/1780).

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb went next (it is not known exactly at what date) to Baṣra, which was still an active centre of Islamic culture, and where he seems to have stayed for a fairly long time. The names are known of several of the teachers whom he met at that period, in particular that of Muḥammad al-Madjmūʿī, under whom he studied philology and the sīra. Probably also, in a town with such a mixed population as Baṣra, he had the opportunity of making the acquaintance of a wider circle of spiritual groups than that in which he had been educated, in particular the mystic fraternities and the Shīʿī sects. The spectacle of popular idolatry such as the cult of saints, with all its attendant practices which were not easily reconcilable with a strict interpretation of tradition, seems to have led the young shaykh to embark at this period on his campaign of reform. His departure from Baṣra, which seems to have occurred in 1152/1739, marks in any case the end of the period of his education and the beginning of his religious and political apostolate.

According to the anonymous author of the Lamʿ al-shihāb fī taʾrīkh M. b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb (ed. Aḥmad A. Abū Ḥākima, Beirut 1967), the legendary character of which seems evident on many counts, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, after spending four years at Baṣra, went to Baghdād, where he made a wealthy marriage and remained for five years. He next appeared in Kurdistān, at Hamadān and at Iṣfahān, where he arrived about 1148/1736 at the beginning of the reign of Nādir Shāh and studied philosophy and Ṣūfism. He next went to Damascus and to Cairo. Similar journeys had already been attributed to Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal.

On leaving Baṣra, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb went to Huraymila, where his father (d. 1153/1740) had just settled. It was here that Muḥammad composed his first work on the unity of God (tawḥīd) and really began his apostolate, gathering round him his first disciples and thus encountering opposition from the ruling families of the oasis. Some traditions even state that he was disowned by his brother Sulaymān and by his father; these accounts should not, however, be accepted without some reservation, particularly since there exists a dissertation by his father against the cult of saints (MRMN, i, 523-5).

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb left Huraymila in about 1153/1740 for ʿUyayna, where he spent four years. The oasis was at this time governed by another member of the Muʿammar, ʿUthman b. Bishr, who, like Ibn Suʿūd after him, tried to base his own power on the teachings of the shaykh. Muḥammad dreamt of the establishment of a theocratic state in which he would be the juridical adviser. He converted ʿUthmān b. Muʿammar to his ideas, urging him to cut down a number of sacred trees and to destroy some sacred tombs in the surrounding district. At the same time he extended his preaching to the oases of Darʿiyya, of Riyāḍ and of Manfūḥa. He even seems at this period to have gained a following in Darʿiyya, whose amīr was then Muḥammad b. Suʿūd; two brothers of the amīr, Mashārī and Thunayān, even became supporters of the reformer and took part in the destruction of tombs in the region of ʿUyayna. The Nadjd was at this time in close relationship with the inhabitants of al-Aḥsāʾ, among whom were many Shīʿīs, who tended to be alarmed by the shaykh's preaching.

Because of their intervention (and also that of the Banū Khālid), Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb left ʿUyayna. He went to Darʿiyya (near Riyāḍ, the present capital of Saudi Arabia), where he had acquired powerful protectors in some members of the family of the amīr, Muḥammad b. Suʿūd. After winning to his cause the amīr's two brothers and his son, the future king ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (d. 1215/1801), he finally gained the support of the amīr himself, though not without some difficulties, since the hostility of the Banū Khālid was still to be feared. In 1157/1744, the amīr and the theologian swore an oath of mutual loyalty (bayʿa)) to strive, by force if necessary, to make the kingdom of God's word prevail. This pact, which was always faithfully adhered to, marked the true beginning of the Wahhābī state, which transformed a small Bedouin principality into a legally instituted theocracy. Henceforward it was impossible to separate the destiny of the shaykh from that of the Suʿūdī dynasty.

Until his death in 1206/1792, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb continued his activities in the religious as well as the political field. He taught at the mosque in Darʿiyya, wrote theological works and sent out numerous letters to win to his cause new supporters in the Nadjd and the neighbouring regions. He also remained the political counsellor of Muḥammad b. Suʿūd (d. 1178/1765) and, to a lesser degree it seems, of his successor ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (1765-1801).

Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb's literary and doctrinal works, which have appeared in many editions for the use of Wahhābī missionary activity, are important. Most of his writings are fairly short, full of quotations from the Ḳurʾān and *hadīth*s; the Kitāb al-Tawḥīd, his main work, often reprinted and the subject of many commentaries, sets out his teaching in the line of the strictest Ḥanbalī doctrine.

His Kitāb al-Uṣūl al-thalātha, written at the request of the ruler ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, is a type of official catechism, which is still esteemed. His Kitāb Kashf al-shubuhāt, more polemical in presentation, condemns Muslims who do not practise the true tawḥīd.

The Madjmūʿat al-ḥadīth al-nadjdiyya (Cairo 1346) mentions several other short treatises by the shaykh defining his conception of faith (īmān) and of Islam (Uṣūl al-īmān; Faḍl al-Islām; al-Kabāʾir; Naṣīḥat al-Muslimīn).

Several of the sons or the descendants of Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb carried on his work. His son ʿAbd Allāh, who accompanied Suʿūd b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (1803-14) on his conquest of the Ḥidjāz in 1805-6 and supported his action in ʿIrāḳ, wrote an important refutation of the doctrines of the Twelvers and of the Zaydiyya, published in the Madjmūʿat al-rasāʾil wa'l-masāʾil al-nadjdiyya (iv, 47-222; the greater part of volume i of this collection consists of his writings). ʿAbd al-Wahhāb often mentions in his works non-Ḥanbalī Sunnī sources (among them Ibn Ḥazm).

Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, the grandson of shaykh Muḥammad and also greatly devoted to the principle of reform, was ḳāḍī of Darʿiyya; he was violently hostile to the Ottomans and forbade all relations with them. He was sentenced to death by Ibrāhīm Pasha after the capture of Darʿiyya in 1233/1818, while his brother ʿAlī was pursued by the Egyptians and killed at Khardj. Sulaymān wrote a work which is interesting for the study of the relations of Wahhābism with ʿIrāḳ, the K. al-Tawḍīḥ ʿan tawḥīd al-Khallāḳ fī djawāb ahl al-ʿIrāḳ (Cairo 1319).

The doctrine of Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb was very strongly influenced by that of Ibn Taymiyya (d. 728/1328) and, to a lesser degree, by that of Ibn Ḳayyim al-Djawziyya (d. 751/1350), but, beyond these two writers, it is still more closely linked to the formulation of Ḥanbalism as found in the works of earlier writers, such as the shaykh ʿAbd Allāh (d. 290/903) or Abū Bakr al-Khallāl (d. 311/924). Very hostile to the sects which had always been denounced by the Ḥanbalīs as incompatible with Sunnism (Shīʿa, Muʿtazila, Khawāridj, etc.), Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb criticized, even within Sunnism, all the forms of kalām or of Ṣūfism which tended to introduce into the dogma or the law of Islam innovations (bidʿa) considered to be heretical or schismatic. He denounced no less violently the survival, particularly among the Bedouin, of practices going back even to the period of the Djāhiliyya. Although Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb's doctrine was condemned or rejected by an important section of Muslim opinion, it was nevertheless to make a powerful contribution not only to a more profound Islamization of Arabia, but also to a general renewal of the Islam conscience immediately before the modern period of intrusion from the West.

IBN ʿABD AL-ẒĀHIR, MUḤYI 'L-DĪN ABU 'L-FAḌL ʿABD ALLĀH B. RASHĪD AL-DĪN ABŪ MUḤAMMAD ʿABD AL-ẒĀHIR B. NASHWĀN B. ʿABD AL-ẒĀHIR B. NADJDA AL-SAʿDĪ AL-RAWḤĪ, born in Cairo 620/1223, died there 692/1292 (Wüstenfeld, Geschichtschreiber, no. 366). He lived in Cairo under the Mamlūk sultans Baybars, Ḳalāwūn and Khalīl, most of the time as private secretary, Kātib al-Sirr or Ṣāḥib Dīwān al-Inshāʾ [see INSHĀʾ]. Maḳrīzī describes the rôle he played when Aḥmad al-Ḥākim bi-amri 'llāh was installed as ʿAbbāsid caliph in Egypt in order to legitimize al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Baybars as sultan (661/1262). He composed the genealogy of al-Ḥākim, which was confirmed by the ḳāḍī, and read it in the assembly of dignitaries; he had also composed the ʿahd of Baybars which the caliph thereafter read (Sulūk, i, 477; for the ʿahd see Ḳastallānī, Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā, x, 116 f.). In his office he had to read all incoming letters and to compose all important letters and documents. Thus he wrote an answer to the Abyssinian king who had asked the sultan to instruct the Coptic patriarch to choose him a worthy archbishop (Sulūk, i, 616, note); and when the Mongol chief Baraka sent an envoy to propose an alliance with Baybars, Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir drew up the letter which confirmed the pact, and read it to the sultan and the amīrs (Sulūk, i, 497). He drew up the taḳlīd by which Baybars installed his son al-Malik al-Saʿīd as heir-apparent, walī-ʿahd (Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā, x, 162, 17 ff.) and the marriage document, khuṭbat ṣadāḳ, for this son and the daughter of Ḳalāwūn in 674/1275-6 (op. cit., xiv, 300 ff.). Under Ḳalāwūn he drew up a document nominating as heir-apparent his son al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn in 679/1280 (op. cit., x, 173 ff.; cf. Tashrīf, 200 ff.) and then his son al-Malik al-Ashraf Khalīl (op. cit., x, 166 ff., Tashrīf, 246-51). ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn died before his father in 687/1288, and some people said that his brother Khalīl had poisoned him (Sulūk, i, 744; Tashrīf, 288). There may be a connexion between this suspicion and the report that Ḳalāwūn had refused to put his name to the taḳlīd which Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir had prepared for Khalīl, and that he even declined again when it was submitted to him by the son and successor of Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir (Sulūk, i, 756 f.; Ibn Taghribirdī, Nudjūm, viii, 3 f.). Indeed the name of Ḳalāwūn does not appear in the text. On the other hand Ḳalāwūn had earlier shown acknowledgement of Khalīl, as Khalīl at the truce in Armenia (in 684) swore the oath together with his brother and father (Tashrīf, 94), and after Ḳalāwūn's death (689) the army "renewed the oath of fealty" to him (Sulūk, i, 756). The author of the Tashrīf emphasizes the good relations between the two brothers, which appeared especially when ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn arranged the marriage of Khalīl. To Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir, al-Ḳāḍī al-Fāḍil was a model, and he wrote a book about him. He himself became an authority, and many of his formulations were used by his followers. He also wrote poems in honour of his sovereigns and on the occasion of important happenings (see Tashrīf). Besides official documents he composed books, which were of use to later authors. Kitāb al-Rawḍa al-bahiyya al-Ẓāhira fī Khiṭaṭ al-Muʿizziyya al-Ḳāhira was much used by Maḳrīzī in his Khiṭaṭ, chiefly for the time of the Fāṭimids (cf. Becker, Beiträge, 23, 30; Guest in JRAS, 1902, 120, 125), also by Ibn Taghribirdī (Nudjūm, iv, 24, 41, 102, etc.). He compiled biographies of the three Sultans of his time. His Sīrat al-Sulṭān al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Baybars (parts survive in MS in the British Museum, Paris and Istanbul) was used by Maḳrīzī, Nuwayrī and Shāfiʿ al-ʿAsḳalānī, who made an excerpt, Ḥusn al-manāḳib (see Moberg, p. xvii). Ḳalāwūn is treated in the Tashrīf al-ayyām wa 'l-ʿuṣūr fī sīrat al-Malik al-Manṣūr, ed. Murād Kāmil, Cairo 1961, cited above. The work is anonymous, and although no conclusive proof is adduced it seems probable that it is rightly attributed to Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir by the editor (and Casanova), who supplied the edition with his biography and some of his documents. As for al-Ashraf Khalīl, the extant part of his biography is edited by Moberg (see below). He also wrote Tamāʾim al-ḥamāʾim about carrier-pigeons (Maḳrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, ii, 231). According to Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā, i, 104, there were under Baybars three kuttāb in the Dīwān al-Inshāʾ, and of these Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir was the chief, named Kātib al-Sirr or Ṣāḥib al-Inshāʾ, and he continued in that position until Ḳalāwūn appointed his son Fatḥ al-Dīn to the office. On this matter there is some obscurity. Maḳrīzī relates (Sulūk, i, 682; Khiṭaṭ, ii, 324) that in 679/1280, just after Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir had composed the taḳlīd in the dīwān al-inshāʾ for ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn, it happened that Fakhr al-Dīn Ibrāhīm b. Luḳmān was dismissed as wazīr and returned to the dīwān al-inshāʾ as its ṣāḥib. Ibn Taghribirdī says (Nudjūm, vii, 338) that Fakhr al-Dīn was Kātib al-inshāʾ under the last Ayyūbids and the first Turks until Ḳalāwūn made him wazīr, and on his recommendation Fatḥ al-Dīn, son of Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir, became his successor in the dīwān and continued in that post. Thus he ignores Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir, and even states that Fatḥ al-Dīn was the first

kātib al-sirr (293, 333); so too does al-Suyūṭī, Ḥusn al-muḥāḍara fī akhbār Miṣr wa 'l-Ḳāhira, Cairo 1321/1903, ii, 147, both of them referring to al-Ṣafadī (similarly too, Ibn Khaldūn, ʿIbar, v, 382 and Ibn Iyās, i, 101). The reality in this seems to be that this office had earlier been subordinated to the wazīr or the dawādār, and Ḳalāwūn attached it (following a hint of Baybars) directly to the Sultan. That earlier rulers also had secret secretaries is confirmed for al-Mahdī (Ṭabarī, iii, 528 f.) and appears too from Ibn Taghrībirdī's relation of earlier usage (Nudjūm, vii, 335-43).

It cannot be doubted that Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir engaged in much official activity as secret secretary, and it is difficult to identify the rôle of Fakhr al-Dīn in his history. An interesting document is quoted by Ibn al-Furāt, a taḳlīd drawn up by the ṣāḥib al-inshāʾ Fatḥ al-Dīn in Rabīʿ I 679/July 1280 for Fakhr al-Dīn as commander of Syria (Tashrīf, 190 ff.). Fatḥ al-Dīn's activity in this post also is attested by a similar taḳlīd for another amīr in 678 (op. cit., 26; cf. for 679 also 193, 198), and in other documents in the following years, among them a letter of amān to merchants of Sind, Hind, China and ʿIrāḳ in 687 (op. cit., 236). Nevertheless, Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir continued his activity during these years. In Djumādā II 679/October 1280 he drew up a tafwīḍ al-salṭana for al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ from Ḳalāwūn (op. cit., 200 f.; Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā, x, 173 f.); in Rabīʿ II 684/June 1285 he produced a decree about the leadership of the Jews (Tashrīf, 218; Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā, xi, 386 f.); in Rabīʿ I 691/March 1292 he wrote a decree for the initiation of the Kurd al-Hakkārī as a member of the futuwwa (text Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā, xii, 274 f., with German tr. Moberg, 70 ff.; Arabic, 64 f.; German tr. F. Taeschner, in F. Taeschner and G. Jäschke, Aus der Gesch. d. islam. Orients, Tübingen 1949). In the same year he wrote a waḳf document for al-Khalīl establishing legacies for the support of his turba and madrasa and for his father Ḳalāwūn's ḳubba (Moberg in Le Monde Oriental, xii, 1918). For the decree on the Jews the Sultan required and received three drafts, from the two Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhirs, and from a third kātib. It appears from all this that father and son were working together for a time in the dīwān.

Fatḥ al-Dīn, born in Cairo in 638/1240, served for a short time under Ḳalāwūn and then under al-Ashraf Khalīl, but died in 691/1292. He respected his father highly and built a mosque in his honour, the Djāmiʿ Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir, in which the khuṭba was first pronounced in 683/1284. It was situated on al-ḳarāfa al-ṣughrā, and near it Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir was buried after his death in 692/1293. Also a road was named after him, the Darb Ibn ʿAbd al-Ẓāhir, in the neighbourhood of his home. He was, as Kātib al-Sirr, "the last to stand out among his contemporaries and surpassed his colleagues" (Ibn Kathīr, al-Bidāya wa 'l-nihāya, xiii, 334).

IBN ʿABDAL [see al-ḤAKAM b. ʿABDAL].

IBN ʿABDŪN, Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd al-Madjīd Ibn ʿAbdūn al-Fihrī, was an Andalusian kātib and poet born in Evora. Early in life his talents attracted the attention of the governor of this city, ʿUmar Ibn al-Afṭas, and he became his secretary when the latter became ruler of Badajoz [see baṭalyaws] assuming the laḳab al-Mutawakkil, in 471/1078 [see afṭasids]. After the fall of the dynasty and the capture of Badajoz in 487/1095 by the Almoravid general Sīr b. Abī Bakr, Ibn ʿAbdūn entered the service of the Almoravids and became kātib to Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn and to his son ʿAlī. He died in Evora in 529/1134.

ʿIbn Abdūn had a high literary culture (he is said to have known the Aghānī by heart), and was much sought after on account of his learning (the ḳāḍī ʿIyāḍ b. Mūsā [q.v.] and Ibn Zarḳūn are said to have been among his pupils). He is esteemed as a prose-writer and a talented poet, but there have survived only a few specimens of his official and private prose writings and of his verse, except for a well-known ḳaṣīda which made him famous. It is a rāʾiyya known by the name of al-Bassāma, composed after the fall of the Afṭasids. After general observations on the vicissitudes of Fate (lines 1-8) and the enumeration of some great characters and races of antiquity who had a tragic destiny (ll. 9-21) the poet recalls the Muslim sovereigns who perished by a violent death (ll.22-44); he then embarks upon the period of the Mulūk al-ṭawāʾif (ll. 45-47) and devotes the last lines to the Afṭasids (ll. 48-75). This ḳaṣīda, which sets out to call to mind all the kings killed since the beginning of mankind and is an elegy on the end of the Afṭasids, possesses a certain literary merit, yet real lyrical inspiration is missing and it is weighed down by the accumulation of proper names. Nevertheless, it is much admired by Arab critics, who consider it a veritable masterpiece.

In order to be intelligible, the poem needs precise explanations, as was realised by Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḥaḍramī, better known by his maʿrifa Ibn Badrūn, who wrote a historical commentary on it. All we know of this Ibn Badrūn is that he came originally from Silves and was a contemporary of Ibn ʿAbdūn. His work, however, which draws largely on Oriental sources, particularly the Murūdj of al-Masʿūdī, has survived and been published, together with the text of the poem and abundant notes, by R. Dozy, as Commentaire historique sur le poème d'Ibn Abdoun par Ibn Badroun, Leiden 1846. Hoogvliet had previously published in Leiden, in 1839, the Prolegomena ad editionem celebratissimi Aben Abduni poematis in luctuosum Aphtasidarum interitum.

Bibliography: The text of Ibn ʿAbdūn's poem is to be found also in the Muʿdjib of Marrākushī (ed. Dozy, 53-60; Cairo edition 1368/1949, 76-87; French translation, E. Fagnan, Histoire des Almohades, 65-74; Spanish translation, Pons Boigues, Ensayo, 190-8); reproduced in F. Bus-

IBN ʿABDŪN, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, Spanish author of a treatise of ḥisba [q.v.] dealing with Seville. All that is known of him is drawn from his work itself, the two known manuscripts of which give the author's name in two slightly different forms (Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Nakhaʿī ʿAbdūn, and Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿAbdūn al-Tudjībī). He was either a faḳīh or a ḳāḍī or a muḥtasib, who was perhaps born, and certainly spent a large part of his life, in Seville, in the second half of the 5th/11th and the first half of the 6th/12th centuries, since on the one hand he refers as a direct witness to the early years of the reign of al-Muʿtamid, and on the other speaks of the Almoravids as being already masters of the town. His short treatise, together with the similar work devoted to Malaga by his contemporary al-Saḳaṭī, is a most valuable source on urban, economic and social life in Muslim Spain at this period. The text edited by E. Lévi-Provençal (JA, ccxxiv (1934), 177-299; 2nd ed. in Doc. arabes inédits sur la vie sociale et économique en Occ. mus. au moyen âge, Cairo 1955, 3-65) has been translated into Italian by F. Gabrieli (Il trattato censorio di Ibn ʿAbdūn sul buon governo di Siviglia, in Rend. Lin., 6th series, xi (1935), 878-935), into French by Lévi-Provençal himself (Séville musulmane au début du XII siècle: le traité d'Ibn ʿAbdūn, Paris 1947), and into Spanish by E. Lévi-Provençal-E. García Gómez (Sevilla a comienzos del siglo XII, Madrid 1948). (F. Gabrieli)

IBN ʿABDŪS [see al-Djahshiyārī].

IBN ʿABDŪS, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm (202-60/817-73), faḳīh of Ifrīḳiya (Tunis). His life, study and thought can be considered typical for those of the generation that followed Saḥnūn b. Saʿīd (160-240/776-854) and tried to follow his example. This Ibn ʿAbdūs was the contemporary and sometimes the rival of Saḥnūn's son Muḥammad; as a learned man (ʿālim) he may be considered his superior. Between the two raged a controversy concerning al-īmān (the faith) which did much harm to Ibn ʿAbdūs: Ibn ʿAbdūs and his followers (al-ʿAbdūsiyya) said that man can be sure of his faith only for the past and present, but not for the future: if he were asked if he were muʾmin he should say "muʾmin in shāʾa 'llāh". Ibn Saḥnūn and his followers (al-Muḥammadiyya) held that this implied doubt and called the theory of Ibn ʿAbdūs al-Shukūkiyya. The majority sided with Ibn Saḥnūn, and Ibn ʿAbdūs was obliged to rectify his point of view and even deny that he ever held it. He was deeply pious and well versed in fiḳh. He was well-to-do and could dedicate his time to worship and study.

IBN ʿABDŪS, Abū ʿAmir Aḥmad, notable and wazīr in Cordova during the regency of the Banū Djahwar (422-62/1030-70). Little is known about his life: he owes his fame to the part he took in the affairs of Wallāda bint al-Mustakfī [q.v.]. Jealous of Ibn Zaydūn [q.v.], Ibn ʿAbdūs sent her a woman go-between and he seems to have received encouragement. Ibn Zaydūn, enraged, wrote a long letter of insult known as "al-risāla al-hazliyya" (the satirical letter), using the signature of Wallāda, and sent it to Ibn ʿAbdūs by the same go-between. The risāla became immediately famous because it was an attack on one of the chiefs of the town. Ibn ʿAbdūs avoided any open contact with Wallāda, whose attitude to Ibn Zaydūn had been cooled by the poet's audacity; but after the latter left Cordova for Badajóz and then Seville, Ibn ʿAbdūs took over Wallāda completely, and she remained his mistress until her death. He died in 472/1079-80, at the age of 80.

IBN ABĪ ʿĀMIR [see al-Manṣūr].

IBN ABĪ ʿAṢRŪN, Sharaf al-Dīn Abū Saʿd ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Hibat Allāh b. Muṭahhar al-Tamīmī al-Mawṣilī, later al-Ḥalabī and finally al-Dimashḳī, was the most important Shāfiʿī scholar of his time. He was born in Rabīʿ I 492 or 493/February 1099 or 1100 at Ḥaditha, studied at Mawṣil and then at Wāsiṭ, with Abū ʿAlī al-Fāriḳī, and at Baghdād, particularly with Asʿad al-Mayhanī and Ibn Burhān (see the list of his teachers in al-Nuʿaymī, Dāris, 400). From 523/1129, he taught at Mawṣil, then went to settle in the region of Sindjār and was appointed ḳāḍī of Sindjār, Niṣībīn and Ḥarrān. In 545/1150-1, Nūr al-Dīn invited him to come to Aleppo. After 549/1154, he accompanied the Zangid prince to Damascus where he taught in the Ghazāliyya madrasa, the lectures of which were given in the north-west section of the Great Mosque. He was also appointed administrator (nāẓir) of the *waḳf*s. He then returned to Aleppo, where he had had a madrasa built, and became again ḳāḍī of Sindjār, Ḥarrān and Diyār Bakr. Leaving his son Nadjm al-Dīn to succeed him at Aleppo, he returned to Damascus in 570/1174 to teach at the Ghazāliyya madrasa and also in his own madrasa. In 573/1183, in the reign of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, he was appointed, after the death of Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn al-Shahrazūrī, to succeed him as the chief Shāfiʿī ḳāḍī, the most important juridical office in Syria. In 575/1179-80 he became blind and had to retire. He died at the age of over 93 in Ramaḍān 585/October-November 1189 and was buried in the madrasa he had built opposite his house in Damascus, to the west of Bāb al-Barīd.

Nūr al-Dīn had had built for him six madrasas: at Aleppo, Baʿlabakk, Damascus, Ḥamāt, Ḥimṣ and Manbidj. Ibn Abī ʿAṣrūn wrote a number of works, which have been lost, but the titles of seven of them are mentioned by Ibn Kathīr, among them Ṣafwat al-madhhab fī nihāyat al-maṭlab in seven volumes, K. al-Intiṣāf, and Fawāʾid al-madhhab.

His sons Nadjm al-Dīn and Muḥyī al-Dīn taught in the madrasas which he had founded at Aleppo and Damascus, followed by his grandsons and great-grandsons.

IBN ABĪ ʿATĪḲ is the usual appellative of the great-grandson of the Caliph Abū Bakr, ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad (= Abū ʿAtīk) b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakr. All that is known of him is that, after al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, he married, among others, Umm Isḥāḳ, the daughter of Ṭalḥa b. ʿUbayd Allāh. He led an idle existence in Medina, dividing his time between meetings with poets such as ʿUmar b. Abī Rabīʿa [q.v.] or Kuthayyir ʿAzza [q.v.] and seeking the company of wits such as Ashʿab [q.v.] or musicians and singers like Ibn ʿĀʾisha [q.v.]. Being a member of the Ḳurayshī aristocracy, he was able in some measure to serve as a link between the rather stern members of the Prophet's family—he often appears with his great-aunt ʿĀʾisha—and milieus where more worldly pleasures were sought after. Authors who speak of him are careful to stress his virtue and irreproachable conduct, in order not to sully the reputation of Abū Bakr's descendants, but they do not hesitate to quote several amusing anecdotes of which he is the hero. It seems that he had little talent for poetry, but that he could appreciate it and on occasions criticise it, and so had no qualms over bursting into song when the circumstances called for it. He would also, it seems, give full rein to his taste for pleasantry. Indeed, his fame rests mainly on his subtle humour, his ẓarf and his ready wit. Thus, for example, when the governor of Medina had forbidden singing and revelry, he succeeded in making him alter his decision by cunningly causing the intervention of a woman singer Sallāma al-Zarḳāʾ and adding a few humorous sallies of his own, which made the stern official laugh. Similarly, he used artful means to reconcile ʿUmar b. Abī Rabīʿa and al-Thurayyā. We may take it that his fame was well established, since two works at least were devoted to him, bearing the title Kitāb Ibn Abī ʿAtīḳ. It is difficult to judge the character of the first, by al-Madāʾinī (see Fihrist, Cairo edition, 1348, 148), for it forms part of a series of monographs on the Ḳurayshīs. There is, however, no doubt about the second, by Abū Ayyūb al-Madīnī, which is mentioned by Ibn al-Nadīm (212) among other writings by the same author on the women singers and ẓurafāʾ of Medina. Thus Ibn Abī ʿAtīḳ, who is considered the really outstanding ẓarīf of the Prophet's city, is cited to authenticate a number of amusing anecdotes which must have been collected in Abū Ayyūb's book and fragments of which are to be found in works of adab, but their authenticity is very much to be doubted. Al-Djāḥiẓ (Kitāb al-Bighāl, 23-5), whilst giving a lesson in criticism over an anecdote in which ʿĀʾisha appears, does not hesitate to accuse the Rāfiḍīs [q.v.], in their hostility to the Prophet's widow, of having invented it. Without going that far, we may legitimately suppose that the name of Ibn Abī ʿAtīḳ could well have served to justify the development of the genre of jokes that flourished so much in the early days of Islam [see al-djidd wa ʾl-hazl, nādira].

IBN ABI ʾL-ʿAWDJĀʾ, ʿAbd al-Karīm, a notorious crypto-Manichean (zindīḳ [q.v.]), belonging to a great family (he was the maternal uncle of Maʿn b. Zāʾida [q.v.]). According to the most reliable information, he lived first at Baṣra, where (although even this is doubtful) he is supposed to have been a disciple of Ḥasan al-Baṣrī [q.v.], from whom he parted on account of the latter's doctrinal inconsistency regarding the problem of freewill and determinism. What is more certain is that he frequented a very mixed milieu, rubbing shoulders with Muʿtazilīs such as ʿAmr b. ʿUbayd and Wāṣil b. ʿAṭāʾ [qq.v.], with poets disapproved of by orthodox Muslims, such as Bashshār b. Burd and Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Ḳuddūs [qq.v.] and with other suspect persons. Expelled from Baṣra, he went to live at Kūfa, where he was put to death by the governor Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, in 155/772 or perhaps two years earlier; it is difficult to accept the date 167/783-4 accepted by L. Massignon; it is also doubtful whether one should accept as entirely historical the Shīʿī accounts speaking of discussions carried on over a long period at Mecca between Ibn Abi ʾl-ʿAwdjā and Djaʿfar al-Ṣādiḳ [q.v.]; the arguments which, according to L. Massignon, would make him the compiler of the riwāyāt of the imām Djaʿfar are also far from convincing.

This much, however, is clear: the information on this personage supplied by Muslim historians and theologians of diverse tendencies depicts him as a man of dangerous heterodoxy, who, on his own admission, invented numerous traditions, falsified the calendar and spread Manichaean propaganda by means of insidious questions relating to the problem of suffering and of divine justice, and who was a believer in the eternity of the world and in metempsychosis (tanāsukh).

IBN ABĪ ʿAWN, IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD ABĪ ʿAWN B. HILĀL ABI 'L-NADJM, man of letters who flourished in the 3rd/9th century. His kunya is variously reported as Abū Isḥāḳ, Abū ʿImrān (Baghdādī, Farḳ), Abū ʿAmr (colophon of the Medina MS of his K. al-Tashbīhāt, no. 4 below). The above genealogy, given by Yāḳūt (Udabāʾ) is confirmed by Baghdādī and by an entry in the Berlin MS of his Lubb al-ādāb (no. 6 below). His great-grandfather Hilāl was a well-known poet and secretary; his grandfather Aḥmad was a scholar and poet, whose verses are quoted in the K. al-Tashbīhāt (al-ʿUmda, i, 205) and the K. al-Mikhlāt (184). His father Muḥammad served Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāhir as chamberlain and was appointed governor of Wāsiṭ in 255/866, during the caliphate of al-Muʿtazz; he too was a poet, and verses of his addressed to Ibn al-Rūmī [q.v.] are quoted in al-Muwashshah, 349.

Ibn Abī ʿAwn, a client of the Banū Sulaym, was a native of al-Anbār, on the Nahr ʿĪsā; he followed the family profession of secretary, whence his designation as al-Kātib al-Baghdādī, and was for a time chief of the shurṭa. He was the friend of al-Muḳtadir's viziers Ḥāmid b. al-ʿAbbās [q.v.] and Muḥassin b. al-Furāt [see IBN AL-FURĀT]. He was an adherent of al-Shalmaghānī [q.v.], and is said to have been hanged for heresy in 322/933 (so Fihrist; Baghdādī, Farḳ; etc.). In view of the fact that his surviving works contain no sign of heretical beliefs, his execution may have been provoked by political intrigue.

Works: (1) K. al-Dawāwīn; (2) K. al-Rasāʾil; (3) K. Bayt māl al-surūr; these have not survived. (4) K. al-Tashbīhāt, a dictionary of similes, ed. M. ʿAbdul Muʿīd Khān, GMS n.s. xvii, 1950. (5) Lubb al-ādāb fī radd djawāb dhawi 'l-albāb and (6) K. al-Djawābāt al-muskita, listed as separate works by the bibliographers, are probably alternative titles of a single work; extract from (6) publ. in IC, xvi (1942), 202-12. (7) K. Nawāḥi 'l-buldān (and variant titles), perhaps confused with the famous K. al-Buldān of Yaʿḳūbī (q.v.].

IBN ABI 'L-BAYĀN, Karaite Jewish physician of Egypt, whose full name was ABU 'L-FAḌL DĀWŪD B. SULAYMĀN B. ABI 'L-BAYĀN AL-ISRĀʾĪLĪ. Born in the middle of the 6th/12th century, he studied with his co-religionists Ibn al-Nāḳid the oculist and Ibn Djāmiʿ, later the physician of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and became the private physician of the Ayyūbid al-ʿĀdil (589/1193-658/1218) and professor at the Nāṣirī hospital. One of his disciples was Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa [q.v.]. He died in 634/1236.

He left the following works: (1) al-Dustūr al-bīmāristānī fi 'l-adwiya 'l-murakkaba, ed. P. Sbath, in BIE, xv (1932-3), 13-80. It deals with various drugs, following Galen. Chapter 11, devoted to prescriptions for treating the teeth, has been analysed by M. Levey (in Janus, xlix (1961), 101-3) and O. Spies (in Sudhoffs Archiv, xlvi (1962), 168-70); (2) R. al-Mudjarrabāt (MS. in the Bodleian).

IBN ABI 'L-DAM, SHIHĀB AL-DĪN IBRĀHĪM B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-ḤAMAWĪ, historian and Shāfiʿī jurist. Born in Ḥamāt on 21 Djumādā I 583/29 July 1187, he studied in Baghdād, taught in Ḥamāt, Aleppo, and Cairo, and finally was appointed judge in his native city. He went to Baghdād in 641 on an embassy for the ruler of Ḥamāt, al-Malik al-Muẓaffar, and, in the following year, when he was again on his way to Baghdād to announce there the death of al-Malik al-Muẓaffar, he was stricken with dysentery in al-Maʿarra and returned to Ḥamāt, where he died upon arrival on 15 Djumādā II 642/18 November 1244. He wrote two histories, one a brief annalistic work starting with the life of the Prophet and continued to the year 628, dedicated to al-Malik al-Muẓaffar, and the other a large biographical work in six volumes, entitled al-Taʾrīkh al-Muẓaffarī. Only the former is preserved in manuscript (Ms. 1292b of the Municipal Library in Alexandria being another copy of it). He also wrote an often cited work on Muslim Sects (cf. H. Ritter, in Isl., xviii (1929), 51), as well as legal works on Adab al-ḳaḍāʾ (-ḳāḍī, -ḳuḍāt), on (it seems) the transmission of traditions Tadḳīḳ al-ʿināya fī taḥḳīḳ al-riwāya, and commentaries on al-Ghazālī's Wasīṭ (Sharḥ mushkil al-Wasīṭ, obviously identical with the Īḍāḥ al-aghālīṭ, mentioned by Brockelmann, S I, 753, no. 49 f) and on the Tanbīh (of Abū Isḥāk al-Shīrāzī, quoted by Damīrī, under zarāfa). A legal opinion from these works was still debated by the Subkīs.

IBN ABĪ DĪNĀR, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ABI 'L-ḲĀSIM AL-RUʿAYNĪ AL-ḲAYRAWĀNĪ, historian of Ḳayrawān. In 1092/1681 or in 1110/1698 he wrote a history of Tunisia entitled Kitāb al-Muʾnis fī akhbār Ifrīḳiya wa-Tūnis, printed Tunis 1286/1861-2; tr. Pellissier and Remusat, Paris 1845. It is a mediocre work. Though of interest for the period close to the date when it was written, it is hardly so for any others.

IBN ABI 'L-ḌIYĀF, ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD, Tunisian chronicler born at Tunis in 1217/1802-3, died in the same town on 17 Shaʿbān 1291/29 September 1874. As secretary and counsellor to the beys, he was entrusted with the delicate missions to Istanbul in 1246/1830 and 1258/1842, and accompanied Aḥmad Bey to Paris in 1262/1846. He played an active part in the drawing up of the Pacte Fondamental and of the Constitution of 1861 [see DUSTŪR]. After this date he seems to have fallen into partial disgrace, from which he was rescued only for a short time by Khayr al-Dīn, who was chief minister from 1873.

The work of Ibn Abi 'l-Ḍiyāf consists essentially of a history of Tunisia from the Arab conquest up to 1289/1872, the Itḥāf ahl al-zamān bi-akhbār mulūk Tūnis wa-ʿahd al-amān. Up to the period of the Ḥusaynids, this chronicle is a summary devoid of originality, but it increases in extent and in interest as it approaches the events which were contemporary with the author.

IBN ABĪ DUʾĀD [see AḤMAD B. ABĪ DUʾĀD].

IBN ABI 'L-DUNYĀ, ABŪ BAKR ʿABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿUBAYD B. SUFYĀN AL-ḲURASHĪ AL-BAGHDĀDĪ, Arabic writer, born in 208/823 in Baghdād and died there in 281/894. Although he was a freedman of the Umayyads, he became the tutor of several ʿAbbāsid princes and in particular of those who were later to become caliphs as al-Muʿtaḍid and al-Muktafī. Ibn Abi 'l-Dunyā was a learned teacher, highly respected for his exemplary way of life; he is counted as a "weak" traditionist only by the Shīʿis (Māmaḳānī, Tanḳīḥ al-maḳāl, 7028). He led a pious and ascetic life (zuhd), combined with an extensive teaching activity. His writings belong for the most part to the field of edifying literature: he preached patience, humility, penitence, trust in God, hospitality, vigils, silence, frugality, etc., and condemned envy, anger, drunkenness, the use of musical instruments, and "the World" (al-dunyā) in general; he treated also single themes such as the merits of Ramaḍān and of 10 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja (yawm al-aḍḥā), or general themes such as the moral characteristics which a man should seek to attain (makārim al-akhlāḳ), or Joy after Sorrow (al-faradj baʿd al-shidda); the titles of a few historical works are also recorded. Altogether Ibn Abi 'l-Dunyā is said to have written over 100 works, some 20 of which have survived. Sibṭ b. al-Djawzī even speaks of more than 130 which were known to him. Indeed more than 100 titles can be traced, partly from Ibn al-Nadīm's Fihrist and Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, partly from "reading lists" (fahāris al-shuyūkh), in which later scholars, recording the works which they have studied, have mentioned also some by Ibn Abi 'l-Dunyā.

IBN ABI 'L-ḤADĪD, scholar of wide learning in the fields of Arabic language, poetry and adab, rhetoric, kalām [q.v.] and of the early history of Islam; in addition he was an uṣūlī jurist [see UṢŪL] and an eminent writer of prose and poetry. Born at al-Madāʾin on 1 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 586/30 December 1190, he died at Baghdād in 655/1257 or 656/1258, i.e., either immediately before or immediately after the capture of the city by the Mongols (20 Muḥarram 656/28 January 1258); since Ibn al-Fuwaṭī states that he was able to escape the massacre by the invaders by taking refuge in the house of the wazīr Ibn al-ʿAlḳamī, and was even appointed kātib of the salla (the archives of the dīwān al-zimām), the second date is the more probable. His full name was ʿIzz al-Dīn Abū Ḥāmid ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Abi 'l-Ḥusayn Hibat Allāh b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. Abi 'l-Ḥadīd al-Madāʾinī; there exists nevertheless a variant for his father's name which, according to the Rawḍāt al-djannāt, was not Hibat Allāh, but Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ḥimāʾ al-Dīn Muḥammad b. Muḥammad (on the final page of vol. iv of the Sharḥ Nahdj al-balāgha published in Cairo in 1329, his genealogy is given as follows: b. Hibat Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Abi 'l-Ḥadīd). His father was a ḳāḍī; of his two brothers mentioned in the sources, one, Muwaffaḳ al-Dīn Abu 'l-Maʿālī Aḥmad (or al-Ḳāsim), less gifted than ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd (according to Ibn Kathīr), enjoyed a certain fame as a jurist, a man of letters and a poet; the other, Abu 'l-Barakāt Muḥammad, kātib of the *waḳf*s of the Niẓāmiyya and also a poet, died at the age of thirty-four in 598/1201 (Ibn al-Sāʿī, 88).

ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd spent his youth in his native town, studied there the doctrines of kalām and showed a leaning towards Muʿtazilism; it was at al-Madāʾin, where Shīʿism was predominant, that he composed the seven *ḳaṣīda*s known as al-ʿAlawiyyāt, which are strongly Shīʿī in tone

He then went to Baghdād, where he mixed with scholars and moderated his opinions. He there enjoyed the patronage of the ʿAbbāsid caliphs, from whom he received gifts, and occupied official positions: kātib in the dār al-tashrīfāt (office of protocol), then in the Dīwān al-Khilāfa, then nāẓir in the bīmāristān (hospital), and finally director of the libraries of Baghdād (according to Muḥammad Abu 'l-Faḍl, in the introduction to his ed. of the Sharḥ Nahdj al-balāgha). Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd himself relates (Cairo ed. 1329, iv, 41) an episode which throws some light on his work as a civil servant, which did not, however, prevent his devoting himself enthusiastically to learning and to poetry. It was the last minister of the ʿAbbāsids, Ibn al-Alḳamī [q.v.], who showed him the greatest favour, there being political affinities (tashayyuʿ) and literary connexions between them.

Brockelmann gives information on only five of Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd's scientific works, whose titles are given here with some additional information: (1) a criticism of al-Mathal al-sāʾir fī ādāb al-kātib wa 'l-shāʿir by Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr (Brockelmann, I, 297, S I, 521), produced on the orders of the caliph al-Mustanṣir and having the title al-Falak al-dāʾir ʿala 'l-Mathal al-sāʾir, which immediately gave rise to refutations (see Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ed. Flügel, v, 373); begun on 1 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 633/6 August 1236, this work was completed in fifteen days. (2) A commentary on the theological work al-Āyāt al-bayyināt (Brockelmann, I, 507, S I, 923) by Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī. (3) A commentary on al-Manẓūma fi 'l-ṭibb by Ibn Sīnā (Brockelmann, S I, 823). (4) A versification of the Kitāb al-Faṣīḥ of Thaʿlab (Brockelmann, I, 118, S I, 181); from the fact that Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd completed this work in twenty-four hours it may be deduced that he composed verses with great facility. (5) The commentary on the Nahdj al-balāgha, the famous collection made by al-Sharīf al-Raḍī [q.v.] (and not his brother, al-Murtaḍā) of fragments of speeches, letters, homilies and maxims etc., traditionally attributed to ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib (Brockelmann, I, 405, S I, 705). This Sharḥ in 20 djuzʾ, which may be justly described as monumental (four large quarto volumes in the Cairo 1329 ed.), is a mine of information of every sort, each fragment having been used by the author as a peg for explanations and digressions on lexicographical, philological, historical, theological, literary, biographical and other matters (attention should be drawn to the historical excursus, because the author has inserted in his commentary long passages from monographs either earlier than al-Ṭabarī or not used by him); because of its value this work deserves first of all a detailed and precise summary, then thorough studies of all the different subjects (its use will be made much easier by the new edition by Muḥammad Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibrāhīm, 20 volumes of which have appeared in Cairo); the author spent more than five years on this work (from 1 Radjab 644/1246 to the end of Ṣafar 649/1251; see Catalogue of the Khedivial Library of Cairo, iv (1307), 288); it was presented by his brother al-Muwaffaḳ to the minister Ibn al-ʿAlḳamī and earned him a rich reward (100 *dīnār*s, a robe of honour and a horse). The Zaydī Fakhr al-Dīn ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Hādī b. Amīr al-Muʾminīn al-Muʾayyad bi'llāh Yaḥyā b. Ḥamza (Brockelmann, S II, 242) made an abridged version of it under the title al-ʿIḳd al-nadīd al-mustakhradj min Sharḥ Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd, which was translated into Persian (Brockelmann, S I, 705). To Brockelmann's list there should be added: (6) al-Iʿtibār ʿalā Kitāb al-Dharīʿa fī uṣūl al-sharīʿa in 3 vols.; the author of this Dharīʿa is said to be al-Sayyid al-Murtaḍā, thus probably al-Sharīf al-Murtaḍā (this work is not mentioned by Brockelmann). (7) Intiḳād al-Mustaṣfā (i.e., al-Ghazālī, al-Mustaṣfā min ʿilm al-uṣūl; see Brockelmann, I, 424, S I, 754). (8) al-Ḥawāshī ʿalā Kitāb al-Mufaṣṣal fi 'l-naḥw (by al-Zamakhsharī; see Brockelmann, I, 291, S I, 509). (9) Some very critical glosses (taʿlīḳa) on al-Maḥṣūl fī uṣūl al-fiḳh by Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (Brockelmann, I, 506, S I, 921). (10) A commentary (sharḥ) on the work Muḥaṣṣal afkār al-mutaḳaddimīn wa 'l-mutaʾakhkhirīn, a philosophical text by the same Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (Brockelmann, I, 507, S I, 923). (11) A commentary on the Mushkilāt al-ghurar of Abu 'l-Ḥasan (or Abu 'l-Ḥusayn) al-Baṣrī on the uṣūl al-kalām (neither the work nor the author is mentioned by Brockelmann). (12) A theological, historical and literary miscellany under the title al-ʿAbḳarī al-ḥassān, in which the author has introduced also some pieces of his own prose and poetry. (13) A commentary on al-Yāḳūt by Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. Nawbakht (Brockelmann, S I, 320). (14) al-Wishāḥ al-dhahabī fi 'l-ʿilm al-abī, on which no further details are known.

Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd was also highly thought of as a poet and sometimes described by antonomasia as al-shāʿir al-ʿirāḳī; commentaries on his poetry were written by a number of scholars. There are mentioned the following poems by him: (1) the Dīwān containing poetry of all types from panegyric to the ghazal, but with a predominance of Ṣūfī munādjāt and mukhāṭaba (several examples are included in the Sharḥ Nahdj al-balāghā, iv, 29-30). (2) The *ḳaṣīda*s known under the name of al-Ḳaṣāʾid al-sabʿ al-ʿalawiyyāt or Sabʿ al-ʿalawiyyāt, on which there exist at least four commentaries (Brockelmann, I, 249 f., S I, 497) and the subjects of which are: (a) the capture of Khaybar; (b) the conquest of Mecca; (c) and (d) praises of the Prophet; (e) and (f) the murder of Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib; (g) praises of the Prophet. (3) The Mustanṣiriyyāt composed on the orders of the caliph al-Mustanṣir. Verses by Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd are quoted by al-Ṣafadī and by Ibn Shākir in their biographical notices.

All the above information produces an image of a scholar of wide and complex intellectual interests, but not different from many other Muslim scholars. It is the details given by the Rawḍāt al-djannāt and confirmed by the Rayḥānat al-adab which show Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd to be a more interesting personality. These two sources show how difficult it was to class this author in one or other of the great religious and political movements of Islam; various judgements have been formed on him and, as his position was not clear, writers have resorted to making distinctions: Muʿtazilī for the uṣūl, but Shāfiʿī for the furūʿ (thus decidedly Sunnī in this field), but objective in his attitude to the ahl al-bayt [q.v.] and explicit in his affirmation of the rights of ʿAlī (therefore Shīʿī); or else it has been suggested that, at first a Muʿtazilī, he later became a Shīʿī; it has also been said that he was between the Shīʿī and the Sunnī parties (bayn al-farīḳayn), since he was inspired by a sense of equity (inṣāf); his position in relation to the Sunnīs has even been compared with that of ʿUmar b. al-ʿAzīz [q.v.] in relation to the other Umayyad caliphs. Concerning his Muʿtazilism, he has been described as "Muʿtazilī Djāḥiẓī", i.e., "following the ideas of al-Djāḥiẓ" [q.v.]; and indeed, in the discussion on dogma which he sets out in his Sharḥ Nahdj al- balāgha, he often states that he is in agreement with al-Djāḥiẓ. A thorough and impartial examination of the many polemical passages in his Sharḥ Nahdj al-balāgha will be necessary before his thought can be better understood and a sounder assessment made of him; it may, however, now be taken as certain that he was not an Imāmī.

IBN ABĪ ḤADJALA, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā Shihāb al-Dīn al-Tilimsānī, a poet and prose writer. He was born at Tilimsān in 725/1325 in the zāwiya of his grandfather, who is said to have been given the nickname Abū Ḥadjala (lit. 'partridge's father') because a partridge laid an egg on his sleeve. Ibn Abī Ḥadjala left Tilimsān for Cairo, then performed the Pilgrimage, after which he went to Damascus where he studied adab, in which he became proficient. He wrote a number of maḳāmas and many works in poetry and prose, a number of which are extant (see Brockelmann). He became head of a Ṣūfī monastery outside Cairo, but seems to have been more occupied with general literature than with mystical writing. He wrote ḳaṣīdas in honour of the Prophet imitating the style of the ḳaṣīdas of Ibn al-Fāriḍ, to whose views he was opposed. He belonged to the Ḥanafī madhhab, but was inclined to the beliefs of the Ḥanbalī. Ibn Ḥadjar says he used to tell the Shāfiʿīs that he was a Shāfiʿī, the Ḥanafīs that he was a Ḥanafī, and the traditionists that he was a traditionist. He died during a plague at the end of Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 776/May 1375.

Of his published works, the most important is his Dīwān al-ṣabāba, for which he used the material on "loves" and "lovers" of his predecessors and contemporaries, such as the Dīwān al-ʿāshiḳīn of Muḥammad b. Ziyād b. al-Aʿrābī [q.v.], the Kitāb al-Zahra of Ibn Dāwūd [q.v.], the Tuḥfat al-ẓirāf of Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Nawḳāṭī, the Ṭawḳ al-ḥamāma of Ibn Ḥazm, etc.

Robson, A chess maqāma in the John Rylands Library, in Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, xxxvi (1953), 111-27. The other writings of Ibn Abī Ḥadjala which have survived are listed in Brockelmann, II, 14 (where no. 8, al-Ṭibb al-masnūn fī dafʿ al-ṭāʿūn is treated as a separate work, whereas it is in fact a summary of the Dafʿ al-niḳma fi 'l-ṣalāt ʿalā Nabī al-raḥma, of S II, 6, no. 10) and S II, 5-6 (where the title of no. 11, Durar al-zamān, etc., should be corrected to Dawr al-zamān; the same mistake occurs in the Cairo catalogue, ²ivb, 48). On the sources of the Dīwān al-ṣabāba (several of which have been edited and summarized), the themes of the 31 chapters, and the response given by Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb [q.v.] to the compilation (which was to provide him with the occasion for writing his Rawḍat al-taʿrīf), see U. IBN ABĪ ḤAṢĪNA, Abu 'l-Fatḥ al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Djabbār b. al-Ḥaṣīna al-Sulamī, poet and prince belonging to the great Arab tribe of the Banū Sulaym, which traces its descent from ʿAdnān. He was born at Maʿarra (Syria) in 388/998 and received his early education in his native town (which was at this time an important cultural centre), drawing on the same resources as al-Maʿarrī, then completed his education at Aleppo, frequenting the literary circles there.

At the age of barely twenty he met Thimāl b. Mirdās at Raḥba and dedicated to him a poem which demonstrated his poetic gifts. When the Mirdāsids became governors of Aleppo (from 414 to 478/1023-85) he enjoyed their special favour and continued throughout his life to celebrate their virtues and their exploits. Sent by Thimāl b. Mirdās on a mission to the Fāṭimid caliph al-Mustanṣir, he visited Egypt in 437/1045 and dedicated to this caliph a first panegyric, then a second one in 450/1058. Al-Mustanṣir granted him a princely title, which permitted him to lead at Aleppo the life of an amīr. Ibn Abī Ḥaṣīna also visited Damascus, where he met its scholars, wrote of the beauties of its situation and composed a fine elegy on the occasion of the death of the ḳāḍī of the town, Abū Yaʿlā Ḥamza b. al-Ḥusayn. Ibn Abī Ḥaṣīna, always loyal to the Mirdāsids, died at Sarūdj on 15 Shaʿbān 457/22 July 1065. Ibn al-ʿAdīm (Zubda, ii, 73) attributes to him a poem written in honour of Sharaf al-Dawla Muslim b. Ḳuraysh after the taking of Aleppo in 473/1080, but the author of this must be another man of the same name—or perhaps there is confusion with Ibn Ḥayyūs [q.v.].

He wrote panegyrics, love poetry, descriptive and elegiac poetry, but his main work was in the field of panegyric. He was distinguished by the quality of his language, his themes remaining the traditional ones.

Ibn Ḥaṣīna's dīwān was published in two volumes at Damascus in 1956 by Muḥammad Asʿad Ṭalas. The first volume contains the poems, the second a commentary on them by Abu 'l-ʿAlā' al-Maʿarrī, from which it may be deduced that he sent his poems to Abu 'l-ʿAlā' al-Maʿarrī for him to comment on them.

This edition is based on a manuscript in Baghdād (Iraqi Museum no. 1261) and on another in the Escurial, no. 275. It is evident that this edition does not contain the whole of the poet's work, since the commentary by Abu 'l-ʿAlā' al-Maʿarrī contains some first lines (maṭlaʿ) of poems which are not found in the published collection.

IBN ABĪ ḤUDHAYFA [see MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ ḤUDHAYFA].

IBN ABĪ KHAYTHAMA, Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Zuhayr (= Abū Khaythama) b. Ḥarb b. Shaddād al-Nasāʾī al-Baghdādī, traditionist, genealogist, historian and poet, born at Nasāʾ in 185/801, died at Baghdād in 279/892 (the dates 205/820 and 299/911-2 are probably too late). The son of Abū Khaythama (d. 243/857), who was the author of a K. al-Musnad and a K. al-ʿIlm (Fihrist, Cairo ed., 321), he was the pupil of Ibn Ḥanbal in ḥadīth and fiḳh, of Muṣʿab al-Zubayrī in genealogy, of al-Madāʾinī in history and of Muḥammad b. Sallām in literature. The Fihrist mentions among his works K. al-Muntamin (?), K. al-Aʿrāb, K. Akhbār al-shuʿarāʾ and K. al-Taʾrīkh; the last, used by al-Masʿūdī, much admired by al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī and well-known in Spain, —see especially IBN ḤUBAYSH—has survived (for the manuscripts see Brockelmann; the edition planned in Ḥaydarābād does not seem to have been published). Nothing is known of Ibn Abī Khaythama's life except that he was accused of ḳadar and that he was in contact with ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā [q.v.].

His son Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad (who died perhaps in 299/911-2) is the author of a K. al-Zakāt and of an unfinished K. al-Taʾrīkh.

IBN ABĪ KHĀZIM [see BISHR B. ABĪ KHĀZIM].

IBN ABĪ LAYLĀ, appellation of two persons who figure in the early history of Islam.

I.—Abū ʿĪsā ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā (= Yasār or Dāwūd) b. Bilāl b. Uḥayḥa b. al-Djulāḥ al-Anṣārī, tābiʿī of Kūfa, who was born in 17/638. He collected traditions which he heard from ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and other Companions, was present, on ʿAlī's side, in the battle of the Camel [see AL-DJAMAL], and took part in the revolt of Ibn al-Ashʿath [q.v.]. There are varying accounts of how he lost his life. In *isnād*s, where he figures as one of the first links after the Companions, he is often quoted under the name Ibn Abī Laylā al-Akbar.

Bibliography: Ṭabarī, index; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, index; Nawawī, Tahdhīb, 389-90; Ibn Ḥadjar, Iṣāba, no. 5192; Tirmidhī, ii, 189, 257; I. Goldziher, Muh. Stud., ii, 144. (Ch. Pellat)

II.—His son, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā, born in 74/693 (Ibn Khallikān), or rather in 76, because he was 72 years old (Ibn Saʿd) when he died in 148/765. He remembered little of his father. Shaʿbī and ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī Rabāḥ [qq.v.] are named as his teachers (Bukhārī); later biographers give extended lists of his authorities and his disciples in traditions. But Ibn Abī Laylā took no part in circulating "legal" traditions; the few traditions in the isnād of which he appears, are "historical" or edifying in character (Wakīʿ, Ṭabarī). From an early period onwards, it was not his truthfulness but his memory and reliability as a transmitter of traditions that was impugned; Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal preferred his fiḳh to his ḥadīth, and this judgment has remained typical. The descent of Ibn Abī Laylā from his ancestor Uḥayḥa b. al-Djulāḥ was questioned, apparently without reason, by Ibn Shubruma, his rival and predecessor as ḳāḍī of Kūfa, and by others, and satirical verses by Ibn Shubruma against him are quoted. Professional jealousy seems to have been at the root of this, and also of some hostility between Ibn Abī Laylā and Abū Ḥanīfa [q.v.]. But the main anecdote explaining the origin of this hostility (in Wakīʿ and in Ibn Khallikān) is not historical because Ibn Abī Laylā refers in it to Abū Ḥanīfa, who was his contemporary, as a "youngster" (shābb). Other items in the biography of Ibn Abī Laylā in Wakīʿ are anecdotal, too, but it is presumably authentic that Sufyān al-Thawrī [q.v.] considered him and Ibn Shubruma to be the two great specialists in Islamic religious law in Kūfa.

Ibn Abī Laylā was appointed ḳāḍī of Kūfa by the recently appointed governor ʿĪsā b. Mūsā in 123/741, and he held this office under the Umayyads and the ʿAbbāsids, except for an interval, at his own request, under the Khāridjī usurper al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Ḳays, until his death. He based his judgments, as was customary in his time, on his own considered opinion (raʾy). A work on the law of inheritance (farāʾiḍ) went under his name (Fihrist). He was succeeded as ḳāḍī of Kūfa by his nephew, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿĪsā, who, however, died soon afterwards. His distinctive doctrine in Kūfa still had followers in the time of Shāfiʿī (d. 204/820).

A treatise of Shāfiʿī (Kitāb al-Umm, vii, 87 ff., surprisingly called Kitāb al-Asmāʾ wa 'l-ḳabāʾil in Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, v, 42, No. 9838) is concerned with the differences between Ibn Abī Laylā and Abū Ḥanīfa concerning technical details of legal doctrine. Ibn Abī Laylā represents, generally speaking, an older stage of doctrine than his contemporary Abū Ḥanīfa, that is to say, he is more conservative; he also pays more regard to judicial practice. Ibn Abī Laylā's doctrine, taken as a whole, shows a considerable amount of technical legal thought, but it is generally of a primitive kind, somewhat clumsy and untrained, and therefore shortsighted and often unfortunate in its results. The striving for systematic consistency, the action of general trends and principles pervade his whole doctrine. A rigid formalism is perhaps the most persistent and typical feature of his legal thought. Ibn Abī Laylā's practical, commonsense reasoning often takes material, and particularly Islamic ethical, considerations, into account. There are numerous traces of his activity as a ḳāḍī in his doctrine, last but not least his conservatism.

IBN ABI 'L-RIDJĀL, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī al-Shaybānī al-Kātib al-Maghribī al-Ḳayrawānī, was the tutor and astrologer of the Zīrid prince, al-Muʿizz b. Bādīs (407-54/1016-62), who held his court at Ḳayrawān till 449/1057, and a leading official of his administration (H. R. Idris, La Berbérie orientale sous les Zīrides, Paris 1962, passim); he was also the patron of the most distinguished poet at al-Muʿizz's court, Ibn Rashīḳ (d. 456/1064), who dedicated to him his ʿUmda fī maḥāsin. It is unlikely that he is identical with the Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Maghribī whom al-Ḳifṭī (Ta'rīkh al-ḥukamā', ed. Lippert, 351-3) lists among the witnesses to observations of the summer solstice and the autumn equinox in Baghdād in 378/988; and, though his tombstone is said to be dated 426/1034-5 (Idris, 810, n. 197), he must in fact have lived several years longer, as he mentions the death (in 1037) of the Kalbī amīr of Sicily, Aḥmad b. Abi 'l-Ḥusayn (Kitāb al-Bāriʿ, iii, 22). In the same passage he refers to a Ḥabūs b. Ḥumayd, who may be identical with the governor of Nefta (Idris, 197) who was disgraced in 439/1047-8; and to an ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad of al-Manṣūriyya, who may be the son of the ḳāḍī (Idris, 560) who fled to Egypt in or shortly after 440/1049.

The Kitāb al-Bāriʿ fī aḥkām al-nudjūm which contains these references is Ibn Abi 'l-Ridjāl's most important scientific work. It is a vast compendium in eight books on four types of astrology: interrogations (1-3), nativities (4-6), catarchic astrology (7), and general (including political and historical) astrology (8). Besides some two dozen manuscripts of the Arabic text there exists an Old Castilian translation (only the first five books survive) made by Yehudā ben Moshē for Alfonso the Wise in 1254. This Old Castilian version was twice translated into Latin (which in turn was three times turned into Hebrew), and once into Old Portuguese; probably from the Latin are also derived the French and English versions. This prodigious quantity of material in European languages accounts for most of what interest has been shown in Ibn Abi 'l-Ridjāl in modern times; in fact, however, the Kitāb al-Bāriʿ is largely copied (often inaccurately) from astrological compilations of the 3rd/9th century which still survive in Arabic.

Ibn Abi 'l-Ridjāl's other astrological works include an Urdjūza fi 'l-aḥkām (the Urdjūza fī dalīl al-raʿd may be a part of this), which was commented on by Kamāl al-Tūrakānī in 755/1354 and by Aḥmad b. Ḥasan b. al-Ḳunfūdh al-Ḳusṭanṭīnī in 774/1372. His Kitāb fi 'l-rumūz and his zīdj entitled Ḥall al-ʿaḳd wa-bayān al-raṣd are lost.

Bibliography: The best (and virtually only) work referring to Ibn Abi 'l-Ridjāl's career in and influence on the court of al-Muʿizz is that by Idris cited in the text. His scientific career is even less studied. Some bibliographical and biographical material will be found in Suter, 100; Sarton, i, 715-6; and Brockelmann, I, 256 and S I, 401, which can be supplemented from the articles of Nykl and Hilty mentioned below. The only studies of Ibn Abi 'l-Ridjāl's use of sources are both by V. Stegemann: Der griechische Astrologe Dorotheos von Sidon und der arabische Astrologe Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAli ibn abi 'r-Riğāl, genannt Albohazen, Heidelberg 1935, and Astrologische Zarathustra-Fragmente bei dem arabischen Astrologen Abū 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī i. abī 'r-Riğāl (11. Jhdt.), in Orientalia, NS vi (1937), 317-36 (a substantial part of this latter article is reprinted in J. Bidez and F. Cumont, Les mages hellénisés, Paris 1938, ii, 233-40). For the various translations of the Kitāb al-Bāriʿ consult the following: Old Castilian—A. R. Nykl, Libro Conplido en los Juizios de las Estrellas, in Speculum, xxix (1954), 85-99; and G. IBN ABI 'L-RIDJĀL, Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ, historian, theologian, jurisconsult and poet, of the Zaydī sect of the Yemen. He was born in Shaʿbān 1029/July 1620 at al-Shabaṭ, in the region of al-Ahnūm, to the west of Ṣanʿā', and spent all his life in the Yemen; he died on the night of Tuesday 5 or Wednesday 6 Rabīʿ I 1092/24-5 or 25-6 March 1618 at the age of 62 years 7 months, and was buried at al-Rawḍa. The biography composed by his brother Muḥammad (MS Ambrosiana nuovo fondo 256, fols. 2-11) contains a wealth of minute details on the curriculum of his studies and provides evidence of the exceptional learning which he acquired, having as his teacher the most learned Zaydīs of his day (among them the imām al-Mu'ayyad bi-'llāh Muḥammad b. al-Ḳāsim and the *shaykh*s Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad al-Mu'ayyadī, ʿIzz al-Dīn b. Durayb, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Imām al-Ḳāsim, Aḥmad b. Saʿd al-Dīn al-Miswarī, Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā al-Suḥūlī), as well as many doctors of various schools. His fame earned him the friendship of the imām al-Mutawakkil ʿala 'llāh Ismāʿīl b. al-Ḳāsim (d. 1087/1677), who employed him as secretary and court orator (khaṭīb Ṣanʿā').

The work on which is rightly based his claim to fame is an alphabetically arranged collection of about 1300 biographies of famous Zaydīs, of military as well as literary importance, of ʿIrāḳ and the Yemen: (1) the Maṭlaʿ al-budūr wa-madjmaʿ al-buḥūr. This monument of doctrine, which until the beginning of this century was thought to be lost, is an almost unique source of information, and all the more valuable because the Zaydīs took especial care to remain silent on everything which concerned themselves; in addition, it contains a number of facts, drawn from sources which now exist only in part, which concern not only the history, but also the geography and the archaeology of the Yemen.

With a few exceptions, of the remainder of his works only the titles remain. They consist of: (a) biographical and genealogical works, such as (2) Taysīr al-iʿlām bi-tarādjim tarādjimat al-tafsīr al-aʿlām (biographies of Ḳur'ān commentators); (3) Inbā' al-abnā' bi-ṭarīḳat salafihim al-ḥusnā djāmiʿ li-nasab Āl Abi 'l-Ridjāl (the genealogy of his own family); (4) Taʿlīḳ (gloss) on al-Mushadjdjar (genealogy of the Zaydī imāms) of Ibn al-Djalāl (MS Ambrosiana 68/1); (b) theological and juridical works: (5) Iʿlām al-muwālī bi-kalām sādātihi al-aʿlām al-mawālī (MS Br. Mus. Suppl. 217/2); (6) Taysīr (Tafsīr) al-Sharīʿa (MS Br. Mus. Suppl. 217/1); (7) al-Riyāḍ al-nadiyya fī anna 'l-firḳa al-nādji'a hum al-Zaydiyya; (8) al-Mawāzīn al-radjīḥa li 'l-barāhīn al-ṣaḥīḥa, commentary on al-ʿAḳīda al-ṣaḥīḥa by the imām al-Mutawakkil Ismāʿīl; (9) Madjālis al-tafhīm; (10) al-Wadjh al-awdjah fī ḥukm al-zawdj allādhī ḍayyaʿ al-zawdja; (11) Madjāz man arād al-ḥaḳīḳa min murād al-ḥaḳīḳa; (12) al-Hadiyya ilā man yuḥibb wa 'l-hidāya ilā man yuḥabb; (13) al-Djawāb al-shāfī li 'l-ṣadā ilā ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Ḍamadī; (14) Tadhkirat al-ḳulūb allatī fi 'l-ṣudūr fī ḥayāt al-adjsām allatī fi 'l-ḳubūr; (15) Rasā'il on various subjects; (c) works of Ḳur'ānic exegesis, such as (16) Bughyat al-ṭālib wa-sūluh fī sabab "innamā Waliyyukum Allāh wa-Rasūluh" (Ḳur'ān, V, 60); (d) philological works, such as (17) Ḥāshiya ʿalā lafẓ al-azhār; (e) poetry: (18) Dīwān, consisting of poems of a mainly religious character, some fragments of which are contained in his biography, while several others are cited in the Maṭlaʿ al-budūr.

IBN ABĪ SHANAB (in Algerian dialect BEN-SHNEB and officially in French BEN CHENEB) MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ʿARABĪ, Algerian teacher and Arabist, born at Taḳbu, near Médéa (Algeria) on 10 Radjab 1286/26 October 1869 and died at Algiers on 27 Shaʿbān 1347/5 February 1929.

Some of his ancestors, who were natives of Bursa, were officers in the Turkish army stationed in Egypt, and at least one of them settled in Algeria. His grandfather, retired from the Turkish army, died at Médéa during the siege of this town (May-June 1840) by the amīr Abdelkader (ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Djazā'irī [q.v.]). His father was a small farmer on the outskirts of Médéa and his mother, a Bāshtarzī, was also of Turkish descent.

He was educated for a short time at the Ḳur'ānic school, then at the École Française, next at the Collège de Médéa (now the Lycée Ben Cheneb) and finally, for a year, at the teacher's training college at Bouzaréa near Algiers; in 1888, at the age of 19, he became a teacher at Tāmdjāret, in the douar of Wāmrī, in the mixed commune of Djendel, 30 kilometres from Médéa. Four years later he was transferred to the Fātaḥ school at Algiers; there he remained for six years, which were to be decisive in his development and his career. While teaching French to the Muslim children of the casba, he was himself attending lectures in the lycée, in the mosques and in the École des Lettres, as well as receiving private lessons. His teachers were the shaykh ʿAbd al-Ḥalīm b. Smāya, a rabbi of Algiers, Ben Sedira, Cat, Fagnan, and René Basset. He studied also on the one hand Arabic rhetoric, formal logic, theology, ḥadīth, genealogy and Hebrew, and on the other, a little Latin, Spanish, German, Persian and Turkish. He passed successfully the first part of the baccalauréat and the brevet and the diploma in Arabic of the École des Lettres of Algiers. Having caught smallpox, he was prevented from taking the second part of the baccalauréat. With these qualifications, however, he was appointed as a replacement for a year for his master Ben Sedira at the École des Lettres.

On 22 May 1898, at the age of 29, he was appointed a teacher at the madrasa at Constantine and taught, for the first time, in Arabic naḥw, ṣarf, adab, fiḳh, to students little younger than himself. He remained at Constantine for less than three years, and his memories of it were not happy.

On 20 April 1901 he was transferred to the madrasa at Algiers, where he remained until 1926. In 1903, he was appointed to run simultaneously at the École des Lettres a course on Arabic prosody, and courses in the translation of legal documents and in colloquial Arabic. In 1904, he agreed to give in addition a course in ḥadīth, based on the collection of al-Bukhārī, at Djāmiʿ Safīr in the Casba of Algiers.

When in 1908 the University of Algiers was created, Ibn Abī Shanab was appointed to lecture in the Faculté des Lettres, while retaining his chair at the madrasa. It was at this time that he showed his abilities both as a teacher and in research. His excellent teaching gained him the attention and the veneration of an audience which increased daily. He published books and articles in increasing numbers. He travelled occasionally, notably to Oran and Constantine and to Tunisia and Morocco, presiding over boards of examiners, taking part in scientific congresses and discussions. He was in touch with many orientalists outside Algeria and corresponded with Codera and Miguel Asín Palacios in Spain, with E. Griffini in Italy, with Krachkovsky in Russia, with Aḥmad Taymūr in Egypt, with Ḥasan Ḥusnī ʿAbd al-Wahhāb in Tunisia, with the members of the Arab Academy at Damascus, and with many ʿulamā' in Morocco and elsewhere.

His scholarship was recognized in 1920 by his election as a member of the Arab Academy at Damascus and, in 1922, the award of the degree of Docteur ès lettres d'État by the University of Algiers. In 1924, he was appointed professor in the Faculté des Lettres of the University of Algiers, succeeding to the chair of Arabic language and literature left vacant by René Basset. In July 1928 he represented Algiers University at the 17th International Congress of Orientalists at Oxford.

Such a career, rare even in France and elsewhere, was without precedent in Algeria, and even until the present there has been none to equal it. The man who achieved it was exceptional, endowed with a robust constitution and an inflexible will, which made him a tireless worker and a patient, stubborn and methodical scholar. His association with scholars like Fagnan and Basset had made him quick to seize the positive side of modern methods of work, based on scientific discipline, without leading him to underestimate the fundamental values of his background, to which he remained faithfully attached, refusing to change his style of dress or his personal beliefs and adhering scrupulously to his code of behaviour as a strict but enlightened Muslim.

His scholarly works are spread over about thirty years. They were prolific between 1906 and 1913, ceased for a period during the First World War, and were resumed between 1918 and 1928. They cover a very wide field, in many disciplines: pedagogy, education, Muslim law, ḥadīth, popular poetry, proverbs, lexicography, grammar, poetry, metrics, sociology, and history. They show traces of the pedagogical training which he received at the École Normale and reflect the various subjects which he had to teach in the madrasas, in the mosque and in the Faculté des Lettres. They consist, in chronological order, of the following:

(1) Fr. tr. of al-Fāsī (Abū Zayd ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-Ḳādir), al-Taysīr wa 'l-tashīl fī dhikr mā aghfalahu 'l-shaykh Khalīl min aḥkām al-mughārasa, under the title: La plantation à frais communs en droit malékite, in Rev. algérienne, tunisienne et marocaine de droit et de législation, Algiers 1895, 13 pages; (2) edition and Fr. tr. of an anonymous treatise entitled Khātima fī riyāḍat al-ṣibyān wa-taʾdībihim wa-taʿlīmihim wa-mā yalīḳ bi-dhālika, under the title Notions de pédagogie musulmane, in RAfr., 1897, 267-85; (3) Itinéraire de Tlemcen à la Mekke par Ben Msāyeb, poète populaire tlemcénien du XVIIIe s., text and Fr. tr. in RAfr., xliv (1900), 261-82; (4) Fr. tr. of a "Treatise on the education of children" by al-Ghazālī (publ. In addition to these works: (a) 63 articles in *EI*¹: 10 in vol. i, 42 in vol. ii, 11 in vol. iii and one in vol. iv; 49 of these are biographies of writers, the majority of them Maghribī, 13 are short notes on Arabic prosody, and one is a summary of the history of ʿAshīr; (b) three brief notes published in the RAAD, 1927, 224 (Ghazzālī aw Ghazālī); 1928, 690 (Īḍāḥ wa-'stīḍāḥ); 1929 (al-Djazā'ir); (c) various works in verse and in rhymed prose for Arab readers and reproduced from drafts by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Djilālī, op. cit., 35 ff. It seems that Ibn Abī Shanab's poetry was written when he was between 30 and 40. His longest poem consists of 58 verses and its aim is to encourage the Algerians to educate themselves; another, of 21 verses, is in honour of René Basset. And finally it was in his private letters, addressed to educated Arab correspondents, that Ibn Abī Shanab felt himself obliged to conform to the old, but still admired, custom of writing in sadjʿ (rhymed prose).

His work thus consisted on the one hand of the editing of Arabic texts, often with a French translation and notes, and on the other of original studies in French in the style of the Arabists of the time but relatively brief, works in Arabic being the exception. He was clearly inspired in his preferences and guided in his choice of subject by the wish to make known, or to save from oblivion, the cultural heritage first of Algeria and then of the Muslim West.

IBN ABI 'L-SHAWĀRIB, name of the members of a family, the Banū Abi 'l-Shawārib, which played an important rôle during the 3rd/9th and the beginning of the 4th/10th centuries and provided the Muslim empire, which was at that time in a state of political disintegration but relatively stable doctrinally, with a succession of traditionists, jurists and ḳāḍīs. The family was of authentically noble Ḳurashī descent, descended from ʿAttāb b. Asīd [q.v.]. It was of Umayyad origin and ʿUthmānī inclination (on ʿUthmānism in the 3rd/9th century, see Ch. Pellat, Milieu, 188; see also Arabica, iii/3 (1956), 312). The family could enter upon the political scene only when the caliphate, with al-Mutawakkil (232-47/847-61), renounced its Muʿtazilī and even pro-Shīʿī period and renewed its link with the Arab and Muslim past in its Sunnī form. The social rise of the Banū Abi 'l-Shawārib seems to have been one of the minor episodes which mark the reconciliation of the ʿAbbāsid caliphate with Sunnism, a reconciliation which was itself the prelude to the establishment of an equilibrium, achieved with difficulty, between the civil and religious powers and the formation of an official creed. In the history of this evolution there appear several persons named Ibn Abi 'l-Shawārib, at first traditionists and, increasingly, jurists and ḳāḍīs. They are:

(1) Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik (d. 244/858). (2) His son, Ḥasan b. Muḥammad, ḳāḍī from 250 to 261/864-74. (3) ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, who succeeded his brother Ḥasan on 1 Shawwāl 261/9 July 875; according to al-Ṭabarī, iii, 1908, this was also the year of his death, but Ibn al-Athīr (vii, 334), followed by Massignon, makes him die in 283. Both al-Ṭabarī and al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī report that he remained in office for only six months. (4) ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAlī, ḳāḍī from 296 to 310/908-13. According to Ibn al-Djawzī (Muntaẓam, i, 97, followed by Sourdel, Vizirat, 401), he was replaced in 298 by his son Muḥammad, who is, however, not mentioned by the other historians (cf. ʿArīb, Ṭabarī continuatus, 39). (5) Ḥusayn b. ʿAbd Allāh, appointed ḳāḍī in 317/923 (ʿArīb, 13); the date at which he ceased to hold office is uncertain, as is the date of his death. ʿArīb, 120, seems to imply that he was still ḳāḍī in 320/932, but there is some doubt about this.

The first of these, Muḥammad, was mainly a traditionist, who, well versed in both Ḳur'ānic exegesis (he was the transmitter of Yazīd b. Zurayʿ) and in mystic ḥadīth, continued Abū ʿĀṣim al-ʿAbbādānī (apud al-Ḳushayrī, Risāla, ch. Riḍā). He preserved the same strict principles adhered to by the "people of the Sunna" at the time when the latter were no longer in power: he advised his children to hold themselves aloof from public affairs. On the other hand his activities, devoted almost entirely to ḥadīth, brought him into contact with men like al-Baghawī, al-Bāghandī, Ibn Abi 'l-Dunyā [q.v.], al-Ṭabarī, i.e., the most eminent transmitters of the second half of the 3rd/9th century. Having contented himself with being an esteemed traditionist, he ended his days in his native town of Baṣra.

Very different was the career of his son Ḥasan, who, with his father, was the most distinguished member of the Banu 'l-Shawārib. At first, being the loyal servant of the caliph al-Mutawakkil, he was sent by this ruler on a mission to the Byzantine frontier. After the assassination of this caliph, he was out of favour under al-Mustaʿīn (248-51/862-6), who deprived him of his office as official counsellor in 250. With the accession of al-Muʿtazz, in 251/866, Ḥasan's fortunes were restored; it was now the turn of the Zaydīs, Djahmīs or Rāfiḍīs to be excluded from the judiciary. The subsequent rulers, al-Muhradī and al-Muʿtamid, retained their confidence in Ḥasan. On his death, his office was entrusted to his brother ʿAlī who, according to the most reliable source, held office for no longer than six months.

From then on the family no longer has a place among the traditionists, but so far as its political fortunes were concerned this was merely a temporary eclipse. Soon, ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAlī was able to play a political rôle. He refused, on the death of al-Muktafī, to let himself be persuaded by the supporters of Ibn al-Muʿtazz, who had perhaps thought of him because of the loyalty which his uncle Ḥasan had shown to al-Muʿtazz. This prudence was soon rewarded by al-Muḳtadir, who entrusted him with the judgeship of West Baghdād, a sort of perquisite which reverted at intervals to the family of the Banū Abi 'l-Shawārib.

ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAlī (unless it was his son Muḥammad —see above) seems to have performed his office in a way which was very profitable to his own interests. Under al-Muḳtadir, a heavy tax was imposed on him by the vizier Ibn Th̲awāba. He seems on this occasion to have had connexions with the al-Mad̲h̲arāʾī family of financiers in Egypt.

His son Ḥusayn, the last of the Banū Abi 'l-S̲h̲awārib to play a part in history, took up again the traditional office of his family at the end of the reign of al-Muḳtadir. Observing the prudence and impartiality traditional in his family, he witnessed important events in public life, for which when necessary he was competent to draw up documents. He directed the funeral of the caliph al-Muḳtadir, who was killed in battle. It is not certain whether he was ḳāḍī after 317. He may have held office at the same time as the famous Mālikī ḳāḍī Abū ʿAmar (H. Bowen, ʿAlī b. ʿĪsá, the good vizier, 119), whose jurisdiction is said to have been limited to the western bank of the Tigris. This may have been the revenge of Abū ʿUmar, who had been in disgrace for precisely the period that ʿAbd Allāh was in office, from 296-300 (Muntaẓam, vi, 247), and who had been able to recover his post, in 301, only thanks to the vizier ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā.

The rivalries between families of semi-hereditary ḳāḍīs (Ibn Abi 'l-S̲h̲awārib, 4 and 5, against Abū ʿUmar and his son ʿUmar; see Mantaẓam, vi, 305) were probably reinforced by doctrinal disagreements and by struggles between clans within the palace of the caliph. It seems that the Banū Abi 'l-S̲h̲awārib became Ḥanafīs in ʿIrāḳ in spite of their Meccan origins (their ancestor was to be referred to, rather disparagingly, as mad̲h̲hab ahl al-ʿIrāḳ). The vizier ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, as a S̲h̲āfiʿī, may have preferred to have a Mālikī at the head of the judiciary, and there may have been a similar reason, in about 317/929, for the dismissal of Ḥusayn, at the time when, as a result of an unsuccessful coup d'état by al-Ḳāhir, al-Muḳtadir's policy was taking a different direction. The arrival of the Būyids did nothing to harm the fortunes, now in their second century, of this family, which the people of Bag̲h̲dād attributed, according to al-K̲h̲aṭīb al-Bag̲h̲dādī (v, 47) to the virtues and disinterestedness of the ancestor of the dynasty, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Malik. An Ibn Abi 'l-S̲h̲awārib (al-K̲h̲aṭīb, ibid.) was still chief ḳāḍī of Bag̲h̲dād during the reign of D̲j̲alāl al-Dawla (416-35/1025-44). He was preceded in this post by two earlier members of the family, who are not mentioned in Ṭabaḳāt works. The Banū Abi 'l-S̲h̲awārib provided (according to the same source) the Islamic judicial system with 24 ḳāḍīs of varying importance. On the whole, therefore, the biographies of the Banū Abi l'-S̲h̲awārib are to be seen against the still rather confused background of the doctrinal history of Bag̲h̲dād.

IBN ABĪ S̲H̲AYBA, ABŪ BAKR ʿABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. IBRĀHĪM (= Abū S̲h̲ayba) B. ʿUTH̲MĀN AL-ʿABSĪ AL-KŪFĪ, ʿIrāḳī traditionist and historian (159-235/775-849) who came of a family of religious scholars; his grandfather Abū S̲h̲ayba was already ḳāḍī of Wāsiṭ, but he is described as ḍaʿīf (Ibn Ḥad̲j̲ar, Lisān al-Mīzān, vi, 395). Abū Bakr studied at al-Ruṣāfa, travelled "in search of learning" and died at Kūfa after having resided at Bag̲h̲dād. He had many pupils, among them Ibn Mād̲j̲a [q.v.], and wrote several works, which are listed in the Fihrist: K. al-Taʾrīk̲h̲, K. al-Fitan, K. Ṣiffīn, K. al-D̲j̲amal, K. al-Futūḥ in the field of history; K. al-Sunan fi 'l-fiḳh, K. al-Tafsīr, K. al-Musnad; the last, curiously known also as K. al-Muṣannaf, exists in many manuscripts (see Brockelmann, S I, 215; in S I, 260 there is mentioned a Radd ʿalā Abī Ḥanīfa, printed at Delhi in 1333 with a translation in Urdu), and parts of its five volumes have been printed in Multān. This work had a particular success in the Mag̲h̲rib and in Muslim Spain, where Baḳī b. Mak̲h̲lad [q.v.] himself gave an exposition of it on his return from the east, to the great anger of the muftī of Cordova Aṣbag̲h̲ b. K̲h̲alīl (see E. Lévi-Provençal, Hist. Esp. Mus., iii, 477-8) and where it remained in use as a textbook for the ʿulamāʾ (see Ibn K̲h̲ayr al-Is̲h̲bīlī, Fahrasa, 131-3; al-Ruʿaynī, Barnāmad̲j̲, 44). In the Mag̲h̲rib the number of the canonical collections of ḥadīth̲s had been increased from six to ten: al-Buk̲h̲ārī, Muslim, Mālik, Abū Dāwūd, al-Nasāʾī, al-Bazzār, al-Dāraḳuṭnī, al-Bayhaḳī, Ibn Abī S̲h̲ayba, probably by the early Almohads, and in any case before 621/1225, the date at which al-Marrākus̲h̲ī (al-Muʿd̲j̲ib, Cairo 1949, 279) relates that Abū Yūsuf Yaʿḳūb gave orders that there should be extracted from al-Muṣannafāt al-ʿas̲h̲ara the ḥadīth̲s on prayer and everything connected with it, in order to put an end to the supremacy of the Mālikī mad̲h̲hab (cf. I. Goldziher, Muh. St., ii, 265).

Abū Bakr's brother, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿUth̲mān, was also a traditionist; he compiled a K. al-Sunan fi 'l-fiḳh, a K. al-Tafsīr, a K. al-ʿAyn and a K. al-Musnad. He was born in 156/773 and died in 237 or 239/851 or 853.

ʿUth̲mān's son, Abū D̲j̲aʿfar Muḥammad, died at Bag̲h̲dād in 297/909, after also compiling a K. al-Sunan fi 'l-fiḳh and a History of traditionists.

IBN ABĪ ṬĀHIR ṬAYFŪR, ABU 'L-FAḌL AḤMAD, Bag̲h̲dādī littérateur and historian. Born in 204/819-20 into a family of Persian origin, he started out as a teacher and eventually took up residence in the bookmen's bazaar in the Eastern quarter of Bag̲h̲dād, embarking upon a literary career which brought him into contact with many of the outstanding littérateurs and high government officials of his time and resulted in the composition of about fifty works. He was also a poet whose verses provoked criticism—deserved or undeserved— in some quarters. Among other things, he wrote works in the fürstenspiegel tradition as well as on horsemanship and hunting, but above all, he wrote works of literary criticism, anecdotes, and other literary, mainly poetical subjects, including a series of anthologies of the work of individual poets. He is particularly famous for his History of Bag̲h̲dād which he continued down to the reign of al-Muhtadī. Only the section dealing with the caliphate of al-Maʾmūn is preserved and was edited, together with a German translation, by H. Keller (Leipzig 1908; ed. ʿIzzat al-ʿAṭṭār al-Ḥusaynī, Cairo 1368/1949). As far as we can judge, the work is a pioneering and highly successful effort in the field of political local historiography, leaning heavily toward literary and cultural matters. Its importance as a source is assured by its early date, its use of documents and sources now lost, and its author's sense for the interesting detail. Ibn Abī Ṭāhir's treatment agrees widely with that of the later Ṭabarī. Numerous quotations in his name in the Aghānī show much agreement with the material found in the surviving section of the History of Baghdād, though they may also be related to the monographs he wrote on various poets (cf. also, for instance, *Aghānī*³, iii, 201, as possibly to be connected with his Akhbār al-mutaẓarrifāt). Ibn Abī Ṭāhir's only other surviving work is the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth parts of his large literary anthology, Kitāb al-Manthūr wa-'l-manẓūm; the section dealing with clever remarks of women was published by A. al-Alfī in Cairo, 1326/1908, and some excerpts were also published by M. Kurd ʿAlī, Rasā'il al-bulaghā', Cairo 1331/1913, 115 ff. The work was among the sources used by Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī in his Baṣā'ir (Cairo 1373/1953, 6). His wide circle of acquaintances helped Ibn Abī Ṭāhir to obtain much of the information that went into his books, but in the highly competitive literary life of Baghdād he did not fail also to make prominent enemies, such as the poet al-Buḥturī (cf., for instance, al-Ṣūlī, Akhbār al-Buḥturī, ed. Ṣ. al-Ashtar, Damascus 1378/1958, 78, 112, 131 f.). Ibn Abī Ṭāhir died in the night Tuesday-Wednesday, 27-8 Djumādā I 280/14-15 March 893.

His son, Abu 'l-Ḥusayn ʿUbayd Allāh, followed in his footsteps and became a highly respected but much less productive man of letters. He continued his father's History of Baghdād, adding the history of the reigns of the caliphs from al-Muʿtamid to al-Muḳtadir. He died during al-Muḳtadir's caliphate, in 313/925-26.

Ṣ. al-Munadjdjid, Kuwait 1959, 31 f., 51 f.); al-Marzubānī, Nūr al-ḳabas, ed. R. Sellheim, Wiesbaden 1964 (Bibl. Isl. 23a), 126, 323, 339; al-Ḥātimī, al-Risāla al-mūḍiḥa, ed. M. Y. Nadjm, Beirut 1385/1965, 132, 161. He is cited in many contemporary and 4th/10th-century works in the fields of philology and literature, such as Ibn al-Djarrāḥ, Waraḳa; al-Marzubānī, Muwashshah (where ʿUbayd Allāh is also quoted); al-Ḳālī, Amālī; al-Tanūkhī, al-Faradj baʿd al-shidda, ch. 13 end (quoting his Faḍā'il al-ward ʿala 'l-nardjis); Abū Ahmad al-ʿAskarī, Maṣūn, etc. (For a ms. of the eleventh to thirteenth parts of the Manthūr wa-'l-manẓūm, cf. K. ʿAwwād, Fihrist makhṭūṭāt [of the Ḥikma University in Baghdād], Baghdād 1385/1966, 40 f.). (F. Rosenthal)

IBN ABĪ ṬAYYIʾ, Yaḥyā b. Ḥamīd al-Nadjdjār al-Ḥalabī (575/1180- ca. 625-30/1228-33), an important Shīʿī historian of Aleppo, and in particular the author of a universal History, Maʿādin al-dhahab fi ta'rīkh al-mulūk wa 'l-khulafā' wa dhawi 'l-ratab, which even the Sunnī writers, whether or not they acknowledge the fact, were unable to refrain from utilizing. Important extracts from it are to be found preserved in the History of Ibn al-Furāt [q.v.] and the Rawḍatayn of Abū Shāma [q.v.], dealing with the first three-quarters of the 6th/12th century; it was known also to ʿIzz al-Dīn b. Shaddād [q.v.], among others, but with less certainty to the other great Aleppo historian, the Sunnī Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-ʿAdīm [q.v.]. Ibn Abī Ṭayyiʾ continued his History with monographs on the reigns of Saladin and his son al-Ẓāhir of Aleppo, with whom he seems to have lived on friendly terms. It is more difficult to specify the titles and contents of his other works, several of which are perhaps merely adaptations of works by earlier writers. In any case, none of them attained the importance of the Maʿādin, which is of particular value as a history of northern Syria in the time of the Crusades, in view of the loss of the sources used (though they had also been drawn upon, but differently, by Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-ʿAdīm) and of the Shīʿī point of view of their general content; the Maʿādin also contains useful accounts on the subject of Egypt and, occasionally, even the Maghrib; for ʿIrāḳ and Persia, Ibn Abī Ṭayyiʾ was, broadly speaking, content to borrow from ʿImād al-Dīn al-Iṣfahānī.

Bibliography: The only surviving bio-bibliography of Ibn Abī Ṭayyiʾ is that of Yāḳūt, his contemporary, quoted by Ṣafadī (MS. Süleymaniye 842, fol. 30 v.), but omitted in our version of the Irshād. Modern studies: Cl. Cahen, Une chronique chiʿite au temps des Croisades, in Comptes-rendus des Séances de l'Acad. des Inscr., 1935; H. A. R. Gibb, The sources for the history of Saladin, in Speculum, xxv (1950); these two articles may be corrected and completed by Cl. Cahen, La Syrie du Nord au temps des Croisades, Paris 1940, 55-7. (Cl. Cahen)

IBN ABĪ ʿUMĀRA [see ḥafṣids].

IBN ABĪ UṢAYBIʿA, Muwaffaḳ al-Dīn Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. al-Ḳāsim b. Khalīfa b. Yūnus al-Khazradjī, physician and bibliographer whose patronymic probably derives from the fact that one of his ancestors had a deformed hand. He belonged to a family of physicians and was born in Damascus, after 590/1194. He studied under the principal teachers of his time, notably Ibn al-Bayṭār [q.v.], who taught him botany; with his father (d. 649/1251) and al-Raḥbī (d. 631/1233) he studied medicine, which he practised in the Nūrī hospital in Damascus and the Nāṣirī hospital in Cairo, and then (634/1236) entered the service of the amīr ʿIzz al-Dīn Aybak al-Muʿaẓẓamī at Sarkhad, where he died in 668/1270.

He wrote various works on medicine which are now lost, but which are mentioned incidentally in his ʿUyūn or by his biographers; among them are: Iṣābat al-munadjdjimīn, al-Tadjārib wa 'l-fawā'id, Ḥikāyāt al-aṭibbā' fī ʿilādjāt al-adwā' and Maʿālim al-umam. He is also the author of numerous poems; but he owes his fame to his ʿUyūn al-anbāʾ fī ṭabaḳāt al-aṭibbāʾ, a collection of 380 biographies which are of inestimable value for the history of Arabic science, in spite of a number of confusions, some long series of verses which have nothing to do with the main theme, and the one-sidedness of the choice of subjects: he provides no mention of persons such as Ibn Nafīs, who, like him, was a pupil of Ibn al-Dakhwār (d. circa 628/1230), but whom he disliked. He based his work on the bibliographical productions of his predecessors (Ibn Djuldjul for example), and a comparison between their texts and that of Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa shows how he either copies them, very often literally, or summarizes them, and how this mass of raw material was amplified by successive additions; the biographies are arranged by country and by generation (ṭabaḳāt). The work appeared in two redactions: a major and a minor. The latter was completed in 640/1242 and, with the addition of new material drawn in part from the Taʾrīkh al-ḥukamāʾ of Ibn al-Ḳifṭī, it produced the major recension (667/1268). From the two redactions a not very careful copyist produced a re-written version after the author's death. The literary style of the ʿUyūn, which contains some features of a popular style, has been studied by A. Müller, who also prepared an edition of the text based on the two original redactions; but this work was so badly printed in Cairo (1299/1882) that he had to include a long list of corrections and to repeat the indices in a third volume which mainly contains the variants (Ibn abi Useibia herausgegeben von August Müller, Königsberg 1884). The ʿUyūn was later published in several commercial editions and was reprinted in Beirut (Dār al-Fikr, 1955-6) without any significant changes.

The importance of this text has been recognized by orientalists since the middle of the 19th century (Wüstenfeld, Leclerc): a French translation of part of it was published by Sanguinetti (in JA, 1854-6) and a German translation by Hamed Waly; recently (Algiers 1958), H. Jahier and Abdelkader Noureddine have edited, translated and annotated the chapter on the physicians of the Muslim West.

IBN ABĪ ʿUYAYNA, name of two poets of Baṣra of the 2nd/8th century. (I) Ibn Abī ʿUyayna the Younger or Abu 'l-Minhāl Abū ʿUyayna b. Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUyayna is the better known. He was a great-grandson of al-Muhallab and the son of a governor of al-Rayy under al-Manṣūr. Towards the middle of the 2nd/8th century he became known in Baṣra through his love poems addressed to Dunyā, the pseudonym of a distant cousin, Fāṭima, the daughter of ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ (d. 153/770), who in spite of promises was refused to him and married to an ʿAbbāsid prince, ʿĪsā b. Sulaymān. He was living at Kūfa in 159/775-6, then went to Djurdjān, serving under his cousin Khālid b. Yazīd b. Ḥātim, with whom he very soon quarrelled. He was not released until the accession of al-Hādī in 169/785. He returned to Baṣra and assuaged his unhappy love and his hatred for Khālid by writing of his native town. He is mentioned under al-Rashīd. According to one tradition he was received by al-Maʾmūn, according to another, al-Maʾmūn banished him for his anti-Muḍarī opinions and he did not return to ʿIrāḳ until after this caliph's death.

From an output estimated to consist of 4,000 verses there have been collected up to now only 41 fragments totalling 325 verses, forming three groups: ghazal of Fāṭima, hidjāʾ of Khālid and descriptive poems about Baṣra. His themes are love, liberty and nature. He is considered as one of the four born poets among the muwallads.

(II) Ibn Abī ʿUyayna the Elder or Abū Djaʿfar ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUyayna, brother of the above, is heard of shortly before the fall of the Barmakids (187/803) and particularly during the struggle between al-Amīn and al-Maʾmūn. He played an important part in rallying Baṣra to the support of al-Maʾmūn in 196/812. In the same year, after the battle of al-Ahwāz, he came in contact with the general Ṭāhir b. al-Ḥusayn. For some time he was governor of Baḥrayn and of the Yamāma, then returned to Baṣra, where he took part in minor political intrigues. Later, falling out of favour with the general Ṭāhir, he remained faithful to the ʿAbbāsids and hostile to the ʿAlids. He is mentioned again in 204/819. He survived his brother and probably also al-Maʾmūn.

From a production as large as that of his brother, 26 fragments have been collected, totalling 206 verses. They consist mainly of madḥ, of ʿitāb and of fakhr. He was more learned but perhaps also less gifted than his brother.

A third brother, Dāwūd, a very minor poet, died young before 169/785.

IBN ABĪ ʿUYAYNA [see muḥ. b. abī ʿuyayna].

IBN ABĪ ZAMANAYN, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿĪsā al-Murrī, Andalusian poet and particularly jurist, born at Elvira in 324/936, died in the same town in 399/1009. The few verses of his which we have are of a somewhat religious nature and show a rather pessimistic attitude and a leaning to asceticism which is expressed in his Ḥayāt al-ḳulūb. However, he is principally known as an independent Mālikī jurist and author of several works, in particular a commentary on the Muwaṭṭaʾ of Mālik, a summary of Saḥnūn's Mudawwana, a Kitāb Aḥwāl al-sunna and a formulary which has been used with others by Abū Muḥammad al-Ḳaysī (see Lévi-Provençal, Hist. Esp. Mus., iii, 242 n.). None of his works seems to have survived.

IBN ABĪ ZARʿ, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad al-Fāsī, d. between 710 and 720/1310-20 at Fez, where he was imām, composed a history of Morocco entitled al-Anīs al-muṭrib bi-rawḍ al-ḳirṭās fī akhbār mulūk al-Maghrib wa-taʾrīkh madīnat Fās, a title often abbreviated to Rawḍ al-ḳirṭās, or Ḳirṭās. The text of this important work, several times printed and translated, has not yet been the object of a critical edition.

Texts of the Ḳirṭās: Tornberg, Annales regum Mauritaniae, Upsala 1843-6 (with Latin tr.); Fez, lithographed several times, e.g., 1303/1885; ed. (badly) Muḥammad al-Hās̲h̲imī al-Filālī, 2 vols., Rabat 1355/1936.

IBN ABI 'L-ZAWĀʾID [see sulaymān b. yaḥyā].

IBN ABĪ ZAYD AL-ḲAYRAWĀNĪ, Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Zayd ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (310-86/922-96), head of the Mālikī school of Ḳayrawān. He came of a family from Nafzawa and studied at Ḳayrawān, his birthplace, where his knowledge, his literary gifts, his piety and his wealth very soon earned him considerable prestige throughout the Muslim world. He came under the influence of As̲h̲ʿarism, which had a large following in Ḳayrawān at that time, and also that of mysticism, against whose excesses, and especially that of miracle-working, he fought. By teaching, delivering innumerable *fatwā*s and editing numerous works, he set in order, systematized and above all spread Mālikism among the people, and the triumph of Mālikism, made final by the rupture between the Zīrids and the Fāṭimids under al-Muʿizz b. Bādīs, is due primarily to his activities and to those of his emulators and disciples, the most prominent of whom in continuing his work was al-Ḳābisī. Ibn Abī Zayd's many and varied works include numerous epistles. Among the works which have been preserved are a summary of Islamic dogma and liturgy, al-ʿAḳīda aw d̲j̲umla muk̲h̲taṣara min wād̲j̲ib umūr al-diyāna, a ḳaṣīda on the resurrection (MS Paris, Bibl. Nat. no. 5675), a poem in honour of the Prophet (MS Brit. Mus. no. 1617), a collection of traditions (MS Brit. Mus. ii, 888); his famous Risāla, which he composed at the request of the pious al-Sabāʾī (d. 356/966) in 327/938, before the revolt of Abū Yazīd, when he was 17 years of age, is, in its present form, dedicated to his cousin Muḥriz b. K̲h̲alaf (d. 413/1022), who at that time was a schoolmaster and who later became, under the name of Sīdī Maḥrez, the patron saint of Tunis. This synopsis of Mālikism, a work of propaganda, the counterpart of the Daʿāʾim al-Islām of the famous Ismāʿīlī ḳāḍī Abū Ḥanīfa al-Nuʿmān, has from that time been the subject of continual study and commentary. It was published several times in Cairo, notably in 1323; text and partial English translation by A. D. Russell and Abdullah al-Mamun Suhrawardy, First steps in Muslim jurisprudence, London 1906; Fr. tr. by E. Fagnan, Paris 1914; Arabic text and Fr. tr. by L. Bercher, Algiers 1945, 1948, 1949. His main work, the summation of his knowledge, was the Kitāb al-Nawādir wa 'l-ziyādāt ʿala 'l-Mudawwana: the publication and study of what remains of this epitome of Mālikī fiḳh would be of great interest. His Muk̲h̲taṣar of the Mudawwana, which was at first highly esteemed, was, however, soon eclipsed by that of al-Barād̲h̲iʿī. Ibn Abī Zayd, who has been called "Mālik the Younger", ranks with al-Abharī among the chief exponents of Mālikism. He was buried in his own house and his mausoleum, which very soon became a place of pilgrimage, still exists. His son, Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Abī Zayd, was appointed ḳāḍī of Ḳayrawān in 435/1043 by al-Muʿizz b. Bādīs, who, as the result of an intrigue, had to revoke this appointment soon afterwards.

IBN ʿĀBIDĪN, patronymic which usually refers to two Ḥanafī jurisconsults who lived in Syria towards the end of the period of Ottoman rule. The first, Muḥammad Amīn b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿĀbidīn, born in 1198/1784 at Damascus, studied first S̲h̲āfiʿī law and later Ḥanafī law, of which he became one of the most distinguished scholars of his time; he died at Damascus in 1258/1842. His best known work is a commentary on the Radd al-Muḥtār of al-Ḥaṣkafī (d. 1088/1677, published in Cairo in 1299 and in Istanbul in 1307). The second, his son ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn b. ʿĀbidīn, went in 1285/1868 to Istanbul where he took part, under the direction of Aḥmad D̲j̲ewdet Pas̲h̲a [q.v.], in the compilation of the Mad̲j̲alla [q.v.]. He returned three years later to Damascus, where he died in 1306/1888.

IBN ʿAD̲H̲ĀRĪ [see ibn ʿid̲h̲ārī].

IBN AL-ʿADĪM, Kamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿUmar b. Aḥmad b. Hibat Allāh, historian of Aleppo, born there in 588/1192, died in Cairo in 660/1262. A wealthy and prominent family of ʿIrāḳī Arab origin, the Banu 'l-ʿAdīm acquired property in and around Aleppo, and a number of them rose to eminence or office under the successive dynasties that ruled in that city. For five generations they held the office of ḳāḍī; the historian's father was a chief ḳāḍī under Zangid and then Ayyūbid rule. He himself, after studies in Aleppo, Damascus, Jerusalem, Bag̲h̲dād and the Ḥid̲j̲āz, served in Aleppo as a secretary, as a ḳāḍī and later as wazīr to the Ayyūbid rulers al-Malik al-ʿAzīz and al-Malik al-Nāṣir. As an official he was again able to travel extensively. In 658/1260, when the Mongols sacked Aleppo, he fled to Palestine, and thence to Egypt. Hülekü invited him to return to Syria as chief ḳāḍī, and the Mongol withdrawal enabled him to revisit Aleppo, but, finding it in ruins, he returned to Egypt where he died.

Ibn al-ʿAdīm is credited with a number of writings, some of them extant, of which the most important are his two historical works on Aleppo. The earlier and more extensive is the Bug̲h̲yat al-ṭalab fī taʾrīk̲h̲ Ḥalab, a biographical dictionary in alphabetical order of men connected with Aleppo. Ten volumes survive in manuscript in Istanbul, additional manuscripts in Paris and Mosul. In these biographies Ibn al-ʿAdīm uses oral information, documents, and a great number of manuscript sources which are meticulously cited and for the most part lost. The work is thus a major source of historiographical as well as historical information. Some extracts were published and translated by Barbier de Meynard in the Recueil des historiens des Croisades (RHC. Or., iii (1884), 695-732); the Istanbul manuscripts have been described, used, excerpted and summarized by Sauvaget, Cahen, Dahan, Lewis and Sevim, but the work as a whole still awaits an editor.

Ibn al-ʿAdīm's second historical book is the Zubdat al-ḥalab fī taʾrīkh Ḥalab, a much briefer work giving the history of the city in chronological sequence, without much citation of sources, from early times to 641/1243. The Paris manuscript has for long been known to Western scholars, especially to historians of the Crusades, and was frequently cited or excerpted. Some passages were published and translated by Barbier de Meynard in RHC. Or., iii (1884), 578-690, and others translated—not very well—by E. Blochet in ROL, iii-vi (1895-98). A critical edition was finally undertaken by Sāmī Dahān (Zubdat al-ḥalab, i (1-457/622-1064), Damascus 1951; ii (457-569/1064-1173), Damascus 1954; third and last volume in preparation in 1968).

IBN ʿADJARRAD [see ʿADJĀRIDA].

IBN AL-ADJDĀBĪ, Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Ṭarābulusī, philologist, native of Adjdābiya (between Barḳa and Tripoli), who lived in the 6th/12th century and died in about 650/1251. He is the author of a number of works, of which reference is made particularly to his Kitāb al-Anwāʾ (ed. Damascus 1964, by ʿIzzat Ḥasan, as al-Azmina wa'l-anwāʾ) and to a short treatise on lexicography entitled Kifāyat al-mutaḥaffiẓ wa-nihāyat al-mutalaffiẓ, printed in Egypt in 1285/1868 and in Beirut in 1305/1887.

IBN ʿADJĪBA, ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-MAHDĪ IBN ʿADJĪBA AL-ḤASANĪ, Moroccan Ṣūfī of Sharīfian origin, was one of the most distinguished representatives of the mystical order of the Darḳāwa [q.v.]. He was born in 1160 or 1161/1746-7 at al-Khamīs, an important village of the Andjra tribe (Mediterranean coastal region of Morocco, between Tangier and Tetuan). Having been attracted from his childhood to devotional observance and religious learning, he studied assiduously the 'reading' of the Ḳurʾān, theology, holy law and philology, first with local fuḳahāʾ, then in Tetuan, where his tutors were ʿAbd al-Karīm Ibn Ḳurrīsh, Muḥammad Djanwī and Muḥammad Warzīzī, and finally in Fez, where he gained licenses to teach (idjāza) from Tawdī Ibn Sūda and Muḥammad Bannīs. When about thirty years old, he returned to Tetuan and there taught sharīʿa and wrote works of fiḳh and ḥadīth, and his first commentaries on mystical works. Greatly impressed by reading the Ḥikam of Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh [q.v.] of Alexandria, he decided to devote himself to the way of mysticism and, in 1208/1794, became a disciple of shaykh Muḥammad al-Būzīdī (d. 1814), a direct pupil of Mawlāy Darḳāwī. He now made a dramatic break with his past life, renounced his office and his possessions, donned the patched garment (muraḳḳaʿa), became a beggar and a water-carrier, and was even thrown into prison for several days in Tetuan with other fuḳarāʾ charged with reprehensible innovations (bidʿa). After this time of trial, of which he has left a very vivid account in his autobiography (Fahrasa), he achieved enlightenment and the rôle of spiritual guide (shaykh ṭarīḳa). He set out then to preach the "return to God" and the Ṣūfī path in the northern villages of the Djbāla, where he founded numerous zāwiyas. His literary output during these years was most prolific and it reveals a great pedagogic ability, in which the teaching of the faḳīh is harmoniously integrated in an original mystical experience, and in which exoteric knowledge (al-ʿilm al-ẓāhir) provides the basis for achieving esoteric knowledge (al-ʿilm al-bāṭin). It was Ibn ʿAdjība's mastery in treating allusions of a spiritual kind (ʿilm al-ishāra) which was to earn him his enduring fame. Struck down by plague, he died in his master's house, in Ghmāra, on 7 Shawwāl 1224/15 November 1809. His tomb, which dominates the hamlet of Zammīdj (20 kilometres south-east of Tangiers), is the focal point every year of a mawsim (14 September) celebrated by the Darḳāwa-ʿAdjībiyya.

Works: In his Fahrasa, Ibn ʿAdjība drew up a list of his works, which appears to follow approximately the chronological order of their composition. It is as follows, with the addition of a few details on the published works: (1) and (2) Sharḥ al-Hamziyya and Sharḥ al-Burda (al-Būṣīrī); (3) Sharḥ al-Waẓīfa (Zarrūḳ); (4) Sharḥ al-Ḥizb al-kabīr (Shādhilī); (5) Sharḥ Asmāʾ Allāh al-ḥusnā; (6) Sharḥ al-Munfaridja (Ibn Naḥwī); (7) Sharḥ Tāʾiyya (Djaʿidī); (8) K. fī ʿilm al-niyya; (9) K. fī dhamm al-ghība wa-madḥ al-ʿuzla wa 'l-ṣamt; (10) Taʾlīf fi 'l-adhkār al-nabawiyya; (11) Arbaʿīn ḥadīth; (12) al-Ḳirāʾāt al-ʿashara; (13) Azhār al-bustān (Ṭabaḳāt mālikiyya); (14) Ḥāshiya ʿalā Mukhtaṣar Khalīl; (15) Sharḥ Ḥiṣn al-Ḥaṣīn (Djazārī); (16) Sharḥ al-Ḥikam (Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh) (pub. in combination with (17), Cairo 1331/1913, and separately, Cairo 1381/1961); (17) Sharḥ al-Mabāḥith al-aṣliyya (Tudjībī); (18) Sharḥ Taṣliya (Ibn Mashīsh); (19), (20), (21) Sharḥ al-Fātiḥa (3 separate commentaries on the first sūra of the Ḳurʾān, one of them short, another long, and the third very brief); (22) Tafsīr al-Ḳurʾān (commentary on the Ḳurʾān in 4 volumes, of which i and ii at least have been published: Cairo 1375/1955 and 1376/1956); (23) Sharḥ al-Khamriyya (Ibn al-Fāriḍ); (24) Sharḥ Ḳaṣīda (Rifāʿī); (25) Sharḥ Muḳaṭṭaʿāt (Shushtarī); (26) Sharḥ Ḳaṣīda fi 'l-sulūk (Būzīdī); (27) K. fi 'l-ḳaḍāʾ wa-l-ḳadar; (28) Sharḥ abyāt (Ibn ʿArabī); (29) Fi 'l-khamra al-azaliyya; (30) Fi 'l-ṭalāsim (this work, and the preceding one, are short metaphysical treatises in which the author propounds, without actually naming it, the theory of the oneness of existence: waḥdat al-wudjūd. In the first, he demonstrates how the Divine Essence remains identical to itself before and after its irradiation—tadjallī—in existence; in the second, he describes the existential veils behind which the one Essence conceals itself and through which it may be grasped according to three increasingly perfect modes of unity: tawḥīd al-afʿāl, tawḥīd al-ṣifāt, tawḥīd al-dhāt); (31) Sharḥ Taṣliya (Ibn ʿArabī); (32) Sharḥ Nūniyya (Shushtarī); (33) Miʿrādj al-tashawwuf ilā ḥaḳāʾiḳ al-taṣawwuf (glossary of technical terms of Ṣūfism; published Damascus 1355/1937 by al-Hāshimī [q.v.]; Fr. tr. by J. L. Michon, see Bibl.); (34), (35) Sharḥ Tāʾiyya fi ʾl-Khamra (two commentaries, one short and one long, on a poem by his master Būzīdī); (36) Sharḥ al-Ādjurrūmiyya (commentary on two levels, grammatical and esoteric, of the treatise on grammar by Ibn Adjurrūm; a tadjrīd giving only the esoteric commentary has been published, Istanbul 1315); (37) Ḥāshiya ʿala ʾl-Djāmiʿ al-ṣaghīr (al-Suyūṭī); (38) Dīwān (4 ḳaṣīdas and various tawshīḥāt, about 200 verses in all). To this list must be added: (38) the Fahrasa itself and some works not mentioned therein, probably because they were composed not long before the author's death: (39) Sharḥ ʿAyniyya (al-Djīlī); (40) Tabṣirāt darḳāwiyya; (41) Taʿrīf Mawlāy Darḳāwī; (42) Fi ʾl-mawadda; (43) Aḥzāb (Ḥizb al-ḥifẓ, Ḥizb al-ʿizz and Ḥizb al-fatḥ).

Bibliography: Lévi-Provençal devoted a notice to Ibn ʿAdjība in Les historiens des Chorfa 336. In Arabic, several of his contemporaries painted glowing portraits of him: ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Kūhin (see ibid., 340) and in particular Būziyyān al-Mʿaskarī (Ṭabaḳāt darḳāwiyya). Sporadic references to his works are found in bibliographical compilations (F. Bustānī, Dāʾirat al-maʿārif, iii, 358; Sarkīs, Muʿdjam, 169-70) and in manuscript catalogues (Allouche and Regragui, Mss. Ar. Rabat, i, passim). The contemporary historian Muḥammad Dāwūd accords him a prominent place in his Taʾrīkh Tiṭwān (see vol. iii, 1962, passim and vol. vi, to appear). These sources and data drawn from the author's writings have been gathered together in a study by J. L. Michon, Ibn ʿAdjība et son Miʿrādj (thesis, Paris 1966).

IBN ĀDJURRŪM, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Dāwūd al-Sanhādjī, Moroccan grammarian born 672/1273-4, died 723/1323 at Fez, where he taught grammar and the art of Ḳurʾānic recitation. Ibn Ādjurrūm is the author of a celebrated Muḳaddima which bears his name, a little treatise of a few pages in which he sets out the system of the iʿrāb of words. This summary syntax, easy to memorize, has enjoyed to the present day great popularity in all the Arabic-speaking countries, in the west as well as in the east. Because of its extreme conciseness, the Muḳaddima has provoked about 60 commentaries by subsequent grammarians, which testify to its wide diffusion among teachers. The Muḳaddima has been known in Europe since the 10th/16th century, being one of the first treatises available to Arabists for the study of the Arabic grammatical system. It has been published a dozen times and translated into most European languages. It is to be remarked that al-Suyūṭī (Bughya, 102) considers Ibn Ādjurrūm to represent the Kūfa grammatical school, basing himself on the fact that he uses the term khafḍ, and that he considers the imperative to be muʿrab and the particle kayfamā to govern the djazm.

IBN al-ʿAFĪF al-TILIMSĀNĪ, Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad b. ʿAfīf al-Dīn Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Tilimsānī, nicknamed al-Shābb al-Ẓarīf, "the witty young man", was a poet of great skill.

His father, ʿAfīf al-Dīn al-Tilimsānī [see al-tilimsānī], was a mystic who had left Tlemcen and settled in the khānḳāh of Saʿīd al-Suʿadāʾ in Cairo, where the poet was born on 10 Djumādā II 661/21 April 1263. While still young, Ibn al-ʿAfīf went with his father to Damascus, where he completed his education under the direction of his father and a number of other scholars. He very soon obtained the post of treasurer, and lived at the foot of Mount Ḳāsiyūn.

From his youth he had devoted himself to poetry, with the encouragement of his acquaintances. His literary fame spread quickly; he secured access to the important people of his time, presenting his panegyrics to them, and in particular wrote of the merits of al-Manṣūr Muḥammad, the Ayyūbid ruler of Ḥamāt.

His poetry, relaxed in style, was highly thought of, but his enemies, jealous of his success, conspired against him; for some time he resisted this, then finally decided to retreat from the world and shut himself away in his own house. He died while still very young, at the age of 27, on 14 Radjab 688/3 August 1289.

Ibn al-ʿAfīf led a free and easy existence. His poetic gifts find expression chiefly in poems of love and wine, which reflect the dissolute life of the period; he wrote also *dūbayt*s and muwashshaḥāt. His skill and facility of expression enabled him to avoid the mannered style in vogue in the poetry of his time. The love poems, generally addressed to men, could be given a Ṣūfī interpretation, but this is not very probable.

The dīwān of Ibn al-ʿAfīf, although rather short, has enjoyed a lasting fame; it has been published several times in Cairo (1274, 1281, 1308) and in Beirut (1885, 1891, 1907), but these editions are very mediocre (a critical edition is at present (1967) in preparation in Paris; on the manuscripts see Brockelmann, I, 300, S I, 458, adding MS Damascus, Ẓāhiriyya, no. 5126). There exist also some Maḳāmāt by him (MSS Paris 3176, 3947; Istanbul, Topkapı Sarayı 2402; Berlin 8594), one of which has been published in Damascus, n.d., and two khuṭbas (MS Berlin 3953).

IBN (al-)AḤMAR, byname of several poets, including an Iyādī (see Āmidī, Muʾtalif, 38), a Kinānī (ibid.), a Badjalī (op. cit., 37; al-Djāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, ii, 214) and a Bāhilī, who is the best known. The sources vary considerably with regard to the genealogy of this poet, but he seems to have been called Abu ʾl-Khaṭṭāb ʿAmr b. (al-) Aḥmar b.

al-ʿAmarrad b. Tamīm b. Rabīʿa b. Ḥirām b. Farrāṣ b. Maʿn b. Aʿṣur al-Bāhilī. He is included among the mukhaḍramūn [q.v.], embraced Islam, took part in the conquests in South-west Asia (in the course of which he lost an eye), settled in Syria and died during the caliphate of ʿUthmān. His poems do not seem to have been collected, but he is often quoted as an authority on the Arabic language, although he is criticized for having invented four words. Ibn Sallām, who places him in the third rank of Islamic poets, appreciates his language, but thinks that he uses too many rare expressions. Numerous apophthegms appear in his poems, and a description of sand-grouse (ḳaṭā) has remained famous.

IBN AL-AḤNAF [see ʿABBĀS B. AL-AḤNAF].

IBN AL-AHTAM [see ʿAMR B. AL-AHTAM].

IBN ʿĀʾIDH, the author of a work on the Raids (maghāzī [q.v.]), used by such later authors as Ibn Sayyid al-Nās and al-Dhahabī. His given name was Muḥammad. His kunya is variously given as Abū ʿAbd Allāh or Abū Aḥmad, and his grandfather's name as Saʿīd or ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. Born in Damascus in 150/767, he died there on Thursday, 25 Rabīʿ II 233/8 December 847 (or in Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 232/July-August 847, or in 234/848), having been the tax collector for the Ghūṭa under al-Maʾmūn. As a historian, he stands in the tradition of al-Walīd b. Muslim and al-Wāḳidī on the one side, and Abū Zurʿa al-Dimashḳī, Abū Zurʿa al-Rāzī, and Yaʿḳūb b. Sufyān on the other. All this information is found in the rather lengthy biography in the Taʾrīkh Dimashḳ (Ms. Yale L-312 [Nemoy 1182], ii, 102a-103b), drawing together the older sources and, in turn, serving as the main or exclusive source for later biographers. The Taʾrīkh Dimashḳ further credits Ibn ʿĀʾidh with a work on the Muslim Conquests and the Summer Campaigns and quotes some non-historical statements in his name. Since that name is not infrequent, however, it is not impossible that Ibn ʿAsākir conflated one or more persons. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the Fihrist, 109, mentions a historian Ibn ʿĀbid (sic) as the author of a history of kings and nations, and this, in turn, obscures the relevance of the reference to a historian of the same name in Masʿūdī, Murūdj, i, 11. If Ibn ʿĀʾidh left no mark in the earlier historical literature known so far, this may be due to his having represented a Syrian tradition unpopular at the time. It may be noted that (if we are dealing with one person) he was considered reliable as a transmitter, but he was also described as a Muʿtazilī (ḳadarī).

IBN ʿĀʾISHA, by-name of several persons, who may be distinguished as follows:

I. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿĀʾISHA, ABŪ DJAʿFAR, Medinan singer of unknown father. A pupil of Maʿbad and of Mālik, he was regarded as the equal if not the superior of his masters, and celebrated for his skill at launching into a performance. He was highly respected at Mecca and at Medina, but, extremely vain, he would become very angry when asked to sing. He was invited to the court of Damascus, probably by al-Walīd b. Yazīd but during the caliphate of Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik (105-25/724-43), and died accidentally on the way back, at Dhū Khushub, when loaded with presents. Two monographs at least were devoted to him, one by Isḥāḳ al-Mawṣilī (Fihrist, Cairo ed. 1348, 202), the other by Abū Ayyūb al-Madīnī (ibid., 212).

II. IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD AL-WAHHĀB B. IBRĀHĪM AL-IMĀM, known as Ibn ʿĀʾisha after his grandmother ʿĀʾisha bint Sulaymān b. ʿAlī. Having hatched a plot against al-Maʾmūn, he was put to death in prison by the caliph and his body was hung up in a street of Baghdād in 209/824-5.

III. MUḤAMMAD B. ḤAFṢ AL-TAYMĪ, ABŪ BAKR, genealogist, collector of traditions, and wit of Baṣra, who owes his by-name Ibn ʿĀʾisha (al-Akbar) to ʿĀʾisha bint Ṭalḥa [q.v.], from whom he was descended.

IV. ʿUBAYD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B ḤAFṢ, ABŪ ʿABD AL-RAḤMAN, the son of the preceding, from whom he takes his by-name Ibn ʿĀʾisha (al-Aṣghar) or al-ʿĀʾishī, or even al-ʿAyshī. Also a traditionist, a rāwī and a celebrated orator, he settled in Baghdād in 219/834. He was considered very learned and is often quoted in isnāds, and it is generally he who is meant when the name Ibn ʿĀʾisha alone is used. He reports very many historical and religious traditions on the authority of his father, and is even said to have been the author of an historical work. He died at Baṣra in 228/843.

IBN ʿAḲĪL, ʿABD ALLĀH B. ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. ʿABD ALLĀH BAHĀʾ AL-DĪN AL-HĀSHIMĪ, born 694/1294 (or 698 or 700), died 769/1367, an important Shāfiʿī jurisconsult and grammarian. A native of Bālis [q.v.] in Syria, he arrived destitute in Cairo, where his ability was recognized by his teacher in grammar, Abū Ḥayyān al-Gharnāṭī [q.v.]. His main teachers in fiḳh were, among others, ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn al-Ḳōnawī (Brockelmann, II, 105; S II, 101) and the Chief Ḳāḍī Djalāl al-Dīn al-Ḳazwīnī (Subkī, Ṭabaḳāt, v, 238); having held various posts as substitute ḳāḍī (nāʾib), he became the substitute of the Chief Ḳāḍī ʿIzz al-Dīn Ibn Djamāʿa [q.v.], but was dismissed by him on account of unseemliness in a discussion. Ibn ʿAḳīl, however, won the favour of the amīr Ṣarghitmish, and the amīr dismissed Ibn Djamāʿa and put Ibn ʿAḳīl in his place in 759/1358. But when Ṣarghitmish fell from power immediately afterwards, Ibn Djamāʿa was reinstalled, and the term of office of Ibn ʿAḳīl lasted only 80 days. Ibn ʿAḳīl's short term of office became memorable through his considerable distributions of charity to the poor and the students, including a legacy of 150,000 dirhams which he distributed in sums ranging from 1 to 10 dīnārs. He also showed concern for the interests of ordinary people in the matter of making valid legacies.

Ibn ʿAḳīl taught several subjects of religious learning in a number of institutions, including tafsīr in the mosque of Ibn Ṭūlūn; his course took 23 years, and after that he started it again but did not live to complete it. His literary output does not seem to have been very considerable; he wrote a commentary on the Alfiyya of Ibn Mālik [q.v.], on which al-Suyūṭī [q.v.] wrote a gloss, and another commentary on the same author's Tashīl, both of which have been preserved; he also started an extremely detailed work, variously called Taysīr al-istiʿdād li-rutbat al-idjtihād and al-Taʾsīs li-madhhab Ibn Idrīs, in which he set out the ikhtilāf and the various arguments, deciding in favour of the doctrine which he found best supported by traditions; four parts of it exist.

Ibn ʿAḳīl was very elegant in his dress, his food and his dwelling, and liked to mix in high society where he was well liked, but he was unreliable in business matters, though generous, and he died in debt. Sirādj al-Dīn al-Bulḳīnī [q.v.] was his son-in-law.

IBN ʿAḲĪL, Abu 'l-Wafāʾ ʿAlī b. ʿAḳīl b. Muḥammad b. ʿAḳīl b. Aḥmad al-Baghdādī al-Ẓafarī, Ḥanbalī jurist and theologian (431/1040-513/1119), a great Sunnī personality whose life and writings shed light on one of the most important periods in the development of Muslim religious thought, and who stands at the head of a progressive movement within Sunnī traditionalism.

Family origins and early youth. Ibn ʿAḳīl was born in Baghdād, on the left bank quarter of Bāb al-Ṭāḳ (see his Kitāb al-Funūn, fol. 12b: "... Bāb al-Ṭāḳ, the quarter in which I was born"), in Djumādā II 431/February-March 1040. This fact, when added to others cited below, leaves little doubt that he belonged to a Ḥanafī family, not only on his mother's side (G. Makdisi, Ibn ʿAqīl, 387), but also on that of his father. Some of his earliest recollections went back to this quarter where the great Ḥanafī mosque-college was located, along with the Shrine of Abū Ḥanīfa and the great Ḥanafī cemetery. Muʿtazilism, during this period, had found a refuge within the Ḥanafī school of law, which helps to explain the interest Ibn ʿAḳīl took in Muʿtazilism, the independence of spirit which was never to leave him and which was to endow the Ḥanbalī movement with a new direction and renewed vigour.

Education. This precocious young man had broad interests ranging from Ḳurʾān and traditions, grammar and belles-lettres, asceticism and Ṣūfism, prosody and the art of letter-writing, to those subjects in which he particularly excelled, the art of the sermon, dogmatic theology, dialectics and legal studies. Of the twenty-three teachers he himself names as those under whom he studied, only two belonged to the Ḥanbalī School, Abū Yaʿlā and Abū Muḥammad al-Tamīmī (d. 488/1095). The others were Shāfiʿī, notably Abū Isḥāḳ al-Shīrāzī (d. 478/1085-6); Ḥanafī, including Ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Dāmaghānī (d. 478/1085-6); as well as Muʿtazilī, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim b. Barhān (d. 456/1064), Abū ʿAlī b. al-Walīd (d. 478/1086) and Abu 'l-Ḳāsim b. al-Tabbān (date of death unknown). He owed his interest in belles-lettres to the paternal side of his family who, in his own words, "were all writers, secretaries, poets and men of letters". His talent as a writer of prose is evident especially in his sermons and meditations.

For eleven years, Ibn ʿAḳīl pursued legal studies under the direction of the Ḥanbalī ḳaḍī Abū Yaʿlā b. al-Farrāʾ. These years fall between two of the most significant dates of his life: 447/1055-458/1066. The first date was linked in his mind with the entry of the Saldjūḳid hordes into Baghdād, when their ruthless pillaging of his quarter of Bāb al-Ṭāḳ forced him to move. His moving from Bāb al-Ṭāḳ coincided with the beginning of his adhesion to the Ḥanbalī school. At this time, the great Ḥanbalī merchant Abū Manṣūr b. Yūsuf (d. 460/1067-8) was playing an important political rôle behind the scenes in Baghdād. It was he who suggested to the Caliph al-Ḳāʾim the appointment of the Ḥanafī Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Dāmaghānī (d. 478) as Chief Ḳāḍī, a political gesture to conciliate the Ḥanafī Saldjūḳids. In his later reminiscences, Ibn ʿAḳīl speaks of Abū Manṣūr as instrumental in increasing the membership of the Ḥanbalī school through his generous patronage. As Ibn ʿAḳīl was his protégé, it is very likely that Abū Manṣūr was instrumental in Ibn ʿAḳīl's joining the Ḥanbalī school at this time. Thus the event which marked the beginning of a new era for the ʿAbbāsid capital marked also the beginning of a new era in Ibn ʿAḳīl's life at the age of sixteen. The second date, that of the death of his teacher Abū Yaʿlā in 458/1066, marks the beginning of his troubles within the Ḥanbalī school.

Persecution and exile. Ibn ʿAḳīl's intellectual curiosity stubbornly resisted confinement within the limits of the traditional sciences held in honour in the Ḥanbalī school at this time. Before the death of his teacher Abū Yaʿlā in 458, he had already frequented the study circles of Muʿtazilī masters, had delved into the study of kalām, vigorously condemned by Ḥanbalism, and had become interested in the writings of the great mystic of waḥdat al-shuhūd, al-Ḥallādj [q.v.]. In one of his reminiscences, he remarks that his Ḥanbalī companions wanted him to abandon the company of certain scholars, and complains that it hindered him from acquiring useful knowledge.

His appointment to a chair in the Cathedral Mosque of al-Manṣūr after his teacher Abū Yaʿlā died in 458, an appointment made possible by his patron Abū Manṣūr, earned him the hostility of a group of Ḥanbalīs led by the Sharīf Abū Djaʿfar (d. 470). The latter, twenty years the senior of Ibn ʿAḳīl, apparently resented the early distinction conferred upon the young man. After the death of Abū Manṣūr in 460 and the consequent loss of his protection, Ibn ʿAkīl had to go into hiding to escape the wrath of this group. From 460 to 465, he lived in exile in the quarter of Bāb al-Marātib under the protection of Abu 'l-Kāsim b. Riḍwān, also a wealthy Ḥanbalī merchant, son-in-law of Abū Manṣūr.

Public retraction. On Monday 8 Muḥarram 465/24 September 1072, in the mosque of the Sharīf Abū Djaʿfar located in the quarter of Nahr al-Muʿallā, on the east side of Baghdād, Ibn ʿAkīl read the text of his retraction in the presence of a numerous gathering. The written retraction was then signed by five shuhūd-notaries, including two sons and two sons-in-law of the late Abū Manṣūr. Two days later, in another ceremony in the Caliphal Dīwān, Ibn ʿAkīl signed his retraction. In this document, Ibn ʿAkīl retracted writings in favour of Ḥalladj and of certain Muʿtazilī doctrines.

There is no doubt that the Ḥanbalī school as a whole was opposed to Muʿtazilism; and there is no reason to doubt Ibn ʿAkīl's sincerity regarding his abjuration of Muʿtazilism. Although his later writings owe much to the spirit of inquiry he may have gained from his Muʿtazilī professors, he cannot be said to share their theological doctrines. Therefore, in so far as Muʿtazilism is concerned, Ibn ʿAkīl was thoroughly sincere in his retraction and remained afterwards true to Ḥanbalism.

However, as regards Ḥalladj, Ibn ʿAkīl's sincerity in retracting his veneration for him is, one may safely say, open to doubt. He was probably practising taḳiyya, prudent dissimulation, in renouncing his writings on the celebrated Muslim saint. In so doing he was not going against the teachings of his school; for Ḥanbalism's attitude towards al-Ḥallādj was, and remained long afterwards, divided. When the Ḥanbalī Ibn Ḳudāma (d. 620/1223) transmitted the text of Ibn ʿAkīl's retraction, he omitted the reference to al-Ḥallādj, undoubtedly because of his own Ṣūfī tendencies. The Ḥanbalī Ṭawfī (d. 715/1316), who abridged one of Ibn Ḳudāma's works, believed in the sainthood of Ḥallādj. Ḥanbalism was not opposed to Ṣūfism as such, since some of the greatest Ṣūfīs have come from its ranks, as for instance, al-Anṣārī al-Harawī [q.v.] and ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Djīlānī [q.v.], founder of the first Ṣūfī brotherhood, the Ḳādiriyya. After the public retraction, the Sharīf Abū Djaʿfar is said to have had condemned writings of Ibn ʿAkīl returned to him with the understanding that he would destroy them himself. According to some he destroyed them, but others say that they appeared after his death. We have the testimony of Ibn al-Djawzī, who reported that he had in his own possession the autograph copy of a treatise of Ibn ʿAkīl written in praise of al-Ḥallādj: Djuzʾ fī naṣr karāmāt al-Ḥallādj.

Judgments of posterity. Ibn al-Djawzī, who was greatly influenced by the writings of Ibn ʿAkīl, especially in the field of sermon writing, attributes Ibn ʿAkīl's troubles to his intellectual curiosity, and believes that he repented of his innovating tendencies. The Shāfiʿī Ibn Shākir al-Kutubī also holds this view. The Ḥanbalī jurists Ibn Ḳudāma and Ibn Radjab, and the Shāfiʿī Ibn Kathīr, while not condemning Ibn ʿAkīl outright, believe that he never quite rid himself of his Muʿtazilī tendencies. On the other hand, the celebrated Ḥanbalī Ibn Taymiyya held that Ibn ʿAkīl, who fell at first under the influence of Djahmism and Muʿtazilism, rallied in the latter part of his life to the purist form of orthodoxy.

Principal works. The works of Ibn ʿAkīl have not yet been critically edited and published, and therefore his thought cannot as yet be properly studied. G. Makdisi is now in the process of editing the followings works. (1) Kitāb al-Funūn; this is the most important work of Ibn ʿAkīl. Historians are not in agreement as to the extent of this work, the figures given ranging from two hundred to as many as eight hundred volumes; only one volume is known to be extant. An abridgment in ten volumes (not extant) was made by Ibn al-Djawzī. Sibṭ Ibn al-Djawzī reports having studied close to seventy volumes in the waḳf of the Maʾmūniyya in Baghdād. It is a journal of encyclopaedic range, covering all sorts of subjects and attesting its author's wide range of interests. (2) Kitāb al-Wāḍiḥ fī uṣūl al-fiḳh; a work on the methodology of law in three volumes; all extant. (3) A series of brief treatises on the nature of the Ḳurʾān, written in refutation of Ashʿarī doctrines. (4) Kitāb al-Djadal; a work on dialectics in one volume.

Among his other important works, now lost: Kitāb al-Irshād fī uṣūl al-dīn, on theology; Kitāb al-Intiṣār li-Ahl al-Ḥadīth, in defence of the traditionalists.

IBN ʿALĪWA, Shaykh Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Muṣṭafā al-ʿAlawī al-Mustaghānimī, ṣūfī and poet, born at Mostaganem in Algeria in 1286/1869 of a distinguished but at that time indigent family. He never went to school and his handwriting remained unproficient all his life, but he was taught to read and given lessons in the Ḳurʾān by his father, though even these had to be cut short owing to his family's poverty, which forced him, at an early age, to take to cobbling and then later to open a small shop. In his spare time he attended a course of lessons in the Islamic doctrine of Divine Unity (tawḥīd). His father died when he was 16, and not long afterwards he entered the ʿĪsawī [q.v.] ṭarīḳa, where he became quite expert in the "wonder-working" practices of that order. He soon, however, began to have doubts about the spiritual value of these practices and gradually ceased to attend the meetings, but he continued, as he tells us, to charm snakes by himself until he came into contact with Muḥammad al-Būzīdī, a shaykh of the Ḍarḳāwī-Shādhilī ṭarīḳa [see ḌARḲĀWA], who told him one day to bring a snake and charm it in front of him. When this had been done, he told him never to revert to the practice again but to devote himself to mastering the far more poisonous and intractable snake of his own soul. Having received him into his ṭarīḳa he forbade him to continue attending the course of lessons, on the grounds that tawḥīd was too transcendent for purely outward or mental understanding, and that it requires inward or intellectual understanding, to awaken which he told him to concentrate on the invocation of the Divine Name, dhikr Allāh. Later he authorized him to resume the lessons. He made him a muḳaddam, with authority to initiate novices into the order, at the age of 25.

On the death of the shaykh al-Būzīdī 15 years later, in 1909, the members of the order insisted that Aḥmad b. ʿAlīwa should be their shaykh. Some five years later he decided to make his zāwiya independent of the mother-zāwiya of the Darḳāwa in Morocco, and the new branch was styled al-Ṭarīḳa al-ʿAlawiyya al-Darḳāwiyya al-Shādhiliyya, whence he himself came to be known as the Shaykh al-ʿAlawī. One of the reasons for the "rupture", which seems to have taken place more or less amicably, was that he felt the need to introduce, as part of his method, the practice of spiritual retreat (khalwa [q.v.]) in an isolated cell under his close supervision rather than in the wilds of nature according to the traditional Darḳāwī-Shādhilī practice.

His fame spread over North Africa and a large zāwiya overlooking the sea was built at Tidgitt, the purely Arab quarter of Mostaganem. As perhaps the most eminent representative of Ṣūfism in his day, and looked upon by many as the mudjaddid (renewer) of Islam in its 14th century, he inevitably came into conflict with the enemies of Ṣūfism, in particular members of the "reformist" Salafiyya [q.v.] group. Partly as an antidote to their paper al-Shihāb, published at Constantine, he started a weekly review at Algiers, al-Balāgh al-Djazāʾirī, in which, in addition to his vindications of Ṣūfism, he attacked the so-called "reformers" for their continual yielding to the modern age at the expense of religion. For Muslims in general he stressed the importance of mastering classical Arabic, and inveighed against westernization and in particular against the wearing of modern European dress. Although he discouraged his fellow-countrymen from becoming naturalized French citizens, and although the amīr ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Khaṭṭābī [q.v.] was among his disciples and in correspondence with him, the French authorities avoided taking any drastic action against him personally; but they were uneasy about him, on account of his great influence, and at least once his movements were restricted. By the time of his death in 1934, he was said to have more than 200,000 disciples; he had zawāyā all over North Africa and also in Damascus [see AL-HĀSHIMĪ], Jaffa, Gaza, Falūja, Aden and Addis Ababa, and in Europe at The Hague, Marseilles, Paris and Cardiff. His numerous Yemenī disciples, many of them seamen, established also other zawāyā at various ports.

Aḥmad b. ʿAlīwa was a great lover of poetry and music. According to one of the many Europeans who knew him, "a remarkable radiance emanated from him, an irresistible personal magnetism"; according to another, to meet him was like "coming face to face, in mid-twentieth century, with a mediaeval Saint or a Semitic Patriarch". As regards the title of A. Berque's monograph on him, Un mystique moderniste (Revue Africaine, 1936, 691-776), the "modernism" appears to have been nothing other than the breadth of his spiritual interests : "To the very end he remained a lover of metaphysical investigation. There are few problems which he had not broached, scarcely any philosophies whose essence he had not extracted". This intellectual amplitude went hand in hand with a profound conservatism and an implacable orthodoxy. Especially characteristic of him is his insistence on the ideal of doing justice to the religion of Islam as an indivisible triplicity, islām, īmān and iḥsān (corresponding to law, dogma and mysticism) by fulfilling, in the highest sense, each domain, so that they become respectively istislām (joyous submission to the law), īḳān (certainty of faith) and ʿiyān (beatific vision). One of the Ḳurʾānic verses most often quoted by him is : "He is the First and the Last and the Outwardly Manifest and the Inwardly Hidden", a verse on which, amongst others, is grounded the basic doctrine of Islamic mysticism, waḥdat al-wudjūd [q.v.], Oneness of Being. Most of his writings, and not least his poems, contain masterly formulations of this doctrine.

Apart from one tract, Nūr al-ithmid, which is confined to the domain of jurisprudence (concerning the posture of the hands in the ritual prayer), his other writings, about 15 in all, are directly or indirectly on Ṣūfism. Of special importance is al-Minaḥ al-ḳuddūsiyya written during his shaykh's lifetime and with his encouragement, an extensive commentary on Ibn ʿĀshir's [q.v.] al-Murshid al-muʿīn. Here he expounds the inward or mystical significance of every feature of Islamic doctrine and ritual, including even details of the sunna. In al-Unmūdhadj al-farīd, using the symbolism of the letters of the alphabet, he treats of the highest aspect of the doctrine, expounding the relationship between the Divine Essence, Divine Being and the Supreme Spirit. The starting point for this treatise appears to be ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Djīlī's al-Kahf wa 'l-Raḳīm, but Aḥmad b. ʿAlīwa's treatment is the more subtle. In Lubāb al-ʿilm fī Sūrat Wa-'l-Nadjm, he explains the nature of the Prophet's two visions referred to in Ḳurʾān LIII, one with the heart (fuʾād) and the other with the eye (baṣar). These three works, together with his poems (the third edition of his Dīwān was published in Damascus in 1963), are perhaps the most profound of his writings. His earliest book in vindication of Ṣūfism, al-Ḳawl al-maʿrūf, first published in 1920, was followed up in 1927 by Risālat al-Nāṣir Maʿrūf, an anthology of pronouncements in praise of Ṣūfism by eminent jurists and theologians from the 2nd/8th until the present century. The first part of al-Mawādd al-ghaythiyya, his commentary on the aphorisms of Shuʿayb Abū Madyan, was published in 1942, but the second part has not yet been published, neither has his commentary on the Sūrat al-Fātiḥa and the first 40 verses of the Sūrat al-Baḳara, in which each verse is given four different interpretations ranging from the literal to the purely spiritual. The unique manuscripts of these unpublished works are at Mostaganem.

Bibliography: in addition to the works already mentioned: al-Shahāʾid wa 'l-fatāwī fīmā ṣaḥḥ laday al-ʿulamāʾ min amr al-shaykh al-ʿAlāwī (collected by Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Bāriʾ), Tunis 1925; F. IBN ʿALḲAMA, TAMMĀM, the name of two prominent figures in Muslim Spain during the early ʿUmayyad amirate. (1) Abū Ghālib Tammām b. ʿAlḳama, mawlā (freedman) of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam (i.e., ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUthmān b. Rabīʿa al-Thaḳafī, Muʿāwiya's governor of al-Kūfa in 58/678, Ṭabarī, ii, 181), came to al-Andalus in 123/741 with the vanguard (ṭalīʿa) of the Syrian contingent of Baldj b. Bishr al-Ḳushayrī [q.v.]. A Ḳaysī [see ḲAYS] through his connexion with Th̲aḳīf, Tammām b. ʿAlḳama was one of the chiefs who supported ʿAbd al-Raḥmān I, al-Dāk̲h̲il [q.v.], in the latter's successful bid (138/755) to re-establish Umayyad rule in al-Andalus after its eclipse in the East. Perhaps the most notable exploit of Tammām b. ʿAlḳama was his share, with the mawlā Badr, in the reduction of Ṭulayṭula [q.v.] (Toledo) in 147/764. Thereafter he was governor of Was̲h̲ḳa (Huesca), Ṭurṭūs̲h̲a (Tortosa) and Ṭarasūna (Tarazona), and died at an advanced age. towards the end of the amīrate of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān I's grandson, al-Ḥakam I. al-Rabaḍī (180/796-206/822).

(2) Tammām b. ʿAlḳama, more fully Tammām b. ʿĀmir b. Aḥmad b. G̲h̲ālib b. Tammām b. ʿAlḳama al-Th̲aḳafī, the direct descendant of (1), with whom he is often confused. He is said to have died at the age of 96 (lunar) years in 283/896, i.e., his birth should fall in 187/803, but is given as 194/809-10 by Abū Bakr al-Rāzī (cited Ibn al-Abbār). He served as wazīr to the Umayyads Muḥammad I [q.v.] (238/852-273/886), al-Mund̲h̲ir [q.v.] (273/886-275/888) and ʿAbd Allāh [q.v.] (275/888-300/912), the last of whom dismissed him. His celebrity is due, however, to his literary work, especially an urd̲j̲ūza (poem in the rad̲j̲az [q.v.] metre), which according to Ibn al-Abbār dealt with the conquest of al-Andalus by the Muslims, gave the names of the Spanish governors and Caliphs (sic: the Umayyad *amīr*s from ʿAbd al-Raḥmān I are apparently meant) and recounted the wars in al-Andalus from the entry of its conqueror Ṭāriḳ b. Ziyād [q.v.] to the last days of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān II [q.v.] (206/822-238/852), at which time it was probably composed (Dozy). Ibn al-Ḳūṭiyya's account of his ancestress, the Gothic princess Sarah (granddaughter of Witiza, the last ruler of the royal line of the Visigoths), appears to have come from the urd̲j̲ūza of Tammām b. ʿAlḳama, which is now lost. The few lines of poetry attributed to Tammām by Ibn al-Abbār are in a different metre and belong to a different work. Ibn Diḥya [q.v.] cites Tammām b. ʿAlḳama for the story of Yaḥyā b. Ḥakam, known as al-G̲h̲azāl [q.v.], stating that the former interrogated the latter, who was his older contemporary, on his journey to the court of the 'king of the Norsemen', but in view of the unreliable character of Ibn Diḥya this is not unexceptionable evidence either for the alleged journey, or for the existence of a work in prose by Tammām b. ʿAlḳama, in addition to those which have been mentioned.

IBN AL-ALḲAMĪ, Muʾayyad al-Dīn Muḥammad, the wazīr of al-Mustaʿṣim [q.v.], the last ʿAbbāsid caliph. He belonged to a S̲h̲īʿī family, which hailed, according to Ibn al-Ṭiḳṭaḳā, from the town of Nīl on the canal of the same name. The nisba al-ʿAlḳamī was first borne by his grandfather, who was so called after a canal he had dug and not, apparently, Alḳamī [q.v.], the western branch of the Euphrates. According to Hindū-S̲h̲āh he held the post of ustād̲h̲ al-dār at the time of al-Mustaʿṣim's accession. Ibn al-Ṭiḳṭaḳā, a fellow-S̲h̲īʿī, speaks of his distinction as a scholar, calligrapher and bibliophile and praises him for his statesmanlike qualities; but even he is constrained to admit to his treasonable correspondence with the Mongols prior to the attack on Bag̲h̲dād. His loyalty seems to have been alienated by the pillaging of the S̲h̲īʿī suburb of Kark̲h̲ [q.v.]. The extent of his treason it is difficult to assess. He was certainly at loggerheads with the military leaders in advocating a conciliatory attitude towards Hūlāgū [q.v.] but on the other hand one cannot credit the statements of D̲j̲ūzd̲j̲ānī that he deliberately denuded Bag̲h̲dād of troops or that he was personally responsible for the breach of the dyke which contributed to the disastrous defeat of the Caliph's army at Bas̲h̲īriyya. According to Ras̲h̲īd al-Dīn he was confirmed in his post as wazīr by the Mongols and, when he died on 2 D̲j̲umādā II 656/6 June 1258, was succeeded in that office by his son, S̲h̲araf al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAlī. On the other hand, Waṣṣāf speaks of his being passed over in favour of one Ibn ʿAmrān, a man of the people from Baḳʿūbā.

IBN AL-ʿALLĀF, Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Aḥmad b. Bas̲h̲s̲h̲ār b. Ziyād Ibn al-ʿAllāf (so called because his father was a seller of ḳatt) al-Nahrawānī, poet and traditionist who lived to be a hundred (218-318/833-930), becoming blind in his old age. He frequented the court at Bag̲h̲dād and was an intimate particularly of al-Muʿtaḍid and Ibn al-Muʿtazz. He knew much poetry and composed a great deal himself, so much indeed that his works, collected by a member of his family and accompanied by accounts of his relations with the persons on whom he had written panegyrics, occupied four hundred *waraḳa*s, if the Fihrist reading (Cairo ed., 238) is reliable.

Ibn al-ʿAllāf's fame however is based almost entirely on a ḳaṣīda of 65 verses (metre munsariḥ, rhyme -dī), including here and there gnomic verses in which he laments the death of his cat, killed by neighbours because it was about to eat their pigeons. This poem, which greatly interested al-Ṣāḥib Ibn ʿAbbād when it was recited to him by the poet's son, Abu'l-Ḥasan, is considered to be in fact an elegy on the death of Ibn al-Muʿtazz, who had been killed by al-Muḳtadir; it is also thought however that it alludes to the treatment inflicted on al-Muḥassin, the son of Ibn al-Furāt (see D. Sourdel, Vizirat, index). or on a slave of Ibn al-ʿAllāf.

IBN AMĀD̲J̲ŪR or IBN MĀD̲J̲ŪR, name of a family of astronomers from Farg̲h̲āna. The family consisted of the father, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAbd Allāh b. Amādjūr al-Turkī and of his son Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī, and also of a freedman of the latter named Mufliḥ. They worked at Baghdād and at Shīrāz between 272/885 and 321/933, making astronomical observations which have been in part preserved by Ibn Yūnus. The son devoted much of his attention to the determination of the limits of the latitude of the moon, observing that it reached greater latitudes than those given by Hipparchus (2nd century B.C.) and finding considerable differences between his own various determinations; this observation, which implies a knowledge of the variation of the plane of the moon's orbit, demonstrates how exact was Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī's work. The three astronomers collaborated in compiling the tables called al-Badīʿ, al-Mamarrat, al-Khāliṣ, al-Muzannar, and a version of the Sind-Hind, now lost, and some tables for Mars according to Persian chronology. Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAbd Allāh was the author of two other works: Djawāmiʿ aḥkām al-kusūfayn (Paris, Bibl. Nat. 5894 and Leiden 1107) and Zād al-musāfir (quoted by Ibn al-Ḳifṭī).

IBN AL-ʿAMĪD, the name of two viziers of the early Būyids, the first of them known also as a man of letters:

(1) Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad was the son of a pedlar or wheat merchant in the Shīʿī town of Ḳumm in central Iran who later became a kātib in Khurāsān, where he received the title of ʿamīd [q.v.] which was in this region usually given to high officials. He appears at Bukhārā (Mathālib, 232-6) at an unknown date, perhaps later than his appearance in 321/933 as vizier of Washmgīr [q.v.] in Rayy, and in 323 as one of the chief dignitaries of Mardāwīdj just before his assassination at Iṣfahān. It is not known under what circumstances his son became in 328/940 the vizier of one of the Būyids, the future Rukn al-Dawla [q.v.] (though it is known that the father was on friendly terms at Rayy with the latter's brother, the future ʿImād al-Dawla; but Abu 'l-Faḍl had quarrelled with his father). The chronicle does not mention his activity (whose double administrative and military character it emphasizes) until 339/950-1, when he foiled a conspiracy to set free the Musāfirid [q.v.] Marzubān, who had been imprisoned by Rukn al-Dawla; in the following year his intervention was chiefly responsible for the failure of the invasion of the Sāmānid general Ibn Ḳarategin; in 344/955-6 he organized the resistance to the invasion of Ibn Mākān, and in 435-6 to the revolt of the Daylamī Rūzbihān. Then again nothing is heard of him for ten years. For a time Rukn al-Dawla stationed him in Fārs with his young son, the future ʿAḍud al-Dawla [q.v.], and when the boy had grown up, Ibn al-ʿAmīd returned to Rayy to the now ageing Rukn al-Dawla. In this town, in 355/966, he succeeded in curbing the unruliness of an army of untrustworthy Khurāsānī *ghāzī*s passing through on their way to the Byzantine frontier; in 356 he reduced Ādharbaydjān to obedience to Rukn al-Dawla's ally, Ibrāhīm Sālār; he would however have preferred to persuade his prince to retain it and to make him its governor. Finally, in 359, he led an expedition against the Kurdish chief Ḥasanwayh [q.v.]. The illness which he contracted during it gave his son the opportunity to make demagogic overtures to the troops, disregarding his father's disapproval. He died at Hamadhān on 5 Ṣafar 360/9 December 970, having been vizier for 32 (lunar) years—a period whose length was to be exceeded later only by Niẓām al-Mulk.

Unfortunately practically nothing is known of his actual administration. Miskawayh, who had been his librarian, praises him, but in general terms only, for having been able to reorganize and maintain a regular system of administration in spite of the disorderly tendencies of the Daylamīs and of Rukn al-Dawla himself, and for having imposed discipline on the troops: it was probably because of his exceptional abilities in this last matter in particular that he enjoyed the apparently unshakeable confidence of his sovereign. The History of Ḳumm mentions during his period, though without naming him, measures in the stabilization of taxes which certainly correspond with his policy. According to Miskawayh, the letter which he wrote to Ibn Hindū on his appointment as governor of Fārs was a perfect summary of the duties and tasks of a good administrator.

Ibn al-ʿAmīd's reputation among his contemporaries and with posterity was not however due mainly to his administrative work but to the prestige which his intellectual and literary personality brought him among the circle of educated men which his office in effect permitted him to gather around him. The Fihrist lists only one genuine work written by him—a K. al-Madhhab fi 'l-balāgha, of which nothing is known; Abū Ḥayyān states that he has seen a K. al-Khalḳ wa 'l-khulūḳ by him but that it had not progressed beyond the stage of a rough draft. But his correspondence, if we are to believe Miskawayh, was so famous and considered so important as a model that there was scarcely a scribe who did not possess a copy of it: this makes it all the more strange that almost nothing of it has been directly preserved and that all that is known of it comes from quotations by Abū Ḥayyān, al-Thaʿālibī and Yāḳūt; even al-Ḳalḳashandī, though quoting so widely from his contemporary and rival Abū Isḥāḳ al-Ṣābiʾ, seems not to have known of it. So little being known, there should be pointed out ms. no 412, p. 449 of the Bihar Catalogue, a short recently copied collection of some of Ibn al-ʿAmīd's letters, which deserves study and suggests that an earlier manuscript may exist somewhere in India or elsewhere. The critics' opinions on Ibn al-ʿAmīd's literary worth depended however on what the writer considered to be the stylistic ideal and perhaps also on his personal relations with Ibn al-ʿAmīd: while he is praised by Miskawayh, and in the Yatīma there is found the formula which was later so often repeated according to which style "began with Ibn al-Ḥamīd and ended with Ibn al-ʿAmīd", Abū Ḥayyān considers him as the first corruptor of the language of al-Djāḥiẓ and prefers to him his son Abu 'l-Fatḥ and his rival mentioned above, Abū Isḥāḳ al-Ṣābiʾ. On the whole, the considerable influence exercised by Ibn al-ʿAmīd must have been due primarily to his prodigious memory in all matters, to his generosity (although Abū Ḥayyān accuses him also of avarice on various occasions), and to his friendly character. In letters, as in politics, he was the master less of his own son than of Ibn ʿAbbād [q.v.] and of ʿAḍud al-Dawla, who always referred to him as al-Ustādh al-Raʾīs.

Bibliography: See BŪYIDS. Apart from the Tadjārib of Miskawayh (to be completed by the Takmila of Hamadhānī, ed. A. Y. Kanʿān), the main sources are: the Mathālib al-Wazīrayn of Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī, ed. Ibrāhīm Kaylānī, Damascus 1961 (especially 55-6, and from 212 to the end), to be completed by the K. al-Imtāʿ wa 'l-muʾānasa, ed. Aḥmad Amīn, especially vol. i (index); and the Yatīma of Thaʿālibī. Yāḳūt's biography of Ibn al-ʿAmīd has not survived; that of Ibn Khallikān (no. 707, de Slane, iii, 256 f.) is based mainly on the Kitāb al-Wuzarāʾ of Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ, of which this part is lost, and the K. al-Tādjī of his ancestor mentioned above, Abū Isḥāḳ al-Ṣābiʾ. The article by Amedroz, Ibn al-ʿAmīd, in Isl., iii, 323-51, consists essentially of translations of the passages concerning him in the Tadjārib of Miskawayh, at that time unpublished. I have not been able to see the brochure of Khalīl Mardum, Ibn al-ʿAmīd, Aleppo 1931.

(2) ABU 'L-FATḤ ʿALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD . . ., born 337/948-9, son and successor of the above, who accompanied his father on the Kurdish campaign during which he died and during which Abu 'l-Fatḥ attracted attention, in spite of his father's disapproval, by his courting of the troops. He had the same intellectual qualities as Abu 'l-Faḍl and some writers even consider him to be a superior stylist, but he had the rashness and inexperience of youth and made the princes uneasy when his incautious expenditure in an attempt to form a personal following affected the regularity of the administration. The exhausted Rukn al-Dawla, wishing only for a quiet life, allowed him to take over his father's office, but he soon attracted the jealousy of ʿAḍud al-Dawla and of his brother, al-Muʾayyid. In 363/974-5 he took part, on the orders of Rukn al-Dawla, in ʿAḍud al-Dawla's campaign in ʿIrāḳ in support of his cousin Bakhtiyār [q.v.]. The latter's obvious inefficiency gave them the idea of making ʿIrāḳ into an apanage held by ʿAḍud, under his father's suzerainty, with Abu 'l-Fatḥ as vizier of this region. Abu 'l-Fatḥ, sent to sound the aged ruler on the matter, had great difficulty in pacifying him, Rukn al-Dawla attaching great importance to family solidarity and loyalty; nevertheless, ʿAḍud having left, Abu 'l-Fatḥ remained behind at Baghdād where he amused himself, amassed possessions, improved his relations with Bakhtiyār and his vizier Ibn Baḳiyya [q.v.], and received from the caliph, without Rukn al-Dawla's having asked for anything, the laḳab of Dhu 'l-kifāyatayn, in short gave the impression of following his own personal policy against the interests of Rukn and of ʿAḍud. ʿAḍud used him again in 365/976 to settle with his angry father questions concerning the succession; but in 366, Rukn being now dead, ʿAḍud intervened in ʿIrāḳ, while Abu 'l-Fatḥ, who had remained at Rayy, quarrelled there with the influential counsellor of al-Muʾayyid, Ibn ʿAbbād [q.v.], whom he feared and tried to get removed and even killed, and finally, on the orders of ʿAḍud, al-Muʾayyid's suzerain, was arrested, tortured and put to death. The family, of whom no other members are known, does not seem to have played after this any role of importance.

Bibliography: See BŪYIDS and the above article on Abu 'l-Faḍl; there is a long biography on Abu 'l-Fatḥ in the Irshād of Yāḳūt, v, 347-73, based on the chronicle or the K. al-Wuzarāʾ of Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ, a Taʾrīkh of al-Ābī, and an account by Abū Ḥayyān which I have not been able to find either in the Mathālib or in the Imtāʿ (both of which include several paragraphs on Abu 'l-Fatḥ—see index); the life of Abu 'l-Fatḥ in Ibn Khallikān is also based on the Wuzarāʾ, and on the Tādjī of Abū Isḥāḳ al-Ṣābiʾ; see also the correspondence of the latter (ed. in part by Shakīb Arslan) and J. Chr. Bürgel, Die Hofkorrespondenz ʿAdud ad-Daulas, 1965; the Yatīma contains nothing about him. (CL. CAHEN)

IBN ʿĀMIR, ABŪ ʿUMAR ʿABD ALLĀH B. ʿĀMIR AL-YAḤṢUBĪ, "reader" of the Ḳurʾān whose ḳirāʾa [q.v.] is counted among the seven canonical "readings". Of south Arabian origin, he belonged to the first class of the Tābiʿūn [q.v.], his guarantors being ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, Abu 'l-Dardāʾ [q.v.] and other less famous Companions. He settled in Damascus, where he was appointed ḳāḍī by al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik and chief of police by Yazīd b. al-Walīd and Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd; his "reading" was adopted by the inhabitants of Damascus. He died in 118/736, having had as direct disciples his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and especially Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥārith al-Dhimārī (d. 145/762), whom Ibn Ḳutayba (Maʿārif, 530) includes among the authors of canonical "readings", while mentioning Ibn ʿĀmir only incidentally. His reading was transmitted indirectly by ʿAbd Allāh b. Aḥmad b. Dhakwān (d. 241/856) and the ḳāḍī of Damascus, Hishām b. ʿAmmār al-Sulamī (d. 245/859).

Among others of the same name, the best known is ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿĀmir b. Kurayz [q.v.].

IBN ʿAMĪRA, ABU 'L-MUṬARRIF AḤMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-MAKHZŪMĪ, writer, poet and judge, who was born in Valencia (Spain) in Ramaḍān 580/December 1184, and died in Tunis in Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 656 or 658/December 1258 or November 1260 (his grandfather's name is given as ʿUmayra in the Djadhwat al-iḳtibās of Ibn al-Ḳāḍī, 72). His family originated in Alcira (Djazīrat Shuḳr), near Valencia. He studied with the best Andalusian scholars and then travelled probably to the East where he acquired an immense knowledge of fiḳh, ḥadīth and literature, and also gained some acquaintance with certain branches of the speculative sciences (maʿḳūlāt), philosophy, kalām, etc.

On his return, he settled for a time in his native town, where he became one of the local dignitaries. It was there that he started a life-long friendship with Ibn al-Abbār [q.v.]. Shortly afterwards, he became a judge at Jativa, and he must have held the same position in Majorca in about 627/1229-30, for he was present in the island when it was conquered by James I of Aragon (Jaime el Conquistador); he wrote an account of the event in a book, the title of which is unknown and which is always referred to as Kitāb ʿan kāʾinat Mayyūrḳa; this is his most famous work, and al-Maḳḳarī (Analectes, ii, 765-6) reproduces long passages from it. From there he must have returned to Valencia, where he witnessed the last years of its history as a Muslim town, until it surrendered, also to James I, nine years after Majorca (17 Ṣafar 636/28 September 1238). His native town being lost, he crossed the Straits to Morocco and entered the service of Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd al-Wāḥid al-Rashīd, the tenth Almohad caliph (630-40/1232-42), who appointed him secretary in the Chancellery. A little later, he was appointed ḳāḍī of the Hilāna tribe, and then transferred to Salé; in the following reign he appears as a ḳāḍī in Meknès. Later, he moved to Ceuta and from there to Ifrīḳiya, where he entered the service of the Ḥafṣids, in Tunis. He was appointed ḳāḍī, first of al-Urbus, then of Gabès; al-Mustanṣir bi'llāh (647-75/1249-76) made him one of his advisers, and he became his favourite courtier until his death, on 20 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 658/26 November 1260.

Ibn ʿAmīra was a prolific writer of both prose and verse; the sources named in the bibliography reproduce an abundance of material, mostly in the form of official State letters and letters addressed to friends. Even his book on the fall of Majorca was a risāla addressed to some particular person. His prose is sober, eloquent, beautiful and precise, but is surpassed in these qualities by that of his contemporary Ibn al-Abbār. His poetry is better than his prose. The only work to have survived under his name is al-Tibyān fī ʿilm al-kalām (MS Escorial 296), and it seems in fact that this and the work on Majorca are the only books that he wrote, although several others have been attributed to him.

IBN ʿAMMĀR, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad, faḳīh and poet, known at the present time in Algeria under the name of Sīdī Ben ʿAmmār. It is not known where or when he was born and nothing is known of his childhood, his youth and his early studies. He is said to have learned ḥadīth from Abū Ḥafṣ ʿUmar b. ʿAḳīl (or ʿUḳāyl) al-Yāʿalawī (sic) or al-Bāʿalawī (probably al-Yaʿlāwī, i.e., of the Banī Yaʿlā, a tribe of the lesser Kabylie) al-Makkī, who died in 1170/1756; he is said to have studied more particularly the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī under masters (?) whose line went back to Abū ʿUthmān Saʿīd b. Aḥmad al-Maḳḳarī, a former muftī of Tlemcen (928/1521-1011/1602). He is said, furthermore, to have been initiated into the precepts of the fraternity of the Shādhiliyya by Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad al-Munawwar al-Tilimsānī, a disciple of Mḥammad b. Nāṣir al-Darʿī, and to have received his mystical education from a second line of masters going back to the Egyptian ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-ʿAfīfī.

For his literary education and notably for the composition of muwashshaḥāt his masters are said to have been two well-known Algerians, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad al-Mandjallātī and Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, known nowadays in Algeria by the name of Sīdī Ben ʿlī.

In 1166/1752 he decided to perform the ḥadjdj and, six years later, after a stay in Cairo, withdrew to the Ḥidjāz to end his days there as a mudjāwir [q.v.]. According to certain indications, he was still alive in 1204/1789, and his death allegedly occurred in Mecca between this date and 1211/1796. This is all that is known of his life and studies. In Algiers he held the post of Mālikī muftī for a long time and taught ḥadīth.

Among his pupils or listeners is named Aḥmad al-Ghazzāl al-Djazāʾirī, who transmitted, in a ḳaṣīda of twenty verses, the memory left by the breadth of his knowledge and the quality of his teaching.

Of his written works the following titles are known: (1) a dīwān of verse; (2) Liwāʾ al-naṣr fī fuḍalāʾ al-ʿaṣr; (3) Risāla fī 'l-ṭarīḳa al-khalwatiyya; (4) Niḥlat al-labīb bi-akhbār al-riḥla ila 'l-ḥabīb.

Only the introduction of the last work has survived, and nothing more is known of it; it is principally from this introduction that we draw the preceding remarks on the personality and works of Ibn ʿAmmār, who, for his time, is indisputably both an ʿālim and a faḳīh, an adīb, a poet and something of a mystic. Without completely neglecting the "humanities" of the Middle East, his interest, in all fields, is obviously centred on the Arabo-Islamic West. As a muftī he willingly follows Ibn al-Djazarī [q.v.], Ibn Marzūḳ [q.v.], al-Raṣṣāʿ, al-Wansharīsī [q.v.]; as an adīb he admires al-Shaḳrāṭisī, al-Tanasī, Yaḥyā Ibn Khaldūn, al-Ḳaysī, Ibn al-Khaṭīb and Ibn Zamrak, and he may be considered a disciple of al-Fatḥ Ibn Khāḳān [q.v.].

IBN ʿAMMĀR, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Ḥusayn b. ʿAmmār, poet and vizier of al-Andalus. Born in 422/1031 in a village near Silves, he belonged to a poor and obscure family and his claim to be of Yemenī origin is doubtful. After beginning his studies at Silves, he received at Cordova an advanced literary education and then tried to make his literary talent pay, travelling throughout Spain in search of patrons. Nothing appears to have survived of his first panegyrics, addressed, it seems without much success, to various Andalusian petty kings, especially as he is said to have himself destroyed the works of his youth. In 445/1053, he arrived at Seville and decided to present himself to the local ruler, al-Muʿtaḍid [q.v.], who had just gained some military successes and was eager to have his exploits praised in writing. Seizing this opportunity, Ibn ʿAmmār addressed to him a panegyric in which he praised his valour and bravery, attacked his Berber enemies and expressed the desire that his own talent should be rewarded. Al-Muʿtaḍid, beguiled by these praises, appointed Ibn ʿAmmār a court poet and adopted him as a companion in his pleasures; this was for him the beginning of an eventful career, which was, however, always linked with the ʿAbbādids. At the court he became the friend of the prince Muḥammad, accompanying him to Silves when the prince was made governor there; but as he pandered to the desires of his friend, disagreeable rumours began to circulate about the two young men and al-Muʿtaḍid, mistrusting their friendship, recalled his son to Seville in 450/1058 and commanded the poet to leave the kingdom. Ibn ʿAmmār then sought refuge in Saragossa, whence he addressed poems to the ruler of Seville and to his vizier, Ibn Zaydūn [q.v.], in a vain attempt to make them relent. He had to wait until the death of al-Muʿtaḍid and the succession of his friend Muḥammad (who took the title al-Muʿtamid) in 461/1069 before being recalled to Seville.

From then on Ibn ʿAmmār gave up poetry to some extent in order to devote himself to politics, in an effort to play a prominent part in Muslim Spain. Soon after his return he was appointed governor of Silves and later became al-Muʿtamid's chief minister. In 462/1070, he took part in the annexing to the kingdom of Seville of the town of Cordova, which became the seat of the court; the following year he got rid of Ibn Zaydūn, whom he considered as his rival, by sending him back to Seville; he struggled successfully against the favourite Iʿtimād, who was hostile to him, and succeeded in dominating the ruler completely and practically directing the state. He then advocated a policy of expansion based on the support of the Christians, i.e., of Alfonso VI, with whom he strengthened the relations of Seville to such an extent that he was even considered a traitor. His manoeuvres to take Granada with the help of Alfonso VI failed however, and his first action against Murcia (Tudmīr) had no greater success. This attempt was part of a plan which he had conceived in order to gain possession of the town for himself personally; he therefore set himself up as independent governor of Murcia as soon as he had succeeded in taking possession of it, with the help of Ibn Ras̲h̲īḳ [q.v.], in 471/1078. Taking advantage of this victory, he turned to Toledo, leaving behind in Murcia Ibn Ras̲h̲īḳ, who in turn betrayed him and declared himself independent. Dispossessed of his short-lived conquest, Ibn ʿAmmār took refuge once again at Saragossa with Muʾtamin Ibn Hūd [q.v.], in whose name he took part in a number of successful expeditions; he was, however, captured at Segura in Rabīʿ I 477/August 1084, and, forced to abandon all political activity, returned to poetry. While in captivity, he wrote some moving poems in which he implores the help of al-Muʿtamid, but the latter had a score to settle and, instead of simply ransoming him, decided to make sure of his person by buying him. Ibn ʿAmmār was brought back to Cordova in chains and paraded on a donkey, then taken to Seville, where he suffered the most degrading humiliations. In spite of interventions on his behalf, al-Muʿtamid stood firm and did not allow himself to be swayed again by the pleas which Ibn ʿAmmār addressed to him from prison; nevertheless, the poems with which he tried to soften the heart of his former friend are marked by strong emotion and certainly such as to touch al-Muʿtamid's feelings, to the extent that he seemed at one time to be on the point of yielding and granting pardon, but his prisoner made a blunder which was skilfully exploited by his enemies, in particular by the son of Ibn Zaydūn, who had taken his father's place, and al-Muʿtamid in a passion of anger cut off Ibn ʿAmmār's head with one blow of an axe (479/1086).

As regards his character, Ibn ʿAmmār is accorded in Spain the fame which he deserves; his intelligence and especially his unbounded ambition made him a dangerous and much-feared person, who knew too well how to attract people by charm of manner and conversation. His behaviour towards al-Muʿtamid is judged with severity but does not prevent the critics from recognizing his poetic talent. His poetry, very personal in inspiration and composed with remarkable technical skill, is indisputably gifted and original, but his satires are bitter and his panegyrics often lacking in dignity.

His Dīwān was much read in Spain, where it appeared in the two recensions, now lost, of Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Muḥ. b. Yūsuf al-Tamīmī and of Abu 'l-Ḳāsim al-S̲h̲ilbī; besides, Ibn Bassām included the poems from it which were considered the best in his Nuk̲h̲bat al-ik̲h̲tiyār fī as̲h̲ʿār D̲h̲i 'l-wizāratayn Ibn ʿAmmār, which is also lost. Recently, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn K̲h̲āliṣ made an attempt to reconstruct it in a thèse complémentaire presented at the Sorbonne in 1953, also devoting to the poet a long chapter in his thèse principale on La vie littéraire à Séville au XIe siècle; the data thus collected were published in Bag̲h̲dād in 1957 under the title of Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār al-Andalusī.

IBN AL-AʿRĀBĪ, MUḤAMMAD B. ZIYĀD, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH, philologian of the school of Kūfa, who is said to have been the son of a slave from Sind who became a mawlā of al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī al-Hās̲h̲imī. Born at Kūfa in 150/767, he was the pupil principally of al-Kisāʾī [q.v.], of Abū Muʿāwiya al-Ḍarīr, of al-Ḳāsim b. Maʿn al-Masʿūdī (see Fihrist, Cairo, 103) and of al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍabbī [q.v.], who had married his mother and whose Mufaḍḍaliyyāt he handed on; and he in his turn had many disciples, among them T̲h̲aʿlab [q.v.], Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī and Ibn al-Sikkīt [q.v.], besides Saʿīd b. Salm b. Ḳutayba, whose teacher he was. His biographers praise his learning in grammar, lexicography, genealogies and poetry, and he is said to have dictated from memory, without having to refer to any book, enough material to have loaded several camels. Al-D̲j̲āḥiẓ, who knew him at Bag̲h̲dād or at Sāmarrā, quotes him often as a rāwī, without, it seems, resenting his ill-natured attack on the Baṣra scholars Abū ʿUbayda and al-Aṣmaʿī, who, he maintained, knew nothing. He claims to have received from the mouth of the Bedouins many facts which contradict the affirmations of al-Aṣmaʿī, but he himself indulges in fanciful interpretations and accepts curious grammatical rules, to the extent that his critics have easily been able to point out proofs of his ignorance, even in the domains where he is considered a master.

Afflicted with both a squint and a limp (Muḥ. b. Ḥabīb calls him also al-Aʿradj), he seems not to have had a very distinguished career, but his learning nevertheless met with some success, since audiences of more than one hundred crowded to his classes. At Sāmarrā, al-Wāthiḳ resorted to him for the solution of a philological problem, which proves that he enjoyed quite a wide reputation. In spite of his hostility towards the Muʿtazilīs, it was Aḥmad b. Abī Duʾād [q.v.] himself who led the funeral prayer at his grave, on 13 Shaʿbān 231/14 April 846 (but the date of his death varies from 230 to 233), at Sāmarrā.

About twenty works are attributed to him: K. al-Nawādir, K. al-Anwāʾ, K. Ṣifat al-nakhl, K. Ṣifat al-zarʿ, K. al-Khayl, K. Taʾrīkh al-ḳabāʾil, K. Maʿāni ʾl-shiʿr, K. Tafsīr al-amthāl (Fihrist: al-Ḳabāʾil, but that is an error), K. al-Nabāt, K. al-Alfāẓ, K. Nasab al-khayl, K. Nawādir al-Zubayriyyīn, K. Nawādir Banī Faḳʿas, K. al-Dhubāb (transmitted by al-Sukkarī), K. al-Nabt wa ʾl-baḳl, and others listed by Brockelmann. Only a few of these have survived, a K. al-Fāḍil fi ʾl-adab, a collection of elegies published by Wright (Op. ar., 97-122), a K. al-Biʾr (Cairo, vii, 652) [see BIʾR], and the K. Asmāʾ khayl al-ʿArab wa-fursānihā, which must correspond to the K. Nasab al-khayl mentioned above (ed. G. Levi Della Vida, Les "Livres des Chevaux", Leyden 1928); on his recension of al-Akhṭal's Dīwān, see AL-AKHṬAL.

IBN AL-ʿARABĪ, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-MAʿĀFIRĪ, a traditionist belonging to Seville; b. 468/1076, d. 543/1148. In 485/1092 he travelled with his father to the East, and spent periods studying in Damascus and Baghdād. In 489/1096 he performed the Pilgrimage, after which he returned to Baghdād and studied under Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī and others. He then went with his father to Egypt and met traditionists in Cairo and Alexandria. After his father's death in 493/1100 he returned to Seville, where he was credited with encyclopaedic knowledge. He wrote books on a variety of subjects, including ḥadīth, fiḳh, uṣūl, Ḳurʾān studies, adab, grammar, and history. A long list of his writings is given by Maḳḳarī, Analectes, i, 483 f. Among them is ʿĀriḍa al-Aḥwadhī, a commentary on al-Tirmidhī's collection of traditions. Many of his works are no longer extant. In Seville he acted as ḳāḍī for a time, acquiring a reputation for severity towards evildoers and kindness towards humble people. He later resigned this post and devoted himself to scholarship, both teaching and writing. When the Muwaḥḥids entered Seville he and others were taken to Marrākush where he was imprisoned for about a year. He died while on a journey from Marrākush to Fez, where he was buried. Maḳḳarī says a ziyāra came to be held at his tomb, which he himself had visited several times. While Ibn al-ʿArabī was generally highly commended, everyone did not accept him as an authority on ḥadīth. He has been called thiḳa (trustworthy) and thabat (reliable), but the ḳāḍī ʿIyāḍ b. Mūsā (d. 544/1149), a contemporary who heard traditions from him, said people criticized his traditions, and Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī (d. 852/1449) has called him ḍaʿīf (weak).

IBN AL-ʿARABĪ, MUḤYI ʾL-DĪN ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ʿALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ʿARABĪ AL-ḤĀTIMĪ AL-ṬĀʾĪ, known as al-Shaykh al-Akbar (560/1165-638/1240), was one of the greatest Ṣūfīs of Islam. He is usually referred to—incorrectly—as Ibn ʿArabī, without the article, to distinguish him from Ibn al-ʿArabī, Abū Bakr [q.v.]; in Turkey he is often referred to as "Muḥyi ʾl-Dīn ʿArabī"; whereas some sources (e.g., al-Kutubī, Fawāt al-wafayāt, Cairo 1951, ii, 487) give his kunya as Abū Bakr, in autograph notes he refers to himself only as Abū ʿAbd Allāh.

Life. He was born at Murcia on 27 Ramaḍān 560/7 August 1165 (see the note by Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Ḳūnawī, reproduced by A. Ateş, in TV, n.s. i/1 (16) (1955), Pl. XXV), of a family claiming descent from Ḥātim al-Ṭāʾī [q.v.]; some Ṣūfī adepts were numbered among his near relations. When he was eight, his father moved to Seville, where Ibn al-ʿArabī began his formal education; as a young man he is said to have acted as kātib to various governors (al-Maḳḳarī, Nafḥ al-ṭīb, i, 568). At an early age, in the course of an illness, he enjoyed a vision (Futūḥāt, iv, 552) which changed the course of his life, leading him to regard his earlier years as a period of djāhiliyya (Futūḥāt, i, 207); the genuineness of this "conversion" much impressed his father's friend the philosopher Ibn Rushd [q.v.], the ḳāḍī of Seville (Futūḥāt, i, 170). Although Ibn al-ʿArabī claimed that his maʿrifa was communicated to him with no intermediary, he notes in his works the names of many shaykhs whom he served and whose company he sought, among them: Abū Djaʿfar al-ʿUraynī (Rūḥ al-ḳuds [no. 8, below], fol. 41; Futūḥāt, iii, 589, 596, etc.); Abū Yaʿḳūb al-Ḳaysī, a disciple of Abū Madyan [q.v.] (Rūḥ al-ḳuds, fol. 43); Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAdawī, skilled at revealing the future; Abu ʾl-Ḥadjdjādj Yūsuf, etc. (Rūḥ al-ḳuds, fols. 46-73), and two women: Fāṭima bint al-Muthannā and Shams Umm al-Fuḳarāʾ. Although he refers to Abū Madyan (d. 598/1193) as his "shaykh", in fact he never met him personally (Rūḥ al-ḳuds, fol. 66).

Ibn al-ʿArabī spent some ten years in various towns of Spain and North Africa with these teachers, but until 590/1194 Seville remained his home. In that year, at the age of 30, he went to Tunis to join a certain ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Mahdawī (Rūḥ al- ḳuds, fol. 33). In the next year he went to Fez, where in 594/1198 he wrote his K. al-Isrāʾ (no. 3, below). In 595/1199 he was in Cordova, where he attended the funeral of Ibn Rus̲h̲d, and later at Almeria, where he wrote his Mawāḳiʿ al-nud̲j̲ūm (no. 7 below) (Nafḥ al-ṭīb, i, 576); in 598/1202 he was back in Tunis and then, travelling via Cairo and Jerusalem, set out to perform the Pilgrimage (Rūḥ al-ḳuds, fol. 63 v.). Deeply moved by the sight of the Kaʿba, for him the point of contact between the worlds of the invisible (g̲h̲ayb) and the visible (s̲h̲uhūd), he stayed for two years at Mecca, frequently performing the ṭawāf, reading and meditating, and enjoying many mystic visions and dreams. It was here that he wrote his Tād̲j̲ al-rasāʾil (no. 6), his Rūḥ al-ḳuds (no. 8), and began, in 598/1202, his great al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyya (no. 1); here too he addressed to ʿAyn al-S̲h̲ams Niẓām, the daughter of an Iṣfahānī resident in Mecca, the poems collected in a dīwān entitled Tard̲j̲umān al-as̲h̲wāḳ (no. 13).

In 600/1204 he met at Mecca a number of Anatolian pilgrims from Konya and Malatya, led by Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Ḳūnawī's father, Mad̲j̲d al-Dīn Isḥāḳ, who was then living in Syria; he accompanied them on their homeward journey, via Bag̲h̲dād and Mosul (where they stayed for some months), reaching Malatya by D̲h̲u 'l-Ḳaʿda 601/June-July 1205. The Sultan of Konya, Kay-K̲h̲usraw I [q.v.], now restored to his throne, invited Mad̲j̲d al-Dīn to re-join him (Ibn Bībī, facs. 91 f.; tr. Duda, 41 f.); the latter brought Ibn al-ʿArabī with him, and the Sultan loaded both with gifts (Nafḥ al-ṭīb, i, 569; Futūḥāt, iii, 126, 255). In the next years we find Ibn al-ʿArabī again travelling—to Jerusalem, Cairo, and Mecca—but in 606/1209-10 he was back in Konya, where in that year he wrote his Risālat al-anwār. In 608/1211-2 he was again in Bag̲h̲dād, perhaps accompanying Mad̲j̲d al-Dīn, who had been sent to the Caliphal court to announce the accession of Kay-Kāʾūs I. To this new ruler Ibn al-ʿArabī addressed a letter of practical advice in religious matters (text in Futūḥāt, iv, 604 f.).

In the following years he visited Aleppo (where he began the S̲h̲arḥ (no. 14) to his Tard̲j̲umān al-as̲h̲wāḳ, completing it in Aksaray in 612/1215) and Sivas (where he had a dream foretelling Kay-Kāʾūs's re-capture of Antalya), but from 612/1216 onwards he lived mainly at Malatya. Here his son Saʿd al-Dīn Muḥammad was born, in 618/1221. The report that he married the widow of his old friend Mad̲j̲d al-Dīn seems doubtful: at least the latter's son Ṣadr al-Dīn (b. 606/1209-10) and Ibn al-ʿArabī do not speak of each other as step-son and step-father.

It is not known why, or when, Ibn al-ʿArabī finally left Anatolia to settle at Damascus, where he is first found living in 627/1230. Here he probably experienced some discomfort, exposed to the criticisms of the orthodox but finding protectors in the Ibn Zakī family of ḳāḍīs (Ibn Kat̲h̲īr, al-Bidāya wa 'l-nihāya, Cairo n.d., xiii, 156) and in members of the Ayyūbid ruling family. He led a quiet life of reading and teaching, composing, as the result of a dream in 627/1229, his most influential work, the Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam (no. 2 below), and completing and revising, from 630/1233 onwards, his Futūḥāt. A tradition (Nafḥ al-ṭīb, i, 581, from al-Yāfiʿī [q.v.]) that towards the end of his life Ibn al-ʿArabī forbade the reading of his works is belied by the facts that he heard and approved the text of his Kitāb al-Asfār (no. 10) only 20 days before his death (A. Ateş, in Bell., xvi/61 (1952), 87), and that his disciple Ṣadr al-Dīn, who was with him in his last days, spent his life in teaching and commenting on his master's works. Ibn al-ʿArabī died, in the house of the ḳāḍī Muḥyi 'l-Dīn Ibn al-Zakī, on 28 Rabīʿ II 638/16 November 1240, and was buried in that family's turba on the slopes of Mount Ḳāsiyūn.

Ibn al-ʿArabī married several wives and presumably had many children, but only two of his sons are known: Saʿd al-Dīn Muḥammad, b. 618/1221 in Malatya, d. 656/1258 in Damascus, a poet (al-Kutubī, Fawāt al-wafayāt, ii, 325 (which, however, gives the date of his death as 686); Nafḥ al-ṭīb, i, 572; Brockelmann, I, 583), and ʿImād al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh, d. 667/1269 in Damascus (Nafḥ al-ṭīb, loc.cit.).

The Ottoman Sultan Selīm I, during his stay in Damascus after his Egyptian campaign (923-4/1517-8), ordered the rebuilding of the turba where Ibn al-ʿArabī was buried, and the construction nearby of a mosque and a takkiyya (H. Laoust, Les gouverneurs de Damas ..., Damascus 1952, 148-50; cf. Ferīdūn, Muns̲h̲aʾāt[1], i, 404, 441, 444; Saʿd al-Dīn, ii, 379); on this occasion a fatwā lauding Ibn al-ʿArabī was given by Kemāl-Pas̲h̲a-zāde [q.v.] (text in S̲h̲ad̲h̲arāt, v, 195).

Works. Ibn al-ʿArabī was certainly the most prolific of all Ṣūfī writers; although Brockelmann (I, 571-82, S I, 791-802) lists no less than 239 works (perhaps with some duplication of works with differing titles), he was unable to avail himself fully of the rich resources of the libraries of Istanbul and Anatolia—the investigation of which still remains incomplete. Ibn al-ʿArabī himself did not know how many works he had written; at the request of his friends he endeavoured to draw up a list, of which three (conflicting) versions survive: (1) Fihrist (Konya, MS Yusuf Ağa 4989, pp. 378-89, on which see A Ateş, in TV, n.s. i/1 (16) (1955), 155-6), written by Ṣadr al-Dīn before 627/1230, is incomplete; (2) a MS of 1337/1918-9 (copied from one of 639/1241-2) lies behind Kurkīs al-ʿAwwād, Fihrist muʾallafāt Muḥyi 'l-Dīn b. ʿArabī, in Mad̲j̲allat al-Mad̲j̲maʿ al-ʿIlmī al-ʿArabī, xxix (Damascus 1954), 344-59, 527-36, xxx (1955), 51-60, 268-80, 395-410; this lists 248 works, some said to be uncompleted; (3) the id̲j̲āza which Ibn al-ʿArabī gave to the Ayyūbid G̲h̲āzī b. al-Malik al-ʿĀdil in 632/1234 (see Ahlwardt, Verzeichniss ..., iv, 77, no. 2992/4) mentions 289 works. [Osman Yahia (see bibl.) lists no fewer than 846 items.] Altogether there seems little doubt that Ibn al-ʿArabī is the author of some 400 works; some of these, as he himself said (K. al-ʿAwwād, op. cit., xxix, 355, 527, 534), had been given away to others, some were in circulation, some he still retained, waiting for God's command to release them. Many of Ibn al-ʿArabī's books, both those written by himself and those owned by him, passed to Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Ḳūnawī, who left them as waḳf to the library which he founded at Konya; in spite of later neglect, many of these survive in the Yusuf Ağa Library at Konya and in other Turkish libraries; and in what follows, especial emphasis will be laid on these and other exceptionally authoritative manuscripts.

Ibn al-ʿArabī's production was not only in the field of taṣawwuf, but his other works are not known to survive: among these are an abridgement of the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim and a K. Miftāḥ al-saʿāda, a compilation of the traditions collected by Muslim and al-Buk̲h̲ārī; an abridgement of Ibn Ḥazm's al-Muḥallā was apparently known to Ḥād̲j̲d̲j̲ī K̲h̲alīfa (Kas̲h̲f al-ẓunūn, ii, 1617).

Of his ṣūfī works, the most important are:

(1) al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyya fī asrār al-mālikiyya wa 'l-mulkiyya (Brockelmann[2], no. 10). The autograph text of the second recension, in 37 volumes dated 633-7/1235-9, is preserved in Istanbul, MSS Türk-Islâm Eserleri Müzesi 1845-81; several printed eds.: 1269, 1294, 1329. The work was begun in Mecca in 598/1201 and finished (according to one tradition) in 629/1231. In six faṣl subdivided into 560 bāb, it contains a full exposition of the author's ṣūfī doctrine. A commentary on its difficult passages was written by ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Djīlī (d. 832/1428; Brockelmann, S II, 283), and there are abridgements by (ʿAbd al-Wahhāb) al-Shaʿrānī [q.v.] (d. 973/1565): Lawāḳiḥ al-anwār ... (Cairo 1311); al-Kibrīt al-aḥmar ... (Cairo 1277); al-Yawāḳīt wa 'l-djawāhir ... (Cairo 1277, 1305, 1321).

(2) Fuṣūṣ al-ḥikam wa khuṣūṣ al-kilam (Brockelmann [2], no. 11). MS written by Ṣadr al-Dīn in 630/1232-3, read to and corrected by the author, in Istanbul, MS Türk-Islâm Eserleri Müzesi 1933. This summary of the teaching of 28 prophets from Adam to Muḥammad, dictated to the author at Damascus by the Prophet in a dream, has been frequently printed: Cairo 1252, Istanbul 1897, Cairo 1304, 1309, 1321, 1329, etc. Abridged Eng. tr.: Sahib Khaja Khan, Wisdom of the Prophets ..., Madras 1929; partial Fr. tr.: T. Burckhardt, La sagesse des prophètes, Paris 1955; Turkish tr. in the series Şark-islâm Klasikleri (no. 27), by Nûrî Genç Osman, Istanbul 1952. Brockelmann lists no less than 35 commentaries, the most important of which are (a) Ibn al-ʿArabī's own Miftāḥ al-Fuṣūṣ, (b) Ṣadr al-Dīn's al-Fukūk fī mustanadāt Ḥikam al-fuṣūṣ (see Osman Ergin, in Şarkiyat Mecmuası, ii (1957), 75); those by (c) ʿAfīf al-Dīn al-Tilamsānī (d. 690/1291; Brockelmann, I, 300), and (d) ʿAbd al-Razzāḳ al-Kāshānī (d. 736/1335; Brockelmann, S II, 280); (e) the Maṭlaʿ Khuṣūṣ al-kilam of Dāwūd al-Ḳayṣarī (d. 751/1350; Brockelmann, II, 299); (f) the Naḳd al-nuṣūṣ of Djāmī [q.v.], etc.

(3) K. al-Isrāʾ ilā maḳām al-asrā (Brockelmann [2], no. 15). MS Veliyüddin (Istanbul, Bayezid Public Library) 1628, dated 633/1235-6, was read to the author. Printed: Ḥaydarābād 1367/1948. A short work, written in rhyming prose (sadjʿ) in Fez in 594/1198, it describes Ibn al-ʿArabī's "miʿrādj" from the world of being (kawn) to the station (mawḳif) in God's presence. Commentaries by (a) his disciple Ismāʿīl b. Sawdakīn al-Nūrī (d. 646/1248; Brockelmann, I, 582), (b) Sitt al-ʿAdjam bint al-Nafīs, and (c) Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn al-Munāwī.

(4) Muḥāḍarāt al-abrār wa musāmarāt al-akhyār (Brockelmann [2], no. 128). MS Istanbul, Topkapısarayı Ahmed III 2145 is dated 711/1311-2; printed: Cairo 1282 (lith.), 1305, 1324. This two volume collection of anecdotes contains some spurious additions, but the authorship of the basic work is certain.

(5) Kalām al-ʿAbādila (Brockelmann [2], no. 126). MS dated 641/1243-4: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4859/2; same date: Istanbul, Aya Sofya 4817/1; MS dated 663/1264-5: Istanbul, Köprülü 713/3 (copied from the autograph); a collection of "sayings" attributed to numerous (imaginary) personages named "ʿAbd Allāh".

(6) Tādj al-rasāʾil wa minhādj al-wasāʾil (Brockelmann [2], no. 54). MS dated 613/1216-7 and 616/1219-20, "heard" by the author: Istanbul, Veliyüddin 1759/1; 764/1362-3: Istanbul, Aya Sofya 4875, fols. 130-46; printed: Cairo 1328. A set of eight letters recounting his spiritual conversations with the Kaʿba while in Mecca in 600/1203-4.

(7) Mawāḳiʿ al-nudjūm wa maṭāliʿ aḥillat al-asrār wa 'l-ʿulūm (Brockelmann [2], no. 18); composed 595/1199 at Almeria; printed: Cairo 1325.

(8) R. Rūḥ al-ḳuds fī munāṣaḥat al-nafs (Brockelmann [2], no. 56). MS copied in Rabīʿ I 600/end of 1203, the month of composition: Istanbul University Library A 79; lith. Cairo 1281. A letter written from Mecca to his Tunis friend ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Mahdawī, with criticisms of the wordly ways of *ṣūfī*s he had met and much information on the *shaykh*s whom he had known in Spain (this section discussed with Sp. tr. by M. Asín Palacios, Vidas de santones en Andalucía, Madrid 1933).

(9) al-Tanazzulāt al-mawṣiliyya fī asrār al-ṭahārāt wa 'l-ṣalawāt wa 'l-ayyām al-aṣliyya (Brockelmann [2], no. 100). Autograph MS dated 620/1223-4: Istanbul, Şeyh Murad (Süleymaniye) 162; MS read to the author by Ṣadr al-Dīn: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4861; MS read to the author: Istanbul, Murad Molla 1256; MS of ch. 4 dated 602/1205-6: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4868, fols. 46 ff. A work of 55 chapters, composed at Mosul, on the "inner" significance of religious duties.

(10) K. al-Asfār (not in Brockelmann). MS read to the author, dated 638/1240: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4859, fols. 4-38. On the three "journeys", to, from and in God.

(11) al-Isfār ʿan natāʾidj al-asfār (Brockelmann, S no. 152); printed: Ḥaydarābād 1367/1948. Perhaps identical with no. 10.

(12) Dīwān (Brockelmann [2], no. 130). MSS written during the author's lifetime: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 5501, 5502; printed Būlāḳ 1271; lith. Bombay n.d.

(13) Tardjumān al-ashwāḳ, and (14) the commentary on it: Fatḥ (Kashf) al-dhakhāʾir wa 'l-aʿlāḳ ʿan wadjh Tardjumān al-ashwāḳ (Brockelmann [2], no. 129); Eng. tr. of text and part of comm.: R. A. Nicholson, The Tarjumán al-Ashwáq, a collection of mystical odes, London (Or. Trans. Fund., n.s. xx) 1911; commentary printed: Beirut 1312. The surviving text of the poems contains 61 love poems preceded by two, completely contradictory, prefaces: according to the first, the poems were written in love for Niẓām bint Makīn al-Dīn; according to the second, they are to be interpreted allegorically. The epilogue of the commentary recounts that it was written because the poems provoked gossip in Syria. The truth may be that the poems fall into two groups: those written in 598/1201-2 for Niẓām, with the first preface, and those written when Ibn al-ʿArabī was about 50, i.e. ca. 610/1213 (cf. poem 32), with the second preface, the two groups being combined when the sharḥ was undertaken.

(15) Sharḥ Khalʿ al-naʿlayn (Brockelmann [2], no. 103a). MS from Ṣadr al-Dīn's library, dated 640/1242-3: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4989, pp. 110-338. A commentary on the work by Ibn Ḳasī [q.v.].

(16) K. Ḥilyat al-abdāl (Brockelmann [2], no. 28). MS dated 602/1205-6: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4868/4; printed: Ḥaydarābād 1948; Turkish tr. Enwer, Istanbul 1326.

(17) K. Tādj al-tarādjim fī ishārāt al-ʿilm wa laṭāʾif al-fahm (Brockelmann [2], no 65). MS dated 602/1205-6: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4868/5; 649/1251-2: Istanbul, Aya Sofya 4817/3.

(18) K. al-Shawāhid (Brockelmann [2], no. 29). MS dated 602/1205-6: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4868/6; 649/1251-2: Istanbul, Aya Sofya 4817/2.

(19) K. Ishārāt al-Ḳurʾān fī ʿālam al-insān (Brockelmann [2], no. 48). MS written during the author's lifetime: Konya, Yusuf Ağa 4989/1.

Among the spurious works attributed to Ibn al-ʿArabī may be mentioned: Tafsīr al-Shaykh al-Akbar (Brockelmann², no. 3); al-Shadjara al-nuʿmāniyya fi 'l-dawla al-ʿUthmāniyya (Brockelmann², no. 124); and a popular work on the interpretation of dreams (Taʿbīr-nāma-i Muḥyi 'l-Dīn ʿArabī terdjümesi, Istanbul 1309 etc.; most lately Rüyâ tâbirleri, Istanbul 1955).

Thought. With so many of his works still in manuscript, it is as yet impossible to give a complete conspectus of Ibn al-ʿArabī's ideas. The following summary is based on only a few of his writings, mainly al-Futūḥāt al-Makkiyya.

Before his mystical ideas are examined, it is necessary to consider his epistemological outlook. Like almost all Muslim ṣūfīs, Ibn al-ʿArabī regards human reason as severely limited: in the introduction of the Futūḥāt (i, 33 ff. and cf. iii, 505), he divides the branches of knowledge (ʿilm) into three classes: (a) those which may be attained through reason (ʿaḳl); (b) the knowledge attained through "states" (ḥāl), acquired by perception of taste, colour, etc.; (c) knowledge of mysteries: this is the knowledge which the soul "blows" (nafatha) into the heart (rūʿ); it is in part like (though higher than) the knowledge provided by ʿaḳl and ḥāl; in part it is knowledge arising from "communications" (akhbār), i.e., the revelations of prophets. This last "knowledge", coming from God, with or without the mediation of an angel, and acquired only after a profound mystic training, is maʿrifa. The true branches of knowledge are the maʿārif; and he who knows these knows everything.

The maʿārif, and particularly those relating to the "way" of God, are not to be acquired by reason, or by reason's most effective instrument ḳiyās [q.v.], for "every day [Allāh] is upon some labour" (Ḳurʾān, LV, 29). The truth of a statement depends on its source: the prophets recognized truths through inspiration (ilḳāʾ); these truths are to be received by faith and are not open to dispute. Ibn al-ʿArabī claimed a similar authority for his own teachings, since the walī [q.v.] is modelled upon and is the heir of the prophet; but he is far from claiming prophethood (nubuwwa) for himself (Futūḥāt, iii, 505).

Ibn al-ʿArabī's maʿārif, for which he claimed to have only a divine source, has in fact other sources, chief among them the Ḳurʾān, verses or words of which, or the letters prefixed to various sūras, he felt free to interpret in a manner unconnected with the context. He also studied the works of such mystics as Djunayd, Bāyazīd al-Bisṭāmī, al-Ḥallādj, and al-Ḳushayrī [qq.v.]. He was not uninfluenced by Muslim Neoplatonism: his relations with Ibn Rushd have been noticed above; and he accepted that truth was to be found in the sayings of such philosophers as al-Ghazālī and al-Suhrawardī [qq.v.]. Indeed, the comprehension of Ibn al-ʿArabī's writings is made exceptionally difficult by the fact that he may use as interchangeable equivalents terms with different meanings taken from such varying sources as these.

Ibn al-ʿArabī believed that God is an Existence free of all attributes, using for this such terms as ʿamāʾ muṭlaḳ, ghayb al-ghuyūb, almost with the suggestion that God is unknowable. The emanation (ṣudūr) of other beings (mawdjūdāt) from this Being is explained in a very confused manner (see, e.g., Ibn Khaldūn's Shifāʾ al-sāʾil . . ., ed. M. Tâvit al-Ṭancī, Ankara (Ank. Ün. Il. Fak. Yay. xxii) 1957), but agrees in essentials with the Neoplatonist, and hence the Bāṭinī, position (summary in IA, art. Muhyi-d-Din Arabî, pp. 549a-551a). Man makes various progresses, which are thought of as a series of journeys (asfār), in particular three: (1) from God, al-safar ʿan Allāh, by which a man having traversed the various worlds (ʿawālim) is born into this world, and is then thus furthest removed from God; (2) to God, al-safar ila 'llāh, by which, with the help of a guide, he makes the spiritual journey with the goal of reaching the "station of junction [with Universal Intelligence] after separation" (maḳām al-djamʿ baʿd al-tafriḳa); (3) in God, al-safar fi 'llāh. The first two journeys have an end, the third has no end: it is baḳāʾ bi'llāh. The traveller (sālik) who is making the third journey performs those precepts of the sharīʿa which are farḍ; externally, he is living with his fellows; but internally he is dwelling with God. Not every man is capable of more than the first journey; only those specially endowed (khawāṣṣ) may win to the vision of God, but even for them this depends on certain conditions (shurūṭ), some fulfilled by the traveller (sālik, murīd) himself, some provided by the shaykh. Even the Prophet had a shaykh—Gabriel. The shaykhs perform the function which the prophets had performed in their day, except that they do not bring a new sharīʿa.

Ibn al-ʿArabī's views on the "traveller" are expounded especially in his Tuḥfat al-safara ilā haḍrat al-barara (Istanbul 1300; Turkish tr. M. Sālim, Istanbul 1303) and Ḥilyat al-abdāl (Turkish tr. Enwer, Istanbul 1306). The conditions he must observe are four: (1) silence (samṭ); (2) withdrawal from men (ʿuzla); (3) hunger (djūʿ) and (4) wakefulness (sahar). Through their observance with sincere intention (ikhlāṣ), there will be awakened in his heart a love (maḥabba), which grows to be a passion (ʿishḳ) quite distinct from selfish desires (shahwa). It is this passion which particularly brings men to God. On the journey the sālik experiences a series of "states" (aḥwāl), some continuing and hence called "resting-places" (maḳām, manzil), at each of which he learns various maʿārif. When the heart is thoroughly purified, the veil (ḥidjāb) of those "other" things which hide God (mā siwāʾ Allāh) is drawn aside; all things, past, present and future, are known; God grants the manifestation (tadjallī) of Himself; and finally union with Him (waṣl) is achieved.

Influence. Thanks to the protection of influential supporters, Ibn al-ʿArabī was only once in his lifetime in danger for his opinions; this was in Egypt (Makkarī, Nafḥ al-ṭīb, i, 580). Neither he in his lifetime nor his followers after his death founded a ṭarīḳa. The greatest influences in spreading his teaching were the works of his disciple Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Ḳūnawī [q.v.] and Ṣadr al-Dīn's conventicle at Konya, where there foregathered learned ṣūfīs who —many of them in flight before the Mongols—had come to Anatolia. The most important of these was the poet ʿIrāḳī ([q.v.]; d. 686/1287), author of the Lamaʿāt: this abridged paraphrase in Persian of the Fuṣūṣ carried Ibn al-ʿArabī's teaching as far as eastern Iran (so that the Lawāʾiḥ of Djāmī [q.v.] is written in imitation of it). Others were al-Muʾayyad b. Maḥmūd al-Djanadī (Brockelmann, I, 588) and Saʿd al-Dīn al-Farghānī (Brockelmann, S I, 812; see also A. Ateş, in TM, vii-viii/2 (1945), 112 ff.).

Ibn al-ʿArabī's mysticism was widely taught in the Yemen, particularly at Zabīd, where it aroused much hostility; some fuḳahāʾ and ḳāḍīs sought the opinions of various doctors, and fatwās to the effect that Ibn al-ʿArabī's ideas were bidʿa and that every word of the Fuṣūṣ was kufr were given by, e.g., Ibn

Taymiyya [q.v.], Taḳī al-Dīn al-Subkī (d. 745/1344; Brockelmann, II, 106) and Badr al-Dīn b. Djamāʿa (d. 767/1366; Brockelmann, II, 86). Ibn Khaldūn [q.v.], in his Shifāʾ al-sāʾil, mentioned above, examined Ibn al-ʿArabī's mystical thought, and found it meaningless and heretical. That he had numerous followers, however, is made clear by the writing of such polemical works as Ibn al-Ahdal's (d. 855/1451) Kashf al-ghiṭāʾ (Brockelmann, S II, 239) and the Tanbīh al-ghabī ʿalā takfīr Ibn al-ʿArabī of Ibrāhīm al-Biḳāʿī (d. 885/1480; Brockelmann, II, 179). It is only later that he found defenders, in the Tanzīh al-ghabī of al-Suyūṭī [q.v.], the K. al-Radd fī munkir al-Shaykh al-Akbar of ʿAbd Allāh b. Maymūn al-Idrīsī (d. 917/1511; Brockelmann, II, 152), and particularly in the fatwā delivered by Kemāl-Pashazāde [q.v.] when the Ottoman Sultan Selīm I ordered the restoration of his turba (see p. 708b above). Thereafter there were written two major works in his defence: al-Ḳawl al-mubīn fī 'l-radd ʿan Muḥyi 'l-Dīn, of al-Shaʿrānī ([q.v.] d. 973/1565; Brockelmann, II, 442) and al-Radd al-matīn ..., of ʿAbd al-Ghanī [q.v.].

The spread of Ibn al-ʿArabī's teaching in Persia and India was promoted particularly by Djāmī [q.v.], with his Lawāʾiḥ, an Arabic Sharḥ al-Fuṣūṣ, and a Persian Sharḥ Naḳsh al-Fuṣūṣ; but here too his doctrines were attacked, e.g., by al-Taftazānī [q.v.], in his al-Radd wa 'l-taṣnīʿ ʿalā kitāb al-Fuṣūṣ.

Ibn al-ʿArabī's ideas had their most profound influence in Anatolia, thanks to the activities of Ṣadr al-Dīn's disciples, so that his works became "text-books" in Ottoman madrasas, commentaries being written by Dāwūd al-Ḳayṣarī (d. 751/1350; Brockelmann, II, 299), Ḳuṭb al-Dīn al-Izniḳī [q.v.] and Yazidji-zāde Meḥmed [see YAZIDJI-OGHLU]. Nevertheless, in spite of Kemāl-Pasha-zāde's fatwā, al-Ḥalabī ([q.v.], d. in Istanbul 956/1549) wrote a refutation of the Fuṣūṣ (Niʿmat al-dharīʿa fī nuṣrat al-sharīʿa); and a similar work was composed by ʿAlī al-Ḳārī (d. 1014/1605; Brockelmann, II, 519). From this time onwards, however, hostile writing ceases, and there appears a continuous stream of commentaries on and translations of Ibn al-ʿArabī's works, chiefly the Fuṣūṣ. A comparable influence in Anatolia was exercised only by Djalāl al-Dīn Rūmī; but the two great commentators of the Mathnawī, Ismāʿīl Anḳarawī ([q.v.], d. 1041/1631-2) and Ṣarī ʿAbd Allāh ([q.v.], d. 1071/1661), interpreted the whole text in the light not of Djalāl al-Dīn's teaching but of Ibn al-ʿArabī's doctrines (see A. Ateş, Mesnevî'nin onsekiz beytinin mânası, in Fuad Köprülü armağanı, Istanbul 1953, 37-50); and from the 8th/14th century onwards this doctrine of monism (waḥdat al-wudjūd [q.v.]) became the main tenet of Anatolian ṣūfism and of the philosophy expressed in dīwān literature.

Ibn al-ʿArabī may have had some influence also on mediaeval Europe, notably on the Catalan missionary Raymond Lull (ca. 1235-1315) (see Carra de Vaux, Penseurs, iv, 223 ff.); and it has been suggested that his description of his isrāʾ influenced Dante (see M. Asín Palacios, Islam and the Divine Comedy, tr. H. Sunderland, London 1926, intr. and pp. 42-52) [on this question see further MIʿRĀDJ].

IBN ʿARABSHĀH, AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. IBRĀHĪM SHIHĀB AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AL-DIMASHḲĪ AL-ḤANAFĪ AL-ʿADJAMĪ, born in 791/1392 in Damascus, was taken with his family to Samarḳand in 803/1400-1, when Tīmūr conquered Damascus and carried off many of its inhabitants (cf. Vita Timuri, ed. Manger, Leeuwaarden 1767-72, ii, 143 ff.); there he studied with al-Djurdjānī, al-Djazarī and others, and learned Persian, Turkish and Mongol. In 811/1408-9 he went to Khaṭā in Mongolia where he studied ḥadīth with al-Shīrāmī, later to Khwārazm and Dasht (at Serāy and Ḥādjdjī Tarkhān), where he still was in 814/1409-10 (Vita Timuri, i, 376). He came through the Crimea to Edirne, where he became a confidant of the Ottoman Sultan Meḥemmed I b. Bāyezīd. He translated several books for him into Turkish (al-ʿAwfī, Djāmiʿ al-ḥikāyāt wa-lāmiʿ al-riwāyāt, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ed. Flügel, ii, 510; Abu 'l-Layth, Tafsīr, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 352; Dīnawarī, Taʿbīr, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 312) and conducted, as Kātib al-Sirr, the Sultan's correspondence in Arabic, Turkish, Persian and Mongol. In 824/1421 he went to Aleppo, in 825/1422 to Damascus, where he studied ḥadīth with his friend Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad al-Bukhārī (cf. Vita Timuri, i, 32). In 832/1429 he performed the Ḥadjdj, in 840/1436 he migrated to Cairo and was there on friendly terms with Abu 'l-Maḥāsin Ibn Taghrībirdī, amongst others. He died in 854/1450. His chief work is the ʿAdjāʾib al-maḳdūr fī nawāʾib Tīmūr (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 122 f.; editions in Brockelmann; tr. into Turkish by al-Murtaḍā Naẓmīzāde al-Baghdādī in 1110/1698, Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv, 190; vi, 544), in which Tīmūr's conquests and the conditions under his successor are described. Tīmūr is represented as a cruel profligate and tyrant, but towards the end (ed. Manger, iii, 781 ff.) his great qualities are appreciated. The book contains valuable descriptions of Samarḳand and its learned world (iii, 855 ff.); Latin translation by Golius, Leiden 1636, French translation by Vattier, 1658, English translation by J. H. Sanders, London 1936. His Fākihat al-khulafāʾ wa-mufākahat al-ẓurafāʾ in ten chapters, written in the month of Ṣafar 852/1448 (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv, 345) contains a mirror for princes and beast-fables, according to Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa "like Kalīla wa Dimna and Sulwān al-Mutāʿ" (see Chauvin, Bibliographie, ii, nos. 140-4), but, as Chauvin has shown (op. cit., ii, nos. 145-9), it is actually a version of the Persian Marzbān-nāma in the recension of Saʿd of Varāvīn (cf. Houtsma in ZDMG, lii, 359 ff.; a selection in Freytag, Locmani Fabulae, 72 ff.; complete edition see below). The introductory portion of an edition of his al-Taʾlīf al-ṭāhir fī shiyam . . . Abī Saʿīd Djaḳmaḳ was published as a posthumous work of S. A. Strong in JRAS, 1907, 395 ff. Ten works are mentioned under his name, among them a work on Arabic, Persian and Turkish, Tardjumān al-murtadjim (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 278). See also Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iii, 158; iv, 190, 232, 270, 311; v, 479, and Freytag's work mentioned below.

Of his sons the following were authors: (1) AL-ḤASAN, wrote Īḍāḥ al-ẓulm wa-bayān al-ʿudwān fī taʾrīkh al-Nābulusī al-Khāridjī al-Khawwān, in rhymed prose, on al-Nābulusī and his tyrannical proceedings against Damascus, see Brockelmann, II, 30. (2) TĀDJ AL-DĪN ʿABD AL-WAHHĀB, born 813/1411 in Ḥādjdjī Tarkhān, died 901/1495. He wrote a biography of his father and a work on Ḥanafī fiḳh (Shadharāt al-dhahab, viii, 5; Brockelmann, II, 19, S II, 13).

IBN ʿARAFA, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD AL-WARGHAMMĪ (716/1316-803/1401), the outstanding representative of the Mālikī school in Ḥafṣid Tunisia. He was a Berber from south-eastern Tunisia, and had Tunisian and Marīnid teachers such as Ibn ʿAbd al-Salām, Ibn Salāma, Ibn Hārūn al-Kinānī, ʿUmar b. Ḳaddāḥ, Ibn al-Djabbāb, Ibn Andarās, and Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm al-Abullī. After becoming imām of the Great Mosque of Tunis and muftī, he exerted by his knowledge and virtue a considerable influence which extended outside the frontiers of his own country. His chief disciples were al-Ghubrīnī, al-Burzūlī, al-Ubbī, and Ibn Nādjī. He opposed the famous historian and sociologist Ibn Khaldūn. Like other Ḥafṣid fuḳahāʾ of his time, he strove to revivify Mālikism by reconciling law and custom. His treatise on "Definitions" (Ḥudūd), which has become a classic and is the object of a commentary by al-Raṣṣāʿ, testifies to his care in defining juridical ideas with precision. His great work on fiḳh, al-Mabsūṭ or al-Mukhtaṣar al-kabīr, which is still in manuscript, is now almost forgotten.

IBN AL-ʿARĪF, ABU'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. MŪSĀ B. ʿAṬĀʾ ALLĀH AL-ṢANHĀDJĪ, a distinguished man of intellect and celebrated Ṣūfī, born according to Ibn Khallikān on Monday 2 Djumādā I 481/24 July 1088, died in Marrākush 23 Ṣafar 536/27 September 1141.

His father had once been ʿarīf in Tangier, that is to say he was employed as head of the guard responsible for keeping watch in the town at night. From this circumstance came his surname Ibn al-ʿArīf. Although naturally inclined to a studious life, the young Aḥmad was apprenticed to a weaver. However, his marked vocation for study became ever stronger and could not be resisted, in spite of constraints and threats. In the end, in Almeria, he was able to receive religious and philological instruction and to satisfy his taste for poetry. He earned a reputation as a traditionist, reader of the Ḳurʾān and poet. He taught in Saragossa, Valencia and Almeria.

It was in this last town that he had his greatest success. His exemplary life and his aptitude for asceticism and meditation enabled him to become a respected Ṣūfī, surrounded by many disciples. Almeria was at that time one of the most vigorous centres of Andalusian Ṣūfism, one of the focal points of opposition to the Almoravid fuḳahāʾ. It was there that a solemn condemnation was made, in a collective fatwā, of the destruction of the books of al-Ghazālī ordered by the ḳāḍī of Cordova, Ibn Ḥamdīn.

Ibn al-ʿArīf was initiated into Ṣūfism by Abū Bakr Ibn ʿAbd al-Bāḳī. The complete chain of the succession will be found in the text of his epitaph, published and translated by G. Deverdun. We may note in it in particular the name of one of the disciples of Djunayd (298/910), Abū Saʿīd Aḥmad b. al-Aʿrābī (d. 311/951-2), whom Ibn Masarra, according to M. Asín Palacios (Abenmasarra y su escuela, Madrid 1914, 35), was later to meet in Mecca. Now, it is known that the teaching of Ibn Masarra (269-319/883-931) exercised a profound and lasting influence on Andalusian Ṣūfī circles until the period of the dissemination, in the Muslim West, of the doctrines of al-Ghazālī, which seemed to infuse fresh, youthful blood into the old Spanish esoteric school, imparting to it a new vitality and, above all, a firm resolve to resist the persecutions of the fuḳahāʾ. Men such as Ibn Barradjān of Seville, Abū Bakr al-Mayūrḳī of Granada and Ibn Ḳasī, who rebelled in the Algarve, owed the greater part of their firmness and intransigence to the Iḥyāʾ.

The first-named appeared to the local authorities to be highly dangerous. Did he share his views with Ibn al-ʿArīf? Ibn al-Khaṭīb (Kitāb Aʿmāl al-aʿlām, ed. Lévi-Provençal, Rabat 1934, 286) writes that he was naẓīruhu fi 'l-khulla, his equal in the matter of friendship with God. Fragments of a correspondence exchanged between the two men, discovered and published by Father Nwyia, show that Ibn al-ʿArīf addressed Ibn Barradjān as though he were his master. There can be no doubt that they were closely linked together. In summoning them both to Marrākush, together with Abū Bakr al-Mayūrḳī, the Almoravid ʿAlī b. Yūsuf wanted to make it clear that he intended to have their case examined conjointly by his fuḳahāʾ. Ibn Barradjān was invited to give an explanation of certain statements of his which were considered heretical. Thrown into prison, he died there shortly afterwards. Ibn al-ʿArīf, on the other hand, was treated liberally. The sovereign ordered that he should be released from the chains in which he had been put at the instigation of his enemy, the ḳāḍī of Almeria, Ibn al-Aswad. He received him honourably at court and granted him liberty to go wherever he wished. But he had scant time to profit from this favourable treatment, for shortly after this unfortunate episode he died. It is supposed, though one cannot be certain of it, that Ibn al-Aswad had him poisoned. The renown for saintliness that he enjoyed, his unanimously recognized noble reputation and the favourable treatment accorded him by the court show clearly that, although belonging to the opposition, Ibn al-ʿArīf was not as fully compromised by political activities as was Abū Bakr al-Mayūrḳī, who took to flight when summoned to Marrākush, or again as was Ibn Barradjān, whose body the prince ordered to be thrown onto the town dunghill.

The only work of Ibn al-ʿArīf known today is the short work entitled Maḥāsin al-madjālis, studied and translated by M. Asín Palacios. Ibn al-ʿArabī of Murcia found it extremely valuable—to quote the eminent Spanish scholar—"in justifying and vindicating the most daring theses of his immanentist pantheism".

The tomb of "Sīdī Bellʿarif" is in Marrākush. His biographers record that he was buried near the ancient mosque of ʿAlī, in the centre of the town, in the funerary enclosure (rawḍa) of ḳāḍī Abū ʿImrān Mūsā b. Ḥammād.

IBN AL-ʿARĪF, al-Ḥusayn b. al-Walīd b. Naṣr, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim, Andalusian man of letters in the 4th/10th century. He was known principally as a grammarian, and was always called al-Naḥwī. He was brought up in Cordova, his native city, under the guidance of Ibn al-Ḳūṭiyya [q.v.], and in Ifrīḳiya under that of Ibn Rashīḳ. He spent several years in Egypt, where he outshone his brother al-Ḥasan, also known by the name of Ibn al-ʿArīf (d. 367/977-8), and, on his return to Spain, the ḥādjib al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī ʿĀmir appointed him tutor (muʾaddib) to his sons. He always took part in the literary gatherings (madjālis) of al-Manṣūr, and distinguished himself by his rivalry with the famous Ṣāʿid al-Baghdādī [q.v.], of which biographers have collected several instances. Sometimes Ibn al-ʿArīf succeeded, by dishonest means, in confounding his rival before al-Manṣūr, but in the end the curious ʿIrāḳī personality prevailed.

Ibn al-ʿArīf wrote various literary works and grammatical treatises which have not survived. He died in 390/1000, during one of al-Manṣūr's last campaigns, that of Cervera, and was buried at Toledo.

IBN ARṬĀṬ [see ibn sayḥān].

IBN ʿARŪS, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad, Sīdī b. ʿArūs, (died 868/1463), the greatest Tunisian saint of the late Middle Ages. A native of Cape Bon, at first he performed menial tasks while educating himself, particularly in Ṣūfism, firstly in Tunisia and then in Morocco, where he lived for a long time. He settled finally at Tunis and there lived as a vagabond marabout and miracle-worker, indulging in the most scandalous excesses, and in takhrīb, or violation of moral and religious rules. In spite of the protests of some of the fuḳahāʾ he attracted the infatuation of the masses and the protection of members of the ruling house. He was buried in his zāwiya. The ʿArūsiyya brotherhood takes its name from him. His Manāḳib, composed by a disciple, ʿUmar b. ʿAlī al-Rāshidī, were printed at Tunis in 1303/1885.

IBN ʿASĀKIR, the name of the members of the Banū ʿAsākir family, eminent figures who for almost two centuries, from 470 to 660/1077-1261, held an important position in the history of the town of Damascus and produced a dynasty of Shāfiʿī scholars.

Among the most illustrious members of this remarkable family it is fitting to mention al-Ḥasan b. Hibat Allāh, who was born in 470/1077 and died at Damascus in 519/1125. A grammarian and jurisconsult of note, he allied himself by marriage to the family of the Banū Kurashī, which traced its ancestry back to the Umayyads and which included numerous *ḳāḍī*s and scholars, one of whom was the historian Ibn Kathīr [q.v.]. Al-Ḥasan b. Hibat Allāh had three sons: al-Ṣāʿin, ʿAlī and Muḥammad, and a daughter. The eldest, al-Ṣāʿīn Hibat Allāh b. Ḥasan, was born in Radjab 488/July 1095 and was an eminent lawyer. He taught in the Ghazāliyya zāwiya at the Great Mosque of Damascus and was himself a muftī; he died in Shaʿbān 563/June 1168 without issue, and was buried like the other members of his family in the cemetery of Bāb al-Ṣaghīr.

The youngest son, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, who was Shāfiʿī ḳāḍī of Damascus, left six sons, all well versed in the science of ḥadīth. They assured for the family a long survival.

The best known member of the family is the historian of Damascus Thiḳat al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAlī b. Abī Muḥammad al-Ḥasan b. Hibat Allāh b. ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Ḥusayn al-Dimashḳī al-Shāfiʿī al-Ḥāfiẓ. Born in Damascus at the beginning of 499/September-October 1105, ʿAlī Ibn ʿAsākir grew up during the reign of the atabeg Tughtakīn in a family of strict Sunnīs, hostile both to the Shīʿīs, who were supported by the Fāṭimids of Cairo, and to the Ismāʿīlī Bāṭinīs, then very active in Syria. Like all boys belonging to the wealthy classes of society, ʿAlī soon received the basis of a sound education. He began by learning the elements of grammar from his maternal grandfather Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Abu ʾl-Faḍl al-Kurashī (d. 534/1139), then, in about 505/1111, he went to attend the teaching given by his elder brother at the Great Mosque. He learned to recite the Ḳurʾān and began to learn ḥadīths with their isnāds. According to custom, he was permitted to transmit these traditions only after the age of puberty. ʿAlī also had as masters the shaykh Abū Muḥammad al-Afkanī (d. 524/1129) and Djamāl al-Islām b. Muslim Abu ʾl-Ḥasan al-Sulāmī (d. 533/1139). As a youth he was present at the inaugural lectures of al-Sulāmī at the Shāfiʿī madrasa which the atabeg Gümüshtegin had built in 514/1120.

On the death of his father, a new period began for ʿAlī, the period of travels across the East in search of ḥadīths. In 520/1126, he went to Baghdād with his brother al-Ṣāʿin, who went to the Niẓāmiyya to attend the lectures of the Shāfiʿī Asad al-Miḥānī (d. 527/1132) on fiḳh, and of Ibn Burhān, a pupil of al-Ghazālī, on philosophy. In 521 ʿAlī made the pilgrimage. He passed some time at Mecca and Medina and stopped at Kūfa on his way back to Baghdād, where he attended the lectures at the Niẓāmiyya; he attended the lectures of the Ḥanbalī Saʿd al-Khayr Abu ʾl-Ḥasan al-Anṣārī, a pupil of al-Ghazālī, and of the disciples of al-Barmakī, of al-Tanūkhī and of Abū Muḥammad al-Djawharī; he attended the lectures on ḥadīth of Abū Saʿīd Ismāʿīl b. Abī Ṣāliḥ al-Ḳaramānī and Ibn al-Ḥusayn Abu ʾl-Ḳāsim. ʿAlī visited the region of Mosul and returned to Damascus in 525, the year of the assassination of Tādj al-Mulk Böri. The young man seems to have married towards the end of this period, for his son al-Ḳāsim was born in 527/1133. The situation was becoming unsettled in Damascus and so ʿAlī returned to the East in 529/1134; he crossed Khurāsān, visited Iṣfahān, travelled in Transoxania and stayed in Marw, where he met Abū Saʿd ʿAbd al-Karīm al-Samʿānī, with whom he went to Nīshāpūr and Harāt. In 533/1139, Ibn ʿAsākir again passed through Baghdād, and returned to Damascus two years later. In the course of his journeying through ʿIrāḳ, Khurāsān, the Djazīra and the Ḥidjāz, he collected a considerable number of ḥadīths and became a ḥāfiẓ.

From the reign of Muʿīn al-Dīn Anar onwards, ʿAlī Ibn ʿAsākir never left his native town, where he devoted himself for forty years to learning and political activity, without neglecting poetry. Because of the eminent position of the Banū ʿAsākir in Damascus society and the personal prestige of Abu ʾl-Ḳāsim ʿAlī as a ḥāfiẓ and lawyer, Nūr al-Dīn, on his occupation of Damascus in 549/1154, immediately established contact with him; the sovereign found in ʿAlī a valuable ally in successfully implementing his programme of Sunnī reaction in Damascus. For him Nūr al-Dīn built the first dār al-ḥadīth, known also as the dār al-Sunna. From then on it was the task of the Banū ʿAsākir to lead the struggle against the Shīʿīs and to spread traditional Sunnī teaching. As a follower of al-Ashʿarī and combating ideas which cast a slur on the Sunna, Ibn ʿAsākir wrote a collection of forty ḥadīths in support of the religious policy of Nūr al-Dīn: Arbaʿīn fi ʾl-idjtihād fī iḳāmat al-djihād, exalting the virtues of the Holy War; to this period also belongs his Faḍl ʿAskalān, mentioned by al-Dhahabī (Tadhkira, iv, 124); the work exhorted the Muslims to recapture the town, which the Franks had just taken from them in 548/1153. Finally, Nūr al-Dīn encouraged ʿAlī to complete his great dictionary entitled Taʾrīkh madīnat Dimashḳ. Ibn ʿAsākir witnessed the death of Nūr al-Dīn and was present at Saladin's entry into Damascus in 571/1175. He died a few months later, on 11 Radjab 571/25 January 1176. The Ayyūbid Sultan was present at his funeral in the cemetery of Bāb al-Saghīr, where he was buried by the side of his father and other members of his family.

ʿAlī Ibn ʿAsākir left considerable works. His principal work, the Taʾrīkh madīnat Dimashḳ, is a biographical dictionary conceived on the same plan as the dictionary of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī. It consists of 80 books (madjallāt) each of 10 sections (djuzʾ) of 20 folios, the whole forming a manuscript in 18 volumes in the Ẓāhiriyya library. This dictionary seems to have been composed in three stages: begun in 529/1134, it consisted in 549/1154 of 57 books of 10 fascicules (djuzʾ); at this time Nūr al-Dīn encouraged the author to continue his work. In 562/1167, when ʿImād al-Dīn came to Damascus, he saw a copy of 70 books of 10 fascicules (kurrāsa) of 20 folios. Finally al-Ḳāsim, the son of the author, speaks of a collection of 800 fascicules divided into 80 books. The work begins with a highly detailed historical topography of the town of Damascus. This section owes much to Aḥmad b. al-Muʿallā (d. 286/899) and to Ibn Ḥumayd b. Abi ʾl-ʿAdjāʾiz, and was later used by Ibn Shaddād in his al-Aʿlāḳ al-khaṭīra and by Ibn Shākir al-Kutubī for his ʿUyūn al-tawārīkh. The principal part of the work is a collection of biographies. approximating to the genre of ṭabaḳāt; after eulogizing the Prophet, the author enumerates in alphabetical order all the important people who dwelt in Damascus permanently or briefly. Widening his horizons, Ibn ʿAsākir also deals with celebrated persons who lived in Ḥalab, Baʿlabakk, Ramla or Ṣaydā. This excellent source for the history of Damascus has so far been only partially published by Badrān and Aḥmad ʿUbayd (7 vols., Damascus 1911-32, as far as part of the letter ʿayn). A new edition, promoted by the Arab Academy of Damascus, is in the course of production (2 vols. appeared in 1954, one volume (vol. x) appeared in 1965). It is very probable that this work of Ibn ʿAsākir inspired Ibn al-ʿAdīm to write the Bughya.

Besides the two books mentioned, exalting the virtues of djihād, we may notice in the abundant production of Abu ʾl-Ḳāsim two apologetic works: Manāḳib ashʿariyya and the Tabyīn kadhib al-muftarī ʿalā Abi ʾl-Ḥasan al-Ashʿarī (ed. al-Kawtharī, Damascus 1928). Finally, his poetic gifts caused him to be mentioned among the "scholar-poets" of Damascus by his contemporary ʿImād al-Dīn al-Iṣfahānī (Kharīdat al-Ḳaṣr, Damascus ed. 1955, 274).

His son, al-Ḳāsim Bahāʾ al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad, was born at Damascus in 527/1132. He studied in his native town and in Cairo. He wrote a biography of his father, but this work, which was used by Yāḳūt and al-Dhahabī, is lost. His most remarkable work is al-Djāmiʿ al-mustaḳṣā fī faḍāʾil al-Masdjid al-Aḳṣā. He died in 600/1203, and was buried on the slopes of Ḳasiyūn (see Subkī, Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya, v, 148; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāya, xiii, 38; Brockelmann, S I, 567).

Among the six nephews of the historian, it is fitting to mention Fakhr al-Dīn and Zayn al-Umanāʾ. Fakhr al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan Ibn ʿAsākir Abū Manṣūr al-Dimashḳī was born in 550/1155. He was the pupil of Ḳuṭb al-Dīn Nīshābūrī before becoming his son-in-law. As shaykh of the Shāfiʿīs of Damascus he taught in several madrasas in the town. He died in 620/1223 and was buried in the cemetery of the Ṣūfīs (see Ibn Kathīr, Bidāya, xiii, 101).

Zayn al-Umanāʾ, Abu ʾl-Barakāt al-Ḥasan b.

Muḥammad Ibn ʿAsākir, the pupil of his uncle the historian, was appointed inspector of the Treasury and of the *waḳf*s in Damascus, then he devoted himself to asceticism and died in 627/1230, at the age of 93. He was buried by the side of his brother Fakhr al-Dīn (see Ibn Kathīr, Bidāya, xiii, 127).

IBN AL-ASHʿATH, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, descendant of a noble Kindī family of the Ḥaḍramawt, who became famous because of his insurrection against al-Ḥadjdjādj [q.v.] in 80-2/699-701 or 80-3/699-702. He was the grandson of the famous al-Ashʿath [q.v.] (see, further to the references given there, L. Caetani, Annali, 40 A.H. 501-5 for further information, an assessment of him and a very full bibliography; H. Lammens, *Moʿawia I*er, 131, 150-2), and the son of Muḥammad [q.v.], who was less famous than his father al-Ashʿath but nevertheless played an important part in the events of his day. The mother of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was named Umm ʿAmr and was the daughter of Saʿīd (see al-Ṭabarī, index) b. Ḳays al-Hamdānī (Aghānī, v, 153). The sources mention ʿAbd al-Raḥmān as assisting his father in his political activity. It was he who revealed to ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ziyād the hiding-place of Muslim b. ʿAḳīl (60/680), though this denunciation was in fact merely the consequence of a thoughtless act (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 231, 261). In 67/686, he fought beside Muṣʿab against al-Mukhtār (ibid., 733), and it was probably from a desire to avenge his father that he either himself killed or encouraged Muṣʿab to kill the prisoners who were supporters of al-Mukhtār (ibid., 739, 740, 749 f.). The sources do not mention him again until 72/691-2, a year when many very important events occurred: ʿAbd al-Malik defeated and killed Muṣʿab on the banks of the Dudjayl, near to the monastery of the Catholicos (Djumādā I or II 72/October 691; for the chronology of the battle, see Périer, Ḥadjdjādj, 34, n.1), and al-Ḥadjdjādj, probably in Djumādā II, was sent to fight against Ibn al-Zubayr at Mecca. As is known, al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufra [q.v] entered the service of the Umayyad caliph, who had defeated Muṣʿab, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān evidently behaved in the same way, since we learn that Bishr, the brother of ʿAbd al-Malik, put him at the head of 5,000 Kūfans intended for a campaign against the Khāridjīs under the command of the Umayyad Khālid b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Khālid b. Asīd (72/probably the first months of 692). These Khāridjīs, who had approached the town of al-Ahwāz, withdrew after about twenty days before the superior forces of the government, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān went to Rayy, of which he had been appointed governor by Bishr (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 826 f.). Between 72 and 76 there is again a gap in the sources on the activities of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. In 75/694-5, al-Ḥadjdjādj, recalled from Arabia and appointed governor of ʿIrāḳ, made his entry into Kūfa. Henceforward it was with the very difficult al-Ḥadjdjādj that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had to deal, since he was his superior. The war against the Azraḳīs was not yet over when another group of Khāridjīs, the majority of them belonging to the Banū Shaybān, spread terror in the territories on the borders of ʿIrāḳ and in ʿIrāḳ itself. This group, consisting of very few men, had inflicted on the government troops some extremely severe defeats (Périer, op. cit., 109-29), when al-Ḥadjdjādj entrusted ʿAbd al-Raḥmān with an army of 6,000 horsemen with instructions to pursue Shabīb [q.v.]. Ibn al-Ashʿath, following the advice of the general al-Djazl ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd, who had had an unhappy experience of Shabīb's tactical skill (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 901-10), hastened in pursuit of the Khāridjīs, while taking every precaution to avoid an unexpected attack. As the campaign dragged on, the governor of al-Madāʾin, ʿUthmān b. Ḳaṭan, in a letter to al-Ḥadjdjādj criticized the way the war was being conducted; invited by al-Ḥadjdjādj to take the initiative, he attacked Shabīb, but could not withstand the Khāridjī counter-attack; he was killed with 1120 (or 720) of his soldiers, and the remnants of the defeated army fled to Kūfa (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 930-7); ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, unhorsed during the battle, was helped by a comrade (Ibn Abī Sabra) to escape and, after a number of adventures, also reached Kūfa, where he remained in hiding until al-Ḥadjdjādj granted him amān (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 937-9).

Relations between the governor of ʿIrāḳ and Ibn al-Ashʿath had at first been friendly (al-Ḥadjdjādj's son, Muḥammad, married a sister of Ibn al-Ashʿath), but they soon deteriorated; in explaining Ibn al-Ashʿath's revolt, all the sources attach great importance to this change of attitude. It appears that Ibn al-Ashʿath, proudly conscious of his noble birth, made it clear that he considered himself to be the most worthy of all the *amīr*s to rule. According to al-Masʿūdī (Tanbīh, 407), he gave himself the title of Nāṣir al-muʾminīn (the Helper of the Believers, presumably setting himself up as the defender of the true Believers as against the Umayyads and al-Ḥadjdjādj, whom he condemned as bad Muslims); he also claimed to be the "Ḳaḥṭānī", i.e., the person awaited by the Yemenīs as being he who would restore domination to them (G. van Vloten, Recherches, 61). Such arrogance annoyed the governor, who vigorously condemned Ibn al-Ashʿath's behaviour (e.g., "Look how he walks! How I should like to cut off his head!"); when these remarks were reported to Ibn al-Ashʿath, he reacted violently (he is said to have shouted: "I shall have neither respite nor rest until I have removed him from power"; al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1043 etc.). A mutual hatred seems to have taken possession of them (the Anonyme Arabische Chronik, 318, Ibn Kathīr and other writers stress this hatred). Things had reached this point when there occurred an event which evoked surprise in Kūfa. In Sidjistān [q.v.], which since 78/697-8 was, with Khurāsān, ruled by al-Ḥadjdjādj (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1032-4), it was the task of the local governor to keep in subjection the territory of the Kābulistān borderland, the ruler of which, referred to in the sources as Rutbīl [q.v.] (but probably to be read Zunbīl), offered resistance to the Muslims. A "Rutbīl" having inflicted on the governor appointed by al-Ḥadjdjādj, ʿUbayd Allāh b. Abī Bakra, a most severe defeat in 79/698-9, al-Ḥadjdjādj, anxious to put an end to this, prepared an army which, because of its splendid equipment, was called the Peacock Army (djuyūsh al-ṭawāwīs); to be in command of it he appointed two generals in succession, choosing finally ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲. It was this appointment which aroused surprise in Kūfa; a paternal uncle of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān thought it advisable to warn the governor against the possibility that his nephew might revolt, but al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ refused to reverse his decision. According to al-Ṭabarī (ii, 1042), it is not known where ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was at this time; according to one tradition (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1046), he had been sent to Kirmān to put down the opposition of a military leader who had refused to help the governors of Sid̲j̲istān and of Sind when necessary, and the number of details given in this tradition point to its being the more reliable, although another passage suggests that he accompanied the Peacock Army (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1044).

In Périer's Vie d'al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ad̲j̲, there is given a very detailed account of the insurrection, with each incident supported by quotations from the sources and with translations of speeches, letters and poems; we give here a summary, emphasizing certain details which help to explain the causes and the development of this event, which came near to overthrowing the Umayyad caliphate. Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ arrived in Sid̲j̲istān in 80/699-700 (on the chronology see below). His first action was to force the troops who were garrisoned there to join the Peacock Army. After refusing an offer of peace from Rutbīl, he invaded Kābulistān, using very different tactics from those of Ibn Abī Bakra: as he occupied the villages and the fortresses, he established garrisons in them and linked the places he had captured by a service of couriers. When he had made himself master of the territory bordering on the high mountains, he returned to Bust, postponing any deeper penetration until the spring of 81/700. But when he informed al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ of this intention, the latter sent him a series of arrogant and offensive messages ordering him to penetrate into the heart of Kābulistān and there to fight the enemy to the death. The invitation to the troops to plough the land, which appears in his second message, and which might seem to be an acquiescence in delay (Périer, 162), should also be interpreted as a threat: he is ironically suggesting that the soldiers may as well start sowing crops since he will not be recalling them until after a total victory. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was certainly offended by the accusations of cowardice and inefficiency which al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ launched against him (he had already shown that he was sensitive to this type of imputation), but he did not act without taking the advice of his counsellors. Ibn Kat̲h̲īr (ix, 35) specifically mentions a meeting at which he informed the ʿIrāḳī leaders of the governor's orders and revealed to them his intention not to obey them. To the troops, he addressed himself in a more diplomatic fashion: after stating that he was concerned for their well-being, that the way in which he conducted the war had the approval of men of experience, and after informing them of the orders and accusations of al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲, he announced that they were free to make a decision: "For myself", he said, "I am here only as your equal; if you march, I shall march; if you refuse, I shall refuse". The soldiers then shouted that they would not obey al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲. Abū Ṭufayl ʿĀmir b. Wāt̲h̲ila, a well-known poet, orator and traditionist, having proclaimed the deposition of the governor, and another orator having invited the troops to march towards ʿIrāḳ to expel from it the enemy of God, they swore an oath of loyalty to Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲. Revolt having thus been decided on, Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ proposed to Rutbīl an agreement, which he accepted: if Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ was the conqueror, he would grant Rutbīl certain facilities; if he were defeated, Rutbīl would grant him refuge. During the march to ʿIrāḳ, the poets who followed the rebel army celebrated the victory in advance; a poem of Aʿs̲h̲ā Hamdān is significant: it accuses al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ of having abandoned the Faith for oppression and apostasy and describes him as a friend of the devil; it adds that Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ had put himself at the head of the Ḳaḥṭānīs and the Hamdānīs against the Maʿaddīs and the T̲h̲aḳafīs (it thus gives expression to religious convictions and tribal hatred). On the rebels' arrival in Fārs, a new and important fact emerged: it was suddenly realized that the deposition of al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ would involve that of the caliph also and they acted accordingly: encouraged by the ḳurrāʾ and the zealots, the majority of the rebels swore to reject the "imāms of error" and renewed their oath of fidelity to Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲, who, in his turn, swore to them the bayʿa. Al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲, informed of this development in the situation, went to Baṣra and asked ʿAbd al-Malik to send Syrian forces; the caliph sent him one detachment after another. Near Tustar, Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲'s advance guard inflicted on that of al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ a defeat and serious losses (9 or 10 D̲h̲u 'l-Ḥid̲j̲d̲j̲a 81/24 or 25 January 701), and al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ withdrew speedily to Baṣra; such prudence was necessary since it is said that Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ had with him 33,000 horsemen and 120,000 infantry. As al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ could not have offered resistance in the town of Baṣra, he entrenched himself at al-Zāwiya. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān entered Baṣra on 29 D̲h̲u 'l-Ḥid̲j̲d̲j̲a, and there set up fortifications. After a month of skirmishes of varying severity, in which al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲'s soldiers in general came off worse (they also lacked provisions), a battle was finally joined (end of Muḥarram 82/early March 701). Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ was on the point of winning, but the courage and skill of the Syrian Sufyān b. al-Abrad reversed the situation. Many ḳurrāʾ (that is ʿulamāʾ, according to the explanation given by Ibn Kat̲h̲īr) were killed (the version of the events given by al-Wāḳidī and repeated by Ibn Kat̲h̲īr (ix, 40) attributes to this battle events which in fact occurred in the following battle of Dayr al-D̲j̲amād̲j̲im [q.v.]). After this defeat, Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ went to Kūfa with his Kūfan soldiers and the élite of the Baṣran cavalry. His lieutenant at Baṣra, the Hās̲h̲imī ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbbās, made efforts to maintain his position in the town, but the Baṣrans had lost no time in accepting the amān offered by al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ (an equivocal amān, which did not prevent his killing a large number of opponents, 11,000 it is said), so with a group of Baṣrans he rejoined his leader at Kūfa. On his arrival at Kūfa, Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲ had been obliged first to drive out from the citadel an officer of al-Madāʾin, Maṭar b. Nād̲j̲iya, who had taken advantage of the troubled situation to seize it; he succeeded in installing himself there only after a full-scale attack with scaling-ladders and other means of assault. At Kūfa, his forces increased, being joined by a large number of men who were discontented with Umayyad rule. Al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲, leaving Baṣra to his cousin Ayyūb b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī ʿAḳīl, set off towards Kūfa (mid-Ṣafar 82/April 701), being harassed en route by detachments of cavalry under the orders of Ibn al-As̲h̲ʿat̲h̲. Reaching a wide plain near Kūfa, he set up his position at Dayr Ḳurra [q.v.] and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, leaving the town, encamped at Dayr al-D̲j̲amād̲j̲im [q.v.] with his troops, who now numbered nearly 200,000 (100,000 were on the regular pay-roll, the others were mawālī). Al-Ḥadjdjādj's army was smaller and in an awkward situation because provisions reached it only with difficulty; in spite of this, Syrian reinforcements were able to join it. Both the armies dug trenches and for a time they engaged in skirmishes, as at al-Zāwiya. Since the dignitaries in Damascus wished to see a peaceful solution of the situation, ʿAbd al-Malik let himself be persuaded to open negotiations with the rebels, against the advice of al-Ḥadjdjādj. Through the agency of his brother Muḥammad and his son ʿAbd Allāh, he proposed to the rebels that he should dismiss al-Ḥadjdjādj and should give to the ʿIrāḳī soldiers the same pay as the Syrians, and offered to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān the governorship of any town in ʿIrāḳ he cared to choose. At a meeting of the leaders of the rebels these proposals were refused, in spite of a speech from ʿAbd al-Raḥmān inviting them to accept. They were convinced that their adversaries had stooped to negotiate only because they were in a difficult situation (in fact there was a famine in al-Ḥadjdjādj's camp) and that the final victory would be theirs. Hostilities being resumed, the two armies still remained for a long time facing each other—it is said that the trench warfare went on for 100 days or about four months, and that there were forty-eight engagements. Those who were the most bitter opponents of the governor were the ḳurrāʾ, fanatically convinced that they were fighting to defend the Faith threatened by the impiety of the Umayyads. They had formed themselves into a squadron under the orders of Djabala b. Zaḥr b. Ḳays al-Djuʿfī, and it was only after the death of this leader that their courage deserted them and they dispersed. Finally in Shaʿbān 82/September 701, a great battle was joined. At first the advantage was with the troops of Ibn al-Ashʿath, but shortly before sunset they scattered, and Ibn al-Ashʿath, after vain attempts to rally them, also took flight accompanied only by a few supporters. After visiting Kūfa to take leave of his family, he travelled in the direction of Baṣra. Meanwhile, al-Ḥadjdjādj returned to Kūfa, set up a tribunal there and executed a large number of rebel prisoners.

But Ibn al-Ashʿath was still not defeated. One of his supporters, Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳāṣ, had taken possession of al-Madāʾin, a key position in ʿIrāḳ; another, the Ḳurayshī ʿUbayd Allāh Ibn Samura, had forced al-Ḥadjdjādj's lieutenant to give up Baṣra to him. After remaining at Kūfa for a month, al-Ḥadjdjādj continued his campaign and, at Maskin on the Dudjayl, where there were gathered the still impressive remnants of the rebel army, he inflicted on Ibn al-Ashʿath, after hostilities lasting about a fortnight, the defeat which finally put an end to his insurrection, the events which followed being only its death-throes. Guided by a shepherd across the scrub and marshes, a band of Syrians surprised the rebels in their encampment while al-Ḥadjdjādj attacked them from another side. Attempting to flee, a great number of rebels threw themselves into the river and were drowned. This was Ibn al-Ashʿath's third defeat. He fled with the survivors, this time towards Sidjistān. While fleeing he had again to fight some of al-Ḥadjdjādj's troops sent in pursuit of him under ʿUmāra b. al-Tamīm al-Lakhmī (according to Ibn Kathīr, ix, 47, b. Ghanm).

When he arrived at Sidjistān, he had further adventures: his ʿāmil at Zarandj refused to open the gates to him; the ʿāmil of Bust opened them, but took him prisoner and put him in chains in order to gain the favour of al-Ḥadjdjādj; it was Rutbīl, coming to meet al-Ashʿath, who forced the ʿāmil to release him, then, keeping his promise given some months earlier, took him with him to Kābulistān and showed him great honour. Meanwhile, about 60,000 fugitives had re-assembled in Sidjistān. Invited by them to resume the struggle, Ibn al-Ashʿath accepted (on his encounter with the treacherous ʿāmil and the events which followed, see also Ibn Kathīr, ix, 48 f., which records the version of al-Wāḳidī). But ʿUmāra, the general of al-Ḥadjdjādj, advanced, and the majority of Ibn al-Ashʿath's supporters, fearing that they would be unable to offer him resistance, wanted to cross the frontiers into Khurāsān, hoping to recruit new forces and to maintain themselves there until the death of either al-Ḥadjdjādj or ʿAbd al-Malik. Ibn al-Ashʿath was with them, but, as a group of 2,000 men led by ʿUbayd Allāh Ibn Samura had defected, he made the fact that there was no longer unity among his supporters a pretext to return again to Rutbīl with the group which preferred to follow him there. The forces remaining in Khurāsān chose as their leader the Hāshimī already mentioned (ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿa b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib; in the version of al-Wāḳidī—Ibn Kathīr: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAyyāsh b. Abī Rabīʿa b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib); shortly afterwards, engaged in battle by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, they suffered a crushing defeat and their leaders were sent prisoner to al-Ḥadjdjādj, who had most of them executed. While the ruthless governor was occupied in carrying out reprisals and even executing mass sentences, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was living at the court of Rutbīl. But, as it was always feared that he might again give trouble, al-Ḥadjdjādj sent continually to his protector letters in which threats alternated with tempting promises in an effort to get him extradited. In the end Rutbīl yielded. Different versions exist of the death of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān: he is said to have been killed by Rutbīl himself or to have died of an illness, his severed head being sent to al-Ḥadjdjādj, who had asked for it; but the account which is generally accepted by the sources is different: put in chains and confined at ʿUmāra in order to be taken to al-Ḥadjdjādj, he threw himself from the top of a castle at Rukhkhadj, dragging with him in his fall the man to whom he was chained (85/704).

Chronology. This is not certain since, although the sources are in agreement on the days and months of some of the outstanding events, for example the battles of Tustar and al-Zāwiya, they are less so on the years. Wellhausen (Ar. Reich, 150 f., Eng. tr., 241 f.) has studied the question and given preference to the series of dates given above: 81 for the beginning of the revolt, 82 for the three defeats of Ibn al-Ashʿath, 83 for the troubles in Sidjistān and the fighting in Khurāsān. Al-Wāḳidī (in al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1052 and 1101; cf. Ibn Ḳutayba, Maʿārif, 181 f.) dates the beginning of the revolt in 82, the battle of al-Zāwiya in 83, and then inconsistently gives the year 82 as the date of the battle of Dayr al-Djamādjim, while adding that according to some it took place in 83 (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1070); this chronology does not accord with the facts as well as the previous one. Equally unacceptable is the date 14 Djumādā II 83/15 July 703 given solely by a tradition of Abū Mikhnaf (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1094), since if one accepts the year 83 for the hostilities near Baṣra, this leaves too brief an interval between them and the final battle of Dayr al-Djamādjim; if one dates the hostilities near Baṣra in the year 82, it leaves an interval of too great a length to be probable (cf. Périer, 186, n. 3). Ibn Kat͟hīr (ix, 42 and 47) lengthens the period of the trench warfare near Kūfa in order that it may fill out his account of the year 82, and transfers some of the skirmishes and the final battle of Dayr al-D̲j̲amād̲j̲im to the year 83; he was evidently attempting to reconcile the divergent accounts, but his solution is not acceptable because he had to disregard the information which limits to about four months the period during which the two armies remained facing one another at Dayr al-D̲j̲amād̲j̲im.

Causes of the revolt. The Arabic sources often have a tendency to explain historical events by incidents relating to persons; in the present case they lay stress, in recounting various episodes, on the mutual hatred of the two protagonists. The facts, however, seem to contradict the suggestion that such a hatred existed: the governor put Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h in command of an army to fight against the K͟hārid̲j̲īs, he is said to have sent him to Kirmān to carry out other tasks, and finally he gave him nothing less than the command of the Peacock Army; the reason for his blindness may have been excessive confidence in the fear which he himself inspired (cf. al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1044), or he may have preferred to keep far from ʿIrāḳ a person who was an embarrassment to him and perhaps dangerous; but if he, as a plebeian, hated the nobly-born Kindī, as is suggested, it is unlikely that he would have shown him so much favour, and if he had been aware of Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h's hostility to him, he would hardly have put into his hands the means of achieving his hostile intentions. It must also be conceded that Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h faithfully carried out the orders of his superior until the autumn of 81. Thus, contrary to the Arabic sources, it is advisable, if not to ignore personal feelings altogether, at least to attach less importance to them and to seek elsewhere the real reasons for the revolt. Von Kremer, in his Culturgeschichtliche Streifzüge (23 f.) and his Culturgeschichte des Orients (i, 172, followed by A. Müller and by van Vloten, 17, 26) links the revolt of Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h with the mawālī movement, and more precisely with the attempt made by those who had embraced Islam in Baṣra and Kūfa to obtain the same political rights as the Arabs who had been Muslims from an early date. Wellhausen (Ar. Reich, 151 ff., Eng. tr., 243 ff.), while recognizing that only a few years had passed since the fall of al-Muk͟htār, who had been their protector, and that al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ had put into force measures which had made things very difficult for the new converts, does not accept the idea that the revolt of Ibn As͟hʿat͟h was no more than a continuation of that of al-Muk͟htār. He notes that the mawālī also fought in large numbers, but side by side with their patrons, according to the custom of the time, and that though they might certainly be hostile to the Syrian government, the supporter of Arabism, yet it was not their claims which lay at the root of the revolt. He considers that the basic cause was a rising of the Arab aristocracy against the imperious and arrogant representative of governmental authority, the plebeian al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲. The Arab clans followed their chiefs all the more willingly since their long service in wars and in the garrisons of distant provinces had caused them great hardship. Since not only the Yemenīs of Kūfa, who regarded Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h as one of their chiefs, but other clans and also those of Baṣra did not withhold their support, Wellhausen adds that there must be seen in the rebellion a new attempt by the ʿIrāḳīs to throw off the yoke of the Syrians and an uprising against the use of Syrian militia and the privileges which were granted to them. All these arguments of Wellhausen must be taken into consideration, but when he states that the rebellion had no religious motives, in spite of the vehement participation of the ḳurrāʾ, it seems that his judgement is open to criticism. There should perhaps be distinguished two phases in the rebellion: at the beginning, it was no more than a mutiny: the politician al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ set himself up as a strategist and presumed to give from a distance peremptory orders to someone with military experience, who knew that during the winter the mountains of Kābulistān are impassable and foresaw that any attempt to penetrate them would result in a disaster similar to that which two years earlier had overtaken the army of Ibn Abī Bakra. The reaction of the army is understandable. But during the march of the rebels towards ʿIrāḳ and after their arrival there, the revolt changed in character and the religious element became predominant. To assess this it is enough to compare the bayʿa of the soldiers to Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h while they were still in Sid̲j̲istān with the exchange of bayʿa between them and their leader in Fārs: on this occasion they swore an oath of obedience to him (bāyaʿūhu) and he replied to them "Undertake with me (tubāyiʿūnī) to depose al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲, the enemy of God, to give me support and to fight with me until God expels him from ʿIrāḳ", and the people promised obedience (bāyaʿahu; al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1055); at Iṣṭak͟hr (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1058), the ceremony was different: the people acknowledged the authority of Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h (bāyaʿūhu), but he replied to them with the following bayʿa: "You will swear an oath (tubāyiʿūna) [to defend] the Book of God and the Sunna of His Prophet, to depose the imāms of error, to fight against those who regard [the blood of the Prophet's kin] as licit (al-muḥillīn)". And it was when they said "Yes" that he made his bayʿa (bāyaʿa) (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1058; Ibn Kat͟hīr, ix, 36). One has the impression that later the control of the revolt slipped from his hands, although he retained the position of commander in chief; the most significant pointer to this diminution of authority is the rejection of his counsel to accept the offers made by the caliph ʿAbd al-Malik to the assembly of the chiefs at Dayr al-D̲j̲amād̲j̲im (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1704 f.), but it is proved also by other indications: the sources do not report any speech by Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h urging the rebels to continue the struggle, but only orders such as might be given by any military leader to soldiers who were in disorder (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1095), whereas they do report violent speeches of ḳurrāʾ proclaiming the necessity of fighting against the heterodox, the innovators, who disregard the truth and practise oppression, or of defending both the faith and worldly possessions (dīnakum wa dunyākum) because if those people (obviously the Umayyads) conquered, they would ruin both the one and the other, or proclaiming that there are in the world no people more unjust than they (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1086 f., etc.). It is true that the traditionists may have had a predilection for speeches of this type, but their complete silence about any propaganda activities in support of the cause by the person who had begun the revolt is striking. Whereas the ḳurrāʾ swore to die and did die on the field of battle, Ibn al-As͟hʿat͟h was inclined towards a compromise with the caliph and ready to lay down arms; he commanded the troops from behind and did not throw himself into the fray, as did many leaders when the cause was already lost; after the defeat at al-Zāwiya he withdrew, at Dayr al-D̲j̲amād̲j̲im and at Maskin he fled; he refused to continue the struggle in Khurāsān. It would seem as though the reason he continued to fight was that the die was cast and he feared that he would be punished for his revolt. He may have been discouraged or have realized that other motives had superseded those for which the chiefs of clans (the Arab aristocracy) and the ʿIrāḳī soldiers had originally joined the campaign, and he did not approve of them. The fact that the scope of the revolt had been enlarged to include those who were discontented with the Umayyad régime and who found support for their recriminations in religious motives, and who were often mawālī, is proved also by al-Ḥadjdjādj's behaviour to the rebels who fell into his hands: it is said (al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1097) that he spared all the Ḳurayshīs, all the Syrians, and all those belonging to the clans of the "two arbiters" (named at Ṣiffīn); furthermore he extorted from the captives above all a declaration that they had been infidel (kāfir; al-Ṭabarī, ii, 1096; cf. Masʿūdī, Murūdj, v, 358) and punished severely the Persian mawālī and the Zuṭṭ who had supported the revolt (al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 373-4; al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 286). The pardon granted to the Arabs and the punishments inflicted on tens of thousands of mawālī show that he saw the latter, after the revolt had been extinguished, as the most dangerous and most guilty of the seditious elements.

Bibliography: The main sources are Ṭabarī (ii, 1023-5, 1042-77, 1085-110, 1132-6 and index), who relied mainly on Abū Mikhnaf, traditionist and author of a monograph entitled Kitāb Dayr al-Djamādjim wa khalʿ ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ashʿath (Fihrist, 93) and the Anonyme arabische Chronik edited by Ahlwardt (308-10, 318-59). To these may be added the Bidāya of Ibn Kathīr because of the clarity of its continuous account and of a number of details drawn from Wāḳidī. The other sources either add nothing of importance or are confusing to the reader: a reputable author such as Dīnawarī (Ṭiwāl, 253, 322-5) offers an entirely deceptive account in which the revolt is the result of propaganda made at Kūfa, with religious arguments, by Ibn al-Ashʿath, and in which the rebels set out from this town (!); other authors, such as, for example, the author of al-Imāma wa 'l-siyāsa, make use of the facts solely in order to introduce episodes and speeches of a literary character and probably apocryphal. IBN AL-ASHʿATH [see ḤAMDĀN ḲARMAṬ].

IBN ʿĀSHIR, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Anṣārī al-Andalusī, Ṣūfī of the Marīnid period, patron saint of the town of Salé, where he died in 764 or 765/1362-3. He was a native of Jimena in Spain and, for unknown reasons, left there to settle in Algeciras. There he supported himself by teaching the Ḳurʾān, and seems to have been happy there until one of the holy men with whom he was acquainted, and in whom he had great confidence, advised him to flee from the country before the Christians arrived. He then undertook the pilgrimage to Mecca. On his return from the east he stopped at Fez, then went to visit one of his sisters at Meknès; but he probably did not find there what he was looking for, and, setting off again, he settled at Shālla, on the left bank of the Bou Regreg, having been offered by a Ṣūfī, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad al-Yāburī, whose disciple he became, a khalwa in the zāwiya which he had set up inside the cemetery. On the death of his master, he left this peaceful place, so conducive to meditation, for another zāwiya in Salé itself, on the right bank of the river, near the Great Mosque. Later, with some hard-earned savings, he acquired a small house in the west of the town, opposite the al-Muʿallaḳa gate which opens on to the cemetery where his tomb now stands.

Ibn ʿĀshir, in spite of his learning, was neither an intellectual nor a pedant. He taught mainly the Ḳurʾān, still in order to support himself, for he always made it a strict rule to live by his own work. Ibn Ḳunfudh of Constantine relates that at the time that he met him at Salé in 763/1361-2, i.e., about two years before his death, he was earning his daily pittance by copying a work of ḥadīth, the ʿUmda, which was one of his favourite books. It is said that he himself bound the copy he had made and sold it for exactly what the work had cost him. His dislike of the world earned him the reputation of being an eccentric solitary. In 757/1356, the Sultan of Morocco (it must have been Abū ʿInān the Marīnid) is said to have tried in vain to approach him, which is why his pleasant and relaxed manner, and the smile with which he greeted Ibn Ḳunfudh, caused general surprise among his disciples and the devout persons who were his followers.

His preference for solitude, silence and meditation increased with age. He had little liking for spiritual gatherings and he barely endured the meetings of fuḳarāʾ, at which he refused to preside and during which he spoke only rarely and with the utmost reluctance. Ibn ʿĀshir at the end of his career was a man poorly clad, not easy to approach, gloomy, afflicted by a sort of chronic internal spasm, who kept company with the dead whom he visited in the cemetery behind the Great Mosque.

He belonged to no fraternity. According to Ibn Ḳunfudh, his ṭarīḳa was based on the strict, zealous, sincere and unreserved observation of the teaching contained in the Iḥyāʾ of al-Ghazālī. Always most anxious to distinguish exactly between what is ḥalāl and what is ḥarām, he was particularly careful to accept nothing from anybody and to submit himself daily to a strict examination of his own conscience. One of his biographers, al-Ḥaḍramī, asserts that the Riʿāya of al-Muḥāsibī was one of the works which he constantly read.

Many Ṣūfīs gathered round Ibn ʿĀshir at Salé, which was a place suitable for meditation and appeared at that time to those who, aspiring to the mystic life, were fleeing from Fez as a haven of peace and security. Thus one of them, Ibn ʿAbbād of Ronda [q.v.], came to spend several years there in the company of the saint, of whom he became a famous disciple.

Bibliography: Aḥmad Ibn ʿĀshir al-Ḥāfī (d. 1163/1750) wrote a monograph on his namesake entitled Tuḥfat al-zāʾir bi-baʿḍ manāḳib sayyidī al-ḥādjdj Aḥmad b. ʿĀshir, which has not been printed (see I. S. Allouche and A. Regragui, Catalogue des manuscrits arabes de Rabat, ii, Rabat 1958, no. 2303); for the list of the biographers of the saint see Lévi-Provençal, Chorfa, 313-4. IBN ʿĀSHŪR, patronymic of a family of Idrīsid descent and Moroccan origin which settled in Muslim Spain. It is said that ʿĀshūr, fleeing from religious persecution, came to settle in Morocco. His son Muḥammad was born at Salé in about 1030/1621 and it was with him that the family's importance in the history of Tunisia began, at first in the field of "mysticism", then in those of fiḳh, of teaching and of religious offices. Muḥammad b. ʿĀshūr, who was initiated into mysticism in Morocco by the shaykh Muḥammad al-Kudjayrī, distinguished himself at Tunis as the leader of a religious fraternity. He settled there, on his return from the Pilgrimage, at the age of about thirty, and carried on the trade of tarboosh-maker. At Tunis he came under the influence first of the shaykh ʿAlī al-Zawāwī, and on his death succeeded him as leader of the fraternity in the zāwiya which was named after him and which was situated in the district of Bāb Manāra (one of the gates of the capital which has only recently been demolished). Finally, however, he adopted the Way of Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Shādhilī. Muḥammad b. ʿĀshūr did not seek power, but rather shunned it, and he led a life of strict poverty. There is attributed to him the following dignified remark: "We are not of those who perform the dhikr in expectation of payment" (Dhayl, 197). On his death in 1110/1698-9, he was buried in the zāwiya inherited from his master ʿAlī al-Zawāwī.

His son, ʿAbd al-Ḳādir, whose birth was announced to him in a dream by the famous mystic of that name, succeeded him as leader of the fraternity. He was less sensitive than his father and in fact lived fairly comfortably. He is described as the wealthy leader of a ṭarīḳa, possessing a certain moral authority which he put at the disposal of any who asked for his protection, including the Jewish and Christian dhimmīs. He was visited by dervishes from India as well as from the East. He was still alive when Ḥusayn Khūdja was writing his Dhayl.

It was with ʿAbd al-Ḳādir's great-grandsons, Aḥmad (d. 1255/1839), Muḥammad, known as Ḥamda (d. 1265/1849), and in particular Muḥammad al-Ṭāhir (d. 1284/1868), that the family began to gain importance in the field of Islamic studies. Aḥmad taught grammar and fiḳh in the Great Mosque al-Zaytūna, followed the profession of notary (al-tawthīḳ) and was buried in the zāwiya inherited from the shaykh ʿAlī al-Zawāwī. Muḥammad known as Ḥamda was also a teacher. Appointed, against his will, by the bey Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad (1253-71/1837-54) as ḳāḍī to the army, he appealed to the vizier Muṣṭafā Khaznadār to make the bey reverse his decision. He too was buried in the zāwiya of Sīdī ʿAlī al-Zawāwī which seems to have become the family burial-place.

The most famous of the three brothers was Muḥammad al-Ṭāhir, who gained renown as an adīb—there exist numerous examples of his prose and verse—as a grammarian and as a faḳīh. He produced a gloss (ḥāshiya) to the commentary on al-Ḳaṭr (which remained the basic work for the second year of teaching at al-Zaytūna until the reform of 1958), and an abridgement of the commentary on the Burda of al-Būṣīrī [q.v.] written by Ibn Marzūk. On 25 Radjab 1267/26 May 1851, he was appointed chief ḳāḍī of Tunis, and in 1277/1860-1 he left this office to become muftī. Shortly afterwards he combined this with the duties of syndic (naḳīb) of the ashrāf. He died on 21 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 1284/14 April 1868 and was buried in the same zāwiya as his two brothers.

The family tradition was carried on by his grandson, also called Muḥammad al-Ṭāhir (born 1296/1879) and by his great-grandson Muḥammad al-Fāḍil.

IBN ʿĀṢIM, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿĀṣim al-Gharnāṭī, a famous Mālikī jurisconsult, grammarian and man of letters. He was born in Granada on 12 Djumādā I 760/11 April 1359 and died there on 11 Shawwāl 829/15 August 1426. He had a brother, who was also called Muḥammad but had the kunya Abū Yaḥyā, and a son who also had the kunya Abū Yaḥyā; this last was the author of a Memorandum on the members of his family (Aḥmad Bābā, Nayl, 285). Ibn ʿĀṣim came of a family of scholars which belonged to the intellectual aristocracy of Granada; Ibn Djuzayy, the famous commentator of the Ḳurʾān, was his great-uncle on the mother's side. He studied in Granada with numerous professors, including al-Shāṭibī [q.v.] (for a fuller list, see Ben Cheneb, in EI [1]), and is said to have exercised the profession of a bookbinder; he finally became Chief Ḳāḍī of Granada.

His biographers mention ten works, mostly in metrical form, on fiḳh, ḳirāʾāt, naḥw and adab; the following have survived:

1. Tuḥfat al-ḥukkām fī nukat al-ʿuḳūd waʾl-aḥkām, a treatise of Mālikī law in 1698 verses of radjaz, often printed. This treatise, also called al-ʿĀṣimiyya, has become, together with the Risāla of Ibn Abī Zayd and the Mukhtaṣar of Khalīl b. Isḥāḳ [qq.v.], one of the authoritative handbooks of the Mālikī school. Among its commentaries, those of Muḥammad b. Aḥmad Mayyāra (d. 1072/1662), of Muḥammad b. Sūda al-Tāwudī (d. 1207/1792), of ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Salām al-Tasūlī (d. 1278/1861), and of ʿUthmān b. al-Makī al-Tawzarī, a professor at the Zaytūna Mosque in Tunis (wrote 1339/1921), have been printed. The Tuḥfa was edited and translated into French by O. Houdas and F. Martel, Algiers and Paris 1882-93, and by L. Bercher, Algiers 1958.

2. Murtaḳa ʾl-wuṣūl ilā maʿrifat ʿilm al-uṣūl, a short urdjūza on uṣūl al-fiḳh.

3. Kitāb al-Ḥadāʾiḳ, or Ḥadāʾiḳ al-azhār, a collection of stories and anecdotes, dedicated to the Naṣrid ruler Yūsuf II (793-4/1391-2).

IBN ʿASKAR, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ʿALĪ B. AL-ḤUSAYN B. MIṢBĀḤ, Idrīsid sharif and Moroccan author of a highly esteemed hagiographic dictionary. He was born in Shafshāwān (Chechaouen) in 936/1529-30; his father is said to have suffered at the hands of the infidels; his mother, herself an Idrīsid, left a great reputation for saintliness. After moving from place to place in his country, he was appointed by the Saʿdid sultan Mawlāy ʿAbd Allāh, in 967/1559-60, to be ḳāḍī and muftī of the little town of Ḳṣar Kutāma. In 969/1562 he made a long stay in southern Morocco, particularly in Marrākush, during which he devoted himself to the study of Ṣūfism. On the death of sultan Mawlāy ʿAbd Allāh in 982/1574, his son and successor Muḥammad, the future al-Maslūkh ("the flayed"), appointed him inspector (naḳīb) of ḳāḍīs. When his master was defeated by his uncle Mawlāy ʿAbd al-Malik, Ibn ʿAskar faithfully accompanied his unfortunate patron to the Iberian peninsula. He returned and died with him in the ranks of the small Moroccan army that fought and was destroyed alongside the troops of Don Sebastian of Portugal in the famous battle of Wādi ʾl-makhāzin in which the three rulers taking part all perished, on 30 Djumādā I 986/4 August 1578. The turbulent life and tragic end of Ibn ʿAskar allowed him to write only a single work of moderate size, but original, the Dawḥat al-nāshir li-maḥāsin man kāna bi ʾl-Maghrib min mashāyikh al-ḳarn al-ʿāshir. As the title indicates, the author's intention was to commemorate the merits of the shaykhs who lived in Morocco in the tenth century of the Hidjra (1495-1592). The personages named as shaykhs were not all scholars, but to some extent they all died in an odour of sanctity. The Dawḥa, as Lévi-Provençal has pointed out, is the first history of the first disciples of the great saint of the period, al-Djazūlī [q.v.]. Ibn ʿAskar's work was continued by al-Ifrānī [q.v.], Ṣafwat man intashar..., and by al-Ḳādirī [q.v.], Nashr al-mathānī. Ibn ʿAskar's monograph is remarkably vivid and contains a great deal of information, especially about his native province in northern Morocco, the Djabal. Political history occupies almost no place in the work which, however, in Morocco, enjoyed an esteem that was largely merited by the author's sincerity. The Dawḥa was lithographed in Fās in 1309/1891 (104 pp.); an English adaptation was made by T. H. Weir, The shaikhs of Morocco in the XVIth Century, Edinburgh 1904; and an annotated French translation has been produced by A. Graulle, under the title Daouhat en Nâchir de Ibn Askar, in AM, xix (1913).

IBN AL-ʿASSĀL, Coptic family which came originally from the village of Sadamant in the Province of Beni Suef in Middle Egypt at an unknown date and settled in Cairo, where its members rose to wealth and high station at the Ayyūbid court during the 7th/13th century. They owned a residence in the capital and occupied a position of leadership in their own community. Though their history is obscure, they were reckoned among the most learned Copts in mediæval times.

Early modern historians of Egypt appear to have vaguely recognized in Ibn al-ʿAssāl only a single personality in mediæval Christian Arabic literature, until in 1713 Renaudot (pp. 585-86, work cited below) revealed that two different brothers had written independently under that name. Afterwards, while classifying some of their manuscripts in the British Museum in 1894, Rieu (p. 18) was able to establish the fact that they were three brothers instead of two. Then in 1905, from different sources (especially the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris), Mallon (JA, 1905, 509-29) confirmed Rieu's thesis and proved that the three attained great literary eminence under the collective name of Awlād al-ʿAssāl, i.e., the sons of the honey producer or merchant, presumably the title and vocation of the founder of that family. Coptic historians, however, including Yaʿḳūb Nakhla Rufayla (p. 185) and the Commission of Coptic History (Ladjnat al-Taʾrīkh al-Ḳibṭī, 148-52) increased the number of "Awlād al-ʿAssāl" by two more—the father and a fourth brother—who also were high dignitaries in the Ayyūbid bureaucracy, though rich literary remains were left only by the other three. In 1943, Higgins (see ref. below) has laboured to establish a new thesis that two sets of Awlād al-ʿAssāl had lived—one at the beginning of the 5th/11th century and another in the 7th/13th century. Since this argument is based on a dubious date (500/1107) in the colophon of a single British Museum manuscript (Arab. e 163, f. 288 r.), we must for the present maintain that the 7th/13th century group is the only one convincingly established.

The full names of the Awlād al-ʿAssāl are as follows: (a) Abu'l-Faḍl b. Abī Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. Abī Sahl Djirdjis b. Abī al-Yusr Yūḥannā b. al-ʿAssāl, the father, known as al-kātib al-Miṣrī, "the Egyptian scribe" or "secretary", who bore the title Fakhr al-Dawla; (b) al-Ṣafī Abu'l-Faḍāʾil b. al-ʿAssāl, with the title Ṣafī al-Dawla; (c) al-Asʿad Abu'l-Faradj Hibat-Allāh b. al-ʿAssāl; (d) al-Muʾtaman Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. al-ʿAssāl, with the title Muʾtaman al-Dawla; (e) al-Amdjad Abu'l-Madjd b. al-ʿAssāl, who was Secretary of the important Dīwān of the Army. The last two were step-brothers of the preceding two, who are described as full brothers.

The literary figures in the list were al-Ṣafī, al-Asʿad and al-Muʾtaman. In spite of their apparent importance, our knowledge of their lives will remain meagre until further data are gleaned from their numerous works, the chief source for any study on the Awlād al-ʿAssāl. All had lived approximately in the tumultuous first half of the 7th/13th century, when Egypt resisted successive crusading attacks on its shores, culminating in the fall of Damietta (1248) and the ultimate discomfiture and imprisonment of King Louis IX of France at the famous battle of Manṣūra in 1350. The firm position of the Awlād al-ʿAssāl in the Ayyūbid administration during those years reveals the loyalty of the Copts to the reigning dynasty and their hostility to the Crusade — a movement which aimed at their humiliation as being schismatics, and thus worse than heretics.

Both al-Ṣafī and al-Asʿad are known from a citation by their third step-brother to have died before 658/1260. The major works of the three are believed to have been accomplished approximately in the decade 627-37/1230-40. All were men of great learning in both the humanities and science. All were masters of Arabic style and in addition well acquainted with Coptic, Greek and Syriac.

Until Ayyūbid times, Coptic was still in use as a language throughout Egypt, though it was increasingly felt that Arabic was becoming a serious menace to its survival. Hence arose a new class of scholars who concentrated on writing Coptic grammars in Arabic and compiled Copto-Arabic dictionaries to ensure the preservation of their ancestral tongue. The Awlād al-ʿAssāl distinguished themselves in this school, as may be witnessed from the enumeration of their works below. In addition to their excellence in Coptic philology, they made outstanding contributions to Coptic canon law, theology, philosophy, Christian polemics, homiletics, Biblical studies, exegesis and all manner of enquiry into their own religion.

The church must have meant a great deal to them, since, as archons or lay leaders of the community, they carried high the torch of reform at a moment when the Patriarchate itself fell into the hands of the ungodly. The infamous Cyril ibn Luḳluḳ (1235-43) occupied the throne of St. Mark by treachery and flourished on simony, while buying royal support by bribery. Finally in 1239 the prelates of the Church forced Cyril to convene a Synod, probably at the Muʿallaḳa Church in Old Cairo, which reviewed all ecclesiastical evils and prescribed total reform. It is noteworthy that al-Ṣafī was the secretary of that Synod and its moving spirit. The Bishops commissioned him to compile what became the greatest and most enduring digest of Coptic canon law and tradition from all the ancient sources available. This tome was named after him al-Madjmūʿ al-Ṣafawī, which remains an authority to this day.

The Awlād al-ʿAssāl's monumental contributions may be appraised from the number and nature of their manuscripts. The Coptic Museum alone has forty-nine, besides many more that are found in European collections, including the Vatican, Florence, the Bodleian, the British Museum, the Bibliothèque Nationale and numerous others, public and private, the most elaborate survey of which we owe to the indefatigable diligence of the late Mgr. Georg Graf (see Bibl.).

Besides numerous religious and philological works, they also wrote some Arabic poetry of no mean quality, notably the urdjūza type for homiletics and the formulation of legal rules of inheritance. It may, however, be deduced from the above that al-Ṣafī was the canonist and philosopher, al-Asʿad the exegete and grammarian, and al-Muʾtaman the theologian and philologist. Their legacy appears to be the consummation of the Coptic culture in the Islamic Middle Ages, though our comprehension of the depth and breadth of their endeavour is still in its infancy.

IBN ʿAṬĀʾ ALLĀH, TĀDJ AL-DĪN ABU 'L-FAḌL (and ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS, see Ibn Farḥūn, Dībādj, Cairo 1351, 70) AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD AL-KARĪM B. ʿAṬĀʾ ALLĀH AL-ISKANDARĪ AL-SHĀDHILĪ, Arab mystic, follower of the doctrines of the mystic al-Shādhilī (d. 656/1258) as a disciple of the mystic Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. ʿAlī al-Anṣārī al-Mursī (d. 686/1287). He wrote a biographical work on the life and teachings of both mystics, entitled Laṭāʾif al-minan fī manāḳib al-Shaykh Abu 'l-ʿAbbās wa-Shaykhihi Abu'l-Ḥasan (Tunis 1304/1886-87; Cairo 1322/1904, on the margin of Shaʿrānī's Laṭāʾif al-minan).

Originally from Alexandria, Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh lived in Cairo and died there on 16 Djumādā II 709/21 November 1309 in the madrasa al-Manṣūriyya. Brockelmann (see Bibl.) lists twenty works by Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh, principally on mysticism and asceticism, of which six are in print and the rest in manuscript. By far the most celebrated of his works is a collection of maxims of a distinct beauty of expression, al-Hikam al-ʿAṭāʾiyya, with numerous commentaries down to modern times, among them Ghayth al-mawāhib al-ʿaliyya (Būlāḳ 1285/1868) by the Spanish mystic Ibn ʿAbbād al-Rundī (d. 796/1394). He is also said to have written in the fields of Ḳurʾānic exegesis, traditions, grammar and the methodology of law (see Dībādj, 70).

Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh was one of the foremost adversaries of the renowned Ḥanbalī jurisconsult and theologian, Ibn Taymiyya (d. 728/1328). When the latter was arrested in Shawwāl 707/March-April 1308, it was Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh who made accusations against him for attacks which he had made against Ibn al-ʿArabī [q.v.] and other mystics, but none of the accusations was substantiated (according to al-Birzālī [q.v.] in Ibn Kathīr, xiv, 45). Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh no doubt had reason to oppose Ibn Taymiyya, who condemns certain doctrines held by the mystics. Thus for instance, in his Madjmūʿat al-rasāʾil wa 'l-masāʾil (5 vols., Cairo 1341-9), v, 86, Ibn Taymiyya condemns as an innovation (bidʿa) the formula of dhikr [q.v.] mentioning the name of God as a single term, either in the form of a noun or a pronoun (al-ism al-mufrad muẓharan wa-muḍmaran). Here, Ibn Taymiyya attributes it to al-Ghazālī [q.v.], but adds that some of his contemporaries were guilty of it (wa-hādhā wa-ashbāhuhu waḳaʿa li-baʿḍi man kāna fī zamāninā). We know that this applies to Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh, among whose works is one entitled al-Ḳaṣd al-mudjarrad fī maʿrifat al-ism al-mufrad (Cairo 1930).

Ibn ʿAṭāʾ Allāh was claimed by the Shāfiʿīs (Subkī, Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya al-kubrā, v, 176) as well as the Mālikīs (Ibn Farḥūn, Dībādj, 70). At his death he was interred in the Ḳarāfa Cemetery in Cairo where his tomb was for long the object of pious visits. It is located in the south-eastern group of tombs (see L. Massignon, La Cité des Morts au Caire, in BIFAO, lvii, 67).

IBN AʿTHAM AL-KŪFĪ, Abū Muḥammad Aḥmad Ibn Aʿtham al-Kūfī al-Kindī, Arab historian of the 2nd-3rd/8th-9th centuries, author of the Kitāb al-Futūḥ (composed 204/819), see Storey, i/2, 1260. The unique manuscript, in two volumes, is preserved in Istanbul, Ahmad III 2956. Yāḳūt (Irshād, i, 379) ascribes two other books to Ibn Aʿtham, both of which are lost. Although little is known about the author, his K. al-Futūḥ proves to be a major source for the early history of the Arabs, from the caliphate of ʿUthmān to that of Hārūn al-Rashīd, particularly for events in ʿIrāḳ, the conquest of Khurāsān, Armenia and Ādharbaydjān, the Arab-Khazar wars and Arab-Byzantine relations. The value of the work is enhanced by the list of Ibn Aʿtham's authorities, which include al-Madāʾinī, al-Wāḳidī, al-Zuhrī, Abū Mikhnaf, Ibn al-Kalbī and other lesser traditionists. Although Ibn Aʿtham explains that he combined their traditions into a connected historical narrative, he fortunately names his authorities for some significant traditions, al-Madāʾinī in this respect being the source most frequently noted. As a contemporary of al-Madāʾinī ([q.v.], 135-225/752-840), Ibn Aʿtham has the pronounced advantage of quoting this great master in his lifetime. Comparison of the narrative of Ibn Aʿtham with the traditions of al-Madāʾinī as related by al-Ṭabarī shows that Ibn Aʿtham not only provides a useful check to the traditions recorded in al-Ṭabarī, but also adds some important details preserved only in the K. al-Futūḥ.

It is true that al-Balādhurī in his Futūḥ al-buldān gives the most comprehensive account of the advance of the Arab armies into the Sāsānian domains and quotes further authorities, such as Abū ʿUbayda, not named by Ibn Aʿtham; nevertheless Ibn Aʿtham provides more details on the situation of the Arabs in the conquered lands, particularly Armenia and Khurāsān. Moreover, whereas al-Balādhurī was mainly interested in "conquests", Ibn Aʿtham goes further: his interest in the internal events of ʿIrāḳ reveals a wider historical perspective than al-Balādhurī's.

In 596/1199 Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Mustawfī al-Harawī translated into Persian the part of K. al-Futūḥ which covers events up to the death of al-Ḥusayn. Of this translation there are many copies (see, e.g., Rieu, Cat. of the Persian Manuscripts in the British Museum, i, 151; Storey, ii/2, 207-9), and at least one published edition (Bombay 1300/1882). This Persian translation has been much discussed, but the real value of the book lies in the Arabic original.

(M. A. Shaban)

IBN AL-ATHĪR, a family name (borne by a number of apparently unrelated families) which was given great and deserved lustre by three brothers, Madjd al-Dīn, ʿIzz al-Dīn, and Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn, who achieved literary fame in the fields of, respectively, philology and religious studies, historiography, and literary criticism. Their father, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Karīm (often but apparently incorrectly: Muḥ. b. Muḥ. b. ʿAbd al-Karīm), whose life spanned the largest part of the 6th/12th century, was a high official of the Zangids of Mosul, stationed in Djazīrat Ibn ʿUmar (hence the nisba al-Djazarī). His three famous sons were born there. The family was, it seems, well-to-do, owning real estate in Djazīrat Ibn ʿUmar and Mosul and investing in commercial enterprises.

(1) Madjd al-Dīn Abu 'l-Saʿādāt al-Mubārak was born in 544/1149. His entire adult life was spent in Mosul, where he worked for the government in the service of Ghāzī b. Mawdūd, Ghāzī's brother Masʿūd, and the latter's son Arslan Shāh. For a while, he was attached to Mudjāhid al-Dīn Ḳaymaz, who, formerly of Irbil, had moved to Mosul and been entrusted there by Ghāzī with the running of affairs. Though he was paralysed in his later years, his administrative services and advice were still very much in demand. However, an anecdote reported by his brother, the historian, depicts him as preferring the contemplative quiet of the invalid to the distractions of politics. He died on Thursday, 29 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 606/24 June 1210.

Of his works, a ḥadīth collection entitled Djāmiʿ al-uṣūl became a much used standard reference work (autograph copy of the first volume in Istanbul, Feyzullah 299, cf. H. Ritter, in Oriens, vi (1953), 71-7). His dictionary of less common words and meanings occurring in the Prophetic traditions, al-Nihāya fī gharīb al-ḥadīth (Cairo 1322, also 1963-65), gained especially wide currency from the fact that it was incorporated in the Lisān al-ʿArab. He wrote on particular kinds of names in the Kitāb al-Banīn wa-'l-banāt wa 'l-ābāʾ wa 'l-ummahāt wa 'l-adhwāʾ wa 'l-dhawāt (= *Kitāb al-Muraṣṣa*ʿ, incomplete ed. by C. F. Seybold [Weimar 1896, Semitistische Studien, 10/11]). While his works on the Musnad of al-Shāfiʿī, on the pious men and women of early Islam (al-Mukhtār fī manāḳib al-akhyār, table of contents by O. Spies, in MO, xxiv (1930), 31-55), and, it seems, a collection of Rasāʾil (listed in Brockelmann as No. 5) are preserved, his major works on grammar and Ḳurʾān interpretation, together with a number of works on other subjects, have not yet been recovered.

(2) ʿIZZ AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ḤASAN ʿALĪ was born on 4 Djumādā I 555/13 May 1160. Like his elder brother, he spent most of his adult life in Mosul but in the capacity of a private scholar. He repeatedly visited Baghdād as a pilgrim or as an envoy of the ruler of Mosul. On at least one of these occasions, upon returning from the pilgrimage, we find him, together with Madjd al-Dīn, trying to use the opportunity for studying with a Baghdādī scholar. At the age of twenty-eight, he was with the armies concentrated under the command of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn [q.v.] for the fight against the Crusaders (Kāmil, sub anno 584), probably in the company of his brother Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn. Near the end of his life, in 626-28/1228-31, he spent some time as an honoured guest with the Atābak of Aleppo, interrupting his stay for one year to visit Damascus. In Aleppo, Yāḳūt [q.v.], just before he died, asked him to arrange for the transfer of his books and papers after his death to a foundation in Baghdād. He agreed but, we are told, handled the task ineptly. He himself died soon thereafter, in Shaʿbān or Ramaḍān 630/May-June 1233.

The circumstances of his life are certainly most imperfectly known as compared to the extent of fame and influence that were his on account of his works, which have been preserved and printed repeatedly. He wrote very successful improved compendia of al-Samʿānī's Ansāb and of some earlier collections of biographies of the men around Muḥammad, entitled, respectively, al-Lubāb and Usd al-ghāba. His more noteworthy contribution, however, has been to secular history. On the Zangī (Atābak) dynasty of Mosul, he wrote a comparatively short work, al-Bāhir, based on the first-hand knowledge of his father and himself. His great compilation entitled al-Kāmil, an annalistic history from the beginning of the world to the year 628, represents the high point of Muslim annalistic historiography. Distinguished by the well-balanced selection of its vast material, by its clear presentation, and by the author's occasional flashes of historical insight, it is somewhat marred, from the modern point of view, by its failure to indicate its sources and the restrictiveness of its annalistic form. A noticeable partiality for the Zangids, leading to some distortion and confusion, is, however, to be expected and is hardly a reason for belittling the great achievement of the historian.

(3) ḌIYĀʾ AL-DĪN ABU 'L-FATḤ NAṢR ALLĀH, born on Thursday, 20 Shaʿbān 558/Wednesday, 24 July 1163, led the most active life of the three brothers and achieved the greatest prominence in politics, obtaining at some time the title of wazīr, which he retained. He joined Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn in April 1191 (if not already once before, in 583/1187). Near the end of the year, given the choice, he joined Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's son, al-Afḍal, becoming his wazīr in Damascus after Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's death in 589/1193. In this position, he is said to have accumulated so much ill-will that when al-Afḍal had to give up Damascus, he was only with great difficulty able to escape, supposedly to Egypt (according to Ibn Khallikān). In fact, he took refuge in Mosul, where he found employment with Arslan Shāh. In 595/1199, he rejoined al-Afḍal in Syria and Egypt, and in 597/1201 moved with him through Syria to al-Afḍal's final destination in Sumaysāṭ. Travelling to Aleppo in 607/1211 with the intention to join al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Ghāzī, he almost immediately left for Mosul. In 611/1214, he took up residence in Irbil, then in Sindjār, and eventually, in 618/1221, settled again in Mosul, where he remained to the end of his life in the service of Maḥmūd b. Masʿūd b. Arslan Shāh and Badr al-Dīn Luʾluʾ, as kātib al-inshāʾ. He died on an embassy to Baghdād on Monday, 29 Rabīʿ II 637/28 November 1239. A son, Sharaf al-Dīn Muḥammad (585-622/1189-1225), had begun to follow in his father's footsteps as a littérateur when he died prematurely.

Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn's works are all concerned with literary criticism. Those published are al-Washy al-marḳūm (Beirut 1298); al-Djāmiʿ al-kabīr (ed. Muṣṭafā Djawād and Djamīl Saʿīd, Baghdād 1375/1956); and the most famous of all, al-Mathal al-sāʾir, which caused much attention already when it first appeared (on the editions and on old manuscripts of the work, cf. S. A. Bonebakker, in Oriens, xiii-xiv (1961), 186-94). Further, al-Istidrāk fi 'l-akhdh ʿala 'l-Maʾākhidh al-Kindiyya (Cairo 1958, on the dependence of al-Mutanabbī on Abū Tammām by the same Ibn al-Dahhān who was the teacher of Madjd al-Dīn, the author for his part of an improved version of Ibn al-Dahhān's al-Fuṣūl al-adabiyya), and one of the collections of his Rasāʾil (published on the basis of the manuscript Topkapısaray Ahmet III, 2630 [described by O. Rescher, in RSO, iv (1911-2), 725], by Anīs al-Maḳdisī [Beirut 1959], according to whom a manuscript in Beirut contains a partly different collection). These Rasāʾil, written to and on behalf of many of the important men of the time, dealing with all the topics on which an educated man had to be able to express himself in a literary fashion, and including such things as a preface for a treatise on the ṣabūḥ (morning drink) by a friend of his (Rasāʾil, 245 ff.), enjoyed hardly less of a reputation than those of his one-time colleague, the Ḳāḍī al-Fāḍil al-Baysānī. He also wrote, among other things, a long Risāla on Egypt (quoted by Ibn Khallikān), a handbook on inshāʾ (al-Maʿālī al-mukhtaraʿa), and a collection of the poetry of Abū Tammām, al-Buḥturī, Dīk al-Djinn, and al-Mutanabbī. The originality of his substantial contribution to Arabic literary criticism is reputed to be high but remains to be investigated.

Bibliography: Information about the father (from the works of the historian) is to be found in the introd. to the ed., by ʿAbd al-Ḳādir A. Ṭulaymāt, of ʿIzz al-Dīn, al-Bāhir (Cairo, n.d. [1382/1963]), and the ed. of Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn, al-Djāmiʿ; about other members of the family, in H. Ritter, Oriens, vi, 71 ff. Meḥmed Sherefeddīn (Yaltkaya), Ibn Ethīrler (Istanbul 1322) was not available.

For (1): Knowledge of Madjd al-Dīn's biography goes back mainly to information furnished by his brothers, ʿIzz al-Dīn (Kāmil, sub anno 606) as reported by Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, vi, 238-41, and Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn in whose name the same information appears in Ibn al-Sāʿī, al-Djāmiʿ al-mukhtaṣar, 199-301 (Baghdād 1353/1934). How much of the probably quite limited biographical information from the works of other contemporaries such as Ibn Nuḳṭa Ibn al-Mustawfī (History of Irbil), and al-Mundhirī is reflected in, for instance, Ibn Khallikān, no. 524, or Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, v, 22 f., can as yet not be determined. Brockelmann, I, 438 f., S I, 305, 607-9.

For (2): ʿIzz al-Dīn achieved fame too late for inclusion in Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, and we are basically restricted to the brief remarks in Ibn Khallikān, no. 433, who, at the age of eighteen, had met him in Aleppo. Later authors apparently had no new worthwhile material to add. For information on his teachers from the Kāmil, cf. the introd. of the ed. of al-Bāhir by ʿA. A. Ṭulaymāt (the Bāhir had previously been published under the title of Histoire des Atabecs de Mosul, in vol. ii of the Recueil des historiens des Croisades, hist. or., Paris 1876). For the statement concerning Yāḳūt, cf. the references given by Muṣṭafā Djawād, in Ibn al-Fuwaṭī, Talkhīṣ Madjmaʿ al-ādāb, iv, I, 260 f. For the esteem he was held in during the Middle Ages, cf., e.g., al-Sakhāwī, Iʿlān, in F. Rosenthal, A history of Muslim historiography, Leiden 1952, 332, 413. For some more recent critical judgments, cf. C. Cahen, La Syrie du Nord, Paris 1940, 58-60; H. A. R. Gibb, in Speculum, xxv (1950), 58-72; H. L. Gottschalk, al-Malik al-Kāmil, Wiesbaden 1958, 6 f.; M. Hilmy M. Ahmad and F. Gabrieli, in Lewis and Holt (edd.), Historians of the Middle East, London 1962, 88-90, 98 ff.; Brockelmann, I, 402, 422 f., S I, 565, 587 f.

For (3): In the absence of Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn's biographies by his early contemporaries Ibn al-Mustawfī and Ibn al-Nadjdjār, we have to rely on Ibn Khallikān, no. 734, and the brief remarks in Ibn al-Ṣābūnī, Takmila, ed. Muṣṭafā Djawād, Baghdād 1377/1957, 4-6. Their information can to some degree be checked by the data derived from the Rasāʾil (cf. D. S. Margoliouth, in Actes du Dixième Congrès Intern. des Or., Section III, Leiden 1896, 9-21; C. Cahen, in BSOAS, xiv (1952), 34-43). Cf., further (in the absence of the biographies of al-Dhahabī and al-Ṣafadī), Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, v, 187-9. For his son, cf. Rasāʾil, 245, as well as Ibn Khallikān and the introd. to the ed. of al-Djāmiʿ al-kabīr. Brockelmann, I, 357 f., S I, 521. (F. ROSENTHAL)

IBN ʿATTĀSH, ʿABD AL-MALIK, an Ismāʿīlī dāʿī who in the mid-5th/11th century was in charge of the Daʿwa in ʿIrāḳ and western Persia. Information about him is scanty. According to the autobiography of Ḥasan-i Ṣabbāḥ [q.v.], he went to Rayy in Ramaḍān 464/May-June 1072, and enrolled Ḥasan in the Daʿwa. He is also said to have won over the Raʾīs Muẓaffar of Girdkūh, later one of the most active leaders of the Nizārīs. Ẓahīr al-Dīn and Rāwandī also allude to his relations with Ḥasan-i Ṣabbāḥ. According to this version, ʿAbd al-Malik, a resident of Iṣfahān, was accused of Shīʿism, and fled from that city to Rayy, where he joined Ḥasan-i Ṣabbāḥ. Ibn al-Djawzī gives a slightly different version, and adds further details: he had been a physician, and had been arrested and threatened with death by Sultan Toghrul Bey because of his faith. He made a show of repentance and, being released, went to Rayy, where he associated with Abū ʿAlī al-Nīsābūrī, the leading Ismāʿīlī there. He wrote an Ismāʿīlī book called al-ʿAḳīḳa, and died in the region of Rayy. Rāwandī and Ibn al-Athīr agree that he was a man of letters and a fine calligrapher; Rāwandī adds that there were many books in Iṣfahān written in his hand.

His son Aḥmad also played a rôle of some importance. According to Rāwandī he was believed in Iṣfahān not to share his father's religious beliefs, and was left unmolested at the time of his father's flight. He was, however, secretly working for the cause. Acting as a schoolteacher for the children of the Daylamī garrison of the fortress called Shāhdiz, he is said to have preached to the fathers and converted them, and thus gained control of the fortress. He held it for several years, and was finally defeated in 500/1107. After the capture of the castle, Aḥmad was paraded through the streets of Iṣfahān, and then flayed alive. His head was sent to Baghdād. Ibn al-Athīr suggests that he was an ignorant man, and that he owed his command to Ḥasan-i Sabbāḥ's respect for his father.

IBN ĀWĀ (A.; pl. banāt āwā, rarely abnāʾ/banū āwā) denotes the jackal (Canis aureus, formerly Thos aureus) in a general sense (Persian shaghāl, Turkish čakal, French chacal). This small member of the canidae which, anatomically, is nearer the wolf (dhiʾb) than to the fox (thaʿlab), has never suffered the least confusion with the last-named among the Arabs; the elongated muzzle of the ibn āwā, the round pupil of the eye, not almond-shaped, its long and shining coat and its swifter pace than that of the fox were sufficient for the Bedouin observer to distinguish between them.

The jackal is a native of the whole of the zone with a steppe climate, as far as the northern and southern fringes of the deserts of Africa and Asia; for preference, it dwells in the grassy savannahs, where it is to be found as far as Cochin China. Its mainly nocturnal habits, its tendencies towards gregariousness, and a sharp and chronic hunger compel it to approach man; encampments and oases pay virtually no attention, at night, to the plaintive yelping (ʿuwāʾ, waʿwaʿa, tahawwub, ḥibūra) of this constant visitor, for it contributes to public hygiene by removing household refuse and carrion. This natural cleansing agent of the wayside can, however, cause damage by the depredations which, from its greed, it is led to make in hen-houses, vineyards and orchards.

Each geographical region of the Arabic-speaking countries is familiar with a race of jackal, which it denotes by local names; thus, we find: (a) the Canis aureus anthus for North Africa (Maghrib: dhīb/dīb, confused with the wolf (Canis lupus) which does not exist there, waʿwaʿ, waʿʿ, awwāw, tamrūr, bābā djaʿdān, Mḥammed al-djaʿīdāt, bū ḍbiḥa, ṭālib Yūsuf; in Maghribī Berber, ushshən, tamashəḳ: ibəgg, ibəggi, əggur); (b) the Canis lupaster for Egypt (dīb, taken to be a wolf); (c) the Thos mesomelas or Black-backed Jackal of Upper Egypt and the Sudan (aws, uways, Sudan bās̲h̲ūm, baʿs̲h̲ūm, abū s̲h̲uʾm, s̲h̲uʾm/s̲h̲ūm); (d) the Canis aureus syriacus for Syria and ʿIrāḳ (wāwī, Lebanon d̲j̲aḳal); and (e) the Canis aureus indicus for Persia and India (Pahlavi Arabized as s̲h̲aʿhar, s̲h̲aʿbar, s̲h̲ag̲h̲bar, zag̲h̲bar).

The sobriquet ibn āwā seems to go back to remote antiquity, in the dialects of Arabia which were very prone to make use of the construct form to create compound nouns in which ibn/bint, like abū/umm and d̲h̲ū/d̲h̲āt, deprived of their original meaning, become instruments denoting ownership or qualification. As for āwā, the Muslim philologists, impelled by the categorical requirements of triliteralism, attached it, on the pattern afʿal, to the root ʾAWW/ʾAWY with the idea of "to seek refuge and company in ..."; thus they interpret ibn āwā as meaning "the one who responds to the appeal of his congeners to rejoin them". This explanation, valid enough in view of the characteristic behaviour of the jackal which it emphasizes, may be rather the result of the combination of the root ʾAWW/ʾAWY, which does not contain the idea of crying out, and of a Bedouin onomatopoeia waʾwaʾ/wāwā, a vocal imitation of its bark common to all these peoples. The closely related onomatopoeic root waʿwaʿ is still very much alive in present-day speech to evoke the wailing yelp of the jackal (see the different local names for the jackal given above and al-D̲j̲āḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, v, 288, on waw-waw = dog, in childish language).

The excessive cowardice of the jackal, which compels it to leave its lair only at night, its instinct as a "carrion-eater", its natural rebelliousness to training, its utter impurity in the eyes of Ḳurʾānic Law and the consequent ban upon the eating of its flesh have condemned it, if not to scorn, at least to total indifference on the part of those who might have been expected to give it their attention, such as huntsmen, naturalists and poets. Although recognizing it to possess the cunning of the fox, they usually refer to it only pro memoria, and, by way of archaisms denoting it, philologists can put forward only the figurative s̲h̲awṭ barāḥⁱⁿ which can be interpreted as "luminous rays of the desert" (the exact meaning of s̲h̲awṭ here remains elusive, for this term signifies at the same time "long course made up of a single stage", "long journey", and "rays of light filtering through a sky-light"), and as the vestige of the Ḥimyaritic language, under its triple Arabic form of ʿillaws̲h̲/ʿillawḍ/laʿwaḍ.

In the Mag̲h̲rib, in particular, so little attention is paid to the proximity of the jackal that many so-called "douar dogs", of very variable and sometimes indefinable types, are considered to be mongrels of jackals (barhūs̲h̲) and reveal their essential characteristics.

In this instinctive shunning of the jackal by the Muslim peoples, an exception must be made in the case of the Touareg, who include it among their game and hunt it, either by driving it with beaters or by gin-traps or poison; being far from strict in their observance of Islamic precepts, they sometimes cook the flesh, but for the most part they use the fur for making saddle-bags. Among this people, as in pre-Islamic Arabia, different organs of the jackal are used in the local medicines. In general, in Barbary where it is still regarded with fear as the transmitter of rabies and devastator of hen-houses and sheep-folds, the jackal has become the principal hero of animal tales, in which it takes the part which otherwise falls to the fox (see H. Basset, Essai sur la littérature des Berbères, Algiers 1920, 206-31).

In conclusion, it seems that in the mediæval West the jackal was the basis of an import trade from the Mag̲h̲rib, through Muslim Spain and that, mixed and confused with the fennec [see FANAK] and the fox under the name adive (from al-dīb), it was esteemed in furriery. The adive, with its corruptions adile, adire, adit, aduz, and ardit, is mentioned in some very ancient chronicles, and in particular we can read in the Mémoires (ed. Paris 1924-6) of Philippe de Commynes (15th century) that: "... King Louis XI sent to search for ... strange beasts in all directions, as in Barbary, a species of small lions which are no larger than small foxes and called them adits". Finally, it will be noted that it is under the name adive that Buffon (Hist. Nat., v, 214) speaks of the jackal.

The jackal therefore is no longer anything more than a pariah in the Islamic countries, whilst the Egyptians of the age of the Pharaohs dedicated a divine cult to it, as Anubis.

IBN AL-ʿAWWĀM [see FILĀḤA, ii].

IBN BĀBAWAYH(I), ABŪ D̲J̲AʿFAR MUḤAMMAD B. ABU 'L-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. ḤUSAYN B. MŪSĀ AL-ḲUMMĪ, known as AL-ṢADŪḲ, is universally regarded among the It̲h̲nāʿas̲h̲arī S̲h̲īʿis as one of their foremost doctors and traditionists. E. G. Browne says "the most important of these earlier divines are the three Muḥammads, al-Kulaynī (Md. b. Yaʿḳūb, d. 329/941), Ibn Bābawayhi (Md. b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn b. Mūsā, d. 381/991-2) and Ṭūsī (Md. b. Ḥasan, 460/1067)" (Browne, iv, 358-9). The first composed the Kāfī; the second Man lā yaḥḍuru-hu 'l-faḳīh, and the third the Istibṣār and Tahd̲h̲īb al-Aḥkām, which are known as the "Four Books" (al-kutub al-arbaʿa).

His name is fully discussed by Saʿīd Nafīsī in the Introduction to his edition of Ibn Bābawayhi's Muṣādaḳat al-ik̲h̲wān (Tehrān, no date; Introduction dated 7 Tīrmāh 1325), who says that the current pronunciation of his name is Bā-ba-wayhi (bi-fatḥ-i wāw, wa sukūn-i yā, wa hāʾ-i is̲h̲bāʿ s̲h̲uda-i d̲j̲alī talaffuẓ karda and). Originally, it was Bā-bū-yi (Introduction, 4; Fyzee, Shiite creed, 8, n. 2). He is generally known as S̲h̲ayk̲h̲-i Ṣadūḳ. His place of birth is not mentioned either by Ṭūsī or Nad̲j̲ās̲h̲ī, but Donaldson says that he was born in K̲h̲urāsān (Shiite religion, 286) either in 311/923 or some years earlier (Nafīsī, Intr., 6). In 355/966 he went to Bag̲h̲dād, apparently from K̲h̲urāsān, and died at Rayy in 381/991. Ahlwardt mentions the date of his death as 391/1001, but there is no sufficient authority for it (Berlin Catalogue, nos. 1269, and 2721; and some others have followed him).

Of his life and character we know next to nothing; but of his birth an entertaining legend is preserved, according to which Ṣadūḳ was born as the result of a prayerful request to the Hidden Imām, and the great traditionist used to pride himself on the fact that he was begotten by order of the Imām (Fyzee, 9-10; Nafīsī, 5). His father ʿAlī was a rich merchant and had three sons, the eldest Ḥasan, the second Ḥusayn and the youngest Muḥammad al-Shaykh al-Ṣadūḳ (Nafīsī, 6, whose opinion is preferable to mine, see Shiite creed, 10). Muḥammad was apparently the son of a slave-girl, probably from Daylam. The eldest son Ḥasan was a theologian of a retiring disposition; Ḥusayn was a well-known jurist and theologian; Muḥammad, known simply as Ibn Bābawayhi, or Shaykh-i Ṣadūḳ among the Shīʿī ʿulamāʾ, was undoubtedly the most famous of all.

Ṣadūḳ taught at Baghdād and was a contemporary of the Buwayhid Prince Rukn al-Dawla, and entered into controversies on his behalf. He was pre-eminent in knowledge, memory, "justice", intelligence and reliability, and is universally recognized as a pillar of the Ithnāʿasharī faith. Although some have doubted his authority, the Rawḍāt al-djannāt declares him to be one of the greatest authorities (iv, 558). Ṣadūḳ came of a very illustrious family of learned men, fifteen of whom have been discussed by Saʿid Nafīsī (Muṣādaḳat al-ikhwān, Intr., 4-17).

Works: Ṣadūḳ was a prolific author; of the earliest authorities, Ṭūsī mentions 43 works and Nadjāshī, 193; later authorities like the Ḳiṣaṣ al-ʿulamāʾ mention 189 and the Rawḍāt al-djannāt, after naming 17 works, says that the rest have not survived. A full list of his works will be found in the Shiite creed, 12 ff.; Nafīsī, 6-13, mentions 214 works.

His most important extant books are: (1) Man lā yaḥḍuru-hu 'l-faḳīh, one of the "four books" (often printed; lith. Tehrān 1326 A.H.); (2) Risālat al-iʿtiḳādāt (see Fyzee, Shiite creed, containing an English translation and full notes); (3) Ikmāl al-dīn, ed. E. Möller, Heidelberg 1901; (4) Kitāb al-Amālī; (5) Kitāb al-Tawḥīd; and (6) ʿUyūn akhbār al-Riḍāʾ (for a full list and particulars see my Shiite creed, 12-17, and Saʿid Nafīsī in his Intr. to Ibn Bābawayhi's Muṣadaḳat al-ikhwān, 11-13.

IBN BĀDĪS (dialectal pron.: Ben Badīs), ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. al-Muṣṭafā b. Makkī, founder of the orthodox reformist movement in Algeria, born at Constantine in 1889. After studying at the Islamic university of Tunis (al-Zaytūna), he devoted himself to private teaching in a mosque in his native town and led an unspectacular life until 1925, when he turned to journalism. He founded a newspaper, al-Muntaḳid ("The Critic"), which went out of circulation after a few months. Immediately afterwards he founded a new newspaper, al-Shihāb ("The Meteor"), which soon took the form of a monthly review and appeared regularly, with some success, until the end of 1939. Ibn Bādīs gave of his best to this publication, which he used as a platform for his reformist propaganda (social questions) and for his religious teaching (tafsīr, ḥadīth).

At first essentially reformist, al-Shihāb tried to spread in Algeria the doctrine of the Salafiyya [q.v.], obviously taking its inspiration from al-Manār of Rashīd Riḍā [q.v.]. But, from 1930 onwards, it dealt more and more with Algerian political questions (this being connected, apparently, with the official celebrations of the centenary of the French settlement in Algeria). From that time onwards the review based its propaganda on two issues—reform (iṣlāḥ) and nationalism, strongly tinged with Arabism. This policy led it to attack: (1) Marabout societies, accused of maintaining certain blameworthy forms of religious life, of favouring obscurantism, of profiting from popular credulity and even of being in collusion with the colonial administration; (2) Gallicization (naturalization and, as a necessary corollary, the abandoning of Islamic personal status, the exclusive adoption of French customs and culture, etc.). Moreover, in this review, Ibn Bādīs showed himself to be a passionate defender of the Algerian personality, which he considered to be inalienable from Islam and Arab culture.

Ibn Bādīs became president of the Association of Algerian Muslim ʿUlamāʾ (constituted in May 1931) and soon confirmed his position as one of the most representative members of the Algerian Muslim community. A tireless worker for his cause, he began the publication of al-Shihāb, and directed the organization for the free teaching of Arabic and the religious education of adults in the numerous cultural centres of his Association. He played an important political rôle alongside the other representatives of Muslim opinion, particularly after the formation of the Popular Front in France, the meeting of the Algerian Muslim Congress in Algiers (June 1936) and the discussion of the "Viollette project" (end of December 1936). During the last years of his life he was engaged in the exhausting work of political leader and of missionary of iṣlāḥ in Algeria. He died prematurely on 16 April 1940.

ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Bādīs is remembered with veneration as a master by many followers. His name is already wrapped in legend. Through his activities at the head of the Association of ʿUlamāʾ he was one of the most effective workers in the Arab-Islamic cultural renewal in Algeria between 1930 and 1940. His intellectual brilliance and his religious influence (chiefly his Ḳurʾānic exegesis published in al-Shihāb) make him incontestably the dominant figure of Algerian Islam in the first half of the 20th century. His ardent faith, devoid of all hatred and fanaticism, his disinterestedness and his extreme simplicity have caused his contemporaries to regard him as a saint. It suffices to quote of Ibn Bādīs these words which summarize his life's work: "I am a sower of love, but on a foundation of justice, equity and respect towards everyone of whatever race or religion" (al-Shihāb, August 1939, 346).

IBN BĀDĪS [see MUʿIZZ B. BĀDĪS].

IBN BĀDJDJA (Latinized as Avempace), ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. YAḤYĀ B. AL-ṢĀʾIGH AL-TUDJĪBĪ AL-ANDALUSĪ AL-SARAḲUSṬĪ, a celebrated philosopher and wazīr in 6th/12th century Spain, and according to Ibn Khaldūn, who ranked him with Ibn Rushd (Averroes) [q.v.] in the West and al-Fārābī [q.v.] and Ibn Sīnā (Avicenna) [q.v.] in the East, one of the greatest philosophers of Islam. Ibn Bādjdja was also well known as a poet, musician and composer of popular songs. Examples of his verses showing a real lyrical gift are to be found in the mediaeval Arabic accounts of the philosopher (see also in the Bibliography the work of Nykl).

Details of his life are obscure. There is an unconfirmed statement in Leo Africanus [q.v.] that the ancestors of Ibn Bādjdja were Jewish. Since he is said to have died young in 533/1139, he must have been born towards the end of the 5th/11th century (not later, for he was politically active in the first decade or so of the 6th/12th century), at or near Saraḳusṭa (Saragossa) [q.v.], where apparently also he spent his youth. We have no reliable information about his education. When in 503/1110 Saraḳusṭa fell to the Almoravids [see AL-MURĀBIṬŪN], or earlier, Ibn Bādjdja for reasons which can only be surmised took service with the new rulers, and became wazīr, apparently while still in his twenties, to the Berber governor Abū Bakr b. Ibrāhīm al-Ṣaḥrāwī, known as Ibn Tīfalwīt. During this vizierate he undertook an embassy for Ibn Tīfalwīt to ʿImād al-Dawla b. Hūd, the former ruler of Saraḳusṭa [see HŪDIDS], who still maintained his independence at Rūṭa (Rueda de Jalón). Ibn Bādjdja was thrown into prison, presumably as a traitor, and remained a prisoner for some months. On his release he seems not to have returned to Saraḳusṭa, and was at Balansiyya (Valencia) when news reached him of the death of Ibn Tīfalwīt (510/1117). Shortly after this the Christians finally captured Saraḳusṭa (Ramaḍān 512/ December 1118). Ibn Bādjdja prepared to retire to the west of Spain, but while passing through Shātiba (Játiva), he was again imprisoned by the Almoravid Ibrāhīm b. Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn on a charge of heresy, according to Ibn Khāḳān. Having gained his release, according to one account through the help of the father of Ibn Rushd (Averroes), more probably the grandfather, the celebrated Ḳāḍī Ibn Rushd, Ibn Bādjdja may have reached Seville. A second vizierate of twenty years to Yaḥyā b. Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn (Yaḥyā b. Abī Bakr b. Yūsuf b. Tāshufīn), credited to him by several writers, perhaps began about this time. We find Ibn Bādjdja also at unspecified times at Granada and Wahrān (Oran), and at Ishbīliyya (Seville) in 530/1135 in the company of his friend Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Imām. He died at Fās (Fez) in Ramaḍān 533/May 1139, it is said (somewhat improbably) from the effects of eating a poisoned fruit provided by a servant of Abu 'l-ʿAlāʾ b. Zuhr (father of the famous Ibn Zuhr or Avenzoar [q.v.]).

Ibn Bādjdja's works survive in their original Arabic in a few manuscripts and in Hebrew translations. The late Miguel Asín Palacios considered it possible that there were fragmentary translations into Latin, but no early Latin version of any work of Ibn Bādjdja has come to light, though he is occasionally quoted in the Latin Averroes and (differently) in Albertus Magnus. The most important Arabic MSS are:

(1) Bodleian MS Pococke 206, which contains a collection of the works of Ibn Bādjdja made by the above-mentioned Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Imām. See J. Uri, Bibliothecae Bodleianae Cod. MSS Or. Catalogus, i, 1787, 499.

(2) Berlin MS 5060, apparently lost since the second World War. For the contents see W. Ahlwardt, Verzeichniss der arabischen Hss. der königl. Bibliothek zu Berlin, iv (1892), 396-99.

(3) Escurial MS 612, containing for the most part commentaries by Ibn Bādjdja on the logical works of al-Fārābī [q.v.]. It has been analysed by H. Derenbourg, Les Manuscrits arabes de l'Escurial, Publications de l'École des Langues orientales vivantes, IIe série, Vol. X, Paris, 1884, 419-23.

(4) Another MS of collected works of Ibn Bādjdja was signalized by Dr. ʿUmar Farrūkh, but has meantime passed out of the hands of its former owner, al-Sayyid ʿAbd al-Razzāḳ al-Ḥasanī of Baghdād.

The Risālat al-Wadāʿ (Letter of Farewell) and the later Risālat Ittiṣāl al-ʿaḳl bi 'l-insān (Treatise on the Union of the Intellect with Man) have been given good editions by Asín. Ibn Bādjdja's most celebrated work, the Tadbīr al-mutawaḥḥid (Rule of the Solitary), hitherto known only from Munk's French rendering of a Hebrew translation (in Mélanges de philosophie juive et arabe, Paris 1859), was also edited by Asín from the unique Bodleian MS and published posthumously with a Spanish translation. In these three works, as also in various passages of his Kitāb fi 'l-Nafs (Book on the Soul), Ibn Bādjdja's interest is centred on the possibility of the union of the soul with the Divine, which he takes as man's highest activity and the ultimate felicity, as well as the final end of human existence. Instead of representing this union in a religious sense, to be attained by moral purity and acts of devotion, and as fully realizable only in the after-life, Ibn Bādjdja considers it as the last stage of an intellectual ascent, by means of a continuous process of abstraction from the impressions caused by sensible objects consisting of matter and form, through a hierarchy of 'spiritual forms' (ṣuwar rūḥāniyya) containing progressively less and less matter, which are intellected by the mind, till finally the Active Intellect is reached. This is devoid of matter and the same for all men (hence Ibn Bādjdja's metaphysical doctrine has been described as panpsychism). The Active Intellect is the highest conception which man can fully comprehend and then only in exceptional circumstances, and is represented not indeed as God, the One, the First Mover, or any aspect of Deity, but as an emanation of Deity, ranking immediately below the Separate Intelligences which move the spheres. These higher Forms are entirely beyond the comprehension of man in the sublunary sphere. Ibn Bādjdja is therefore necessarily concerned with the lower stages of the hierarchy of existence in its metaphysical aspect, but also with the psychological and ethical characteristics of the mind which makes the ascent, which derive according to him from the metaphysical characteristics of the successive stages. The Neoplatonic character of this schema is plain, and Ibn Bādjdja's 'spiritual forms' derive probably from a treatise of Alexander of Aphrodisias dealing specifically with them, which was available in Arabic.

Apart from the exposition in the Risālat Ittiṣāl al-ʿaḳl bi 'l-insān (cf. ed. Asín, § 23), Ibn Bādjdja made his most sustained effort to explain his thought in the Tadbīr al-mutawaḥḥid, which, however, was left incomplete at his death (Ibn Ṭufayl). Within Arabic philosophy, the Tadbīr was evidently influenced by al-Fārābī, who in al-Siyāsa (Siyāsāt) al-madaniyya, speaks, like Ibn Bā\dj\dja, of the solitary 'plants', i.e., philosophers in the unfavourable environment of existing imperfect cities, and in the Fuṣūl al-madanī states that it is the duty of the virtuous man or true philosopher to emigrate to the ideal cities if such exist in fact in his time, adding that if they do not exist, the virtuous man is a stranger in life and to die is preferable for him than to live (ed. Dunlop, § 88). Ibn Bādjdja, who also envisages emigration for his sage, evidently faces the same situation and suggests the solution, viz. withdrawal to a life of speculation within the existing imperfect cities. The idea of the solitary sage may have suggested to Ibn Ṭufayl his philosophical romance Ḥayy b. Yaḳẓān [q.v.], in which an orphan child growing up in solitude finds means of realizing man's highest development. The influence of Ibn Bādjdja on Ibn Rushd (Averroes) has also to be noted, though the latter was never the former's pupil, as has been stated (Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa). When Ibn Rushd mentions Ibn Bādjdja it is usually in a somewhat critical tone, but he was evidently much interested in the idea of the union with the Active Intellect, and even projected a commentary on the Tadbīr al-mutawaḥḥid.

In addition to the fields which have been mentioned, Ibn Bādjdja studied mathematics, astronomy, botany, etc.

IBN BADRŪN [see ibn ʿabdūn].

IBN BAĶĪ, Abū Bakr Yaḥyā b. Aḥmad (in some sources: Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān), Andalusian poet born at the end of the 5th/11th century. Although he is considered by Arab biographers and in some modern works to be from Cordova (al-Ḳurṭubī), Ibn al-Abbār, Ibn Saʿīd (whose grandfather knew him personally) and Ibn Bassām refer to him as al-Ṭulayṭulī, and the latter states that the disturbances at Toledo (fitnat Ṭulayṭula) forced him to leave this town. At this time, probably about 477/1085, the year during which Alfonso VI conquered the town, Ibn Baḳī was still young. Soon afterwards the poet began the journeys across Spain and Morocco which were to continue throughout his life. Always seeking a means of livelihood and unlucky in his fortune, he spent some time in Seville—complaining bitterly of it in his poetry as he was to do of all al-Andalus—then in Cordova. The times, the period of the Almoravids, were not propitious for men of letters who were "fighting against poverty and ignorance" as has been said by E. García Gómez, who has made a study of the period (al-Andalus, x (1945), 285-340). Ibn Baḳī was the friend of al-Aʿmā al-Tuṭīlī and, in a poetry contest at Seville, after al-Aʿmā had recited his poem and gained the audience's admiration, Ibn Baḳī had not the courage to read his and tore up the paper on which he had written it. The two poets are rightly classed at the head of their contemporaries and it is surprising to find verses of one attributed to the other. Ibn Baḳī finally found refuge with the Banū ʿAshara, ḳāḍīs of Salé, some of whom he praises in his poems.

Of Ibn Baḳī's work there survive various court poems on classical themes which clearly demonstrate his greatness as a poet, which was recognized by his contemporaries and by the later critics. But it is primarily in the genre of muwashshaḥa that his brilliance is apparent. His various muwashshaḥāt which end in a Romance khardja [q.v.] have recently aroused particular interest.

This "charmant poète, l'un des meilleurs que l'Andalousie ait eus", in the words of Dozy (Hist. Mus. Esp.[2], iii, 156), died in 545/1150-1 according to Ibn al-Abbār (Takmila, no. 2042). Yāḳūt and Ibn Khallikān, less reliable as being Eastern writers, give the date as 540/1145-6.

IBN AL-BĀḲILLĀNĪ [see AL-BĀḲILLĀNĪ].

IBN BAḲIYYA, ABŪ ṬĀHIR MUḤAMMAD, vizier to the Būyid ʿIzz al-Dawla Bakhtiyār [q.v.], whose history is perhaps difficult to relate objectively since the chroniclers, who wrote from the point of view of the military or bureaucratic aristocracy, were a priori hostile to a parvenu such as he. Coming from a peasant family of Awana (Upper ʿIrāḳ), he had taken advantage of the disturbances during the first half of the 4th/10th century to organize a force which had seized control of the tolls on the Tigris at Takrīt. At the time of the conquest of ʿIrāḳ by the Būyid Muʿizz al-Dawla, when he was in fact in charge of provisioning the prince's kitchens in Baghdād, he had succeeded in holding his privileges as tax-farmer to the new government. A certain charm in conversation, combined with skill in intrigue between rivals bidding for power and in the adroit placing of gifts, finally secured him the favour of the vizier, Abu 'l-Faḍl al-ʿAbbās al-Shīrāzī, and then of Bakhtiyār at the beginning of his reign; finally, in 362/972, he received the succession from al-Shīrāzī himself, probably without desiring it, and contrary to the customary practice whereby, for more than a century, viziers had been recruited from among the bureaucratic profession. Good fortune did not make him unmindful of his former companions, and it is one of the complaints brought against him by the chroniclers that he appointed men of low rank to numerous positions. It seems, however, that Ibn Baḳiyya was a clever manipulator rather than a true politician and he failed to compensate for his own inadequate administrative training by winning over the chief officials in the administration. He was unlucky enough to serve a fickle prince, and his final ruin was to result from the latter's overthrow.

Though bound up with the fortunes of Bakhtiyār, Ibn Baḳiyya, at the time of the first ʿIrāḳī campaign of his prince's cousin, ʿAḍud al-Dawla [q.v.], nevertheless perceived the usefulness of enjoying the favour of the latter (a man who today was the protector and tomorrow, it seemed only too clear, would be the redoubtable.adversary of Bakhtiyār) and the favour too of the vizier to Rukn al-Dawla (father of ʿAḍud al-Dawla), Abu 'l-Fatḥ Ibn al-ʿAmīd [q.v.], who was lingering in ʿIrāḳ. From them, besides the vizierate, he received also the town of Wāsiṭ, as an iḳṭāʿ [q.v.]. In the end, however, the policy he had adopted of trying by means of gifts to win the attachment of certain forces, the ʿayyārūn [q.v.] of Baghdād, the autonomous head of the Baṭīḥa ʿImrān b. Shāhīn who was always in semi-revolt against Baghdād, and others, aroused the suspicions of ʿAḍud al-Dawla, while at the same time Bakhtiyār continued to fear that Ibn Baḳiyya might utterly betray him for the sake of his powerful cousin. When the latter, now successor to Rukn al-Dawla, invaded ʿIrāḳ for the second time, Bakhtiyār attributed the responsibility for the defeat to his vizier and in the end had him arrested and blinded; then ʿAḍud al-Dawla occupied Baghdād, Ibn Baḳiyya fell into his power, and he had him trampled on by his elephants and impaled; the corpse had to await the death of the formidable Būyid before receiving burial (Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī, Imtāʿ, i, 42).

Bibliography: See BŪYIDS, ʿAḌUD AL-DAWLA, BAKHTIYĀR and IBN AL-ʿAMĪD (Abu 'l-Fatḥ). The principal source is of course Ibn Miskawayh; several letters of Abū Isḥāḳ al-Ṣābiʾ (particularly in the Leiden MS) are addressed to Ibn Baḳiyya or concern him; the article devoted to him by Yāḳūt in the Irshād (vi) is in reality mainly concerned with the relations of Ibn al-ʿAmīd (Abu 'l-Fatḥ) with him; Ibn Khallikān, no. 709 (de Slane, iii, 272 ff.); F. Bustānī, Dāʾirat al-maʿārif, ii, 375-6; J. Chr. Bürgel, Die Hofkorrespondenz ʿAḍud ad-daulas, 1965 (Index).

IBN AL-BALADĪ, SHARAF AL-DĪN ABŪ DJAʿFAR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. SAʿĪD, vizier of al-Mustandjid. In 563/1167-8 Ibn al-Baladī, who at that time was Nāẓir in Wāsiṭ, was appointed vizier. There was an old feud between him and the ustād-dār ʿAḍūd al-Dīn Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh. After the murder of the caliph in Rabīʿ II 566/December 1170 by ʿAḍud al-Dīn and the amīr Ḳuṭb al-Dīn, they forced his successor al-Mustaḍīʾ to appoint ʿAḍud al-Dīn vizier, whereupon Ibn al-Baladī was executed.

IBN BĀNA, ʿAMR, famous singer, poet and musician of Baghdād, mawlā of the Thaḳīf, died in 278/891 at Sāmarrā. His father was a famous secretary and a high official. His mother, Bāna, whose name he bears, was the daughter of Rawḥ, secretary of Salāma al-Waṣif. Ibn Bāna was a very cultured, yet a very proud man. He was the supporter and protégé of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī and among the most bitter enemies of Isḥāḳ al-Mawṣilī, whom he accused of regarding music merely as a profession, whereas for him it was a source of delight. A mediocre musician, he did not play any instrument; nevertheless he excelled in the arts of singing, of improvisation, and of imitation and in teaching music. He wrote a work on music: Kitāb Mudjarrad al-aghānī. He was an intimate companion of al-Mutawakkil.

IBN AL-BANNĀʾ, ABŪ ʿALĪ AL-ḤASAN B. AḤMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-BAGHDĀDĪ (396/1005-471/1079), Ḳurʾānic scholar, traditionist and jurisconsult of the Ḥanbali School in Baghdād; he studied law under the direction of the ḳāḍī Abū ʿAlī b. Abī Mūsā al-Hāshimī (d. 428/1037), and later under the ḳāḍī Abū Yaʿlā b. al-Farrāʾ (d. 458/1066). The available sources tell us nothing of his family origins; he apparently lived all his life in Baghdād, where he died on 5 Radjab 471/11 January 1079. His scholarship was the subject of criticism as well as praise by Shāfiʿites, beginning with al-Muʾtaman al-Sādjī (d. 507/1113) and carried on as late as the 9th/15th century with Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī (d. 852/1448). His teaching career began in the lifetime of his teacher, the ḳāḍī Abū Yaʿlā, on the east side of Baghdād, where he had two study circles, one in the Palace Cathedral Mosque (Djāmiʿ al-Ḳaṣr) and another in the Cathedral Mosque of al-Manṣūr. He was commissioned by the wealthy Ḥanbali merchant, Abū ʿAbd Allāh b. Djarada, to teach in a mosque-college built by the latter and known by his name, Masdjid Ibn Djarada. He was also a special tutor of this merchant's family.

Ibn al-Bannāʾ is said to have written as many as one hundred and fifty works (some say five hundred, but this number appears to be a copyist's error). He wrote in the fields of history and biography, fiḳh, asceticism, ḥadīth, theology, philology, pedagogy and the interpretation of dreams. His biographer Ibn Radjab gives a list of his works wherein twenty-eight titles are cited. Four of his works are preserved in manuscript in the Ẓāhiriyya library in Damascus (one of which is not cited in Ibn Radjab's list).

Of great importance for the socio-religious history of Baghdād in the 5th/11th century is Ibn al-Bannāʾ's diary cited in Ibn Radjab's list as al-Taʾrīkh, the History, or Chronicle. This work is in fact a diary, in which the author recorded his personal observations of day-to-day socio-religious life in the ʿAbbāsid city. Unfortunately, only a small part of the diary has been preserved, a fragment dating from 1 Shawwāl 460/3 August 1068 and ending on 14 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 461/4 September 1069. There is evidence that the author kept his diary until the year 470/1077-8, just one year before his death. We have no way of telling at present how early he began to keep it. In the history of Muslim historiography, Ibn al-Bannāʾ's diary is significant, in that regularly kept diaries were not generally thought to have existed at this early date (cf. F. Rosenthal, A history of Muslim historiography, 151). The surviving fragment of the Diary is devoted mainly to the Ḥanbalīs and their activities, this being the time when the celebrated Ḥanbalī Ibn ʿAḳīl [q.v.] was being persecuted by a certain group of his own school because of the interest he was taking in Muʿtazilī thought.

IBN AL-BANNĀʾ AL-MARRĀKUSHĪ, ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿUTHMĀN AL-AZDĪ, a versatile Moroccan scholar whose reputation rests mainly on his knowledge of mathematics, astronomy, astrology and occult sciences. Born in Marrākush on 9 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 654/29 December 1256, he studied the traditional sciences—Arabic language, grammar, the Ḳurʾān, ḥadīth and fiḳh—in his native town, where he was initiated into mathematics and medicine by masters whose identification is still in dispute, though he is known to have attached himself to the saint of Aghmāt [q.v.], Abū Zayd ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Hazmīrī, who directed his knowledge of mathematics toward purposes of divination. Having been invited several times by the Marīnid sultans to go to Fās, he collected together, both in the capital and in Marrākush, a certain number of disciples, who had been drawn sometimes from far-distant places by his reputation as a scholar and Ṣūfī, and in particular he helped to maintain the tradition of mathematics and astronomy in the West; indeed, although he made some advances in arithmetic, especially in calculation involving fractions and square roots (new formula of approximation for

he seems mainly to have been an excellent popularizer and one of the principal exponents of calculation in ghubār figures [see ḤISĀB AL-GHUBĀR].

In all probability, he died on Friday 5 Radjab 721/31 July 1321 in Marrākush and soon became a legendary figure; he was regarded as a sort of magician, with the power to perform miracles by means of his scientific knowledge applied to divination and magic. Nevertheless, his biographers praise his piety, his noble character and irreproachable conduct.

The list of works attributed to Ibn al-Bannāʾ is considerable and includes over 80 titles, belonging to the most disparate branches of learning—Arabic grammar and language, rhetoric, exegesis, uṣūl al-dīn and fiḳh, the division of inheritances, logic, magic, divination, astronomy, meteorology and mathematics; they even include a résumé of the Iḥyāʾ of al-Ghazālī. Only a few of his writings have survived however (see Brockelmann), and only one has been published in its entirety, the Risāla fi 'l-anwāʾ (ed. and tr. H. P. J. Renaud, Le calendrier d'Ibn al-Bannâʾ de Marrakech, Paris 1948). The best known is, beyond question, the Talkhīṣ aʿmāl al-ḥisāb, which has been the subject of several commentaries (see Suter and add Ibn Ḳunfudh, MS Rabat 531, attributed to Ibn Haydūr in Lévi-Provençal's catalogue), and which has been translated by A. Marre, in Atti Ac. Lincei, xvii (1864), also published separately, Rome 1865. Also to be noted are the Rafʿ al-ḥidjāb ʿan ʿilm al-ḥisāb (MSS. Tunis 10301, 206 R, 184 R; more detailed than the Talkhīṣ), the Masāʾil fi 'l-ʿadad al-tāmm wa 'l-nāḳiṣ (MS Tunis 2840), the Ḳānūn li-faṣl (faḍl?) al-shams wa 'l-ḳamar wa-awḳāt al-layl wa 'l-nahār (MS Escorial, 788/16) and some astronomical tables, Minhādj al-ṭālib li-taʿdīl al-kawākib (MS Escorial, 909/1; Algiers 1454/1). It is to be hoped that further work, in addition to the existing fragmentary studies, will be done on this scholar who is an eminent figure of the Maghrib and whose knowledge compelled the high esteem of Ibn Khaldūn.

IBN BARAKA, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD ʿABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. BARAKA AL-ʿUMĀNĪ, Ibāḍī author born in the village of Bahlā in ʿUmān. The exact dates of his life are unknown. However, an Ibāḍī writer of ʿUmān, Ibn Mudād, regards him as a disciple and supporter of the imām Saʿd b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Maḥbūb, who was killed in 328/939-40. He himself played a considerable part in political life in ʿUmān and wrote several historical and juridical works, of which only the following survive: (1) K. al-Djāmiʿ, dealing with the principles of law; (2) K. al-Muwāzana, on the state of ʿUmān in the time of the imām al-Ṣalt b. Mālik; in addition, it discusses certain questions of principles and their juridical solutions; (3) K. al-Sīra, in subject similar to the preceding work; (4) Madḥ al-ʿilm, a eulogy of learning and those who cultivate it; (5) K. al-Taḳyīd; (6) K. al-Taʿāruf; (7) K. al-Sharḥ li-Djāmiʿ Ibn Djāʿfar, no doubt a commentary on al-Djāmiʿ, the work of Abū Djābir Muḥammad b. Djaʿfar al-Azkawī of ʿUmān dealing with questions of the application of principles.

IBN BARRADJĀN, Abu 'l-Ḥakam ʿAbd al-Salām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Lakhmī, an Andalusian mystic theologian, born in North Africa, who taught in Seville during the first half of the 6th/12th century.

His name is often associated with that of the celebrated Ṣūfī Ibn al-ʿArīf [q.v.], head of the Almeria school. With Ibn Ḳasī and Abū Bakr al-Mayūrḳī, these two men were indeed the leaders of the resistance movement directed against the Almoravids by the canonists and traditionalists and, in general, by those men of religion who, under the influence of the master al-Ghazālī, were then inclining towards taṣawwuf. But it is tempting to think that, far more than Ibn al-ʿArīf, it was Ibn Barradjān who was the most ardent and active inspiration of this Ṣūfī opposition to the inquisition of the Almoravid fuḳahā'. Ibn al-Abbār, his principal biographer, states that he was outstanding among his colleagues in merit and abilities, and that he was known as the Ghazālī of al-Andalus. This pre-eminence seems to emerge clearly from the fragments of correspondence between himself and Ibn al-ʿArīf that have been discovered. Finally, Ibn Barradjān appears to have been more involved in events than his companion and friend. He aspired to the imāma. According to al-Shaʿrānī (Ṭabaḳāt, i, 15), he was recognized as imām in 130 villages.

This advancement and the agitation which probably accompanied it aroused the suspicions of the Government's local agents. Alerted by them, the Almoravid prince summoned Ibn Barradjān, Ibn al-ʿArīf and Abū Bakr al-Mayūrḳī to Marrākush. The last-named managed to escape and took refuge in Bidjāya, travelling from there to the East where previously he had lived for a time. The other two both died in 536/1141, the year of their arrival in Morocco. This date is more generally accepted than the year 537/1142 given by Ibn al-Khaṭīb.

The two men were accorded very different treatment. To Ibn al-ʿArīf, the prince offered his belated but certainly sincere regrets. As for the unfortunate Ibn Barradjān, ʿAlī b. Yūsuf gave orders that his body should be thrown onto the town dunghill, without any prayers for the dead. The intervention of ʿAlī b. Ḥirzihim, a courageous Ṣūfī from Fās who was then passing through Marrākush, saved him from such a disgrace. Ibn Barradjān was buried in the corn-market square (raḥbat al-ḥinṭa). In the very year that followed his death, Ibn Ḳasī came out into open rebellion against the Almoravids in the Algarve.

Ibn Barradjān was versed in the science of ḳirā'āt, Tradition and kalām. As a Ṣūfī, he led an exemplary life of austerity, dedicated to worship. He wrote a commentary on the Ḳur'ān conceived in the spirit of his esoteric doctrine, and also a commentary on the names of Allāh. Among other miracles with which he was credited, he was said to have predicted in 520, with mathematical accuracy, the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin, as well as the actual year in which that event took place, that is to say Radjab 583/1187. This aspect of his learning implies that Ibn Barradjān had a reputation for divination, of evident appeal to the popular imagination. When summoned to Marrākush, he had foreseen that only a short span of life was left to him, but also that ʿAlī b. Yūsuf too would die soon afterwards. In fact the prince's death occurred one year after his own.

Ibn Barradjān belongs to the great Ṣūfī tradition of the school of Ibn Masarra, but like the other Andalusian mystics of his time, he felt the influence of al-Ghazālī. Ibn Khaldūn places him in the category of men of the tadjallī (revelation, divine irradiation), whom he contrasts with the category of the theorists of monism (waḥda), for whom God is the totality of the manifested and non-manifested world, the sole reality (Ibn Khaldūn, Shifā' al-sā'il li-tahdhīb al-masā'il, ed. Khalifé, Beirut 1959, 51-2).

The memory of Ibn Barradjān seems to have remained alive for a long time among the populace. In Marrākush, he is still known by the name Sīdī Berridjāl (Sīdī Abu 'l-Ridjāl).

It will be found rewarding to read the first pages of the biography of Ibn al-ʿArīf, written by M. Asín Palacios as a preface to the translated and annotated Arabic text of the Maḥāsin al-madjālis, Paris 1933; on the relations between Ibn al-ʿArīf and Ibn Barradjān, interesting details are given by Father Paul Nwyia, Note sur quelques fragments inédits de la correspondance d'Ibn al-ʿArīf avec Ibn Barrajān, in Hespéris, xliii (1956), 217-21.

IBN BARRĪ, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥ. b. ʿAlī b. Muḥ. b. al-Ḥusayn al-Ribāṭī, Moroccan scholar born in Taza in about 660/1261-2, died in the same town in about 731/1331. Deeply versed in the Islamic sciences, Ibn Barrī owes his renown to an urdjūza of 242 verses, al-Durar al-lawāmiʿ fī aṣl maḳra' al-imām Nāfiʿ, completed in 697/1298 and dealing with the "reading" of Nāfiʿ [q.v.]; this work, published several times in Cairo and Tunis in collections of treatises of Ḳur'ānic orthoepy and orthography, enjoyed a very great vogue in North Africa. From the same author has survived another urdjūza of 30 verses, fī makhāridj al-ḥurūf, on the points of articulation of phonemes (MS Berlin 548). See also the next article, beginning of final paragraph.

Of his life, all that is known is that after having been an ʿadl (a kind of notary) he was entrusted with the official correspondence of the government at Taza, and retained this post until his death.

IBN BARRĪ, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD ʿABD ALLĀH B. BARRĪ B. ʿABD AL-DJABBĀR AL-MAKDISĪ (so called after his family's place of origin) AL-MIṢRĪ AL-SHĀFIʿĪ, Arab grammarian born at Cairo on 5 Radjab 499/13 March 1106 and died there 27 Shawwāl 582/11 January 1187. He studied under the masters of that period (see Ibn Khallikān, ii, 293); when he himself was a master, among his disciples was Abū Mūsā al-Djazūlī al-Naḥwī [q.v.].

During the whole of Ibn Barrī's life the Crusades were in progress (capture of Jerusalem by the Crusaders, 1099; disastrous defeat of the Crusaders at Ḥaṭṭīn, in the year of his death, 1187); but he himself was an absent-minded scholar, untidily dressed, who seems to have had no interest beyond his passionate interest in pure ʿarabiyya, although he himself made mistakes in iʿrāb while speaking, mistakes of which he was unaware. He held the reputation of having the greatest knowledge in his generation of the language, the grammar, and the vocabulary of Arabic and, like Ibn Bābashādh, was the literary reviser of official correspondence at the Dīwān al-inshā'. The author of the Lisān quotes him continually, e.g.: six times under ḳ r n (see his Preface, i, 3, line 10, i, 7, line 3 from the bottom).

This scholar showed his learning in writing on the works of other authors: by making annotations (corrections or additions): (1) to the Muʿarrab and to the K. al-Takmila fī mā yalḥan fīhi 'l-ʿāmma (MS Damascus, Ẓāhiriyya) of al-Djawālīḳī [q.v.]; (2) to the Ṣiḥāḥ of al-Djawharī. These copious ḥawāshī, his chief work (in manuscript; see Brockelmann, I, 134), were collected into an independent work: the K. al-Tanbīh wa 'l-īḍāḥ ʿammā waḳaʿa min al-wahm fī K. al-Ṣiḥāḥ (the title given in Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv, 93, l. 9-10); according to Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, however, ibid., l. 10, these annotations were begun by his master ʿAlī b. al-Ḳaṭṭāʿ, cf. Brockelmann, S I, 540 bottom, and, according to al-Ṣafadī (al-Baghdādī, Khizānat al-adab, ii, 529, lines 8-9), Ibn Barrī continued them as far as w ḳ sh, a quarter of the work, and the rest was written by ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad al-Basṭī; (3) to the Durrat al-ghawwāṣ fī awhām al-khawāṣṣ of al-Ḥarīrī, according to Ibn Khallikān, ii, 293, l. 17, Ibn Ḳāḍī Shuhba, 324, l. 5-6; by his defence of the Maḳāmāt of al-Ḥarīrī against the criticisms of Ibn al-Khashshāb [q.v.], printed under the title: al-Istidrākāt ʿalā Maḳāmāt al-Ḥarīrī wa 'ntiṣār Ibn Barrī (Istanbul 1328) and as an appendix to the Maḳāmāt (Cairo 1326)—as well as by his Sharḥ shawāhid al-Īḍāḥ of Abū ʿAlī al-Fārisī, in manuscript, Cairo[2], ii, 128. Of the personal writings of Ibn Barrī only two small works are known: the K. Ghalaṭ al-ḍuʿafā' min al-fuḳahā', a criticism of the incorrect terms of the jurists, published by C. C. Torrey in Orient. Studien Th. Nöldeke gewidmet, i, Giessen 1906, 211-24; and al-Masā'il al-ʿashr al-mutʿiba li 'l-ḥashr, on some grammatical difficulties, in manuscript, Paris 1266 (no. 3), fols. 181-218.

It should be noted (1) that no. 6 of Brockelmann (S I, 530) is wrongly attributed: this Sharḥ ikhtiṣār (and not iḳtiṣār) al-ʿarūḍ, S. 282 (and not 252) is, as is indicated in the catalogue of the Arabic manuscripts of the Escurial (H. Derenbourg, i, 1884, no. 410, 3°), to be attributed to Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn Ibn Barrī, the Ibn al-Barrī of Brockelmann, II, 248 and S II, 350. (2) No. 2 of Brockelmann, I, 302, the 13 verses on the meaning of the word al-khāl which LA attributes to Ibn Barrī (xiii, 246-7/xi, 232-3) are already cited by Abū Hilāl al-ʿAskarī (d. 395/1005) in his K. al-Ṣināʿatayn (Istanbul 1320), 335-7 and there attributed to Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Thaʿlab. (3) On the question of the glosses or criticisms of Ibn Barrī to the Durrat al-ghawwāṣ and of his refutation of the criticisms of Ibn al-Khashshāb to this Durra, see C. C. Torrey's introduction to his edition of the K. Ghalaṭ al-ḍuʿafā' (Orient. St., 212-3).

IBN BASHKUWĀL, ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM KHALAF B. ʿABD AL-MALIK B. MASʿŪD B. MŪSĀ, B. BASHKUWĀL B. YŪSUF B. DĀḤA B. DĀḲA B. NAṢR B. ʿABD AL-KARĪM B. WĀḲID AL-ANṢĀRĪ, an Andalusian scholar of Spanish origin, as his name "son of Pascual" indicates, was a native of Sorrión, an unknown village of the vega of Valencia, which is not to be confused with Sarrión in the province of Teruel. He was born in Cordova on 3 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 949/29 September 1101 and died there on the night of Tuesday-Wednesday 8 Ramaḍān 578/4-5 January 1183 at 83 (lunar) years of age. He received his first education at Cordova from his father and then at Seville, where he heard Abū Muḥammad b. ʿAttāb, Abu 'l-Walīd b. Rushd, Abū Bakr b. al-ʿArabī, and other celebrated scholars. Well-equipped with learning acquired from some 400 books, he became, according to his biographer Ibn al-Abbār, the doyen of the traditionists of Cordova and a scholar without peer in the literary history of al-Andalus. At first he became a member of the judiciary as a subordinate of the chief ḳāḍī of Seville, Ibn al-ʿArabī, and worked as a ʿadl in Cordova, but soon gave up this administrative career and devoted himself to his chosen vocation of teaching and research, in which he proposed to follow in the footsteps of Ibn al-Faraḍī, the great pioneer in biographical studies, which had had so great a success. Ibn al-Faraḍī, with his Ta'rīkh ʿulamā' al-Andalus, had laid the foundations for a knowledge of literary history among the Spanish Muslims. Ibn Bashkuwāl, two centuries later, decided to continue so interesting a work and called his work al-Ṣila "the continuation". In it he was able to gather 1400 biographies of men of letters who had flourished in the 5th/11th and 6th/12th centuries. Although the information which he gives is above all literary and is excessively and aridly detailed in the lists of masters and disciples, he provides a great deal of new data for history, administration, and the toponymy of numerous towns and localities of Muslim Spain.

He is said to have composed 50 works, but of them, apart from the Ṣila (Kitāb al-Ṣila fī ta'rīkh a'immat al-Andalus), finished on 3 Djumādā I 534/27 December 1139, ed. F. Codera in BAH, i, ii, Madrid 1883, we know only the Kitāb al-Ghawāmiḍ wa 'l-mubhamāt min al-asmā', a dictionary of traditionists whose names are difficult to spell or easily confused with others (Berlin, Verzeichn., no. 1673).

IBN BAṢṢĀL [see filāḥa, ii].

IBN BASSĀM, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Bassām al-Shantarīnī, Andalusian poet and anthologist, a native of Santarem. Forced to flee from his native town when it was taken by Alfonso V of Castile (485/1092-3), he went to Cordova for the first time in 493/1100 and, during the following years, undertook at Seville the compiling of his Dhakhīra and the collecting of the *dīwān*s of some great poets of the 5th/11th century: al-Muʿtamid, Ibn Wahbūn, Ibn ʿAmmār; he also collected the correspondence of the prince of Murcia, Ibn Ṭāhir, and collected in one volume his own satirical poems, which, however, he refrained from circulating. Although in order to support himself he had to accept a reward from those to whom he devoted an entry in his Dhakhīra, he behaved more honestly than his contemporary al-Fatḥ Ibn Khāḳān [q.v.].

The only one of his works which has survived is the Dhakhīra fī maḥāsin ahl al-Djazīra, which is, however, enough to earn him enduring fame and the gratitude of all who are interested in the Arabic literature of Spain. Planning his anthology as a continuation of the Kitāb al-Ḥadāʾiḳ of Ibn Faradj al-Djayyānī [q.v.], Ibn Bassām (d. 543/1147) is reputed to have been concerned only with writers and poets who were his contemporaries or nearly so, but on many occasions he goes back as far as the beginning of the 5th/11th century and even to the end of the preceding century. He was so widely read that he could immediately detect the least obvious plagiarism, and he was irritated by the infatuation of his fellow countrymen for everything from the East—"if a crow croaked in that part of the world or if a fly buzzed on the far borders of Syria or of ʿIrāḳ, they would prostrate themselves as if before an idol", he writes in his preface; hence he was anxious to collect and preserve the verse and the prose works written in Spain, which he with his sound judgement was able to evaluate and to offer to posterity. He himself admitted that the compilation of his anthology had caused him immense trouble, and we have in general no possibility of verifying the authenticity of the texts which it contains. The work, which (according to Yāḳūt) consisted of seven volumes, is divided into four sections: I. Men of letters and poets of Cordova and its surrounding district; edition of 1st part, Cairo 1939, of 2nd part, Cairo 1942; II. the western part of al-Andalus (Seville, Portugal); III. the eastern part of al-Andalus; IV. foreign poets and men of letters living in al-Andalus; ed. 1st part, Cairo 1945. (An edition of the whole work is being prepared (1968) at Paris.) For the manuscripts of the unpublished sections see Brockelmann. The notices are of varying length; they contain in general some biographical data, in an ornate but intelligible prose, citations of earlier authors and historians, notably Ibn Ḥayyān [q.v.], and selected extracts in prose or verse; Ibn Bassām refrains, however, from including the more shocking satirical pieces, probably because of the rigorism which prevailed in his time. A shortened version of the Dhakhīra was made by Ibn Mammātī (542-606/1147-1209) under the title Laṭāʾif al-Dhakhīra wa-ṭarāʾif al-Djazīra (ms. in the Veliüddin Library, Istanbul).

IBN BASSĀM, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥ. b. Naṣr b. Manṣūr b. Bassām al-ʿAbartāʾī, poet and writer of Baghdād. His grandfather, Naṣr, had held high office during the caliphate of al-Muʿtaṣim (see Sourdel, Vizirat, 252), and he himself was at one time employed in the service of the barīd [q.v.]; he probably carried out other administrative duties, since his biographers attribute to him a collection of letters (rasāʾil) which are unlikely to have been of a private nature. However, his fame rests on his epigrams, very brief, for he was short-winded, but effective; many stories are told about his relations with the great men of his time, whom he treated with scant regard, attacking the caliphs and their ministers as well as his own family, so that Yāḳūt counts him among the unfilial (ʿaḳaḳa); he also managed to write verses on the most highly placed of his contemporaries and to attribute them to other poets, for example to Ibn al-Rūmī. Certain eulogies of Ibn al-Furāt or of Ibn Muḳla [q.v.] seem out of place in an almost exclusively epigrammatic output.

Ibn Bassām is besides the author of several works: K. Akhbār ʿUmar b. Abī Rabīʿa, which Ibn al-Nadīm considers this poet's best monograph and for which Yāḳūt gives the many sources; K. Akhbār al-Aḥwaṣ; K. Munāḳadāt al-shuʿarāʾ; K. al-Muʿāḳirīn or al-Zandjiyyīn. He died in 302 or 303/914-6, aged over 70.

IBN BAṬṬA, ʿUbayd Allāh b. Muḥammad Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-ʿUkbarī, more generally known under the name of Ibn Baṭṭa, Ḥanbalī theologian and jurisconsult, born at ʿUkbarā in 304/917. He received his early education at Baghdād, where he went while still very young, in 315 or 316/927 or 928, his principal teachers being, together with a number of less well-known ʿulamāʾ, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim al-Khiraḳī (d. 334/945), the author of the famous Mukhtaṣar, and Abū Bakr al-Nadjdjād (d. 348/960), the renowned jurisconsult, traditionist and preacher, who gave his courses in the mosque of al-Manṣūr. He studied also under ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Djaʿfar (d. 363/974), called Ghulām al-Khallāl, and also knew personally Barbahārī (d. 329/941 [q.v.]) the author of the Kitāb al-Sunna, whose sensational activity in the religious and political life of the period was one of the reasons for the condemnation of Ḥanbalism in 323/935 by the caliph al-Rāḍī.

After the years which he spent studying in Baghdād, Ibn Baṭṭa next stayed in Mecca, where he became the friend of Abū Bakr al-Ādjurī (d. 360/970), the author of the famous Kitāb al-Sharīʿa (Cairo 1369/1950), and went on several other journeys in order to study in ʿIrāḳ (in particular in Baṣra), in the border regions between the Islamic countries and the Byzantine Empire, and also in Damascus, where he was anxious to meditate at the tomb of Abū Ṣāliḥ (d. 330/942), the founder of a mosque situated outside the Bāb Sharḳī (cf. Bidāya, xi, 204-5). When he was about forty—thus about ten years after the arrival of the Būyids in Baghdād (334/945)—Ibn Baṭṭa returned to his native town, where, until his death on 10 Muḥarram 387/23 January 997, he led a secluded life, devoted, it is said, to fasting, meditation and study.

Ibn Baṭṭa wrote several works, listed by the ḳāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥusayn (d. 526/1132) in his Ṭabaḳāt (ii, 152). The two most important, which were to have the greatest influence, were his two professions of faith: his ʿaḳīda in the shorter version, the Ibāna ṣaghīra, which has survived, and the Ibāna kabīra, the text of which appears to be lost, but of which much use was made by the ḳāḍī Abū Yaʿlā b. al-Farrāʾ (d. 458/1066) and Ibn Taymiyya (d. 728/1328). Apart from these two professions of faith, of salafī type, Ibn Baṭṭa's other works deal mainly with fiḳh or ḥadīth; in one of them he criticizes the legitimacy of the juridical subterfuges (ḥiyal [q.v.]) practised by the Ḥanafī school and among certain Shāfiʿis.

Ibn Baṭṭa, through his doctrinal work and his sermons, belongs to the great tradition of Ḥanbalī polemic which was practised, during the century following the death of the founder of the school, by the shaykh ʿAbd Allāh (d. 290/903), Abū Bakr al-Khallāl and Barbahārī. Like them, he denounced and forbade all the blameworthy innovations (bidʿa), which he considered had come to debase the religion founded by the Prophet, in the field of dogma as well as in those of worship, law or morals. His severity concerning bidʿa was such that he refused to distinguish, not only between good and bad *bidʿa*s but also between small and great. He saw as the only means of salvation a return to the primitive religion (dīn ʿatīḳ) exactly as it had been formulated during the lifetime of the Prophet and of the first three caliphs, Abū Bakr, ʿUmar and ʿUthmān.

Ibn Baṭṭa's first disciples were numerous (cf. H. Laoust, La profession de foi ..., intr., note 109) and he himself can be considered as an excellent example of the Sunnī opposition to the Būyid régime, which favoured Shīʿism and, to a lesser degree, Muʿtazilism and falsafa. His influence was profound and lasting. It is found, not only in the Ḥanbalī Ḳādiriyya which the caliph al-Ḳādir (381-422/991-1031) wished, in 409/1018, to make the official credo of the state, but also in the works of men such as the ḳāḍī Abū Yaʿlā or the sharīf Abū Djaʿfar (d. 470/1078), Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb al-Kalwadhānī (d. 510/1117) or ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Djīlī (d. 561/1166). Ibn Baṭṭa was severely attacked by al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071), a Ḥanbalī who had changed to Shāfiʿism and Ashʿarism; he was defended, in his Muntaẓam (193-7), by Ibn al-Djawzī (d. 597/1200), who was much influenced by him.

Under the Ayyūbids there was a revival of interest in Ibn Baṭṭa's dogmatic works with the Damascus traditionist ʿAbd al-Ghanī al-Maḳdisī (d. 600/1204) and also, but to a lesser degree, with the shaykh Muwaffaḳ al-Dīn b. Ḳudāma (d. 620/1223). Under the Mamlūks, Ibn Taymiyya and several of his disciples or admirers such as al-Dhahabī (d. 748/1348), Ibn al-Ḳayyim (d. 750/1350) or Ibn Kathīr (d. 773/1371) were interested in the works of Ibn Baṭṭa, while later the Ḥanafism of the Ottomans was to be one of the factors which caused them to relapse again into semi-oblivion.

IBN BAṬṬŪṬA (sometimes Baṭūṭa), Shams al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Yūsuf al-Lawātī al-Ṭandjī, Moorish traveller born at Tangier on 17 Radjab 703/25 February 1304, died in Morocco in 770/1368-9 or 779/1377, after many lengthy journeys which make him one of the world's most famous travellers (djawwāla) and authors of travel-books (riḥla).

The chronology of his journeys may, in spite of some uncertainties of detail, be set out as follows: (1) Departure from Tangiers 2 Radjab 725/13 June 1325; North Africa; Egypt; Upper Egypt; Syria; departure from Damascus for Mecca in Shawwāl 726/September 1326. (2) Departure from Mecca 20 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 726/17 November 1326; ʿIrāḳ; Khūzistān, Fārs and Djibāl; Tabrīz; Baghdād, Sāmarrā, Mosul, return to Baghdād; a stay in Arabia (with three Pilgrimages) from 727/1327 to 730/1330. (3) Red Sea, Yemen, Aden, Zaylaʿ, Mogadishu and the trading ports of East Africa; return by ʿUmān and the Persian Gulf; a further Pilgrimage in 732/1332. (4) Egypt, Syria; Asia Minor and the territories of the Golden Horde; visit to Constantinople and return to the territories of the Golden Horde; Transoxania and Afghānistān; arrival in the valley of the Indus on 1 Muḥarram 734/12 September 1333; stay at Delhi until Ṣafar 743/July 1342. (5) Stay of a year and a half in the Maldives; Ceylon and a second visit to the Maldives, Bengal, Assam, Sumatra; arrival at the Chinese port of Zaytūn: Ts'üan-chou (it is not certain whether Ibn Baṭṭūṭa reached Peking). (6) Return by Sumatra and Malabar (Muḥarram 748/April-May 1347); the Persian Gulf, Baghdād, Syria, Egypt; a further Pilgrimage. (7) Egypt, Alexandria; embarked in Ṣafar 750/April-May 1349 for Tunis; thence reached Sardinia in a Catalan ship; return by Algeria; arrival at Fez at the end of Shaʿbān 750/November 1349; visit to the kingdom of Granada and return to Morocco. (8) Departure from Sidjilmāsa at the beginning of Muḥarram 753/February 1352; journey across the Sahara; the country of the Niger; return to Sidjilmāsa in Dhu 'l-Kaʿda 754/December 1353.

This chronology suffices to demonstrate the new dimensions which Ibn Baṭṭūṭa gave to the genre of riḥla. Originating from the West, among Spaniards or Maghribīs who were curious to take note, while making the Pilgrimage, of the countries and the customs of the East (which had for long been regarded as the source of knowledge and the model of civilization), the traditional riḥla was centred round the visit to the Holy Places of Arabia. Although Ibn Baṭṭūṭa, especially in the beginnings of his work, conforms to this usage, by degrees the extent of his journeys finally blurs the initial object and raises the riḥla to become in fact a description of the known world.

The documentary value of the Riḥla is closely linked to the history of its text, which was written down not by Ibn Baṭṭūṭa himself, but by a scholar, Ibn Djuzayy [q.v.], commissioned by the Marinid ruler of the time, Abū ʿInān. The writing of it, from Ibn Baṭṭūṭa's dictation, was completed on 3 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 756/9 December 1357, and the definitive text appeared a few months afterwards, under the title of Tuḥfat al-nuẓẓār fī gharāʾib al-amṣār wa-ʿadjāʾib al-asfār. So far as can be judged, the literary form imposed, commencing with his preface, by Ibn Djuzayy's editing inevitably altered in some degree the original aspect of the work; in it are found descriptions which are pertinent, sober and sometimes succinct to the point of dryness, side by side with high-flown passages whose aim is less to give objective information than to produce stylistic exercises on "marvels" such as were then in favour with the educated public. The predilection for unusal details should perhaps not be attributed to Ibn Djuzayy alone, any more than should the exaggeration or the plagiarism: for this reason the problems raised by the voyage to the country of the Bulgars, by the description of China, by certain details concerning Syria and Arabia, clearly borrowed from Ibn Djubayr, and, in a general way, by all the other suspect passages, should not be solved each time by attributing them to the unnecessary intervention of Ibn Djuzayy, all the more since Ibn Baṭṭūṭa, having admitted that he had sometimes lost during his adventures the notes made on his travels and then re-written them from memory, may on occasion have been tempted to use his imagination to make good any failure of his memory. But that being admitted, it may all the same reasonably be considered that the editor systematically exaggerated in the direction of fantasy tendencies which in the original work were certainly more moderate. It is even more certain that the re-arrangement of several itineraries at the sacrifice of the logical chronology of the journeys, the poetical quotations and, above all, the use of an elaborate prose style, are attributable to Ibn Djuzayy.

Whether or not they are original, these weaknesses do not detract from the value of the work as a whole, which has long been recognized in particular for the descriptions of India, of the Turkish principalities of Asia Minor and of the lands of the Niger. The riḥla in the manner of Ibn Baṭṭūṭa thus appeared as one of the most typical forms of the literature of observation (ʿiyān). After the disintegration of the Muslim empire (mamlaka), the depiction of which had been the mainstay of the descriptive geography of the 3rd/9th and 4th/10th centuries, the formation of the new territorial groupings of the Turco-Mongol period, facilitating the movement of merchandise and of people, made possible the appearance of an original form of ʿiyān in the riḥla. Ibn Baṭṭūṭa's place in the history of the genre is at the turning-point: by basing his account on his own travels, around which he builds his professional and even his family life, he goes further than Ibn Djubayr. But already the intervention of Ibn Djuzayy foreshadowed the final development of the riḥla; like all works of ʿiyān, it became part of a more literary tradition in which the facts were taken over and adjusted to the laws of scholarly prose and the tastes of adab. The structure and sequence of the riḥla thus correspond exactly to the chronology; in this respect Ibn Baṭṭūṭa follows Ibn Djubayr and differs from such later writers as al-ʿAbdarī or al-ʿAyyāshī, for whom the riḥla was merely the pretext for writings inspired mainly by literary or religious preoccupations.

The best edition of the text of the Riḥla is still that of C. Defrémery and B. R. Sanguinetti (with Fr. tr.: Paris 1853-9, 4 vols.; a reprint is in preparation). It is the Arabic text of this edition which is followed both by the new Beirut edition (Dār Ṣādir-Dār Bayrūt, 1379/1960, with a short preface by K. al-Bustānī; see review by P. Masnou in Arabica, ix (1962), 211), and also, with important corrections, for the new translation into English by H. A. R. Gibb, The travels of Ibn Baṭṭūṭa (Cambridge [Hakluyt Society] 1958-62, 2 vols., in progress).

IBN AL-BAWWĀB, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Hilāl, known also under the name of Ibn al-Sitrī, famous calligrapher of the Buwayhid period who died in Baghdād in 413/1022 (this date is more probable than 423/1031). He frequented the governmental circles of the period, as he was closely attached to the vizier Fakhr al-Mulk Abū Ghālib Muḥammad b. Khalaf at Baghdād and was for some time in charge of the library of the Buwayhid Bahāʾ al-Dawla at Shīrāz. He was also an illuminator (at least one outstanding example of his work surviving), a devout man who knew the Ḳurʾān by heart and is said to have reproduced sixty-four copies of it, and a man of letters who was well versed in the law and who wrote a treatise and a didactic poem on the art of writing. His real title to fame, however, according to the early Arab authors, was to have perfected the style of writing invented, about a century earlier, by his famous predecessor, the vizier Ibn Muḳla [q.v.] and to have brought it to a degree of well-balanced elegance which was to be surpassed later only by the efforts of Yāḳūt al-Mustaʿṣimī [q.v.]. "The well-proportioned script" (al-khaṭṭ al-mansūb) which he thus made famous in such a remarkable way, and whose basic geometric outlines E. Robertson and N. Abbott have tried to reconstitute by means of a system of theoretical measurement of the letters described in later treatises on calligraphy, has given rise to many different interpretations—particularly since its title itself means perhaps nothing more than a "fine script". It nevertheless seems likely that we are today in a position to evaluate the calligraphy of Ibn Bawwāb through the unique example of it in a Ḳur'ān in the Chester Beatty Library (MS K. 16), signed by Ibn Bawwāb and dated 391/1000-1, whose calligraphy is as splendid as its illuminations. The type of naskhī used in this work, as well as the style of its geometric and floral decorations, form the subject of a long study by D. S. Rice, who applied himself to demonstrating the authenticity of this specimen while revealing forgeries in the five other manuscripts hitherto attributed to the famous calligrapher (among them two copies of the Dīwān of Salāma b. Djandal preserved in Istanbul, which do indeed date from the 5th/11th century but which had had false signatures added).

IBN AL-BAYṬĀR, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD ʿABD ALLĀH B. AḤMAD AL-DĪN B. AL-BAYṬĀR AL-MĀLAḲĪ, botanist and pharmacologist, born in Malaga at the end of the 6th/12th century. He probably belonged to the family of the same name whose existence in Malaga is attested by Ibn al-Abbār (Muʿdjam, nos. 35, 165, 241). He studied in Seville and collected plants in the districts round the town with his teachers Abu 'l-ʿAbbās al-Nabātī, ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṣāliḥ and Abu 'l-Ḥadjdjādj. In about 617/1220 he emigrated to the East: after crossing North Africa (Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia), he visited Asia Minor and Syria and, on his arrival in Egypt, he was appointed by the Ayyūbid al-Malik al-Kāmil as head of the herbalists (ra'īs ʿalā sā'ir al-ʿashshābīn). From Cairo he made several scientific expeditions; he next settled in Damascus, where his pupil was Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa, with whom he collected plants. He died here in 646/1248.

His main works are: (1) al-Mughnī fi 'l-adwiya al-mufrada, dedicated to al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Nadjm al-Dīn Ayyūb, in which he gives the appropriate simples for each illness. (2) al-Djāmiʿ li-mufradāt al-adwiya wa 'l-aghdhiya, with the same dedication (printed Cairo 1291/1874; good Fr. tr. by L. Leclerc in Notices et extraits, xxiii, xxv and xxvi (1877-83); German tr. by J. Sontheimer, Stuttgart 1840-2). In this work the author lists in alphabetical order some 1400 simples, animal, vegetable and mineral, basing it on his own observations and also on over 150 authorities including al-Rāzī, Ibn Sīnā, al-Idrīsī and al-Ghāfiḳī. Meyerhof and Sobhy (The abridged version of the book of simple drugs of ... al-Ghafiqi by Gregorius Abu-l-Farag (Barhebraeus), Cairo, fasc. I (1932), 32-3) consider that the Djāmiʿ of Ibn al-Bayṭār is merely plagiarized from the pharmacopoeia of al-Ghāfiḳī with the addition of material obtained from the works of his teachers. Apart from this doubtful statement (particularly since the mediaeval idea of intellectual honesty was different from that of today), it should be mentioned that, of the total number of simples studied, about a thousand were already known to Greek authors. This work had a considerable influence both outside and within the Islamic world, for example on the Armenian Amir Dowlat. (3) Mīzān al-ṭabīb. (4) Risāla fi 'l-aghdhiya wa 'l-adwiya. (5) Maḳāla fi 'l-līmūn. (6) Commentary on Dioscorides, of which a manuscript has been found and which contains a list of 550 drugs which appear in the first four books of Dioscorides; the technical terms are frequently accompanied by their Latin and Berber equivalents (see MMMA, iii/1 (1957), 105-12).

IBN BĪBĪ, AL-ḤUSAYN B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿALĪ AL-DJAʿFARĪ AL-RUGHADĪ, known by the name of Ibn al-Bībī al-Munadjdjima (son of the "lady", the astrologer) or simply Ibn Bībī, is the author of al-Awāmir al-ʿAlā'iyya fi 'l-umūr al-ʿAlā'iyya, written in Persian, which was completed early in 680 A.H. (beg. 22 April 1281); it deals with the period from 588/1192 to 679/1280 and is an extremely important work for the history of the Seldjūks of Rūm in whose domains it was written. This work is neither a chronicle nor a pragmatical history in the strict sense. The author's intention was, as he himself states in the introduction (cf. MS Aya Sofya 2985 [henceforward referred to as AS] p. 11), to hand down what he himself had heard and seen, in the literary style of the time. The main part of Ibn Bībī's work may therefore be classed as memoirs, which gain especial value from the facts that Ibn Bībī was Mālik-i Dīwān al-Ṭughrā or Amīr Dīwān al-Ṭughrā at the court of the Rūm-Seldjūks, and thus in effect head of the chancellery of the Secretariat of State (cf. Mukhtaṣar [see below], 2 and 196), and that his father, Madjd al-Dīn Muḥammad Tardjumān (Sulṭān Walad in a ḳaṣīda refers to him as Madjd al-Dīn ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, see Divanı Sultan Veled, ed. F. Nafiz Uzluk, Ankara 1941, 143, no. 240), was for a long time at the court of Djalāl al-Dīn Khwārazmshāh as Munshī, from 631/1233-4 worked as Secretary in the Seldjūk chancellery at Konya and was sent on a number of diplomatic missions (see AS, 482, 485, 542).

Practically all that is known of Ibn Bībī's life is what he himself relates about it in his work (cf. AS, 10, 442-3, Mukhtaṣar, vii ff. and 196-9). The exact date of his death is not known, yet it seems certain that he must have been still alive in the months between Shaʿbān 683/October 1284 and Shawwāl 684/ December 1285 (cf. H. W. Duda, Zur Geschichtsforschung über die Rūm-Seldschuken, in ZDMG, lxxxix (1935) p. 19 f.). Ibn Bībī's mother, who belonged to a distinguished family from Nīshāpūr, was highly skilled in astrology and a considerable authority on this subject. She was no longer alive in the last months of 679/early 1281. His father, who came of a prominent family of Djurdjān, died in Shaʿbān 670/March 1272 at an advanced age. In 628/1231, when Djalāl al-Dīn Khwārazmshāh's power was waning, Ibn Bībī's parents had moved to the court of the Ayyūbid Malik al-Ashraf Muẓaffar al-Dīn Mūsā at Damascus, whence they were invited to Konya by the Rūm-Seldjūk sultan ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn Kayḳobād I, who had heard of the exceptional ability of Ibn Bībī's mother.

Ibn Bībī's work is preserved in three forms:

(1) The above-mentioned original work—the Aya Sofya manuscript as written for the Seldjūk sultan Ghiyāth al-Dīn Kaykhusraw III. For details of the facsimile edition of this manuscript and of the first volume of a printed edition, see Bibl. Ibn Bībī was commissioned to write this work by ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn ʿAṭā Malik b. Muḥammad Djuwaynī [see DJUWAYNĪ], to whom he also dedicated it.

(2) An epitome (mukhtaṣar), also written in Persian, by an anonymous epitomizer while Ibn Bībī was still alive, between Shaʿbān 683/October 1284 and Shawwāl 684/December 1285, which omits a great part of the rhetorical padding of the original work and leaves out the mention of Djuwaynī. This epitome was edited from the manuscript in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris (Supp. Persan 1536, apparently of the 9th/15th century) by M. Th. Houtsma as Recueil, iv, 1902 [see Bibl.].

(3) A paraphrase into Turkish, with occasional omissions and interpolations, of the original work al-Awāmir al-ʿAlāʾiyya ... by Yazîdjîoghlu ʿAlī in the third section of his Oghuznāme, often called also Selčūknāme, which he composed for the Ottoman sultan Murād II in 827/1423-4 or 840/1436-7 (for the date see H. W. Duda, Zeitgenössische islamische Quellen und das Oġuznāme des Jazyǧyoǧlu ʿAlī zur angeblichen türkischen Besiedlung der Dobrudscha im 13. Jhd. n. Chr., in the Spisanie of the Bulgarian Academy, lxvi/2 (Sofia 1943), 138 and P. Wittek, Miscellanea, in TM, xiv (1965), 263 ff.). There are a number of more or less complete manuscripts of this Oghuznāme of Yazîdjîoghlu ʿAlī in the libraries of Ankara, Berlin, Istanbul, Leiden, Leningrad, Moscow and Paris (cf. Adnan S. Erzi in IA art. Ibn Bîbî, 716b, and P. Wittek in Isl., xx (1932), 202). An edition by M. Th. Houtsma (Recueil, iii, see Bibl.) is based on two incomplete manuscripts (Leiden, Warner 419 and Paris, Bibl. Nat. Ancien fonds turc 62) of Yazîdjîoghlu ʿAlī's translation. This contains only about half of the section devoted to the Seldjūks of Asia Minor. There is also an epitome of the Oghuznāme made by Seyyid Loḳmān [see LOḲMĀN, SEYYID] in 1008/1599; the unique manuscript is in the Austrian National Library (see Flügel, ii, 225, no. 1001); it was edited and translated into Latin by J. J. W. Lagus (see Bibl.). H. W. Duda's Die Seltschukengeschichte ... (see Bibl.) is a complete German translation, with commentary, of Ibn Bībī's Mukhtaṣar (Houtsma, Recueil, iv) in which Houtsma's text has been supplemented on the basis of Ms. Aya Sofya 2985 and the Oghuznāme (Houtsma, Recueil, iii, controlled by the manuscript of the Staatsbibliothek, Berlin, Orient Quart 1823).

IBN AL-BIRR, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ʿALĪ B. AL-ḤASAN (or al-Ḥusayn) AL-ṢIḲILLĪ, lexicographer and philologist born in Sicily towards the end of the 4th/10th century. After studying in the east (in 415/1024 he was at Alexandria and Mahdiyya with Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ismāʿīl al-Tudjībī al-Barḳī) he returned to the island at the end of the Kalbī period at the time when the country was split up by the greed of several ḳāʾids. It was one of these ḳāʾids, Ibn Mankūd (the sources do not agree on the spelling of this name), the ruler of Mazara, who welcomed him warmly. Ibn al-Birr devoted himself to teaching in his new residence and had occasion to meet there the poet Ibn Rashīḳ al-Ḳayrawānī [q.v.]. But the "Sicilian's" addiction to drink obliged his patron Ibn Mankūd to send him away from Mazara; the scholar went to Palermo, where he continued to carry on his profession of philologist and remained there, according to Ibn Abbār, until 460/1067-8.

The sources, which mention no work by Ibn al-Birr, are unanimous in attributing to him three merits: (1) the transmission of the famous dictionary al-Ṣiḥāḥ of al-Djawharī (which he had received from his master Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad al-Nīsābūrī) to his pupil Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭāʿ [q.v.], who is said to have helped to circulate the work in Egypt; but the chain Nīsābūrī-Ibn al-Birr-Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭāʿ is regarded as doubtful by certain biographers; (2) his contribution, in Egypt, to the survival of the poetic tradition of al-Mutanabbī (in which he had been initiated by his master Ṣāliḥ b. Rishdīn) as well as in Sicily, where the fame of the panegyrist of Sayf al-Dawla dated from the immigration into the island (in 375/985) of ʿAlī b. Ḥamza al-Baṣrī, rāwī of al-Mutanabbī; (3) the revision of the Tathḳīf al-lisān wa-talḳīḥ al-djanān, a work of Siculo-Maghribī dialectology compiled by his pupil Abū Ḥafṣ ʿUmar b. Makkī [see IBN MAKKĪ].

IBN BUHLŪL, Aḥmad b. Isḥāḳ b. al-Buhlūl Djaʿfar al-Tanūkhī, born in 231/846 and died at Baghdād in 318/930, was primarily a Ḥanafī ḳāḍī. Trained in the doctrines of his madhhab by his father and Ibrāhīm b. Saʿīd al-Djawharī, he received also a very careful education in the fields of philology and of belles-lettres. He followed, in grammar, the school of Kūfa and had the reputation of being a judicious critic of poetry and of adab. Appointed in 276/889 by the regent al-Muwaffaḳ, during the caliphate of al-Muʿtamid (256-79/870-92), and on the advice of Ismāʿīl al-Bulbul, ḳāḍī of Anbār, Hīt and of the district of the Euphrates, Ibn Buhlūl then remained in the service of al-Muʿtaḍid (279-89/892-902), the son of al-Muwaffaḳ. Al-Muktafī (289-95/902-8) appointed him, in 292/904-5, ḳāḍī of the Djibāl. At the beginning of the reign of al-Muḳtadir (295-320/908-32), Ibn Buhlūl, who had not yet taken up his new post, would have nothing to do with the plot of Ibn Muʿtazz's supporters against the new caliph in 296/909. ʿAlī b. al-Furāt, who then succeeded to the vizierate (296-99/909-12), appointed him ḳāḍī at Madīnat al-Manṣūr and, in 298/911, entrusted him in addition with the ḳaḍāʾ of al-Ahwāz. Without having the title of ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt, Ibn Buhlūl seems to have enjoyed all the prestige and the prerogatives of this post. He retained his offices throughout the reign of al-Muḳtadir, until 317/929.

Ibn Buhlūl, who was thus in the service of several caliphs and viziers, appears as a man of great independence of character. He refused to annul, at the request of the mother of al-Muḳtadir, a waḳf which she had founded; he was also able, while having served Ibn al-Furāt, to survive his disgrace and to defend him under Ḥāmid b. al-ʿAbbās (306-11/918-23), and later to defend also ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā during the third vizierate of Ibn al-Furāt (311-2/923-4), when the Ḳarmaṭī policy of the "good vizier" was called into question.

IBN BUḲAYLA, ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. ʿAmr b. Ḳays b. Ḥayyān b. Buḳayla al-Ghassānī, legendary character who is supposed to have lived for 350 years (only 320 according to al-Ibshīhī, Mustaṭraf, ii, 44) and thus takes his place among the muʿammarūn [q.v.]. The name of his ancestor, who is credited with the construction of al-Ḳaṣr al-abyaḍ at al-Ḥīra, is often corrupted to Nufayla, but the correct reading is furnished by the tradition according to which this Buḳayla owed his surname to a green silk garment, which was the reason for his nickname of "little cabbage".

It is possible that Ibn Buḳayla was an historical person; no historian has cast doubt on this, and some Banū Buḳayla are mentioned at al-Ḥīra by al-Yaʿḳūbī. However, the traditions relating to him have, in addition to his longevity, many legendary characteristics. The strangest tradition is that which associates ʿAbd al-Masīḥ b. Buḳayla with the Djurhum [q.v.] and according to which ʿAbd Allāh b. Djudʿān [q.v.] discovered his body in a catacomb near Mecca. This tradition is related by al-Hamdānī (Iklīl, viii, 161 ff.), who states elsewhere (153) on the authority of Ibn al-Kalbī that the body of Ibn Buḳayla was discovered lying on a marble plinth in a catacomb reported this time as being close to al-Ḥīra. Elsewhere this character plays a part in two other traditions of Islamic origin. According to the first, he was sent by Parvīz II (or Anūshirwān) to the soothsayer Saṭīḥ [q.v.], who was related to him in the female line (!), to question him on the meaning of certain supernatural phenomena (dream of the grand mobadh, shocks to the Īwān etc.), which were interpreted as announcing the imminent coming of a prophet (see R. Basset, La Bordah du Cheikh al Bousiri, Paris 1894, 59-62). The second of these traditions relates that when Khālid b. al-Walīd [q.v.] was besieging al-Ḥīra, he was attacked with projectiles of burning material and then asked the townspeople to send to him a mature and experienced man for him to question on their situation. ʿAbd al-Masīḥ was therefore sent before Khālid, whose questions, however, he took in a different sense from that intended by the general. Ibn Buḳayla's answers are similar to those found in folk-stories (see Montaignon and Raynaud, Recueil de fabliaux, Paris 1877-88, ii, 52). For example, the question, "The son of how many are you?", meaning, "How old are you?", was answered by "The son of only one man". Afterwards he made as if to poison himself, but Khālid took the poison from his hands and swallowed it without suffering the least inconvenience. This caused Ibn Buḳayla to advise his countrymen not to resist the Arab general any further. In one of his replies the old man declared that at one time the sea reached as far as the outskirts of al-Ḥīra, and al-Masʿūdī uses this to support his thesis on the movement of seas and continents, apparently convinced of the truth of such a tradition.

Finally, although ʿAbd al-Masīḥ was not converted to Islam, it is he at least who is said to have pointed out to Saʿd b. Abī Waḳḳāṣ [q.v.] a suitable site for the foundation of Kūfa.

IBN BULBUL [see ISMĀʿĪL b. BULBUL].

IBN BURD [see BASHSHĀR B. BURD].

IBN BURD, name of the members of an Andalusian family (the Banū Burd), of which two representatives in particular enjoy some fame.

I.—Ibn Burd al-Akbar, Abū Ḥafṣ Aḥmad, was head of the Chancellery (dīwān al-inshāʾ) under al-Muẓaffar after the arrest and execution of Abū Marwān ʿAbd al-Malik b. Idrīs al-Djazīrī in 394/1004: with the chief ḳāḍī Ibn Dhakwān [q.v.], he paved the way for the recognition of Sanchuelo [see ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN IBN ABĪ ʿĀMIR] as heir presumptive to the caliphate, and it was he who drew up the act of investiture dated Rabīʿ I 399/November 1008; along with other dignitaries, he provided a deputy for Sanchuelo during the latter's absence, then, having taken up office once again during the reign of al-Mustaʿīn, he was appointed kātib during the caliphate of Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī, became a minister in the cabinet formed by al-Mustaẓhir (414/1023), retired to Saragossa shortly before 417/1026 and died there in 418/1027, more than 80 years of age. Thanks to his perfect mastery of the office of Kātib and to his political prudence he was able to live through a troubled period in the history of Andalusia without mishap. According to Ibn Bassām (Dhakhīra, i/1, 84 ff.), there existed a dīwān containing all his correspondence, of which the author of the Dhakhīra has given some well chosen extracts; other specimens of his writing can be found in nearly all the sources dealing with this period. Not only do they show the characteristics of his prose and his talents as head of the Chancellery, but they are also indispensable documents for the study of the history and politics of the time. Unlike the majority of the kuttāb of his day, Ibn Burd al-Akbar is strikingly clear, precise and always to the point. His style is elegant, sober and flowing; he never uses out-of-the-way words and avoids the pedantic expressions so dear to his contemporaries; sadjʿ is even used with such skill that it hardly attracts one's attention. It should be observed that, in spite of the troubled times in which he worked, he was anxious to maintain the technical tradition of the Chancellery of the caliphs, insisting on the perfection with which official documents should be written and assigning great importance to paper, ink, writing, the address and its position, etc. In this respect he was the last Andalusian master of the Chancellery to keep up the great traditions of the Spanish Umayyads.

II.—Ibn Burd al-Aṣghar, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad, grandson of the above, Andalusian author and poet of the first half of the 5th/11th century. Born about 395/1005 at Cordova, he died at Almeria in 445/1054. His father, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Burd, had remained almost unknown, and it was the grandson who revived the tradition of Ibn Burd al-Akbar.

It is highly probable that he left Cordova for Saragossa with his grandfather, shortly before 417/1026; after the death of the latter he went to Denia where he was employed in the chancellery of Mudjāhid [q.v.], but cannot have remained there for long, for he was at Cordova again in 426/1035, pronouncing the funeral prayer at the grave of Ibn Shuhayd (the Banū Burd were mawālī of the Banū Shuhayd). The following year, 427/1036, his name is quoted by Ibn ʿIdhārī as the author of a document proclaiming the reappearance of Hishām II al-Mu'ayyad brought about by the astute Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl Ibn ʿAbbād with a view to promoting his own designs; this fact seems to prove that Ibn Burd was at that time head of the chancellery; Ibn ʿAbbād's ruse was discovered, and Ibn Burd gave up his position. After that he was to be found in Almeria in the service of Maʿn b. Ṣumādiḥ whose reign began in 433/1041, and he remained there till his death in 445/1054.

Aḥmad Ibn Burd al-Aṣghar was a prolific poet and writer whose art is known to us thanks once again to Ibn Bassām. His poetry is like that of most of his contemporaries, but his prose is different, for it follows the example, on the one hand, of his grandfather, and on the other, of Ibn Shuhayd. Ibn Bassām quotes long passages from his works: Sirr al-adab wa-sabk al-dhahab (i/2, 18 ff.); Risālat al-sayf wa 'l-kalam (i/2, 435 ff.) and al-Risāla al-badiʿa fī tafḍīl uhab al-shā' ʿalā mā yuftarash min al-wiṭā' (i/2, 446 ff.), besides a brief essay on the palm tree, Risāla fi 'l-nakhla (i/2, 441 ff.). The first of these texts is an unsuccessful imitation of the Kitāb al-Akhlāk wa 'l-siyar of Ibn Ḥazm, in which Ibn Burd tries to give specimens of his writing on different subjects; the second is a dialogue between the sword and the pen, in which he sometimes succeeds in giving the debate a faintly dramatic aspect; but he does not carry the comparison beyond the external merits of the two antagonists; the last two are ordinary essays with dialogues interspersed. Yākūt attributes two books to him: al-Taḥṣīl fī tafsīr al-Kur'ān and al-Tafṣīl fī tafsīr al-Kur'ān, but we know nothing of what these were like.

IBN BURGHŪTH [see muḥammad b. ʿumar].

IBN BUṬLĀN, al-Mukhtār (or Yuwānīs = Johannes) b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbdūn b. Saʿdūn b. Buṭlān, a Christian physician and theologian of Baghdād. He was the foremost disciple of the Christian priest, philosopher and physician, Ibn al-Ṭayyib [q.v.], and Ibn Buṭlān himself was certainly a Nestorian cleric and probably a priest. He used to teach medicine and philosophy in Baghdād, but left his native city in Ramaḍān 440/January 1049 for a journey which took him by way of Raḥba, Ruṣāfa, Aleppo, Antioch, Laodicea and Jaffa to Cairo, where he arrived in Djumādā II 441/November 1049. In Aleppo he was honoured by the Mirdāsid governor Muʿizz al-Dawla Thimāl b. Ṣāliḥ (Zambaur, 33, 133), and he advised him on the healthiest location of a hospital which was to be built there; the governor also authorized him to regulate the worship of the Christians, but these last disliked the rules which he made. In Cairo, he became the target of the hostility of his Egyptian colleague, Ibn Riḍwān [q.v.], and there ensued a remarkable medico-philosophical controversy in which the two adversaries tried to exhibit their entire erudition, particularly in Greek medicine and philosophy. "Ibn Buṭlān was the more gracious in style, more spirited and more distinguished in literature and subjects connected with it" (Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa). After a stay in Cairo of three or four years, he went to Constantinople where he arrived in the summer of 446/1054; his arrival there coincided with the crisis which led to the schism between the Greek and the Latin Church, and the Patriarch, Michael Cerularius, asked Ibn Buṭlān to compose for him a treatise on the doctrine of the Eucharist, and in particular on the controversial point of the use of unleavened bread. Ibn Buṭlān stayed in Constantinople for one year and then returned to Syria, alternating between Aleppo and Antioch; he was for some time in the service of Abu 'l-Mutawwadj Muḳallad b. Naṣr b. Munḳidh (d. 450/1059), the great-grandfather of Usāma b. Munḳidh [q.v.]; in 455/1063 we find him supervising the building of a hospital in Antioch and at the same time engaged in literary work. Finally he became a monk and retired to a monastery in Antioch; he died on 8 Shawwāl 458/2 September 1066 and was buried in the church of the monastery.

The literary production of Ibn Buṭlān is distinguished by its originality. (1) His main work is the Taḳwīm al-ṣiḥḥa, a synopsis of hygiene and macrobiotics in the form of tables, an arrangement borrowed from works of astronomy; al-Ghazālī in the preface of his Iḥyā' refers to it as his precedent for using an arrangement familiar to the readers from another branch of learning, and it served as a model for the Sulūk al-mālik fī tadbīr al-mamālik, a "mirror for princes" by Ibn Abi 'l-Rabīʿ (wrote 655/1256; cf. G. Richter, Fürstenspiegel, 1932, 106, n. 4; Brockelmann, I, 230; S I, 372; M. Plessner, Οἰκονομικός, 30-35). It was translated into Latin with the title Tacuini Sanitatis Elluchasem Elimithar Medici de Baldath, Argentorati 1531, second ed. 1533, and into German, by Michael Herr, with the title Schachtafeln der Gesundheit, Strassburg 1533; see E. Wickersheimer, Les Tacuini sanitatis et leur traduction allemande par Michel Herr, in Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance, xii (1950), 85-97. Facsimile editions of MSS of the Latin translation: Il Tacuinum Sanitatis, by Elena Berti Tosca, Paris 1937, and Theatrum Sanitatis, by L. Serra and S. Baglioni, 2 vols., 1940; see also Unity and Variety in Muslim Civilization, ed. G. E. von Grunebaum, Chicago 1955, 363 f. Another Latin treatise of hygiene is based on this work (see Brockelmann). (Add to the manuscripts mentioned by Brockelmann: Brit. Museum, Add. 3676; London, Royal College of Physicians, see Tritton in JRAS, 1951, 185, No. 24. On the title, see Thorndike and Sarton, in Isis, x, 489-93.) (2) Daʿwat al-atibbā', "The Medical Dinner Party", written in 450/1058 and dedicated to Naṣr al-Dawla Aḥmad b. Marwān, the Marwānid ruler of Mayyāfāriḳīn (401/1010-453/1060; Zambaur, p. 136), a witty skit on quacks, their ignorance and arrogance, with remarks on the ethics of the medical profession. A commentary by a Christian author of Baghdād dates from the 6th/12th century. Edition of the text, by Dr. Bishāra Zalzal, Alexandria 1901; study with summary in French, by Dr. Mahmoud Sedky Bey, Un banquet de médecins, Cairo 1928; on the miniatures in an illuminated manuscript of the Ambrosiana, dated 672/1273, (not mentioned by Brockelmann), see Dr. Djamāl al-Dīn Muḥriz, Min al-taṣwīr al-mamlūkī: nuskha min Daʿwat al-aṭibbā' li-bn Buṭlān, in MMMA, vii (1961), 75-80, and R. Ettinghausen, Arab painting, 1962, 143 f. (Ibn Buṭlān's Daʿwat al-ḳusūs, "The Priests' Dinner Party", which was perhaps a counterpart to the Daʿwat al-aṭibbā', has unfortunately not been preserved.) (3) Tadbīr al-amrāḍ al-ʿāriḍa ʿala 'l-akthar bi-'l-aghdhiya al-ma'lūfa wa-'l-adwiya al-mawdjūda yantafiʿu bihā ruhbān al-adyira wa-man baʿuda min al-madīna, a treatise on homely remedies, particularly for the benefit of monks. (4) Risāla fī shirā' al-raḳīḳ wa-taḳlīb al-ʿabīd, on how to buy slaves and how to detect bodily defects; extracts from the contents in Mez, Renaissance, 156-8; Spanish tr. by S. Vilá, El Renacimiento del Islam, Madrid 1936, 204-7; Eng. tr., 160-2. (5) Two treatises directed against Ibn Riḍwān [q.v.] dating from 441/1049-50, edited and translated by Schacht-Meyerhof, below; a third and final treatise, written after Ibn Buṭlān had left Cairo, and called Waḳʿat al-aṭibbā', has not been preserved. (6) A report of Ibn Buṭlān, addressed at his request to the man of letters and minister, Hilāl al-Ṣābi' [q.v.], on his journey from Baghdād to Cairo; it was incorporated in Muḥammad b. Hilāl's Kitāb al-Rabīʿ, and considerable extracts have been preserved in the biography of Ibn al-Ḳifṭī and the Geographisches Wörterbuch of Yāḳūt. These were translated into English by G. Le Strange, Palestine under the Muslims, London 1890, 370-5, and from English into German by R. Röhricht, Geschichte des ersten Kreuzzuges, Innsbruck 1901, 242-6. This report contains most valuable descriptions of Aleppo, Antioch, Laodicea and other cities at the time of Ibn Buṭlān's visit. The treatise, together with other indications, shows the kind of society in which Ibn Buṭlān moved. (7) Ibn Buṭlān's "Treatise on the Eucharist", Maḳāl fi'l ḳurbān al-muḳaddas, hastily written in the summer of 446/1054; extracts in text and translation by G. Graf, Oriens Christianus, xxxv (1938), 46-70, 175-91. (8) Quotations from his notes for an autobiography, with remarks on the epidemics which he witnessed, have been preserved by Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa. (9) Ibn Buṭlān's last recorded work, on which he worked in 455/1063, is a Discourse, Maḳāla, "on the reason why the skilled physicians have changed the treatment of most diseases which were formerly treated with hot remedies, advising in their place a cooling treatment, e.g. for plegia, facial paralysis, paresis and others, and why they disagree with the rules laid down by the Ancients in compendiums (kanānish) and pharmacopoeias (aḳrābādhīnāt), and how this new system has gradually gained ground in ʿIrāḳ and the neighbouring countries from the beginning of the year 377/988 down to the year 455"; Ibn Buṭlān refers to changes in climate and subsequent changes in vegetation; extracts have been preserved in the biographies of Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa and of al-Ṭabbākh, who quotes Abū Dharr al-Ḥalabī. Ibn Buṭlān's refusal to follow slavishly the doctrines of the Ancients, notwithstanding his deep knowledge of them, also appears from his controversy with Ibn Riḍwān. Further writings are mentioned by Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa and by Brockelmann. (The ʿUmdat al-ṭabīb fī maʿrifat al-nabāt li-kull labīb, attributed to Ibn Buṭlān in one of the two known manuscripts [the other is anonymous], is in reality the work of an Andalusian botanist and pharmacologist of the 5th/11th or 6th/12th century; see M. Asín Palacios, Glosario de voces romances, Madrid and Granada 1943.)

IBN DA'B, ABU 'L-WALĪD ʿĪSĀ B. YAZĪD B. BAKR B. DA'B AL-LAYTHĪ AL-MADANĪ, traditionist, genealogist, rāwī and poet of Medina who, after having been a schoolmaster, lived for a time at the court of al-Mahdī and longer at that of al-Hādī, from whom he received unusual favour, and died in 171/787. He owes his fame mainly to the elegance and delicacy of his speech and his manners, to the extent of his knowledge of genealogies and of early poetry, to his readiness in repartee and to his skill in finding verses apt for the circumstances, which made him an ideal companion for important persons, in spite of his pride and his sometimes rather offhand attitude to the caliph, who seems to have overlooked all this impertinence. There is an anecdote which, albeit presented differently by various authors (see D. Sourdel, Vizirat, 123), shows that al-Hādī had no hesitation in offering him considerable sums for a few well-chosen verses.

In the field of the transmission of ḥadīths, of the historical traditions and of the works of the poets of the Ḥidjāz, Ibn Da'b was not very highly thought of; indeed, although such writers as al-Djāḥiẓ (though he does express doubts in Bighāl, § 14), Ibn Ḳutayba or Ibn Sallām see no harm in reproducing traditions on his authority, Khalāf al-Aḥmar and other transmitters accuse him of inventing ḥadīths; furthermore, Abū ʿAmr ibn al-ʿAlā' points out numerous mistakes in the poems which he transmitted, while others consider that he invented akhbār concerning the Arabs. These accusations may be due in part to jealousy, but they may not have been entirely unfounded.

The name of Ibn Da'b usually refers to ʿĪsā b. Yazīd, but many other members of his family are cited as transmitters of historical and genealogical traditions: his great-uncle Ḥudhayfa b. Da'b, his father Yazīd b. Bakr, his brother Yaḥyā b. Yazīd and his cousin Muḥammad b. Ḥudhayfa.

IBN AL-DABAYTHĪ [see IBN AL-DUBAYTHĪ].

IBN ḌABBA [see YAZĪD B. MIḲSAM].

IBN DĀNIYĀL, SHAMS AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. DĀNIYĀL B. YŪSUF AL-KHUZĀʿĪ AL-MAWṢILĪ, b. ca. 646/1248, d. 710/1310, Arab writer in Egypt. Born in Mawṣil; from the age of 19, he lived in Cairo, studying and practising ophthalmology. In literary and colloquial Arabic poetry and versified prose, he wrote some of the earliest shadow-plays in mediaeval Egypt. He apparently composed some Arabic poems too, but he is mainly memorable for the keen observation reflected in his dramatic works. All three plays were actually intended for production, and the manuscripts were most probably intended to serve as guides rather than as binding texts; the producer could, and did, depart from them.

The three plays are: (1) Ṭayf al-khayāl (The shadow of imagination) relates the story of Wiṣāl, an erstwhile soldier, ensnared by the wiles of a match-maker. The comic element is provided by his frustration, when he lifts the bride's veil after the wedding-ceremony, and discovers that she is a monster, in everything the opposite of the match-maker's promises; (2) ʿAdjīb wa-Gharīb (ʿAdjīb and Gharīb) lacks a plot and is a parade of characters, common in the market-place, plying their odd or dishonest trades—mainly quack-doctors, animal-tamers, and performers; the play is named after two quick-witted rogues who appear at its start; (3) al-Mutayyam (The Enamoured) presents a succession of prizefights of cocks, rams and bulls, accompanied by comments and music, and loosely connected by a thin plot: al-Mutayyam and his rival-in-love initiate these prize-fights; and, at the play's end, a party is thrown open to all sorts of pathological characters, who come to feast on a slain bull.

While Ibn Dāniyāl's first play is a farce, the other two are comedies of manners. Ridicule is achieved by contrast, slapstick and obscenity. Lip-service to morals is paid to a limited extent in the second play (in a special ending), and more so in the epilogues of the first (the disappointed bridegroom decides on a pilgrimage to the Ḥidjāz, to atone for his sins) and of the third (the Angel of Death makes an appearance). However, the plays' main asset lies not in their plot or literary quality, but rather in their reflexion of the times. They are a realist's description of mores in late 7th/13th century Egypt. Most mediaeval shadow-plays in Arabic were composed by the producers or their circle; Ibn Dāniyāl, however, was a physician by training and occupation, and it is an open question whether or not he incorporated into his plays earlier materials (owned by shadow-play producers), of which hardly anything is known today.

Bibliography: The three plays have been published together (not a complete version) by Muḥammad Taḳi'l-Dīn al-Hilālī, Baghdād 1948. IBN DARRĀDJ AL-ḲASṬALLĪ, ABŪ ʿUMAR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ʿĀṢĪ B. AḤMAD B. SULAYMĀN B. ʿĪSĀ B. DARRĀDJ, Andalusian poet whose nisba derives from Ḳasṭallat Darrādj, a place which R. Blachère wishes to identify with Cacella (now in Portugal) but which more probably corresponds to Cazalilla or Castellar de Santisteban, in the province of Jaén. Born in Muḥarram 347/March 958, he belonged to a noble family of Ṣanhādja origin which had settled in Spain at the time of the Arab conquest. He seems to have studied at Jaén and to have become acquainted with literary circles in Cordova. Apart from this, nothing at all is known of his early life.

At the age of 35, he appeared as an already accomplished poet at the court of al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī ʿĀmir in 382/992. The poem with which he introduced himself (see Dīwān, no. 3), and which contains some details on his family life (for example that he had a daughter eight years old), was considered by the critics at the court to be too perfect to be by an inexperienced poet and some of them accused him of plagiarism. In order to test him, al-Manṣūr summoned him during the night of Thursday 3 Shawwāl 382/1 December 992 and invited him to improvise a description of a tray of apples surrounded by jonquils; the poet then wrote (see Dīwān, no. 149) and recited a poem (no. 100) in which he refuted the charges of plagiarism and claimed qualities as a poet and a prose-writer that entitled him to a position in the court. After this test Ibn Darrādj's fortunes began to rise. Al-Manṣūr rewarded him generously, had his name inscribed in the register of his official poets, and appointed him to a post in the Dīwān al-inshāʾ. For sixteen years he remained in the service of al-Manṣūr and of his son ʿAbd al-Malik al-Muẓaffar; this period corresponds to the zenith of the splendour of Muslim Spain and to a period of military and political power such as it was never to know again. Under the ʿĀmirid dictatorship, Ibn Darrādj became the celebrator of the ʿĀmirids and their victories, the chronicler of their exploits and the most highly esteemed panegyrist of their court.

The assassination of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī ʿĀmir [q.v.] in 399/1008 and the beginning of the fitna inaugurated a new phase in his life. During the first four years he lived at Cordova; he foresaw the dramatic change of régime which was to take place, but, unhampered by excessive moral scruples, he addressed his panegyrics to all those who followed one another on the throne: Muḥammad b. Hishām al-Mahdī, Sulaymān al-Mustaʿīn, al-Ḳāsim b. Ḥammūd, etc. Finally, despairing of seeing the situation return to normal, he decided to leave the capital. His first and only journey outside the Peninsula took him, in 404/1014, to Ceuta, at that time governed by ʿAlī b. Ḥammūd, the future founder of the first ʿAlid régime in Spain. Ibn Darrādj, with his opportunism as a court poet, addressed to him a poem feigning Shīʿī sympathies. However, he does not appear to have found at the Ḥammūdid court the serenity which he was seeking, since he was obliged to undertake, during four years, many journeys to various minor courts. Until 408/1018 he travelled through the kingdoms of Almeria, Valencia, Játiva and Tortosa, addressing his poems, without much success, to the Slavonic princelings. Finally he arrived, in 408/1018, in Saragossa, where he attached himself to the court of al-Mundhir b. Yaḥyā al-Tudjībī; for about ten years Ibn Darrādj lived a relatively tranquil life, once again holding the positions of chief official poet and of secretary of the chancellery which he had held at the court of the ʿĀmirids, and serving as court poet to al-Mundhir (408-12/1018-22) and his son Yaḥyā (412-27/1022-36), to whom the third part of his Dīwān is dedicated. In material matters his life appears to have been completely comfortable, a poem (no. 57) revealing that he had acquired land and orchards. However, for reasons unknown, his relations with Yaḥyā b. al-Mundhir deteriorated considerably, and Ibn Darrādj found himself obliged to emigrate. In 419/1028 he appears at the court of Denia, addressing his poems to Mudjāhid al-ʿĀmirī [q.v.], and seems to have passed the final years of his life in this eastern town, since this is where al-Faḍl, his only known son, spent his life. Ibn Darrādj died on 16 Djumādā II 421/22 June 1030.

Ibn Darrādj is considered as one of the greatest poets of Muslim Spain and the main representative of the golden age of Arabo-Andalusian poetry at the end of the 4th/10th and the beginning of the 5th/11th century. Although he lived until the time of the Mulūk al-ṭawāʾif, he was a product of the Spain of the caliphs. Like Ibn Shuhayd, Ibn Ḥazm and al-Ramādī, this poet represents the period during which the character of al-Andalus itself was stamped on its literary production and on all the other manifestations of its culture.

Ibn Darrādj was not, however, a revolutionary poet as, to a certain extent, were those who cultivated muwashshaḥ and zadjal; he was, on the contrary, a neo-classic poet of the type of Abū Tammām and al-Mutanabbī—and in fact he is referred to by the critics as "the Mutanabbī of al-Andalus". Like these other poets, Ibn Darrādj adheres scrupulously to what the critics call ʿamūd al-shiʿr, the canons of classical poetry. His technique is very polished and he devotes much attention to the correct use of language and the choice of words. His poetry reflects a wide knowledge of Arabic literature and a complete mastery of its vocabulary. He may not achieve the intellectual level and the profundity of thought of Mutanabbī, his favourite model, but some of his compositions (see e.g., nos. 32, 39, 44) are definitely superior to those of his master. The poems in which he describes the battles of al-Manṣūr are full of realism and life and reflect the people's sincere admiration for the leader whom they considered as the champion of Spanish Islam against Christianity; in this respect his poems have much in common with those which al-Mutanabbī dedicated to Sayf al-Dawla.

In the genre of floral poetry (nawriyyāt), Ibn Darrādj wrote various poems containing original imagery; in this he appears as the forerunner of such poets as Ibn Khafādja, Ibn al-Zaḳḳāḳ and al-Ruṣāfī, who were to devote almost all of their poems to this genre.

A large part of his poetry, and this the most sincere and moving part, is devoted to the description of the horrors of the civil war which followed the overthrow of the ʿĀmirid dictatorship. These poems form an elegy for the Muslim Spain which the poet had known during the period of its greatest splendour. The lines in which he refers to his sad personal experience during this war, when he wandered continually from place to place with his large family of twelve, mainly females, deserve especial mention. Some of these poems (for example the description of a stormy voyage in a ship, poem no. 33) are particularly successful.

Because of the great care with which he wrote his poems, as much in their basic inspiration as in their form, without adopting the mannerism and the conventionalism of the oriental poets of his time who had a liking for rhetorical ornaments (badīʿ), Ibn Darrādj may be considered as the initiator, in the Arabic poetry of Spain, of a sort of "cultisme" similar to that which was to characterize, six centuries later, another Cordovan, Luis de Góngora y Argote (1561-1627).

His poetry, apart from its purely literary and aesthetic value, is a very valuable documentary source on contemporary events in Spain and particularly on the relations of al-Andalus with the neighbouring Christian kings (on this aspect, see M. Makki, La España cristiana en el dīwān de Ibn Darrāŷ, in Bol. de la Real Acad. de Buenas Letras de Barcelona, xxx (1963-4), 63-104).

Ibn Darrādj's prose is almost completely lost. It is known that he wrote some very famous official communiqués, such as that which he wrote in the name of al-Manṣūr on the occasion of the capture of Santiago de Compostella (387/992). But the fragments of this prose which are preserved in the Dīwān or in the Dhakhīra of Ibn Bassām are much inferior in quality to his poetry.

IBN DARRĀDJ AL-ṬUFAYLĪ [see ṬUFAYLĪ].

IBN AL-DAWĀDĀRĪ, ABŪ BAKR B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. AYBAK AL-DAWĀDĀRĪ, Egyptian historian. His father, Djamāl al-Dīn ʿAbd Allāh, was in the service of the Amīr Sayf al-Dīn Balabān al-Rūmī al-Ẓāhirī, the Dawādār of Baybars, whence the by-name Dawādārī. His grandfather, lord of Sarkhad, was tentatively identified by Ṣ. Munadjdjid as ʿIzz al-Dīn Aybak al-Ustādār al-Muʿaẓẓamī (d. 645/1247-8), the patron of the medical biographer Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa [q.v.]. The family is described, somewhat improbably, as of Saldjūķid descent.

The author's family lived in Cairo, in the Ḥārat al-Bāṭiliyya. His father served for 11 years, until 710/1310, as mutawallī of Sharķiyya province, the wilāyat al-ʿUrbān, and adjoining areas. Released from this post, he moved to Damascus, where he was appointed mihmāndār, and, later mushidd al-dawāwīn. He lost the latter post through a disagreement, but remained a mihmāndār until his death in 713/1313, in a riding accident at ʿAdjlūn. He was buried at Adhriʿāt, near the grave of his parents.

The dates of the author's birth and death are unknown. In his writings, he speaks of having lived in Cairo and moved with his father to Damascus, presumably as a child. He held some official post, which he does not specify. It seems to have been in Egypt, and an incident in 723/1323 (Chronik, ix, 310) suggests that it may have been connected with the Barīd. He wrote several works, of which two, an extensive universal chronicle (Durar al-tīdjān) and an abridgement (Kanz al-durar), survive. An autograph of the former, in 9 parts, exists in Istanbul. Parts 6 (on the Fāṭimids) and 9 (on the reign of Muḥammad b. Ķalāwūn) have been published. The author tells us that he began to make notes and drafts for his work in 709/1309, started his final autograph copy in 732/1331-2, and completed it in 736/1335.

IBN DĀWŪD, MUḤAMMAD B. DĀWŪD B. ʿALĪ B. KHALAF, famous Ẓāhirī jurist and first codifier of Arabic "courtly love", died in 294/909; nothing else is known of his life. Little is known of his Ẓāhirism: Ibn Dāwūd was the leader of a school, who took over the direction of the Ẓāhirī movement of Baghdād on the death of his father [see DĀWŪD B. ʿALĪ]. It is not clear in which direction he led it. It may have been in one less harsh and less uncompromising than that of Ibn Ḥazm [q.v.], under whom Ẓāhirī intransigeance was to reach its peak (in the Muḥallā of Ibn Ḥazm the Ẓāhirīs as a whole are described by the term aṣḥābunā and it is not clear whether Ibn Dāwūd is included in this designation). There gathered around Ibn Dāwūd not only Ẓāhirī jurists but also an eclectic group of scholars and grammarians (Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn al-Ẓāhirī al-Kātib, the Shāfiʿī Ibn Suraydj, Aḥmad b. ʿImrān, an impassioned admirer of the mystic Djunayd, the Malāmatī mystic Ruwayn, the traditionists Aḥmad b. ʿUbayd b. Nāṣiḥ, the principal informer of al-Washsha, and Aḥmad b. Naṣr b. Dhāriʿ, the grammarians Thaʿlab and Niftawayh, both of them converts to Ḥanbalism, the second later becoming the transmitter of accounts concerning the death of Ibn Dāwūd). But Ibn Dāwūd was to give more serious contributions to Ẓāhirism: he wrote or transmitted an important number of Ẓāhirī works, a list of which is given in the Fihrist. (Among them is a refutation of Ibn Sharshīr, which may well have been a dialectical exposition of Ẓāhirism, the loss of which at an early date is much to be regretted). But Ibn Dāwūd's chief claim to fame is the Kitāb al-Zahra, his anthology of courtly love (translated variously as "Book of the flower" or "Book of Venus"). The Kitāb al-Zahra, which purports to be an anthology, is however a precursor of the "Trobarclus" of the West: it is difficult fully to comprehend its composition, its deeper purposes, and its guiding inspiration. It is possible that the Kitāb al-Zahra conceals the personal secret of Ibn Dāwūd. The following is as much as can be said with certainty, about a work which must be read between the lines, if one is to achieve any insight into the extremely complex personality of its author. The Zahra is made up of two parts: the first is a collection of love poetry, the second (MS Turin) is an anthology proper (different parts: panegyric, satire, drinking poetry, versification). The two parts together make up about fifty chapters, each containing a fairly free selection of one hundred verses. Each chapter illustrates a maxim; these maxims are not of equal importance: they may concern fine points of literary style as well as more urgent matters and, perhaps, the most intimate details of the "secret" of love. The maxims are in rhyming prose—the elegant style of the jurist who had succeeded in delivering fatwās in this form. The logical arrangement of the first part is as follows: the first ten chapters are a kind of ethic of love (the ḥadīth of ʿis̲h̲ḳ gives the advice to put one's trust in a physician rather than in the beloved). The ten chapters which follow depict the various consequences of passion and the misfortunes which befall lovers (calumniators, slanderers and "exile"). Next, in the following ten chapters, are enumerated the obstacles of a deeper or more permanent nature which beset passion (suluww, "consolation"—a sort of interior movement which follows the "triumph" of the lover, separation with all its consequences). A further ten chapters (30 to 40) are devoted to situations which are reminiscent of the nasīb: the lover and the lightning, the lover on the day of separation, the lover haunted by the memory of the beloved, etc. At the very end of the first part, the ethical values return to the foreground, in particular that of the secret. The death of love is also dealt with. It will be obvious that everything in this work is problematical: it seems innocuous and soothing and yet it gave rise to passion and polemic. Its greatest originality was to have attempted to define a code of courtly behaviour independent of both religion and mysticism. This code seems to be based entirely on the principle: "He who loves, remains chaste, does not tell his love, and dies (or dies of it), dies as a martyr". This ḥadīth, transmitted on the authority of Dāwūd the father, sets two problems which long disturbed or annoyed Muslim moralists: al-naẓar al-mubāḥ (the lawfulness of glancing at young people or a "strange" woman) and kitmān, the obligation to refrain from speaking of one's love, even to the beloved himself. It was particularly among the Ḥanbalīs that the reactions were strongest and opposition to Ibn Dāwūd's ideas most bitter: a work like the D̲h̲amm al-hawā of Ibn D̲j̲awzī contains a list of later re-wordings which have been proposed for the famous ḥadīth. Ibn Ḳayyim al-D̲j̲awziyya [q.v.] also inveighed against Ibn Dāwūd, doing his utmost to discredit him. On the other hand the Ḥanbalīs, from al-K̲h̲arāʾiṭī (Brockelmann, S I, 250, the author of an Iʿtilāl al-ḳulūb, Bursa, Ulu Cami 1535), attribute to the passions a sort of therapeutic action, based both on Islam and on common sense. It is true that, in his description of "courtly" love, Ibn Dāwūd did not admit that it could possess a providential therapeutic quality, and indulged neither in excessive systematization nor misplaced idealism. (He always refrained from confusing human passion and divine love; he attributed to love, and even to the memory of love, a theme dear to the nasīb, causes which are predominantly physical: the interaction of the "humours" on the thought and vice-versa). It is possible that he took this categorical attitude, discouraging both mysticism and human wisdom, in order to preserve intact the unimpaired character of "courtly" love. Whether this attitude was dictated by his Ẓāhirism, with its tendency to dispute the capabilities of the human reason, or by a negative mysticism based on malāmatiyya, Ibn Dāwūd is regarded by such scholars as L. Massignon, A. R. Nykl and H. Ritter as one of the initiators of the doctrine of "courtly love", both in its Western and in its Oriental manifestations.

IBN AL-DĀYA, AḤMAD B. YŪSUF B. IBRĀHĪM, Ṭūlūnid historian. His father Yūsuf was a foster-brother of the caliph al-Muʿtaṣim and an administrative assistant to Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī. As such, Yūsuf moved in the centre of intellectual life in Bag̲h̲dād and Sāmarrā and counted among his acquaintances many littérateurs and physicians. After the death of Ibn al-Mahdī in 224/839 (and, presumably, in consequence of it), he left Sāmarrā for Damascus and, it seems, moved from there to Egypt where he thenceforth had his residence. Having connections with the ʿAbbāsid government and with Ibn al-Mudabbir, Yūsuf was under the suspicion of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, who imprisoned him but soon released him as the result of an intervention by his numerous friends. When Yūsuf died, Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn had his son Aḥmad and the latter's brother arrested, and his files confiscated and searched for evidence of espionage, but nothing incriminating was revealed and the two brothers were released immediately. Yūsuf wrote a book of stories about his patron Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī, which is certainly the source of the material on the subject transmitted in his name in the Ag̲h̲ānī (for instance, *Ag̲h̲ānī*³, i, 253, 268, ii, 353, iii, 29, iv, 337, 361, vi, 22, ix, 148, 173, xvi, 6, 249, etc.). Like his patron, he also wrote a book on cookery, and he seems to be meant by the Yūsuf b. al-Dāya mentioned in the Fihrist, 160, who published a collection of stories about Abū Nuwās together with an anthology of his poetry. He probably provided much material for the works of his son Aḥmad. His Ak̲h̲bār al-aṭibbāʾ, cited by Ibn Ḥawḳal, i, 124 (cf. F. Gabrieli, in RSO, xxxvi (1961), 246), and, presumably, the source for al-Ḳifṭī and Ibn Abī Usaybiʿa when they quote Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm, would seem to be a case in point.

Aḥmad b. Yūsuf, known by preference as Ibn al-Dāya "son of the wet nurse" (although this nickname would seem to have been originally that of his father), belonged like his father to the class of government officials. A reasonable guess for the date of his birth would seem to be between 245-250/859-864, and he is said to have died between 330-340/941-951. Accurate details are lacking. He wrote a Biography of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, known from an abridgment in Ibn Saʿīd's Mug̲h̲rib (ed. K. Vollers, Berlin 1894, Semitistische Studien, i). It was also used in a similar biography of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, written in the 4th/10th century by a certain ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad al-Balawī (ed. M. Kurd ʿAlī, Damascus 1358), who nevertheless criticized Ibn al-Dāya's work as confused and incomplete and not the work of a professional historian. Biographies of K̲h̲umārawayh and Hārūn, including those of Ṭūlūnid lieutenants, are listed by Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, ii, 157-60, as separate works, but they very likely belonged together with the biography of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, in the same way as Ibn al-Dāya's Ḥusn al-ʿuḳbā is listed and cited as a work distinct from his Kitāb al-Mukāfaʾa, although it forms part of it. The Mukāfaʾa (ed. Cairo 1914, 1940, 1941) consists of three sections containing, respectively, stories about rewards for good deeds, punishments for evil deeds, and timely escapes from difficult situations. The preserved text may not be complete (cf. F. Sayyid, in his edition of Ibn Djuldjul, Ṭabaḳāt al-aṭibbā', Cairo 1955, 72, n. 43). Two other biographical works, on physicians and on astronomers/astrologers, are not preserved. In the field of science, he wrote a commentary on the Pseudo-Ptolemaic Centiloquium (al-Thamara), which, in addition to the Arabic original, is also preserved (partially?) in Greek translation (Cat. Codicum Astrol., ii, 74, iii, 11), as well as a lost Compendium of Logic, dedicated to the wazīr ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā.

The Mukāfa'a and the fragments of the biography of Ibn Ṭūlūn show that Ibn al-Dāya possessed a keen eye for the life around him and a good understanding of the nature of political leadership and all it involved. If he still felt any family animosity against Ibn Ṭūlūn, he never shows it. On the contrary, he displays considerable admiration for Ibn Ṭūlūn's great gifts. Contemporary culture, in terms of language, customs, and the expectations and emotions of individuals, is brought close to us in his works.

IBN AL-DAYBAʿ, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. ʿALĪ WADJĪH AL-DĪN AL-SHAYBĀNĪ AL-ZABĪDĪ AL-SHĀFIʿĪ, Arab historian and religious scholar, was born in 866/1461 in Zabīd and died there in 944/1537. Older biographers call him Ibn al-Daybaʿ, but al-Djirāfī refers to him simply as al-Ḳāḍī al-Ḥāfiẓ ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Daybaʿ. Daybaʿ, said to mean "white" in Nubian, was the laḳab of his remote ancestor ʿAlī b. Yūsuf.

Ibn al-Daybaʿ, whose father died in India without having seen him, was brought up by his maternal grandfather in Zabīd [q.v.], the centre of Shāfiʿite learning in Tihāmat al-Yaman. He studied a little under this grandfather but more under his maternal uncle, the muftī of Zabīd, who taught him various branches of mathematics as well as religious subjects. Ibn al-Daybaʿ also studied ḥadīth in the town of Bayt al-Faḳīh [q.v.], which lies just north of Zabīd. He made the Pilgrimage several times, the first, according to al-Sakhāwī and al-Shawkānī, in 883/1479 (not 884 as in EI[1], ii, 369). In 897/1491 (not 896) he took lessons in the Ḥidjāz from the Egyptian Shāfiʿite al-Sakhāwī [q.v.]; in a verse quoted by al-Sakhāwī, Ibn al-Daybaʿ expressed the desire to become an imām of the ḥadīth, which he would recite at the feet of this master.

Born about eight years after the capture of Aden from the last Rasūlid by ʿĀmir I b. Ṭāhir, the inaugurator of the rule of the Ṭāhirids [q.v.] in the Yaman, Ibn al-Daybaʿ lived nearly sixty years under this dynasty. His chief patron was the fourth and last of the Ṭāhirids, al-Malik al-Ẓāfir ʿĀmir II b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb. At ʿĀmir II's request he wrote a history of the dynasty, al-ʿIḳd al-bāhir fī ta'rīkh dawlat Banī Ṭāhir, now lost. ʿĀmir rewarded him with robes of honour, a palm-grove in Zabīd, and the post of teacher of ḥadīth in the great mosque, which ʿĀmir had built. The most important surviving history by Ibn al-Daybaʿ is Bughyat al-mustafīd fī akhbār madīnat Zabīd, which brings the story of the city down to 901/1495-6 and which closes with the author's autobiography. A number of MSS of Bughyat al-mustafīd are extant, but C. Th. Johannsen unfortunately relied on the defective Copenhagen copy for his Latin translation, Historia Jemenae, Bonn 1828, with introduction and notes. Ibn al-Daybaʿ composed two supplements to his history of Zabīd, al-Faḍl al-mazīd fī ta'rīkh Zabīd and Ḳurrat al-ʿuyūn fī akhbār al-Yaman al-maymūn, the second of which ends with 924/1518, the year after ʿĀmir II's death and the almost total destruction of Ṭāhirid power by Mamlūks from Egypt (Ibn al-Daybaʿ wrote a not entirely uncritical elegy of ʿĀmir II). There is no indication that Ibn al-Daybaʿ recorded events which took place in Zabīd during the last twenty years of his lifetime, the period when the Yaman was being made a province of the Ottoman empire.

Another historical work by Ibn al-Daybaʿ is Aḥsan al-sulūk fī man waliya Zabīd min al-mulūk, a radjaz poem, not the best vehicle for writing history.

Ibn al-Daybaʿ wrote a book on the merits (faḍā'il) of the Yaman and its people and at least two books on ḥadīth, Taysīr al-wuṣūl and Tamyīz al-ṭayyib min al-khabīth, which proved of benefit to students. Al-Shawkānī (d. 1250/1834) found his fame still widespread in the Yaman.

Bibliography: Brockelmann, II, 400, and S II, 32, 238, 548; biographical sketches of Ibn al-Daybaʿ in al-Sakhāwī, al-Ḍaw' al-lāmiʿ, Cairo 1345, iv, 104-5; al-Shawkānī, al-Badr al-ṭāliʿ, Cairo 1348, i, 335-6; and al-Ziriklī, Aʿlām[2], Cairo 1374, iv, 91-2. A succinct account of the Ṭāhirids of the Yaman is given in al-Djirāfī, al-Muḳtaṭaf min ta'rīkh al-Yaman, Cairo 1367, 82-5.

(2) The most famous member of the family was the son of the above, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. ʿAbd Allāh, who, after having been ḳāḍī of Faḥṣ al-Ballūṭ, succeeded his father as ṣāḥib al-radd and was appointed chief ḳāḍī of Cordova in 392/1001. Possessing excellent diplomatic qualities, and popular among both the Cordovans and the Berbers, he played an important political rôle under al-Manṣūr, whose close confidant and trusted adviser he was. After the death of the ḥādjib (392/1002), he retained his post until 394/1004, then regained it from 395 to 401/1005-10. In 399/1009, he gave his sanction to the document drawn up by Ibn Burd [q.v.] to make ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Sanchuelo [q.v.] the successor of Hishām II on the throne of the Umayyads. He also supported the succession to the caliphate of al-Mahdī (399/1009). Exiled for a time to Almeria and to Oran, he soon regained his office under Hishām II, who returned to the throne in 400/1010. It was he who, in 403/1013, asked for amān from the Berbers who were investing the capital. He died in 22 Radjab 413/21 October 1022, and his funeral eulogy was made by Ibn Shuhayd [q.v.].

(4) Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, son of the chief ḳāḍī (2), was renowned for his virtue, his learning and his honesty. He was appointed vizier during the reign of Yaḥyā b. ʿAlī [see HAMMŪDIDS], became ḳāḍī of Cordova in 430/1039 and died on 3 Rabīʿ I 435/10 October 1043. Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad and Abū ʿAlī al-Ḥasan, sons of Abū Ḥātim (3), are also mentioned but played a less important rôle than the above. See in particular Ibn Bassām, iv/1, 28; Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, 160. (CH. PELLAT)

IBN DIḤYA [= DAḤYA], ʿUMAR B. AL-ḤASAN AL-KALBĪ, also known under the name of IBN AL-DJUMAYYIL, Andalusian poet, philologist, and traditionist, born probably in Valencia, in the middle of the 6th/12th century (the year of his birth is variously given as 544, 546, 547 or 548). His kunya was Abu 'l-Faḍl but he preferred to call himself Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb and this is what he is generally called. In some sources he appears with the laḳab Madjd al-Dīn, but he used that of Dhu 'l-nasabayn (he who has two [illustrious] origins), since he claimed descent through his father from Diḥya b. Khalīfa [q.v.] and through his mother from al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Other *kunya*s of his are known, which are hardly ever used, and various other *nisba*s: al-Dānī (from Denia), al-Balansī, al-Sabtī, al-Andalusī.

While still very young he began his journeys in search of learning, particularly in philology and ḥadīth, visited various towns in al-Andalus and the Maghrib and met famous teachers, among those in Andalusia being Ibn Bashkuwāl, Ibn Khayr and Ibn Maḍāʾ [qq.v]. He twice filled the office of ḳāḍī of Denia, which he was obliged to give up after being denounced for passing a sentence of extreme cruelty. After living for some time in North Africa —in 595/1198 he was expounding in Tunis the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim—he undertook the Pilgrimage to Mecca and on the way stayed in Egypt, to which he was to return later. He next visited Syria, ʿIrāḳ and Persia, and went as far as Nīsābūr in his eagerness to collect traditions and to meet the most famous masters in this subject. In 604/1207, when he was at Arbela, where the feast of the birth of the Prophet was being celebrated with much ceremony, he wrote a work for the occasion entitled Kitāb al-Tanwīr fī mawlid al-sirādj al-munīr, which ended in a long poem in praise of the amīr Muẓaffar al-Dīn al-Malik al-Muʿaẓẓam, who rewarded him with a payment of a thousand *dīnār*s. On his return to Egypt, the Ayyūbid al-Malik al-ʿĀdil appointed him tutor to his son; when the latter succeeded his father, under the title of al-Malik al-Kāmil, he founded the Dār al-ḥadīth and appointed Ibn Diḥya as director of it; but towards the end of his life (he died in 633/1235) he was dismissed by the sultan—one source even states that he was flogged and paraded in disgrace through the streets of the city—who appointed in his place the poet's brother, Abū ʿUthmān, who survived him for only a short time (d. 634/1237).

The judgements of his contemporaries on Ibn Diḥya's character and work are contradictory. Whereas the Andalusians in general praise him highly and refer to his great learning, the Eastern critics regard him as a charlatan because of his false claim to an illustrious genealogy, as a plagiarist (Ibn Khallikān states that the poem dedicated to Muẓaffar al-Dīn was written by Ibn Mammātī), or as a liar (which various sources consider to have been the reason for his expulsion from the Dār al-ḥādīth al-Kāmiliyya). The titles are known of about twenty of his works, of various types, the majority of which have not survived. There have recently appeared two editions of the work for which he is chiefly known, al-Muṭrib fī ashʿār ahl al-Maghrib, a vast anthology of Arabic poets of the West, compiled in Egypt and dedicated to his royal patron al-Malik al-Kāmil. The remainder of his surviving work is so far unpublished.

IBN DĪNĀR [see ʿĪSĀ B. DĪNĀR; MĀLIK B. DĪNĀR; MUḤAMMAD B. DĪNĀR; YAZĪD B. DĪNĀR].

IBN DIRHAM, DJAʿD, heretic, was a native of Khurāsān but spent most of his life at Damascus; he was imprisoned and then put to death, on the orders of Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik [q.v.], by Khālid al-Ḳasrī [q.v.] on the day of the Feast of Sacrifices as a substitute for the ritual sacrifice of a sheep; the sources vary on the place and date of his execution: Kūfa or Wāsiṭ, 124/742 or 125/743. Very few facts are known on the doctrinal position of Djaʿd b. Dirham; it is, however, clear that anti-Marwānid political propaganda and theological propaganda directed against the Muʿtazilīs (whom their enemies wished to accuse not only of having non-Muslim ideologies but also of being influenced by the heretics of the early period of Islam) were in part the reason for the accusations directed at him during five centuries, from al-Dārimī to Ibn Taymiyya: he was accused of having advanced the doctrines, later specifically associated with the Muʿtazilīs, of the created Ḳurʾān and of free will, errors which he was said to have led Marwān b. Muḥammad to hold; of having professed a radical doctrine of denial of the Divine attributes (taʿṭīl, of which the Muʿtazilīs were also accused), whence probably the saying attributed to him by Khālid: "God did not speak to Moses, nor take Abraham as His friend"; he is described as a dahrī and appears prominently in the list of *zindīḳ*s in the Fihrist; according to some verses quoted by al-Muṭahhar al-Maḳdisī, the followers of Djaʿd's religion, beardless men (a characteristic borrowed from the portrait of the Manichean "Elect"), accuse the Prophet of lying and deny the resurrection. He is also associated with Djahm b. Ṣafwān [q.v.]; it is certain, however, that the latter did not profess the doctrine of free will. Without casting doubt on the authenticity of the majority of these statements, the co-ordination of which is, however, difficult, it should nevertheless be noted that there is no mention at all of Djaʿd b. Dirham in sources as important as the Taʾrīkh of al-Ṭabarī (where he appears, Annales, i, 1396, sub anno 102, only as the author of an entirely conventional lament), the K. al-Intiṣār of al-Khayyāṭ, the Maḳālāt al-Islāmiyyīn of al-Ashʿarī, and al-Sharḥ wa 'l-ibāna ("Profession of faith") of Ibn Baṭṭa.

Bibliography: The earliest source at present known is the K. al-Radd ʿala 'l-djahmiyya of ʿUthmān al-Dārimī (d. 282/895), ed. G. Vitestam, Leiden 1960, p. 4, lines 7-16, which gives, on the authority of a chain of transmitters, the version of the doctrine and the death of Ibn Dirham which was, in its essentials, repeated in the Fihrist and many later texts. IBN AL-DJADD, name of the members of a family (Banu 'l-Djadd) famous and influential in Muslim Spain during the 5th-6th/11th-12th centuries, the origin of which, according to Ibn Taghrībirdī (vi, 112), goes back to a certain al-Faraḥ b. al-Djadd al-Fihrī. They were established at Seville and Niebla, where they possessed vast territories. Four important members of this family are mentioned:

I.—Abu 'l-Ḥasan (or al-Ḥusayn) Yūsuf b. Muḥammad Ibn al-Djadd (Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, i/2, 109 ff.; Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, i, 340; Ibn Faḍl Allāh al-ʿUmarī, Masālik al-abṣār, ms. Dār al-Kutub, Cairo. no. 431). He had literary ability, but his passion for wine and his frivolity prevented him from reaching the heights he deserved. For some time he was a secretary (kātib), in the service of Ibn ʿAmmār [q.v.], during the brief period in which the latter reigned in Murcia.

II.—Of greater importance was his cousin and contemporary Abu 'l-Ḳāsim Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh Ibn al-Djadd. He was one of the best representatives of the family and one of the authorities of his time on ḥadīth, fiḳh, literature and genealogy. Yazīd al-Rāḍī, the son of al-Muʿtamid Ibn ʿAbbād, made him his wazīr when he was appointed governor of Algeciras by his father, and took him with him when he went to govern Ronda; Ibn al-Djadd remained with Yazīd till the latter's death at the hands of the Almoravids, in 484/1091 (Ibn al-Abbār, Ḥulla, apud De Abbadidis, ii, 75; ed. Monés, ii, 71). He then retired to Seville; the inhabitants of Niebla then offered him the office of jurisconsult (khuṭṭat al-shūrā) of the town, which he accepted without enthusiasm, keeping his position till Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn made him kātib in the chancellery. He was still holding this office when he died at Marrākush in 515/1121 (Ibn Bashkuwāl, Ṣila, no. 1149; Ibn Khāḳān, Ḳalā'id, Cairo 1283, 109 ff.; Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, i, 341-2; al-Marrākushī, Muʿdjib, Cairo 1949, 173; Ibn Diḥya, Muṭrib, Cairo 1954, 190-2; Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, ms. Baghdad, ii, fols. 185-213). Abu 'l-Ḳāsim Ibn al-Djadd is an excellent prose writer, his style being on a level with that of the eminent kuttāb of the time (Muḥ. b. Abi 'l-Khiṣāl and his brother Abū Marwān, Abū Bakr Ibn al-Ḳabṭurnu, etc.), which marks the apogee of prose writing in Muslim Spain.

III.—A third member of the family is Abū ʿĀmir Aḥmad b. ʿAbd Allāh Ibn al-Djadd, who was a grammarian of repute. He was arrested and executed by the agents of the Almohads in 550/1155, although he had taken no part in politics (Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, i, 342-3; al-Maḳḳarī, Analectes, ii, 468; al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 275).

IV.—The fourth and last representative of the family to be mentioned is Abū Bakr Muḥ. b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Yaḥyā b. al-Faraḥ b. al-Djadd. the most famous in the history of the family. Ibn al-Abbār dedicates a long article to him in the Takmila (no. 825). Born at Niebla in Rabīʿ I 496/December 1102, he studied under the best teachers of the time, such as Ibn Rushd and Abū Bakr Ibn al-ʿArabī. The former advised him not to limit himself to the study of grammar, literature and ḥadīth, but to study fiḳh and uṣūl; he showed a special aptitude for these subjects and was not long in becoming the favourite pupil of Ibn Rushd. About 521/1127 he became a jurisconsult in Seville, and continued in this high office for 65 years, till his death in Shawwāl 586/ Nov. 1190, at the age of ninety. Abū Yūsuf Yaʿḳūb al-Manṣūr (580-95/1184-98) had a profound veneration for him, perhaps because he had undergone a certain amount of injustice in the reign of his predecessor, Abū Yaʿḳūb Yūsuf (558-80/1162/84). During the troubled years which preceded the unfortunate campaign against Santarem (580/1184), he was among the Niebla dignitaries who were arrested and imprisoned (cf. A. Huici Miranda, Hist. pol. del imperio almohade, i, 255-309). He spent his whole life as a faḳīh and teacher. He has left no written work, but his position allowed him to increase his fortune; he was in fact the head of his native town of Niebla.

IBN DJAʿFAR, Abū Djābir Muḥammad b Djaʿfar al-Azkawī, Ibāḍī scholar of ʿUmān, d. 281/894. He was the author of an important work of fiḳh entitled Kitāb al-Djāmiʿ and usually known as Djāmiʿ Ibn Djaʿfar to distinguish it from the other Ibāḍī works with the same title. This work is still unpublished; there are several manuscripts of it in the Mzāb, the earliest of them dated 914/1508. Ibn Djaʿfar also took part in the political events of his time as supporter of the imām al-Ṣalt b. Mālik.

IBN DJAHĪR [see djahīr, Banū].

IBN AL-DJAHM [see ʿalī b. al-djahm; muḥammad b. al-djahm].

IBN DJAMĀʿA, name of a distinguished Shāfiʿī family of the Mamlūk period, in Syria and Egypt, which produced a number of able jurists, notably Badr al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Djamāʿa (639-733/1241-1333), his son ʿIzz al-Dīn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (694-767/1294-1366), and his grandson Burhān al-Dīn Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm (725-790/1325-1388).

Originally from Ḥamāt, in northern Syria, the

GENEALOGICAL TABLE OF THE BANŪ DJAMĀʿA

Banū Djamāʿa traced their descent to the North Arab tribe of Kināna. The first member of the family to gain a modest reputation for Islamic learning was Burhān al-Dīn Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. Saʿd Allāh (596-675/1200-1277), who studied jurisprudence (fiḳh) and tradition (ḥadīth) in Damascus, lectured in his native Ḥamāt and elsewhere, and died in Jerusalem shortly after he had gone to settle there. The distinguished career of his son Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad, who rose to become three times Shāfiʿī chief ḳāḍī of Egypt, and twice of Damascus, made the fortunes of the family and established it among the leading religio-judicial "dynasties" of the Mamlūk empire. Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad was the author of numerous works, of which the most important is a book on constitutional law: Taḥrīr al-aḥkām fī tadbīr ahl al-Islām (ed. and German trans by H. Kofler in Islamica, vi (1934), vii (1935), Schlussheft (1938)). The position of Khaṭīb of the Aḳṣā mosque in Jerusalem, which he held before becoming chief ḳāḍī of Egypt in 690/1291, remained in the family until certainly the early 10th/16th century; it continued as the preserve of the descendants of Muḥammad's brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Ibn Djamāʿa, who formed the Jerusalem branch of the Banū Djamāʿa. As for the descendants of Muḥammad they came to form the Cairo branch of the family, which produced the distinguished ʿIzz al-Dīn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and Burhān al-Dīn Ibrāhīm. The former, after holding the position of intendant of the treasury (wakīl bayt al-māl) of Egypt for eleven years, was appointed Shāfiʿī chief ḳāḍī of Egypt in 738/1340, and remained in this position, with one brief interruption, for 25 years, retiring shortly before his death. His nephew Ibrāhīm, after him, was twice chief ḳāḍī of Egypt, and died as chief ḳāḍī of Damascus. Between 690-784/1291-1383, the three Ibn Djamāʿa mentioned held the office of chief ḳāḍī of Egypt—the chief judicial position in the realm—for a total of 61 out of 92 years.

The fortunes of the Banū Djamāʿa declined after the death of Burhān al-Dīn Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm, the family nevertheless maintaining a traditional importance in Jerusalem. After the Ottoman conquest the name of the family appears to have been forgotten.

IBN DJĀMIʿ, ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM ISMĀʿĪL, famous singer and musician of Mecca. Of noble origin, he belonged to the clan of Sahm, one of the principal branches of the tribe of Ḳuraysh. A handsome man, well-versed in jurisprudence, ḥadīth and the Ḳur'ān, he had won the admiration of the ḳāḍī Abū Yūsuf until the latter discovered that he was a singer. He was the pupil of Yaḥyā al-Makkī and of his father-in-law Siyyāṭ, with whom he went to Baghdād. Some time afterwards, he was expelled from there by al-Mahdī in order to separate him from his sons Hārūn and al-Hādī. He returned to Mecca, where he squandered his fortune on his two passions: gaming and dogs. After al-Mahdī's death, he returned to Baghdād and became, during the reign of al-Rashīd, the leader of a rival group to that of his former friend, Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī. With his tender, sensitive, stirring and expressive character, possessing a voice vibrant with emotion, Ibn Djāmiʿ embodied the typical image of a romantic musician of the period. The flautist Barṣawma said: "Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī is like an orchard in which the sweet and the sour grow side by side . . . Ibn Djāmiʿ is like a pot of honey all of which is delicious".

IBN DJĀMIʿ (or DJUMAYʿ), ABU 'L-MAKĀRIM (ABU 'L-ʿASHĀ'IR) HIBAT ALLĀH (Nathaniel) B. ZAYN (al-Dīn) B. ḤASAN B. IFRĀ'ĪM B. YAʿḲŪB B. ISMĀʿĪL, Jewish physician who received the honorific titles of Shams al-ri'āsa and Ustādh zamānih. Born at Fusṭāṭ, he was the disciple of Ibn al-ʿAynzarbī (d. 548/1153), entered the service of Saladin, and died in 594/1198. One of his pupils was Ibn Abi 'l-Bayān al-Isrā'īlī (d. ca. 634/1236) and he became famous for having prevented a person in a cataleptic fit from being buried alive. He was the author of several works: (1) al-Irshād li-maṣāliḥ

al-anfus wa 'l-asdjād, a compendium of medicine which he dedicated to al-Baysānī, the vizier of Saladin, and which was completed by his son Abū Ṭāhir Ismāʿīl; it consists of four parts and deals with simple and compound medicines, with dietetics, hygiene, therapeutics, etc. (for manuscripts see Brockelmann). (2) al-Maknūn fī tanḳīḥ al-Ḳānūn, a commentary on Avicenna. He wrote also a certain number of risālas of minor importance, on the description of Alexandria, on what to do when no physician is available, on the lemon and its sorbets, on rhubarb, etc. One of his treatises was used by Ibn al-Bayṭār [q.v.] and was translated into Latin by Alpagus.

IBN DJANĀḤ, ABU 'L-WALĪD MARWĀN (Hebrew name Yōnāh, Latin name Marinus [?]), Jewish physician and philologist, born at Cordova circa 380/990, died at Saragossa about fifty years later. His very important works, written in Arabic, as a grammarian and lexicographer of the Hebrew language do not concern us here. Ṣāʿid b. Aḥmad Ibn Ṣāʿid al-Andalusī (whose notice was reproduced by Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa), however, praises him as a logician and the author of an epitome of pharmacology, which is mentioned also by Ibn al-Bayṭār.

IBN AL-DJARRĀḤ, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. DĀWŪD B. AL-DJARRĀḤ, secretary of state of the ʿAbbāsid caliphs and uncle of the famous vizier ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā [q.v.]. He belonged to a family of Iranian origin which had formerly been converted to Christianity and then embraced Islam. His father Dāwūd had been secretary under al-Mutawakkil and he himself began his career in government service during the caliphate of al-Muʿtaḍid and the vizierate of ʿUbayd Allāh b. Sulaymān, whose son-in-law he became. He was director of taxes for the eastern provinces and accompanied the vizier to the Djibāl in 285/898; on his return from this expedition, he succeeded in getting his section (which until then had been attached to the office of the Palace directed by Aḥmad Ibn al-Furāt) formed into an independent department. This promotion enabled him, during the last years of the caliphate, to defend with varying degrees of success, against the firmly Shīʿī brothers the Banu 'l-Furāt, the Sunnī secretaries or governors whose accounts had been submitted to strict inspection.

He retained this office under al-Muktafī, then became secretary of the army, occupying this post when, in 294/906, the Pilgrim caravan was attacked by the Ḳarmaṭīs.

Muḥammad b. Dāwūd, who on the death of al-Muktafī had supported the succession of Ibn al-Muʿtazz [q.v.], was some months afterwards one of the promoters of the conspiracy to depose the young al-Muḳtadir, and for twenty-four hours he held the office of vizier to Ibn al-Muʿtazz (who was later known as the "caliph of one day"). After managing for a time to avoid the pursuit of his old enemy, Ibn al-Furāt [q.v.], who had become vizier when al-Muḳtadir returned to the throne, Muḥammad b. Dāwūd was finally captured and executed in 296/908.

An administrator whose competence was universally recognized, he was also a highly esteemed man of letters, the author of a poetic anthology, the K. al-Waraḳa (published in Cairo in 1953), as well as a Book of viziers, of which only a few fragments survive.

IBN DJARRĀḤ [see DJARRĀḤIDS].

IBN AL-DJAṢṢĀṢ, "the plasterer's son", the by-name of at least two persons who should be distinguished:

I.—ABŪ YAʿḲŪB ISḤĀḲ B. ʿAMMĀR AL-KŪFĪ, who handed down poetry and was very closely connected with the ʿAbbāsid prince ʿĪsā b. Mūsā [q.v.].

Bibliography: Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, vi, 74-6 (= Irshād, ii, 232).

II.—ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH ḤUSAYN (or Ḥasan) B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. AL-DJAṢṢĀṢ AL-DJAWHARĪ, a celebrated jeweller and financier of the ʿAbbāsid period. Originally a broker in attendance on the harem of the Ṭūlūnid Khumārawayh [q.v.], he seems to have owed the start of his fortune to a necklace; when he was ordered to reduce the bulk of the pearls in it, he merely replaced them by smaller ones, and the difference in value won him a considerable profit. When instructed by his master to negotiate the marriage of his daughter Ḳaṭr al-nadā to Muʿtaḍid's son, he himself brought the girl to Baghdād in 280/893—incidentally she became the caliph's wife—and settled in the ʿAbbāsid capital. Having taken Ḳaṭr al-nadā's jewels into his keeping, he retained them after her death, which occurred a few years later, and his fortune was correspondingly augmented. In 296/908 he was arrested and fined for giving refuge to Ibn al-Muʿtazz [q.v.], but the financial difficulties of al-Muḳtadir soon involved him in more serious straits; in 302/914-5, he was again arrested, his palace, situated in the Sūḳ Yaḥyā, and his other possessions, which had reached a fabulous total value (several million dīnārs), were confiscated, but he managed to safeguard part of his fortune and lived the rest of his life in comfort. He died in 315/927-8.

However, it was not his vast wealth and the unusual luxury in which he lived that have primarily brought this man to the notice of posterity; his fame in fact rests mainly on a series of anecdotes of which he is the hero and which present him as a feeble-witted fellow given to absurd and ridiculous observations; such characteristics certainly do not tally with his real personality and, insofar as these repartees are authentic, they were probably dictated by the desire of Ibn al-Djaṣṣāṣ, a particularly wily individual, to protect his fortune by passing himself off as an inoffensive creature. Certain anecdotes connected with his name are also attributed to other personages, but the essential point is to note this curious occurrence of his name among a class of jesters, in which financiers would hardly seem to belong.

IBN AL-DJAWZĪ, ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN B. ʿALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD ABU 'L-FARASH B. AL-DJAWZĪ, jurisconsult, traditionist, historian and preacher, was one of the most famous Ḥanbalīs of Baghdād, where he was born in 510/1126 and died in 597/1200 after a life of great intellectual, religious and political activity. He belonged to a fairly wealthy family and received a very thorough education.

Among his chief teachers (cf. Dhayl, i, 401) were some of the most famous ʿulamāʾ of his time: Ibn al-Zāghūnī (d. 527/1133), Abū Bakr al-Dīnawarī (d. 532/1137-8), Abū Manṣūr al-Djawālīkī (d. 539/1144-5), who introduced him to adab, Abu 'l-Faḍl b. al-Nāṣir (d. 550/1155), Abū Ḥakīm al-Nahrawānī (d. 556/1161) and Abū Yaʿlā the younger (d. 558/1163; grandson of the ḳāḍī, Abū Yaʿlā b. al-Farrāʾ).

In addition to his direct teachers, Ibn al-Djawzī was much influenced by three men whom he did not know personally but whose work he admired and often made use of: the Shāfiʿī Ashʿarī Abū Nuʿaym al-Iṣfahānī (d. 430/1038-9), the author of the Ḥilyat al-awliyāʾ, the historian and traditionist al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1070-1), a Ḥanbalī who had changed to Shāfiʿism, and the Ḥanbalī Ibn ʿAḳīl (d. 513/1119-20), whom he followed in the majority of his works while at the same time criticizing or refuting his ideas (Dhayl, i, 414). Ibn al-Djawzī had only a slight knowledge of kalām, of which he was a severe critic.

Ibn al-Djawzī began his career in the reign of the caliph al-Muḳtafī (530-55/1136-60), mainly thanks to the patronage of the Ḥanbalī vizier Ibn Hubayra, whom the caliph al-Mustandjid (555-66/1160-70) retained in office until his death in 560/1165.

He began his teaching career as assistant to his teacher Abū Ḥakīm al-Nahrawānī, who taught fiḳh in his madrasa at Bāb al-Azadj and, in the year of his death, in a madrasa built for him at the Maʾmūniyya. On Nahrawānī's death, in 556/1161, soon after the accession of al-Mustandjid, Ibn al-Djawzī succeeded him as master of these two colleges (Dhayl, i, 404).

It was during the reign of al-Muḳtafī, however, with the encouragement of Ibn Hubayra, whose policy for the restoration of the caliphate and for a Sunnī revival he supported, that Ibn al-Djawzī began his career as a preacher (wāʿiẓ), holding each Friday a session of waʿẓ in Ibn Hubayra's own house (Dhayl, i, 402). The caliph al-Mustandjid, during whose reign there occurred Nūr al-Dīn's [q.v.] three interventions against the Fāṭimids of Egypt, in 559, 562 and 564, authorized Ibn al-Djawzī to preach sermons in the Palace mosque—sermons in which the famous preacher (Dhayl, i, 403) vigorously defended the Sunna and criticized, not only all those whom he considered to be schismatics, but also the fuḳahāʾ who were too blindly attached to their own madhhabs.

It was during the reign of al-Mustaḍīʾ (566-74/1171-9), who moreover did a great deal for the development of Ḥanbalism, that Ibn al-Djawzī, as much through his activity in the university as through his preaching, became one of the most influential persons in Baghdād. At the beginning of 567/1171-2, when Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Ayyūbī (d. 589/1193) re-established the ʿAbbāsid khuṭba in Cairo, Ibn al-Djawzī celebrated this event by a work which he presented to the caliph: the Kitāb al-Naṣr ʿalā Miṣr (Dhayl, i, 404). He wrote also, at a date which is not known, another work to the glory of this caliph: al-Miṣbāḥ al-muḍīʾ fī dawlat al-Mustaḍīʾ (Dhayl, i, 420).

On 10 Muḥarram 568/1 September 1172—the day of al-ʿashūrāʾ—he preached a popular sermon of exhortation to a very large crowd; in the same year he was authorized by the caliph to preach in his presence a series of sermons at the Badr gate (Dhayl, i, 404-5). The year 569 was also one in which he preached many sermons, and in 570 both his teaching and his sermons continued to be received enthusiastically; he taught in two new madrasas and the caliph had a dais (dakka) constructed for him in the Palace mosque. In 571, the caliph conferred on him virtually inquisitorial powers: Ibn al-Djawzī then encouraged his hearers to denounce to him all those who, by their words or their attitude, impugned the reputation of the Companions—a measure aimed directly at the Shīʿism which still flourished in Baghdād (Dhayl, i, 407). In 572, during Ramaḍān, he preached in addition sermons in the mosque of al-Manṣūr and, in the caliph's presence, in the house of Ẓahīr al-Dīn, the ṣāḥib al-makhzin (Dhayl, i, 407-8). Again in 573 he preached many sermons.

The year 574/1178-9 marked the zenith of Ibn al-Djawzī's career at Baghdād. He was then directing five madrasas and had already written more than one hundred and fifty works; he enjoyed excellent relations with al-Mustaḍīʾ, and with the vizier, the ṣāḥib al-makhzin and the chief ʿulamāʾ. Under his influence, Ḥanbalism enjoyed great popular prestige in Baghdād; in 574 the caliph had an inscription engraved on the tomb of Ibn Ḥanbal, on whom he bestowed the title of imām (Bidāya, xii, 300), and erected a dakka for the Ḥanbalī jurisconsult Ibn al-Munā in the mosque of al-Manṣūr (Dhayl, i, 409). But the supporters of the other madhāhib complained, seeing this act as the result of Ibn al-Djawzī's influence over the caliph and the latter's growing sympathy with Ḥanbalism. In addition troubles broke out between Sunnīs and Shīʿīs (Bidāya, xiii, 300-1).

During the caliphate of al-Nāṣir (575-622/1179-1225), who gave a new turn to the policy of the caliphate but who had many Ḥanbalīs in his entourage or in his service, Ibn al-Djawzī, though by now old and less active, did not disappear from the political scene. He had, in particular, the support of the Ḥanbalī vizier Abu 'l Muẓaffar b. Yūnus (d. 593/1197), who also had been a pupil of Abū Ḥakīm al-Nahrawānī. He seems to have taken an active part in the condemnation of the shaykh Rukn al-Dīn b. ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Djīlī (d. 561/1166), who was accused of harbouring in his madrasa suspect books of philosophy and of zandaḳa, in particular the Rasāʾil of the Ikhwān al-ṣafāʾ (Dhayl, i, 425-6). The Djīliyya madrasa was taken away from Rukn al-Dīn and given to Ibn al-Djawizī.

The dismissal and arrest of the vizier Ibn Yūnus and the appointment to the vizierate of the Shīʿī Ibn al-Ḳaṣṣāb in 590/1194 marked the beginning of disgrace for Ibn al-Djawzī, who had written, it is not known precisely when, a refutation of al-Nāṣir's policy. In the same year, 590, Ibn al-Djawzī was arrested, without good reason it is said, put under the guard of a Shīʿī and sent to live under house arrest at Wāsiṭ. He remained in exile for five years until he was set free in 595/1198-9 on the intervention of the caliph's mother, a very devout woman whose sympathy had been gained by one of the preacher's sons, the shaykh Muḥyi 'l-Dīn Yūsuf, who was to make his career in the service of the caliphate. But soon after his triumphant return to Baghdād Ibn al-Djawzī died, in 597/1200.

Ibn al-Djawzī was one of the most prolific writers of Arabic literature. Ibn Radjab, in his Dhayl (i, 415-20), lists more than 200 works (cf. Brockelmann, I, 659-66 and S I, 914-20). Ibn Taymiyya, moreover, when he was still in Cairo, had counted and been acquainted with more than 1,000 works, varying greatly in length, and later learned of still more. All the great Islamic disciplines are represented in this prodigious output, which includes some major works.

His Muntaẓam, part of which has survived (ed. Krenkow, Ḥaydarābād 1357-9/1938-40, 6 vols.), is an exceptionally rich source for the history of the caliphate from 257/871 to 574/1179. His Ṣifat al-ṣafwa (Ḥaydarābād 1355-6/1936-7), which makes great use of the work of Abū Nuʿaym al-Iṣfahānī, is a well-documented history of Ṣūfism which aims to demonstrate that the true Ṣūfīs in Islam were primarily in fact those who set themselves to follow faithfully the teaching of the great Companions.

But his best historical work, inseparable from his sermons, is found, as Ibn Taymiyya emphasized, in his laudatory biographies (manāḳib); even the choice of subject is in itself instructive: the first four caliphs and the Umayyad ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz; al-Shāfiʿī and Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (with some Ḥanbalī ṭabaḳāt); also several ʿubbād or zuhhād such as al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, Fuḍayl b. ʿIyāḍ, Ibrāhīm b. Adham, Sufyān al-Thawrī, Bishr al-Ḥāfī, Maʿrūf al-Karkhī and Rabīʿa al-ʿAdawiyya.

His zeal as a cataloguer of heresies and as a polemicist, which appears throughout his work and prompted him to write refutations of al-Ḥallādj and of ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Djīlī, appears with particular intensity in one of the major works of Ḥanbalī polemic, Talbīs Iblīs (Cairo 1369/1950; Eng. tr. by D. S. Margoliouth, The Devil's delusion, in IC, ix (1935)-xii (1938)), in which he attacks not only the various sects more or less outside Sunnism (khawāridj, rawāfiḍ, muʿtazila, falāsifa, bāṭiniyya, etc.), but also, within Sunnism, all those whom he considered responsible for having introduced into the dogma or the law of Islam innovations which were to be condemned (bidʿa): fuḳahāʾ, traditionists, statesmen and, above all, ṣūfiyya, among whom men such as Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī, al-Ḳushayrī and al-Ghazālī, with many others, are vigorously attacked. Ibn al-Djawzī left, together with an excellent manual of Ḥanbalī fiḳh, several collections of sermons.

Ibn al-Djawzī had very many disciples and his influence on the Ḥanbalism of the Ayyūbid period was considerable. The traditionist ʿAbd al-Ghanī al-Maḳdisī (d. 600/1203-4) and the jurisconsult Muwaffaḳ al-Dīn b. Ḳudāma (d. 620/1223) went to Baghdād to study under him or his disciples. Ibn Taymiyya (d. 728/1328) also had a profound knowledge of his works.

IBN AL-DJAWZĪ, Shams al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf b. Ḳizoghlu, known as SIBṬ, famous preacher and historian (581/1185 or 582/1186-654/1256). Son of a Turkish freedman of the vizier Ibn Hubayra and of a daughter of the famous preacher and voluminous writer, Ibn al-Djawzī of Baghdād, from whom he derived the name by which he is known, the young Yūsuf was in fact brought up by this grandfather; after the latter's death (597/1201), he settled at Damascus, where he joined the Ayyūbid al-Muʿaẓẓam, then his successors al-Nāṣir Dāwūd and al-Ashraf. Although he abandoned the Ḥanbalism of his grandfather for Ḥanafism, the juridical school to which the Turks in general belonged, and in particular (an exceptional thing for Ayyūbids) al-Muʿaẓẓam and al-Nāṣir Dāwūd, he nevertheless inherited Ibn al-Djawzī's eloquence as a preacher and it was essentially for this that he was known during his life-time, moving crowds and princes to tears, urging them to take part in the Holy War, protesting against the giving up of Jerusalem to the Franks, etc. However, his fame now rests primarily on his historical works.

Sibṭ Ibn al-Djawzī is the author of an immense Universal History, the Mirʾāt al-zamān, in which, while he borrowed from his grandfather's Muntaẓam the practice of adding for each year to the chronicle of events a section of obituary notices, he far surpassed it in the fullness of his documentation and the scope of the work. It is true that in this respect, and because of the simple information given in his account, he falls far short of his near contemporary Ibn al-Athīr, but, because he preserves in extenso and without criticism the versions of sources which often no longer survive, he is in these cases of inestimable value. Although (but this point might well be established more conclusively) his work is of little interest for the period covered by al-Ṭabarī, and for the 6th/12th century, where his sources (Ibn al-Ḳalānisī, Ibn al-Djawzī, ʿImād al-Dīn al-Iṣfahānī and some other minor writers) are preserved, on the other hand it is of the greatest value not only for his own period but also for the 4th-5th/10th-11th centuries, for which he depended first on the almost completely lost history of Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ, then, particularly for the years 448-79/1056-86, on the detailed continuation of this work by al-Ṣābiʾ's son, Ghars al-Niʿma Muḥammad, which Sibṭ reproduces almost verbatim. Unfortunately the Mirʾāt al-zamān survives only in two forms which each contain slight alterations: it appears that the author's drafts cannot have been re-written in a definitive fair copy before his death, with the result that one whole group of manuscripts, which reproduce the full text of the passages which they preserve, contain lacunae, often actually in the middle of an account, and some confusions which make them difficult to use on their own. A complete and systematic edition, preserved in the other, more numerous, group of manuscripts, was made by the same Ḳuṭb al-Dīn al-Yūnīnī who, at the beginning of the 8th/14th century, wrote a continuation of it; in this edition, however, al-Yūnīnī has on the one hand inserted a number of additions (easily recognizable) and on the other hand cut out some lengthy passages (of little importance except when they contained the names of sources). It is much to be regretted that so far there exist only editions limited to the years 495-658 (the date of the end of the work) and these very mediocre: that of Jewett (Chicago 1907), which covers this period, is the facsimile of a manuscript of the group with lacunae (see Cl. Cahen, in Arabica, iv (1957), 911), and it is still on this one alone that the printed edition of Ḥaydarābād is based (1952); in the Recueil des historiens des Croisades a manuscript of the al-Yūnīnī group was used, but the part published (and translated) covered only about forty years, from the First Crusade onwards. The part based on Ghars al-Niʿma is still unpublished and little known, although an edition of it is planned by G. Makdisi and Cl. Cahen.

The Mirʾāt al-zamān is the basic source for all the wealth of the later historiography of Damascus as well as of various other historical works. It was the source in particular already of the Continuation of the Two Gardens by the contemporary of Sibṭ, Abū Shāma. Much used by al-Dhahabī, it was almost the sole source of Ibn Kathīr and of very large sections of the Nudjūm of Ibn Taghrībirdī. The Mirʾāt and the Mufarridj of Ibn Wāṣil alone between them provide nine-tenths of the information known to later writers on the Ayyūbids.

There are attributed to Sibṭ Ibn al-Djawzī a "Mirror for princes" written for al-Muʿaẓẓam and several other works including a treatise on ʿAlī, the ʿAlids and the ʿAlid imāms which, if it is really by him, raises a problem: a priori it would be considered as a polemical treatise against Shīʿism if al-Dhahabī, who knew the author, had not stated that he was suspected of Shīʿī tendencies; the existing manuscripts would repay study (see Brockelmann, S I, 589).

IBN AL-DJAZARĪ, SHAMS AL-DĪN ABU 'L-KHAYR MUḤ. B. MUḤ. B. MUḤ. B. MUḤ. B. ʿALĪ B. YŪSUF AL-DJAZARĪ, faḳīh, "reader" and ḳāḍī, born in Damascus on 25 Ramaḍān 751/26 November 1350. After completing the traditional studies in his native town, with particular attention to ḥadīth and Ḳurʾānic "readings", he made the pilgrimage to Mecca in 768/1367 and then went to Cairo, where he continued the study of the ḳirāʾāt. Returning to Damascus, he devoted himself to ḥadīth and fiḳh, attending the classes of the pupils of al-Dimyāṭī, al-Abarḳūhī and al-Asnawī. He then returned to Cairo to study rhetoric and the uṣūl al-fiḳh and, in Alexandria, came in touch with the pupils of Ibn ʿAbd al-Salām. He received the idjāza as muftī from Ismāʿīl Ibn Kathīr [q.v.] in 774/1373, from Ḍiyāʾ al-Dīn in 778/1376 and finally from the shaykh al-Islām al-Bulḳīnī [q.v.] in 785/1383. On his return to Damascus he devoted himself to the teaching of the ḳirāʾāt, and then was appointed ḳāḍī in 793/1391. However, when his property in Egypt was confiscated in 798/1396, he went to Bursa, where the Ottoman sultan Bāyazīd I had his court. After the battle of Ankara (805/1402) and Bāyazīd's capture, Tīmūr Lang sent him with other prisoners to Samarḳand, where he continued his teaching. Tīmūr died in Shaʿbān 807/February 1405; Ibn al-Djazarī then travelled to Khurāsān, thence to Herāt, Yazd, Iṣfahān and finally to Shīrāz; after teaching there for some time he was, against his wishes, appointed ḳāḍī of the town by Pīr Muḥammad. He next went to Baṣra and later, in 823/1420, to Mecca and Medina where he lived for some years before returning to Shīrāz, where he died on 9 Rabīʿ I 833/6 December 1429.

Ibn al-Djazarī left a great number of works, mostly relating to the "readings", fiḳh and ḥadīth; some have been published, others are still in manuscript:— Ghāyat al-nihāya fī ṭabaḳāt al-ḳurrāʾ, ed. Bergsträsser and Pretzl, Istanbul 1933-5, 3 vols.—Ṭayyibāt al-nashr fi 'l-ḳirāʾāt al-ʿashr, an urdjūza of 1,000 verses on the "ten readers" of the Ḳurʾān, completed in Shaʿbān 799/May 1396; ed. Cairo 1282, 2307.—al-Durra al-muḍiyya fī ḳirāʾāt al-aʾimma al-thalātha al-marḍiyya, a poem of 241 verses, completed in 823/1420; ed. Cairo 1285, 1308.—Mundjid al-muḳriʾīn wa-murshid al-ṭālibīn, on the difficulties of reading the Ḳurʾān; ed. Cairo 1350.—al-Muḳaddima al-Djazariyya, an urdjūza of 107 verses on the correct pronunciation of the Ḳurʾān; ed. Cairo 1282, 1307. The author's son, Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Muḥammad, wrote a commentary on it under the title al-Ḥawāshī al-mufahhima fī sharḥ al-Muḳaddima, which was completed in 806/1403; ed. Delhi 1288, Cairo 1309.—al-Ḥiṣn al-ḥaṣīn min kalām Sayyid al-Mursalīn, a collection of ḥadīth used for prayer; ed. Cairo 1279, 1315, Algiers 1328; Urdu trans., Delhi 1871.—al-Zahr al-fāʾiḥ fī dhikr man tanazzaha ʿan al-dhunūb wa 'l-ḳabāʾiḥ, Cairo 1305, 1310.—al-Muṣʿid al-aḥmad fī khatm Musnad al-Imām Aḥmad, Cairo 1347/1929.

Among the works of Ibn al-Djazarī which have survived but not yet been published (for the manuscripts see Brockelmann), we may mention: a Kitāb al-nashr fi 'l-ḳirāʾāt al-ʿashr; a commentary on the Taysīr of al-Dānī [q.v.], Taḥbīr al-Taysīr fi 'l-ḳirāʾāt; a treatise on pronunciation, al-Tamhīd fī ʿilm al-tadjwīd, written by the author in his youth (769/1367); a mukhtaṣar of the Ṭabaḳāt al-ḳurrāʾ (see above); a treatise on the technology of ḥadīth, Muḳaddimat ʿilm al-ḥadīth; a monograph on Ḳurʾān, XI, 46, Kifāyat al-almaʿī fī āyāt "yā arḍu'blaʿī"; an urdjūza on the transmission of Ḳurʾānic pronunciation, al-Hidāya ilā maʿālim al-riwāya; a treatise on ethics, Mukhtaṣar al-naṣīḥa bi 'l-adilla al-ṣaḥīḥa; a short treatise on the art of writing, al-Iṣāba fī lawāzim al-kitāba; a short urdjūza on astronomy; several works on the Prophet: al-Risāla al-bayāniyya fī ḥaḳḳ abaway al-Nabī, on the subject of his parents' conversion; al-Mawlid al-kabīr, a biography of Muḥammad; Dhāt al-shifāʾ fī sīrat al-Nabī wa 'l-khulafāʾ, an urdjūza on the Prophet, the orthodox caliphs and the history of Islam up to the reign of Bāyazīd I.

Bibliography: Ghayāt al-nihāya, ii, 247 ff. contains some useful information on the author as recorded by one of his students; Ṭāshköprüzāde, al-Shaḳāʾiḳ al-nuʿmāniyya, in the margin of Ibn Khallikān, Cairo 1310, i, 39; Suyūṭī, Ṭabaḳāt al-ḥuffāẓ, xxiv, 5; Sakhāwī, Ḍawʾ, viii, 256 ff.; Ibn Khāwand-Shāh, Rawḍat al-ṣafāʾ, Lucknow 1874, vi, 1234; Khwāndamīr, Ḥabīb al-siyar, Bombay 1273/1857, iii, 90; Shawkānī, al-Badr al-ṭāliʿ, Cairo 1348/1930, ii, 251; Maʿārif (Urdu monthly), Aʿẓamgaṙh, 81/v (Nov. 1957), 325-44, 81/vi (Dec. 1957), 441-52, 82/i (Jan. 1958), 62-76; Dhahabī, Dhayl Ṭabaḳāt al-ḥuffāẓ, Damascus 1347/1949, 377; Ṣiddīḳ Ḥasan Khān Ḳannawdjī, Itḥāf al-nubalāʾ al-muttaḳīn, Cawnpore 1288/1871, 392; Brockelmann, II, 201-3, S II, 274-8; F. IBN DJAZLA, Abū ʿAlī Yaḥyā b. ʿĪsā, Arab physician of Baghdād, known in the West under the names of Ben Gesla, Byngezla, Buhahylyha, etc. Of Christian origin, he embraced Islam under the influence of his teacher, the Muʿtazilī Abū ʿAlī ibn al-Walīd, on 11 Djumādā II 466/11 February 1074. He was secretary to the Ḥanafī ḳāḍī of Baghdād and studied medicine with Ṣāʿid b. Hibat Allāh, court physician to al-Muḳtadī. He lived in the al-Karkh quarter, where he attended his neighbours and his friends without payment and even obtained the necessary medicines for them. He died in Shaʿbān 493/June 1100.

Ibn Djazla is the author of: (1) Taḳwīm al-abdān fī tadbīr al-insān (printed in Damascus in 1333/1914), which was translated into Latin by the Sicilian Jewish physician, Faradj b. Sālim (Magister Farachi) in 1280, under the title of Tacuini aegritudinum (printed at Strasbourg in 1532); this work consists of 44 tables describing 352 maladies and indicating the appropriate diets for them. It is possible that the author was inspired by the Taḳwīm al-ṣiḥḥa of Ibn Buṭlān; the work was later imitated by Ibn Biklārish and by the anonymous author of Salerno of the middle of the 12th century, and may have had an influence on the arrangement of the tables in the Taḳwīm al-buldān of Abu 'l-Fidāʾ. (2) Minhādj al-bayān fīmā yastaʿmiluh al-insān, dedicated to the caliph al-Muḳtadī; this work, compiled after the Taḳwīm, consists of an alphabetical list of plants and drugs, simple or compound; there exists in manuscript a modern French translation of it by P. de Koning (see Dietrich, Medicinalia, p. 102, no. 41). (3) Faḍāʾil al-ṭibb. (4) al-Radd ʿala 'l-Naṣārā, a work in praise of Islam and criticizing Christianity and, in passing, also Judaism; it is apparent from the author's attitude that the basic reason for his conversion to Islam was his identification of Muḥammad with the prophet announced in the books of the Pentateuch and the Gospels. (5) al-Ishāra fī talkhīṣ al-ʿibāra. (6) Mukhtār Mukhtaṣar Taʾrīkh Baghdād, a summary of the work of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī.

IBN AL-DJAZZĀR, Abū Djaʿfar Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Abī Khālid, famous physician of Ḳayrawān, died at a great age in about 395/1004-5. His father was a physician, as was also his paternal uncle Abū Bakr. He made no journey outside Ifrīḳiya. A pupil of the celebrated Isḥāḳ b. Sulaymān al-Isrāʾīlī [q.v.], he was a philanthropist and led an austere life, caring not only for the great and rich but also for the poor, for whom indeed he composed a Kitāb Ṭibb al-fuḳarāʾ ("Medicine for the poor"), which is unhappily lost with all the rest of his medical works (about 20 titles) except for a Risāla fī ibdāl al-adwiya (on succedanea) and, especially, his famous Zād al-musāfir ("Viaticum"). The latter was introduced into Spain by his pupil ʿUmar b. Ḥafṣ b. Barīḳ, became known in Italy, and was translated into Greek during the author's lifetime. Later it was translated also into Latin and Hebrew. Several philosophical works of his are also cited. He composed three historical works: Kitāb Maghāzī Ifrīḳiya (on the Arab conquest), K. Akhbār al-dawla (on the Fāṭimid dynasty), and K. al-Taʿrīf bi-ṣaḥīḥ al-taʾrīkh (collection of biographies, consulted by Yāḳūt); probably also a K. Ṭabaḳāt al-ḳuḍāt ("classes" of ḳāḍīs); and a geographical work: K. ʿAdjāʾib al-buldān. These books have not survived, but were used by the anonymous author of the Kitāb al-ʿUyūn, al-Bakrī, Ibn Ḥayyān, Abū Bakr al-Mālikī, and al-Ṣafadī.

IBN AL-DJILLĪḲĪ [see ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Marwān].

IBN DJINNĪ, Abu 'l-Fatḥ ʿUthmān, was born in Mosul before 300/913 (Pröbster, p. x, ca. 320), the son of a Greek slave belonging to Sulaymān b. Fahd b. Aḥmad al-Azdī. His teacher was the Baṣran Abū ʿAlī al-Fārisī, with whom he was associated for forty years till the latter's death, partly at the court of Sayf al-Dawla at Aleppo and partly at the court of ʿAḍud al-Dawla in Fārs; according to Yāḳūt, he held the post of Kātib al-inshāʾ at the court of the latter and of Ṣamṣām al-Dawla. In both places he was on friendly terms with al-Mutanabbī, with whom he discussed grammatical questions and on whose Dīwān he wrote two commentaries; as they were merely grammatical, it was criticized by Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī. He also sought other teachers (Rescher, 5 f.). He succeeded al-Fārisī in Baghdād and died in 392/1002. He devoted himself especially to grammar and is celebrated as the most learned authority on taṣrīf; he occupied a position midway between the Kūfa and the Baṣra schools. He founded the science of etymology (al-ishtiḳāḳ al-akbar), see I. Goldziher, in ZDMG, xxxi (1877), 546. His most important works are K. Sirr al-ṣināʿa wa-asrār al-balāgha (on Arabic vowels and consonants) and K. al-Khaṣāʾiṣ fī ʿilm uṣūl al-ʿarabiyya: in Mosul he studied the language of the Bedouins, which he (like al-Fārisī) found fresh, but vitiated by offences against the classical rules (quotation from Khaṣāʾiṣ, in al-Suyūṭī, *Muzhir*³, ii, 494). Besides other philological works he also wrote poems.

IBN DJUBAYR, ABU 'L-ḤUSAYN MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD B. DJUBAYR AL-KINĀNĪ, Andalusian traveller and writer, born at Valencia 540/1145, into a family which had settled in Spain in 123/740. He studied at Játiva, where his father was a civil servant, and received the traditional instruction of young men of his class, that is to say he learnt the rudiments of the religious sciences and of belles-lettres at the same time, but not without learning how to exercise his poetic skill. His talents won for him the post of secretary to the governor of Granada, Abū Saʿīd ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Muʾmin, but having been induced to drink wine on a certain occasion, he repented bitterly, and to expiate this sin decided to make the pilgrimage to Mecca. His fame rests on his account of this fairly eventful journey, the Riḥla.

Leaving Granada on 19 Shawwāl 578/3 February 1183 in the company of his friend Aḥmad b. Ḥassān, he proceeded to Ceuta via Tarifa and there embarked for Alexandria on a Genoese ship, which took a month to reach its destination by way of Sardinia, Sicily, and Crete. At Alexandria Ibn Djubayr had to endure vexations at the hands of the Egyptian customs of which he gives a very lively picture. To reach Mecca he then had to pass through Cairo, Ḳūṣ, and ʿAydhāb, and then cross the Red Sea to Djudda. After staying for nine months in the holy city and performing the pilgrimage, he visited Medina and continued his journey across the desert as far as Kūfa; from there he went to Baghdād and Mosul, crossed the Djazīra to Aleppo, came down to Damascus, and went thence to Acre to wait for a ship to take him back to his native land. He embarked there, again in a Genoese vessel, on 10 Radjab 580/18 October 1184, bound for Sicily; he narrowly escaped with his life in a dramatic shipwreck in the straits of Messina. Re-embarking at Trapani, he arrived at Cartagena on 15 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 580/15 March 1185 and returned to Granada on 22 Muḥarram 581/25 April 1185.

Four years later he undertook a second voyage to the east, which lasted from 585/1189 to 587/1191, but he has left no account of this journey. In 614/1217 he set off once more and stopped at Alexandria in order to teach there; it is there that he died on 27 Shaʿbān 614/29 November 1217.

Ibn Djubayr's Riḥla is the first and one of the best of the works of this kind; it has served as model to many other pilgrims, and many later authors have borrowed from it shamelessly, beginning with Ibn Djuzayy [q.v.], the editor of the Riḥla of Ibn Baṭṭūṭa [q.v.], who had no scruples in copying from it, especially some descriptions of towns; passages from it are also found in al-Sharīshī, al-ʿAbdarī, al-Maḳrīzī, and others. Ibn Djubayr records his journey day by day, describes the countries which he passes through and furnishes an abundance of information on the people among whom he stayed; all this makes his journey a precious source for the history of the Crusades, the state of navigation in the Mediterranean in the Middle Ages, the political and social condition of the countries through which he passed, the pilgrimage to Mecca, etc. His style, though in certain narrative passages lively and vivid in a way which recalls the manner of modern reporters, is over-florid and resorts to the devices of rhymed prose when giving generalities on a country, describing towns, and also in expressing the sentiments which storms inspire in this poet; on the other hand, he is skilful at seizing the characteristic and picturesque traits of an animated crowd, and on these occasions his colourful and simple style gives an entirely modern air to his narrative. The verses which have been preserved are of traditional type and of generally sententious character, this dedicated traveller sighing with homesickness for his native land and advising his contemporaries never to go abroad.

The Riḥla became known in Europe in the middle of the 19th century. A fragment was published and translated in Les Historiens orientaux des Croisades, iii, and M. Amari also edited and translated an extract under the title of Voyage en Sicile sous le règne de Guillaume le Bon, in JA, 1846. The whole text was not published till 1852, at Leiden, by the young W. Wright, then taken up again and emended by M. J. de Goeje, GMS, v, Leiden-London 1907; this last edition was the basis for a poor Egyptian edition, Cairo 1326/1908, but Ḥ. Naṣṣār produced a much better one at Cairo in 1374/1955. Three translations have been published: in Italian by C. Schiaparelli, Viaggio in Ispagna, Sicilia, etc., Rome 1906; in English by R. J. C. Broadhurst, The travels of Ibn Jubayr, London 1952; in French by M. Gaudefroy-Demombynes, 3 vols., Paris 1949-56.

IBN DJUDʿĀN [see ʿABD ALLĀH B. DJUDʿĀN].

IBN DJULDJUL, ABŪ DĀWŪD SULAYMĀN B. ḤASSĀN AL-ANDALUSĪ, Arab physician, perhaps of Spanish extraction, born in Cordova 332/944, died after 384/994. He began the study of grammar and tradition in Cordova in 343/954, but already at the age of 15 turned to medicine, in which field ten years later he was an acknowledged authority. He was the personal physician of al-Muʾayyad bi'llāh Hishām (336-99/977-1009). It was during this period that he wrote most of his works, such as the Tafsīr anwāʿ al-adwiya al-mufrada min kitāb Diyusḳūrīdūs, composed in 372/982 (of which only extracts survive, in Ms Madrid 233) and the Ṭabaḳāt al-aṭibbāʾ wa 'l-ḥukamāʾ, composed in 377/987 (ed. Fuʾād Sayyid, Les générations des médecins et des sages, Cairo 1955). Further works are: Maḳāla fī dhikr al-adwiya allatī lam yadhkurhā Diyusḳūrīdūs (perhaps extant in the manuscript of mixed contents Bodl. 573); Maḳāla fī adwiyat al-tiryāḳ (in Bodl. 573); Risālat al-tabyīn fī mā ghalaṭ fīhi baʿḍ al-mutaṭabbibīn (lost). Among these works the History of Physicians (Ṭabaḳāt al-aṭibbāʾ) can claim especial interest: firstly, it is, after the Taʾrīkh al-aṭibbāʾ of Isḥāḳ b. Ḥunayn (ed. F. Rosenthal, in Oriens, vii (1954), 55-80), probably the oldest collection of biographies of physicians in Arabic, and secondly it is the earliest example of the use of Arabic translations from Latin (Orosius, Chronicle of Hieronymus, Etymologiae of Isidorus of Seville).

Bibliography (in addition to works mentioned above): Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa, ʿUyūn al-anbāʾ, ii, 46-8; Ibn al-Ḳifṭī, Taʾrīkh, ed Lippert, 190; Ṣāʿid al-

IBN DJUMAYYIL [see ibn diḥya].

IBN DJUZAYY, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-Kalbī, Arab writer, born in 721/1321 at Granada of a literary family. His father, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, was known particularly as a poet and as a faḳīh; born in 693/1294, he was one of the teachers of Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb and died at the battle of Rio Salado in 741/1340 (cf. al-Maḳḳarī, Nafḥ al-ṭīb, ed. M. M. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, Cairo 1367-9, 10 vols., viii, 28-31; Brockelmann, II, 342, S II, 377; ʿU. R. Kaḥḥāla, Muʿdjam al-muʾallifīn, Damascus 1376-81/1957-61, 15 vols., ix, 11). His three sons, Aḥmad, Muḥammad and ʿAbd Allāh, carried on the family's literary and juristic traditions (cf. Maḳḳarī, ibid., 31 f.; Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb, al-Iḥāṭa fī akhbār Gharnāṭa, new ed. by M. ʿA. ʿInān, i, Cairo 1375/1955, 163-8, 411). Of the three, it was Muḥammad (Abū ʿAbd Allāh) whose fame chiefly survived. Having served as kātib during the reign of the Naṣrid Abu 'l-Ḥadjdjādj Yūsuf (733-55/1333-54), he then went to Fez, where the Marīnid Abū ʿInān (750-9/1349-58) commanded him to take down in writing the text of the Riḥla of Ibn Baṭṭūṭa [q.v.]. Besides his redaction of this work, Abū ʿAbd Allāh wrote poems and various other works, particularly on history, law and philology. He died circa 756-8/1355-7.

IBN AL-DUBAYTHĪ, Djamāl al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Saʿīd b. Yaḥyā, an ʿIrāḳī historian, was born in Wāsiṭ on Monday, 26 Radjab 558/Sunday, 30 June 1163, and died in Baghdād on Monday, 8 Rabīʿ II 637/7 November 1239. His History of Wāsiṭ is not preserved. His History of Baghdād, variously called dhayl or mudhayyal and extant in individual manuscripts, continues the work of al-Samʿānī, which in turn was a continuation of the Taʾrīkh Baghdād of the Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī. It is strictly biographical, containing biographies of those who died after the death of al-Samʿānī (562/1166), with the addition of biographies which al-Samʿānī had failed to include. Many of the men listed in the work were known to Ibn al-Dubaythī personally. For the continuity of historical writing at the period, it is characteristic that he studied with an earlier historian of Baghdād, al-Ḳaṭīʿī, who taught him the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī (al-Mukhtaṣar al-muḥtādj ilayhi, 20), and that among other historians who were his students, Ibn al-Nadjdjār, his junior by twenty years, continued his work. An abridgement of Ibn al-Dubaythī's History was made by al-Dhahabī for his own use (vol. i, comprising the biographies of those named Muḥammad to al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī, published by Muṣṭafā Djawād, Baghdād 1371/1951, under the title of al-Mukhtaṣar al-muḥtādj ilayhi min Taʾrīkh ... Ibn al-Dubaythī; vol. ii, Baghdād 1963, with a biographical introduction in which the editor argues for Dabaythī as the more original form of the nisba but gives the apparently wrong date 639 for the author's death).

Bibliography: al-Mustawfī, History of Irbil, as quoted by Ibn Khallikān, no. 633; Dhahabī, Ḥuffāẓ, iv, 199 f. (the same author's Taʾrīkh al-Islām and ʿIbar, not available); (Ibn al-Fuwaṭī), al-Ḥawādith al-djāmiʿa, Baghdād 1351, 135 f.; al-Subkī, Ṭab. al-Shāfiʿiyya, v, 26; al-Sakhāwī, Iʿlān, in F. Rosenthal, A history of Muslim historiography, Leiden 1952, 386 f., 406; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, v, 185 f.; Brockelmann, I, 402 f., S I, 565. Another Ibn al-Dubaythī prominent at the time, Aḥmad b. Djaʿfar b. Aḥmad (558-621/1163-1224), is said to have been a paternal cousin, but the name of his grandfather does not bear this out (Ibn al-Fuwaṭī, Talkhīṣ Madjmaʿ al-ādāb, Baghdād 1962-, iv, 897 f.; Ibn al-Ṣābūnī, Takmila, Baghdād 1377/1957, 321, with a note by the editor Muṣṭafā Djawād). (F. Rosenthal)

IBN DUḲMĀḲ, Ṣārim al-Dīn Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Aydamur al-ʿAlāʾī al-Miṣrī (the name is derived from the Turkish toḳmaḳ "hammer", cf. Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ed. Flügel, ii, 102), b. about 750/1349, was a zealous Ḥanafī and wrote a work on the ṭabaḳāt of the Ḥanafīs, Naẓm al-djumān, in three volumes, the first of which deals with Abū Ḥanīfa (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv, 136; vi, 317); on account of his depreciatory references to al-Shāfiʿī he was flogged and thrown into prison. His history of Egypt, Nuzhat al-anām, in about 12 vols. to the year 779, was of great importance (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 102; vi, 323). By command of the Sultan al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Barḳūḳ he wrote a history of the rulers of Egypt to the year 805; he further wrote a separate history of this Sultan, ʿIḳd al-djawāhir fī sīrat al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Barḳūḳ, abbreviated under the title Yanbūʿ al-maẓāhir (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 102; iv, 230; vi, 514). According to Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa his historical works were largely utilized by al-ʿAynī and al-ʿAsḳalānī (i, 442; ii, 118). He wrote a large work on ten cities of Islam, Kitāb al-Intiṣār li-wāsiṭat ʿiḳd al-amṣār, devoting one volume to each city; of these volumes the 4th and 5th describing Cairo and Alexandria are preserved in Cairo and have been published by Vollers (Cairo 1314/1893). According to Vollers (p. 5) he used better authorities than al-Maḳrīzī. The latter, for a time his pupil, seems not to have used his work. Ibn Duḳmāḳ also wrote a work on Ṣūfī biographies, al-Kunūz al-makhfiyya fī taʾrīkh al-Ṣūfiyya (Vollers, 4), also a book on the organization of the army, Tardjumān al-zamān (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 277), and a book on the interpretation of dreams, Farāʾid al-fawāʾid (op. cit., iv, 392). According to al-Suyūṭī, Ḥusn al-muḥāḍara fī akhbār Miṣr wa 'l-Ḳāhira, Cairo 1321/1903, i, 266, he died in 790/1388, aged over 80; so also Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, i, 447; ii, 102, 277; but in any case he was still alive in 793 (see Vollers, Introduction) and Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa elsewhere gives the date of his death as 809/1406 (ii, 149; iv, 230, 392; vi, 323, 357, 514), as does Ibn al-ʿImād.

IBN AL-DUMAYNA, one of the lesser poets of the late Umayyad and the early ʿAbbāsid periods. His name was Abu 'l-Sarī ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿUbayd Allāh b. Aḥmad. He belonged to the Banū ʿĀmir b. Taym Allāh, a clan of the Khathʿam tribe. His mother was al-Dumayna bint Ḥudhayfa al-Salūliyya. His notoriety rests on the story of how he murdered the seducer of his wife, killed her and her little daughter, and was finally slain in the ensuing blood-feud. This story is told with many differences in the details and embellished with spurious poems in Aghānī[1], xv, 151-4.

In his verses he deals mainly with love and its sorrows in the sentimental way of Arabic erotic poetry. Owing to this affinity in style and sentiment, some of his verses and even whole poems are attributed to other authors, whilst he is reported to have usurped one ḳaṣīda from his contemporary Ibn al-Ṭathriyya (see Bakrī, Simṭ al-laʾālī, 490; cf. also ibid., 49). Some verses of his (often interpolated) became popular love-songs (Aghānī[1], x, 161; xv, 151; xix, 82 f.; xxi, 252, 17). Al-Zubayr b. Bakkār collected Akhbār Ibn al-Dumayna (Fihrist, 111, 13; cf. Aghānī[1], xv, 151). Another work of the same title was written by Ibn Abī Ṭāhir (Fihrist, 147). His dīwān was published in Cairo in 1337/1918 (see Machriq, 1920 489) on the basis of two manuscripts of the Dār al-Kutub but the oldest known manuscript (Istanbul Aṣir Ef. 950, see O. Rescher in MFOB, v, 515), containing the recension of Thaʿlab and Muḥ. b. Ḥabīb, has been used as basis for a good edition by A. R. al-Naffākh, Cairo 1379/1960.

IBN DURAYD, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN AL-AZDĪ, Arab philologist and lexicographer, born at Baṣra in 223/837 as son of a raʾīs of some standing and wealth. He was a pure Arab belonging to the Azd [q.v.] of ʿUmān and tracing his pedigree back to Ḳaḥṭān (Taʾrīkh Baghdād, ii, 195). He was educated by his uncle al-Ḥusayn b. Durayd who engaged for him as tutor the philologist Abū ʿUthmān al-Ushnāndānī (d. 288). During a voyage on the river, Ibn Durayd learned from his tutor some hundred difficult couplets together with their explanation, which he later transmitted to his own pupils; they form al-Ushnāndānī's Kitāb Maʿānī al-shiʿr (printed Damascus 1922), which is sometimes ascribed to Ibn Durayd himself (Ibn Khayr, Fahrasa, 366). Ibn Durayd also studied under Abū Ḥātim al-Sidjistānī (d. 255), al-Riyāshī (d. 257), Ibn Akhi 'l-Aṣmaʿī and other scholars of the Baṣra school. During the War of the Zandj Ibn Durayd, with his uncle, left Baṣra before it was sacked in Shawwāl 257 and fled to ʿUmān where he stayed twelve years. Little is known of his life during the next decades: once (see Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, vi, 492) he met the ruler of ʿUmān al-Ṣalt b. Mālik al-Ibāḍī of the Banū ʿUmāra (reigned 237-273, see Zambaur, 125). In one of his poems (Dīwān, pp. 101 ff.) al-Ṣalt's successor Rashīd b. al-Naḍr (reigned 273-277; Zambaur, 125) is mentioned as a foe of the poet's tribesmen. We also hear of his travels to the islands (in the Persian Gulf). Of his later years we know more, thanks to the information given by his pupil Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbd Allāh Ibn Mīkāl (270-362; see Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, i, 343-6) to al-Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyiʿ (and reproduced from the latter's Taʾrīkh Nīsābūr by Yāḳūt, l.c.) and to al-Salāmī (see Yāḳūt, vi, 490). Ismāʿīl's father was appointed governor of al-Ahwāz and Fārs by the caliph al-Muḳtadir (reigned 295-320); he invited Ibn Durayd, who was then living in ʿIrāḳ (see his Maḳṣūra, verse 95) to take charge of his son's studies. Ibn Durayd composed for his pupil his famous poem al-Maḳṣūra, ending it with a eulogy on the two Mīkālīs. In 297 (see Yāḳūt, op. cit., vi, 490) he dictated to Ismāʿīl his dictionary of the Arabic language, al-Djamhara. Some time later he left Fārs owing to the death of the elder Ibn Mīkāl and the return of his son Ismāʿīl to Nīsābūr. This must have happened somewhere between 297 and 301; for the ruler of Khurāsān Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl al-Sāmānī to whom, after his return, Ismāʿīl paid his respects in Herāt was murdered on 23 Djumādā II 301/24 January 914 (Zambaur, 202). Ibn Durayd went back to ʿIrāḳ and settled in Baghdād. Al-Muḳtadir granted him a monthly stipend of 50 dīnār so that he could carry on his studies and his teaching. His profound knowledge of the language and poetry of the Arabs attracted many students. Among the more famous of his pupils are: Abū Saʿīd al-Sīrāfī (284-368), al-Marzubānī (297-384), Abu'l-Faradj al-Iṣbahānī [q.v.] (284-356), Abū ʿAlī al-Baghdādī al-Ḳālī [q.v.] (288-356), who made Ibn Durayd's works known in Spain (see Ibn Khayr, Fahrasa, 348 f., 366, 398, 400), al-Zadjdjādjī (d. 337), Ibn Khālawayh [q.v.], Abū Aḥmad al-ʿAskarī [q.v.].

Ibn Durayd's chief work is his monumental dictionary al-Djamhara (Ḥaydarābād 1344), which contains some materials not to be found in our dictionaries; in it Ibn Durayd made use of the Kitāb al-ʿAyn of Khalīl—which gave his enemies a pretext for their slander—but in selecting and arranging the words he followed his own judgement. He included a large number of loanwords, tracing as far as possible their origins. His Kitāb al-Ishtiḳāḳ (ed. Wüstenfeld, Göttingen 1854) was prompted by the assertion of some (non-Arabs) that the names of the Arabs had on the whole no meaning; therefore, Ibn Durayd gives in this book the etymology of their proper names, arranging them according to the genealogical system.—His Kitāb al-Malāḥin (Cairo 1347) contains about 400 ambiguous words for the benefit of such persons who, when unjustly forced to take an oath, want to take refuge in mental reservation.—The Kitāb al-Mudjtanā (ed. Krenkow, Ḥaydarābād 1342) is a miscellany of remarkable sayings of the Prophet and his successors. There are also some apophthegms of the ancient philosophers and a selection of didactic verses.—His Kitāb al-Wishāḥ (see J. Kraemer in ZDMG, cx, 259-73) deals not only with the bynames and sobriquets of poets but also with historical und genealogical topics.—Amongst his poems (Diwān, collected by Badr al-Dīn al-ʿAlawī, Cairo 1360/1946) we find verses fi 'l-maḳṣūr wa 'l-mamdūd (pp. 29-31), a Ḳaṣīda Lughawiyya (pp. 87-97), an elegy on al-Ṭabarī, d. 310/923 (pp. 38-41) and two poems in honour of al-Shāfiʿī (pp. 77 f. and 109).

Ibn Durayd possessed the virtues of a sayyid; he was courageous, generous and kind. He was also a cultured man, enjoying good books (see Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, vi, 493) as well as singing and music. After two apoplectic fits, he died at the age of 98 in Baghdād on Wednesday, 17 Shaʿbān 321/13 August 933 on the same day as Abū Hāshim al-Djubbāʾī, the leading Muʿtazilī.

IBN DURUSTAWAYH, important grammarian born in 258/871, died at Baghdād in 346/957, all of whose works are lost, with the exception of a Kitāb al-Kuttāb (referred to in the Fihrist as Adab al-kuttāb). In accordance with the ideal of his time, his learning was very extensive; it embraced ḥadīth, in which he was a transmitter of the ancient masters ʿAbbās al-Dūrī and Yaʿkūb b. Sufyān al-Nasawī, and also of his contemporary, the famous al-Dārākuṭnī. These compilations still existed in the time of al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (5th/11th century). Ibn Durustawayh was also an exegetist of the Ḳurʾān (cf. Fihrist): he had tried to find a compromise, in the matter of exegesis, between the theses of the Baṣran al-Akhfash and the Kūfan Thaʿlab [qq.v.]. He himself had written a Kitāb Maʿānī al-Ḳurʾān. It is not known exactly in what degree he was inspired in this work by that of Abū ʿUthmān al-Djarmī, of whom he was the transmitter. In spite of his relatively conciliatory attitnde to Thaʿlab in the field of exegesis, he was considered to be uncompromisingly "Baṣran" in pure grammar. He is said to have written a work refuting al-Mufaḍḍal b. Salama and another in which he attacked the theses of Thaʿlab on the "divergences among grammarians". The lack of these works is particularly regrettable since very little is known of the polemic between Baṣrans and Kūfans and since from the time of Weil (Abū l-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī, Leiden 1913) there has been a tendency to regard this quarrel simply as a literary genre worked up by the 4th/10th century grammarians of Baghdād, Ibn Durustawayh's contemporaries. The latter seems, in short, to have concerned himself with the theory of grammar (Kitāb al-Hidāya) in the manner of the neo-Baṣrans of Baghdād in his time (ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā al-Rummānī, Abū ʿAlī al-Fārisī, Ibn al-Djinnī) whereas, in his written works of Ḳurʾānic exegesis or his collections of *ḥadīth*s, he was much more eclectic, even going so far as to take account of the contribution of the grammarians of Kūfa. His main work nevertheless remains the Kitāb al-Kuttāb (ed. L. Cheikho, Beirut 1927). In it he dwells on details of writing and spelling, in fact on all the material side of the art of writing (the question of the hamza, of the alif maḳṣūra, the dating of letters, obligatory additions and formulae at the beginning and end of letters, etc.). This work was of course intended for secretaries who wished to be provided with a set of rules for the practical details of their profession. It is not, however, free from grammatical speculations (e.g. the relations between the spelling and the structure of words).

IBN FAḌL ALLĀH AL-ʿUMARĪ, SHIHĀB AL-DĪN AḤMAD, distinguished author and administrator of the Mamlūk period, who served al-Nāṣir Muḥammad b. Ḳalāwūn [q.v.] in the chancery of Cairo and Damascus and left important works on the organization and administration of the Mamlūk state.

Shihāb al-Dīn Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā Ibn Faḍl Allāh al-Ḳurashī al-ʿAdawī al-ʿUmarī was born in Damascus on 3 Shawwāl 700/12 June 1301, of a Shāfiʿī family already distinguished in the Mamlūk civil service [see FAḌL ALLĀH]. His father, Muḥyī al-Dīn Yaḥyā Ibn Faḍl Allāh, was head of chancery (kātib al-sirr) first in Damascus, and after 729/1329 in Cairo, and Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad began his public career as an assistant in Cairo as his father advanced in years. A quarrel with al-Nāṣir Muḥammad brought about his dismissal from office and replacement by his brother ʿAlāʾ al-Dīn ʿAlī. When Muḥyī al-Dīn Yaḥyā died in 738/1337 it was ʿAlī who was appointed to replace him as head of chancery in Cairo. As for Aḥmad, it was not long before he was thrown in prison, having further incurred the displeasure of the Sultan.

Released from prison in the early months of 740/1339, Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad was soon after appointed head of chancery in Damascus, taking charge at the start of the next year. He remained in that office until 743/1342, when he was dismissed and replaced by his brother Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad. Aḥmad remained out of office until his death, of a fever, on 9 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 749/1 March 1349. His principal works may well have been the product of the leisure of his last years, while he was living in retirement in Damascus.

Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad, as a government official, was not as successful as his father or his two brothers. Obstinate and outspoken, he was not the sort of man to win easy favour with a sovereign, and he was quick to make enemies of people with whom he dealt. It was the frequent complaints against him that finally brought about his dismissal from the chancery of Damascus. However, he outshone other members of his family by his brilliance as a writer and expert on a wide variety of subjects related to politics and administration. It is with these subjects that his principal works deal. The compendium al-Taʿrīf bi 'l-muṣṭalaḥ al-sharīf (ed. Cairo 1312 A.H.) is a manual of administration which describes the organization of the Mamlūk empire in its various provinces and explains the manner of correspondence between the central chancery in Cairo and the other central and provincial offices. The book also explains the manner of correspondence with tribal chiefs, heads of Muslim and dhimmī sects, and foreign rulers. The encyclopaedic Masālik al-abṣār fī mamālik al-amṣār (vol. i, ed. Cairo 1924) touches on many subjects (literature, history, geography, religion and law, politics and administration), and is designed to serve the same purpose as al-Taʿrīf. The two works continued to be regarded as authoritative on the subject of administration during the Mamlūk period, and were imitated with due reference by al-Ḳalḳashandī [q.v.] in his well-known Ṣubḥ al-aʿshā fī kitābat al-inshā.

Apart from al-Taʿrīf and Masālik, Aḥmad Ibn Faḍl Allāh left a history of his family (whose ancestry he traced to the second Caliph, ʿUmar, whence the nisba al-ʿUmarī), a number of minor essays and letters, and some verse of little importance. His over-ornate Arabic prose style was highly esteemed by writers of the Mamlūk period.

IBN FAḌLĀN, in full Aḥmad b. Faḍlān b. al-ʿAbbās b. Rās̲h̲id b. Ḥammād, Arabic writer of whose life nothing is known and who was the author of an account (incorrectly referred to as Risāla in Yāḳūt, Kitāb in the title of the work itself) of the embassy sent by the caliph al-Muḳtadir to the king of the Bulg̲h̲ārs of the Volga [see bulg̲h̲ār]. Ibn Faḍlān was a client of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, who seems to have been the same person as the Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, the kātib al-d̲j̲ays̲h̲, who conquered Egypt from the Ṭūlūnids in 292/904. He was probably not an Arab by birth.

The embassy in which he took part was led by the eunuch Sūsan al-Rassī, a client of Nad̲h̲īr al-Ḥaramī (on the latter see M. Canard, La relation ..., 50, n. 31). Ibn Faḍlān's particular task was to read out the letter from the caliph to the king, to present gifts to him and to his entourage and to supervise the jurists and teachers whom the caliph had sent at the king's request to teach the Bulg̲h̲ārs the laws of Islam. The embassy left Bag̲h̲dād on 11 Ṣafar 309/21 June 921, went to Buk̲h̲ārā, where they were received by the Sāmānid Naṣr b. Aḥmad, then to K̲h̲ʷārazm; they stayed at al-D̲j̲urd̲j̲āniyya (Gurgand̲j̲), which they left on 2 D̲h̲u 'l-Ḳaʿda 309/4 March 922, crossed the country of the Og̲h̲uz Turks, the Pečenegs and the Bas̲h̲gird, and arrived at the capital of the country of the Bulg̲h̲ārs on 12 Muḥarram 310/12 May 922. Having accomplished their mission, the embassy returned to Bag̲h̲dād, but neither the date nor the route of their return journey is known. This embassy from the caliph to the king of the Bulg̲h̲ārs is not mentioned by al-Masʿūdī or by any other writer of the period, nor is Ibn Faḍlān himself. The only information on it is provided by Ibn Faḍlān's account.

This account first became known in Europe only after the publication by Fraehn, in 1823, of the extracts from it which had been given by Yāḳūt (s.vv. Itil, Bas̲h̲g̲h̲ird, Bulg̲h̲ār, K̲h̲azār, K̲h̲uwārizm, Rūs), in whose time several copies of it had been in circulation. Since the discovery of a manuscript at Mas̲h̲had, the account has been the subject of several editions, translations and studies, the most important of which are those of A. Zeki Velidi Togan (1939), I. Kračkovskiy and A. Kovalevskiy (1939), K. Czegledy (1952), and A. Kovalevskiy (1956).

Although the Mas̲h̲had manuscript is neither the original, which was perhaps an official report addressed to the chancellery at Bag̲h̲dād, nor a complete text, since it lacks the account of the return journey, and although the quotations from it by Persian writers do not correspond to this text but to an abridged version thought to be the work of a Sāmānid vizier, the account, even so, is of great historical, geographical and ethnographic interest and shows that Ibn Faḍlān possessed extraordinary powers of observation and an enquiring mind, which led him to bring back a mass of extremely important information on the peoples, including the Rūs and the K̲h̲azars, whom he had been able to see himself or of whom he had heard accounts during his journey.

There should also be mentioned a new edition of the text of the account by S. Dahhān, Damascus 1959 (in the series Publications of the Arab Academy of Damascus). (M. Canard)

IBN FAHD, an important Meccan family whose activities during a period of two hundred years in the 8th-10th/14th-16th centuries are known in quite considerable detail. The family claimed ʿAlid descent through Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyya. Its members were all well trained in the traditional subjects and learned mainly in S̲h̲āfiʿī but also in Ḥanafī law. Through four successive generations, they boasted of productive historians whose chief interest lay in local history and biography. Through marriage, the Banū Fahd were closely allied to many other influential Meccan families as well as to scholars from other countries who had come to settle in Mecca. Many of them made their living as merchants. Travel on business took them on frequent trips not only all over Arabia, Syria, and Egypt, but also as far as India and the Red Sea port of Suakin.

The judge Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad (ca. 735-770/1334(35)-1369) married Khadīdja, the daughter of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Yūsuf (677-750/1278(79)-1350), a Shāfiʿī scholar from Aṣfūn in Upper Egypt, who had taken up residence in Mecca (Ibn Ḥadjar, Durar, ii, 350; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, vi, 168; Brockelmann, S II, 227). His son ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had a son Yaḥyā (789-843/1387-1439), who engaged in the Indian trade (al-Sakhāwī, Ḍawʾ, x, 233); he married the daughter of a Meccan merchant, al-Duḳūḳī (Ḍawʾ, v, 240 f.), and had a son named ʿAbd al-Ḳādir (829-888/1425-1484), a rather unsuccessful merchant, who died in Suakin on a business trip (Ḍawʾ, iv, 299). Another son of the judge Muḥammad, also named Muḥammad (ca. 760-811/1358(59)-1408) (Ḍawʾ, ix, 231), had a son ʿAṭiyya (804-874/1402-1469) (Ḍawʾ, v, 148 f.), who married Fāṭima, the daughter of a man of Indian ancestry (Ḍawʾ, ii, 167, no. 477). They had two sons, Ḥasan (843-922/1439-1516) (Ḍawʾ, iii, 105; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, viii, 107 f.) and Ḥusayn, who died as an infant in 849/1445 (Ḍawʾ, iii, 148). ʿAṭiyya's elder brother,

1. Taḳī ʾl-Dīn Muḥammad, born in Aṣfūn on Tuesday, 5 Rabīʿ II 787/ 16 May 1385, collected a very large library in Mecca and was a prolific author. He wrote on Muḥammad's biography, the stories of the prophets, the glories of the Ḳuraysh, the history of local scholars and the history of various places in and around Mecca, and many other subjects. A list of his works is said to be contained in his ʿUmdat al-muntaḥil (preserved in Cairo). Another of his surviving works deals with Djabal Thawr near Mecca (Brockelmann, S II, 538, where the work is listed, it seems wrongly, under his great-grandson Djār Allāh). His Laḥẓ al-alḥāẓ, a continuation of al-Dhahabī's Ṭabaḳāt al-ḥuffāẓ, has been published in Damascus 1347 (pp. 69-344); it consists of a number of biographies, interspersed with repeated brief notices of the dates of death of scholars in various regions of the Muslim world, and was transmitted by his great-grandson Djār Allāh through his grandson ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and al-Sakhāwī. Taḳī ʾl-Dīn died on Saturday, 7 Rabīʿ I 871/Friday, 17 October 1466 (Ḍawʾ, ix, 281-83; Brockelmann, II, 225, S II, 225, III, 1267, also S I, 604 [see G. Vajda, in JA, ccxl (1952), 28]). Of his children, Abū Bakr (809-890/1407-1485), married to the daughter of a wealthy Meccan merchant, Abū Bakr al-Tawrīzī (Tabrīzī) (Ḍawʾ, xi, 93), was very active as a copyist of manuscripts. He travelled widely and made two journeys to India (Ḍawʾ, xi, 92 f.); one of his sons, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (841-873/1437-1469), was born in Calicut (Ḍaw, iv, 70 f.). One of his daughters, Kamāliyya, later married her cousin ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (No. 3). Abū Bakr's younger brother,

2. Nadjm al-Dīn ʿUmar (Muḥammad), born on Friday night, 29 Djumādā II 812/8 November 1409, also wrote many works, among them a continuation of al-Fāsī's [q.v.] History of Mecca and a History of Mecca entitled Itḥāf al-warā bi-akhbār Umm al-Ḳurā, which formed the basis of the History of Mecca by his son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. He was particularly interested in family history, writing on his own family and other Meccan families related to them by marriage, and in contemporary scholarly biography, writing *muʿdjam*s of his own and his father's teachers and the teachers of other scholars; his own Muʿdjam was completed in 861/1457 (Cat. Bankipore, xii, no. 727). For the stage Muslim scholarship had reached in his time, it is characteristic that he compiled a number of indexes to biographical works, including Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa's History of Physicians. An example of ʿUmar's penmanship is the manuscript of Ibn Ḥadjar, al-Muʿdjam al-mufahras, described by V. Rosen, in Mél. Asiatiques, viii (1881), 691-702. He died on Friday, 7 Ramaḍān 885/10 November 1480 (Ḍawʾ, vi, 126-31; Brockelmann, II, 225, S II, 225; al-Sakhāwī, Iʿlān, in F. Rosenthal, A history of Muslim historiography, Leiden 1952, esp. 251, 355, 360, 369 f., 398, 403 f.). ʿUmar was married to the daughter of a merchant of Iṣbahānī origin known as al-ʿAdjamī (Ḍawʾ, v, 59). Of his children, a daughter, Umm Hāniʾ, continued the alliance of the Banū Fahd with other prominent Meccan families (cf. Ḍawʾ, ii, 169, no. 482; ix, 42, no. 112). His son Yaḥyā (848-885/1444-1481) wrote a work on awāʾil [q.v.], entitled al-Dalāʾil ilā maʿrifat al-awāʾil (Ḍawʾ, x, 238-40). His scholarly heir, however, was another son,

3. ʿIzz al-Dīn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, born on Saturday, 26 Shawwāl 850/14 January 1447. He closely followed his father in collecting a Muʿdjam, making an index to al-Dhahabī's Ṭabaḳāt al-ḳurrāʾ, and writing on the history of Mecca. He also compiled a history of Egypt as well as an annalistic history starting with the year 872/1467. Among manuscripts written by him is the Muʿdjam of his father in Bankipore (xii, no. 727) and the MS L-234 in Yale University Library. He died in 921/1515 (Ḍawʾ, iv, 224-6; al-Ghazzī, al-Kawākib al-sāʾira, ed. J. S. Jabbūr, i, 238 f.; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, viii, 100-102; Brockelmann, II, 224, S II, 224). Of his children from his marriage to his cousin Kamāliyya bint Abī Bakr, Yaḥyā died as an infant (Ḍawʾ, x, 234). His successor as the family scholar,

4. Muḥibb al-Dīn Djār Allāh (Muḥammad) (891-954/1486-1547) appears to have done little original work, but he received much credit as the transmitter and continuator of the writings of his forefathers. He continued his grandfather's History of Mecca. He also wrote monographs on local history, the market-place ʿUkāẓ, the harbour of Djidda, the faḍāʾil of al-ʿAbbās and Wadjdj and al-Ṭāʾif, the history of the sanctuary in Mecca, a Ḥusn al-ḳirā fī awdiyat Umm al-Ḳurā, dealing with Mecca, Djidda, and al-Ṭāʾif (MS in Tarīm, cf. R. B. Serjeant, in BSOAS, xxi (1958), 254-8). He collected a Muʿdjam of his teachers, both scholars and poets, and wrote a work in connexion with the history of Ḳānṣūh al-Ghūrī, entitled Taḥḳīḳ al-radjā li-ʿuluww al-maḳarr Ḳarādjā(?). Short treatises on the days of the week (incomplete) and on the ribāṭ of al-ʿAbbās in Mecca (related to the work mentioned above?) are preserved, ostensibly in his own handwriting, in Yale University Library L-235 (Nemoy 1292, 1592) (Ḍawʾ, iii, 52; al-ʿAydarūsī, al-Nūr al-sāfir, 241 f.; al-Ghazzī, Kawākib, ii, 131; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, viii, 301; Brockelmann, II, 516, S II, 538, III, 1295). A son of Djār Allāh, Muḥammad, owned after him the manuscript written by ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz (no. 3) preserved in the Yale Library L-234 (fols. 1a, 128a, 166a, 183a).

A certain Taḳī ʾl-Dīn Abū Bakr b. Fahd, who died in 946/1539-40, also seems to have been a member of the family (al-Ghazzī, Kawākib, ii, 92; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, viii, 265).

Bibliography: In the article, which is based mainly on al-Sakhāwī, Ḍawʾ (cf. also Ḍawʾ, xi, 265). More manuscripts of works by members of the family than are hitherto known will no doubt be identified in the future.

IBN AL-FAḤḤĀM, Abu ʾl-Ḳāsim ʿAbd al-

RAḤMĀN B. ʿATĪḲ B. KHALAF AL-ṢIḲILLĪ (422-516/1030-1122), muḳriʾ, was probably born in Sicily but soon emigrated to Egypt, where we find him in 438/1046-7, that is, in the time of al-Mustanṣir (427-97/1036-94) fī ṭalab al-ḳirāʾāt, say the sources, the traditional science for which he was able to follow the lectures of such scholars as Aḥmad b. ʿAlī b. Hāshim, Ibn Nafīs, ʿAbd al-Bāḳī b. Fāris and Abu ʾl-Ḥusayn al-Fārisī al-Shīrāzī. His master in grammar was the famous Ṭāhir b. Aḥmad b. Bābashād [q.v.] and Ibn al-Faḥḥām had the distinction of transmitting one of the two redactions of the commentaries of the celebrated Muḳaddima, which the pupil had taken down at the master's dictation (the other commentary is connected with the name of Khalaf b. Ibrāhīm, d. 511/1117).

We know scarcely anything of his life in Sicily and nothing of the main phases of his long stay in Egypt, which he left in 504/1110-1 for an unknown destination. The biographers merely tell us that his fame in Alexandria as a master of ḳirāʾāt was so great that he acquired the title of shaykh al-Iskandariyya. Among his disciples in that town, two may be mentioned: Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī [q.v.] and another scholar of Sicilian origin, ʿUthmān b. ʿAlī b. ʿUmar al-Saraḳūsī al-Ṣiḳillī, philologist and grammarian who lived in the 5th-6th/11th-12th centuries.

Ibn al-Faḥḥām is best known by his work on the science of ḳirāʾāt, which is entitled al-Tadjrīd fī bughyat al-murīd, while his Mufradāt Yaʿḳūb have been almost forgotten in the literature of the traditional Muslim sciences.

Bibliography: For the biographical sources, the MSS, commentaries, versifications etc., of the work of Bābashād, as well as for the argument and a summary of the chapters of the Tadjrīd, see U. Rizzitano, Ibn al-Faḥḥām muqriʾ "siciliano", in Studi Or. in onore di G. Levi Della Vida, Rome 1956, ii, 403-24. (U. RIZZITANO)

IBN AL-FAḲĪH, Iranian author of a geography written in Arabic, who lived in the 3rd/9th century. Nothing is known of his life and only one of his works survives, in an abridged form. De Goeje introduced his edition of this work with an authoritative preface in which he reproduced the information, of varying reliability, which Ibn al-Nadīm and the geographer al-Muḳaddasī provide on Ibn al-Faḳīh. According to the Fihrist of the former (154), "he produced a Kitāb al-Buldān of a thousand folios, a compilation from various works, in particular that of al-Djayhānī, and another work on the best recent (Arabic) poets". Al-Muḳaddasī (Aḥsan al-taḳāsīm, ed. De Goeje, 4-5) attributes to him a work in five books which he criticizes for its imprecise geographical information and a number of irrelevant digressions. The short notice by Yāḳūt (Udabāʾ, ii, 63) adds that Ibn al-Faḳīh and his father were well-known as traditionists.

Thus Ibn al-Faḳīh's original work seems to be lost, but there exist three manuscripts of the abridged version, plus a fourth discovered after the publication of De Goeje's edition. From the colophons of the three manuscripts, De Goeje deduced that the abridgement was probably made by Abu ʾl-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Djaʿfar al-Shayzārī, who in several places altered the coherence of the text, suppressing important passages and retaining trivial ones (which accords with al-Muḳaddasī's criticism). Yāḳūt quotes, in his Muʿdjam al-buldān, a series of passages from Ibn al-Faḳīh which appear in a condensed form in the abridged version (introd. De Goeje, p. ix; Yāḳūt, index, 300), a proof that Ibn al-Faḳīh's work was more compact, since it is possible that Yāḳūt sometimes quoted him without giving the author's name.

Sprenger (Post- und Reiserouten, p. xvii f.) established that Ibn al-Faḳīh wrote in about 290/903; he mentions two events occurring during the reign of al-Muʿtaḍid in 287 and 288 (text, 53 and 319) and refers to him as "our caliph" (53); this passage must therefore have been written during al-Muʿtaḍid's reign; on the other hand he twice refers to his successor al-Muktafī (pp. 253 and 270); although he is reporting (270) an event which occurred before his accession, it may be concluded that Ibn al-Faḳīh completed his work after the death of al-Muʿtaḍid; this is confirmed by a passage relating that ʿAmr b. Layth was executed on the orders of al-Muʿtaḍid (p. 53, l. 17), since it is known from al-Ṭabarī (iii, 2208) that this caliph, on his deathbed, gave orders for the execution but that this was carried out after the caliph's death. Thus Ibn al-Faḳīh wrote his book in 289-90/902-3 (it contains no reference to any historical event after this date).

That Ibn al-Faḳīh was born at Hamadān is shown not only by his nisba (Hamadānī) but also by the details which he provides on this town and its district—a description followed by a digression on his native country. We give here the countries which he describes, arranged according to the space he devotes to them: Iran, Arabia, ʿIrāḳ, Syria, Egypt, Rūm, Djazīra, Nubia, Abyssinia; the Maghrib, Andalusia, and Sudan are given merely a brief résumé. The proportion devoted to each country was probably decided by the redactor of the abridged version; what should be noticed is the preponderance given to Iran. According to Ibn al-Nadīm, the title of the book was Kitāb al-Buldān, but this is not certain, since the title-page and preface no longer exist. The fourth manuscript (Library of the Mausoleum of the Imām Riḍā, Mashhad), the subject of a study in 1923 by Z. V. Togan, does not provide the answer to this question, the manuscript lacking the first and last pages; but Z. V. Togan has recognized that this manuscript contains a sizeable part of the original text, providing valuable extra material on ʿIrāḳ and the regions of Central Asia (making possible additions and emendations to De Goeje's ed.).

The digressions concerning adab which are criticized by al-Muḳaddasī are far from being lightweight or superfluous—they are a salient feature of the work: inserted among the geographical sections (which provide instances of the author's taste for buildings and for stories which are more or less fabulous), they demonstrate his intention of retaining the reader's interest by an alternation of documentary sections with literary pieces. Apart from the one in praise of his native country, the digressions are: the "passing from the serious to the sweet, from the jesting to the serious" (41), a debate between the Syrians and the people of Baṣra, and the superiority of the vine over the palm-tree (118), praise of building (151), the duties of an author and the virtues of a good book—a digression which could serve as an introduction to the whole work (193), in praise of fresh water (220), Allāh gives to each country a gift, to the exclusion of others (251). According to al-Muḳaddasī, Ibn al-Faḳīh borrowed a great deal from al-Djāḥiẓ (whom he mentions only three times: 116, 165, 253). But these digressions lead to the conclusion that, without borrowing directly from al-Djāḥiẓ, he was influenced by him.

The general content of the work may be described here in the assessment by De Goeje, who made a profound study of it: "... I thought that some extracts would suffice, but a more detailed inspection made me change my mind: this work provides a very important contribution to the history of culture in the second part of the 3rd/9th century...; it contains a number of geographical and historical details which were hitherto unknown or imperfectly known; it deserves study because Muḳaddasī borrowed much from it and because it is among the main sources of Yāḳūt". To this may be added the opinion of A. Miquel, the author of a penetrating study: "Chronologically, Ibn al-Faḳīh occupies an essential place in the history of Arabic geography: appearing after the first, basically technical, works, ... on the one hand he reinforced the trend of technical geography towards an inclusion of the themes of adab, and on the other he helped to direct the interest of writers towards the world of Islam."

IBN AL-FARAḌĪ, ABU 'L-WALĪD ʿABD ALLĀH B. MUḤAMMAD B. YŪSUF B. NAṢR AL-AZDĪ B. AL-FARAḌĪ, Andalusian scholar, was born at Cordova on the night of Monday-Tuesday 22-3 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 351/22-3 December 962. He studied law, Traditions, literature, and history in his native town, particularly with Abū Zakariyyāʾ Yaḥyā b. Mālik b. ʿĀʾidh and the ḳāḍī Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Kharrāz. In 382/992 he went to the east to perform the pilgrimage, and, when passing through Ḳayrawān, attended the lectures of the jurisconsult Ibn Abī Zayd al-Ḳayrawānī [q.v.] and those of Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Khalaf al-Ḳābisī. He studied further at Cairo, Mecca, and Medina. On his return to Spain he taught for a time at Cordova, then was appointed ḳāḍī of Valencia in the reign of the Marwānid Muḥammad al-Mahdī. He was killed in his house when Cordova was taken and sacked by the Berbers on Monday 6 Shawwāl 403/20 April 1013. For three whole days his body remained unburied, and then was discovered lying in a pile of refuse, so disfigured and decomposed that it was buried without being washed or wrapped in a shroud. It is reported that during his pilgrimage to Mecca he seized the covering of the Kaʿba and asked God to grant him a martyr's death.

Ibn al-Faraḍī was very learned in law, Tradition, literature, and history; in the course of his travels he had gathered together a rich library. Of his works we possess only the Taʾrīkh ʿulamāʾ al-Andalus, ed. Codera, BAH, vii-viii, Madrid 1891. The scrupulous exactitude of this work and the abundant information which it provides made Ibn al-Faraḍī the initiator of a series of biographical studies embracing the whole of the Iberian peninsula. These had a great success, being continued and amplified in the course of the 5th/11th and 6th/12th centuries by Ibn Bashkuwāl [q.v.] with his Ṣila. Ibn al-Abbār [q.v.] in his turn supplemented this Ṣila with his Takmilat al-Ṣila down to the middle of the 7th/13th century and finally this series of supplements to Ibn al-Faraḍī's Taʾrīkh received a final revision in the 8th/14th century with the Ṣilat al-Ṣila of Abū Djaʿfar Muḥammad b. al-Zubayr, of which the incomplete manuscript belonging to the library of the famous bibliophile Sīdī Muḥammad ʿAbd al-Ḥayy al-Kattānī was edited by Lévi-Provençal in a partial edition beginning with the letter ʿayn, Rabat 1937.

IBN FARADJ AL-DJAYYĀNĪ, ABŪ ʿUMAR AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD, poet, anthologist and historian of Muslim Spain. The only information we have on his life is provided by the few lines inserted by al-Ḥumaydī in his Djadhwat al-muḳtabis and reproduced by the other sources; all that is known is that he was among the poets attached to the court of al-Ḥakam II al-Mustanṣir (350-66/961-76). Either his misfortune or his irascible nature led him to compose so wounding a satire on al-Ḥakam that the latter consigned him to prison for the rest of his life, where he continued to write poems and books. He had two brothers, also poets: Abū Saʿīd ʿUthmān and Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh, of whom we know only the names and a few verses.

Ibn Faradj al-Djayyānī owes his fame to a remarkable anthology of Andalusian poetry entitled Kitāb al-Ḥadāʾiḳ (the Gardens) and quoted by all subsequent anthologists. The work itself has been lost, but the lengthy quotations made from it by other authors give some idea of its contents. He composed it to rival (ʿāraḍa bi-hi) the famous anthology of Eastern poets, al-Zahra, by Ibn Dāwūd al-Iṣfahānī [q.v.]; as the latter had a hundred chapters of a hundred lines each, Ibn Faradj decided to divide his book into two hundred chapters of two hundred lines. The Kitāb al-Ḥadāʾiḳ is considered one of the earliest manifestations of cultural maturity in Muslim Spain, of the self-awareness it had acquired and of the tendency of its intellectuals to shake off the tutelage of the Muslim East.

A considerable amount of Ibn Faradj's own poetry has come down to us. His poetry is almost exclusively floral (rawḍiyyāt) or erotic (taghazzul) in character and reveals a delicate poetic gift.

Another book is attributed to Ibn Faradj, the Taʾrikh al-Muntazīn wa 'l-ḳāʾimīn bi 'l-Andalus wa-akhbāruhum (History of the insurgents and rebels in Muslim Spain); this book, now lost, must have been written in prison, and it probably expressed the bitterness Ibn Faradj felt towards the caliph.

IBN FARAḤ AL-ISHBĪLĪ, whose full name was SHIHĀB AL-DĪN ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD B. FARAḤ B. AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD AL-LAKHMĪ AL-ISHBĪLĪ AL-SHĀFIʿĪ, born in 625/1228 at Seville (Ishbīliya [q.v.]), was taken prisoner in 646/1248 by the Franks (al-Ifrandj), i.e., the Spaniards under Ferdinand III the Saint, of Castile (1217-52), at the conquest of Seville, but escaped and afterwards went, between 650 and 660/1252-62, to Egypt; after hearing the most celebrated teachers of Cairo, he studied under those of Damascus, where he settled and gave lectures in the Umayyad mosque, as a great authority on Tradition; yet he declined the professorship offered him in the Dār al-Ḥadīth al-Nūriyya. Among those who heard him were al-Dimyāṭī ([q.v.] cf. al-Kutubī, Fawāt al-wafayāt, ii, 17), al-Yūnīnī [q.v.], al-Muḳātilī, al-Nābulusī, Abū Muḥammad b. al-Walīd, al-Birzālī [q.v.], and notably the great authority on history and tradition al-Dhahabī [q.v.]. He died in the turba of Umm al-Ṣāliḥ on 9 Djumādā II 699/19 February 1300. Only al-Suyūṭī, Ṭabaḳāt al-mufassirīn (ed. Meursinge), no. 88, (wrongly) makes this Ibn Faraḥ the son of another, the author of the eschatological Tadhkira bi-aḥwāl al-mawtā wa-umūr al-ākhira and of the great Ḳurʾān commentary, Djāmiʿ aḥkām al-Ḳurʾān, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Abī Bakr b. Faraḥ (al-Maḳḳarī, i, 600, wrongly b. Fardj) al-Anṣārī al-Mālikī al-Ḳurṭubī, died 9 Shawwāl 671/29 April 1273.

Ibn Faraḥ al-Ishbīlī's most celebrated work is the scholastic didactic poem on 28 technical expressions of the science of Tradition in 20 (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ed. Flügel, vi, 190, wrongly gives 30) verses in ṭawīl metre in the form of a love-poem, so that it was described correctly by al-Ṣafadī in al-Maḳḳarī, i, 819, as a Ḳaṣīda ghazaliyya fī alḳāb al-ḥadīth (see Brockelmann, I, 372); it is usually called Manẓūmat Ibn Faraḥ or Gharāmī ṣaḥīḥ after the two opening words of the first verse.

The text of the Ḳaṣīda was first printed by Krehl in 1860 in al-Maḳḳarī's Analectes, i, 819 f. (from al-Ṣafadī) and again in Madjmūʿ al-mutūn, Cairo 1313, 51 f., and in al-Subkī's Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya al-kubrā, Cairo 1324/1906-7, v, 12 f., where only 18 verses are given. The commentary of ʿIzz al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Djamāʿa al-Ḳinānī, died 816/1413, Zawāl al-taraḥ fī sharḥ Manẓūmat Ibn Faraḥ, is published by Fr. Risch, Leiden 1885 (there is another MS in the British Museum, Cat. Cod. Orient., ii, no. 169/2); in the notes there is also published almost the entire commentary of Shams al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAbd al-Hādī al-Maḳdisī, died 744/1343 (see al-Dhahabī, Ṭabaḳāt al-ḥuffāẓ, ed. Wüstenfeld, xxi, no. 12) from the manuscripts of Leiden (Cat. Cod. Or., iv, no. 1749) and Gotha (no. 578, see Pertsch, v, 20). We may also mention Berlin, Verz., no. 1055, Taʿlīḳ ʿalā Manẓūmat Ibn Faraḥ, a gloss on Ibn Faraḥ's poem of the year 894/1489; Cairo, i[2], 250, contains the commentary of Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Khalīl al-Tatāʾī (Boinet, Dictionnaire, 154 and 899) al-Mālikī, died 937/1530-1, al-Bahdja al-saniyya fī ḥall al-ishārāt al-sunniyya.

Besides Ibn Faraḥ's didactic poem there is also a commentary by him on al-Nawawī's [q.v.] 40 Traditions, Sharḥ al-arbaʿīn ḥadīthan al-Nawawiyya, Berlin, nos. 1488-9.

IBN FARḤŪN, BURHĀN AL-DĪN IBRĀHĪM B. ʿALĪ AL-YAʿMARĪ, Mālikī jurist. He was born about 760/1358 in Medina into a scholarly family of Andalusian origin. After travels in Egypt and Syria he was appointed to the ḳaḍāʾ in Medina in 793/1390 and is stated to have revived the Mālikī rite there. He died in 799/1397. Of the eight works (three unfinished) credited to him by Aḥmad Bābā five have survived, and of these two have been printed.

(1) Al-dībādj al-mudhhab fī maʿrifat aʿyān ʿulamāʾ al-madhhab (printed several times; the most familiar edition is that combined with Aḥmad Bābā's Nayl al-ibtihādj, Cairo 1351/1932) is a biographical dictionary of Mālikī scholars. It contains some 630 entries and constitutes a prime source for the intellectual movement in Spain and North Africa up to his time besides providing a great deal of other miscellaneous information. It has the further interest of containing an introduction comprising an apologia for the Mālikī rite and a biography of Mālik himself, and a terminal passage in which Ibn Farḥūn lists the works from which he has compiled the Dībādj. The Dībādj has generated several supplements and abridgements, of which the best known is the Nayl al-ibtihādj.

(2) Tabṣirat al-ḥukkām fī uṣūl al-aḳḍiya wa-manāhidj al-aḥkām (printed on the margins of Muḥammad Aḥmad ʿIllīsh's Fatḥ al-ʿalī al-mālik, 2 vols., Cairo 1937) is a sort of manual for ḳāḍīs containing details of procedure, rules of evidence, etc., and displays a certain independence of mind as, for instance, where (ii, 142 f.) it attempts to justify the bringing within the ḳāḍī's competence of powers theoretically belonging to the ṣāḥib al-maẓālim, ṣāḥib al-shurṭa, etc.

IBN AL-FĀRIḌ, ʿUMAR B. ʿALĪ (SHARAF AL-DĪN) ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM AL-MIṢRĪ AL-SAʿDĪ, a celebrated Ṣūfī poet. The name al-Fāriḍ (allocator of shares in an inheritance) refers to the profession of his father (see Dīwān, Cairo 1319, 3), who belonged to Ḥamāt but migrated to Cairo, where ʿUmar was born in 576/1181. In early youth he studied Shāfiʿī law and ḥadīth; then came his conversion to Ṣūfism, and for many years he led the life of a solitary devotee, on the hills (al-Muḳaṭṭam) to the east of Cairo, in deserts among wild beasts, and afterwards in the Ḥidjāz, and he had a vision of the Prophet. On his return to Cairo he was venerated as a saint until his death (632/1235), and his tomb beneath al-Muḳaṭṭam is still frequented. The Dīwān of Ibn al-Fāriḍ, though small, is one of the most original in Arabic literature. Possibly the minor odes, which exhibit a style of great delicacy and beauty and a more or less copious use of rhetorical artifices, were composed in order to be sung with musical accompaniment at Ṣūfī concerts (Nallino, in RSO, viii, 17); in these the outer and inner meanings are so interwoven that they may be read either as love-poems or as mystical hymns. But the Dīwān also includes two purely mystical odes: (1) the Khamriyya or Wine Ode, describing the "intoxication" produced by the "wine" of Divine Love, and (2) the Naẓm al-Sulūk or "The Poem of the Progress", a poem containing 760 verses, which is often called al-Tā'iyya al-kubrā to distinguish it from a much shorter ode rhyming in the same letter, t. In this famous ḳaṣīda, nearly equal in length to all the rest of the Dīwān together, Ibn al-Fariḍ sets forth a penetrating psychological description of the whole series of mystical experiences, a unique masterpiece and an instructive work, in which the mystic's experiences are seen as a realization of Muslim orthodoxy. Among Ṣūfīs the Tā'iyya occupies the position of a classic, and many commentaries have been written on it.

Bibliography: Brockelmann, I, 262 and S I, 462 ff. A life of the poet by his grandson ʿAlī, the first editor of the Dīwān, has been printed as an introduction to the edition of Rushayyid b. Ghālib al-Daḥdāḥ, Marseilles 1853. See also Ibn Khallikān, no. 511; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt al-dhahab, v, Cairo 1351/1932, 149 ff.; Suyūṭī, Ḥusn al-muḥāḍara, Cairo 1321/1903, i, 246; and the references given by Di Matteo (see below) and Nallino, loc. cit., p. 8. Other editions: Cairo 1319 (with two commentaries) and 1335 (with short notes). Pedersen, Muhammedansk Mystik, Copenhagen 1952, 54-133.—The fullest critical study of Ibn al-Fāriḍ is that by Nallino in his review of Di Matteo's version, in RSO, viii (1919-20), 1-106 and 501-62. IBN FĀRIS, ABU 'L-ḤUSAYN AḤMAD B. FĀRIS B. ZAKARIYYĀ' B. MUḤ. B. ḤABĪB, AL-SHĀFIʿĪ, later (in Rayy) AL-MĀLIKĪ, AL-LUGHAWĪ, Arab philologist. The date of his birth in unknown and the place uncertain: on the one hand, according to one of his poems (Yāḳūt, Udabā', iv, 93) the place was a village, Kursuf, in the district of al-Zahrā', and from it an early nisba, al-Zahrāwī, is derived; in any case he was certainly of peasant origin (according to Yāḳūt, op. cit., 92, lines 12-3); on the other hand, Ibn Fāris himself, in his sources for the Maḳāyīs (his Muḳaddima, i, 5) names Fāris b. Zakariyyā' [his father] as the person who transmitted to him the K. al-Manṭiḳ of Ibn al-Sikkīt (see also Yāḳūt, op. cit., 92, lines 6-7; al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 153; Ibn al-Anbārī, Nuzha, 220). Thus he was apparently the son of an educated faḳīh who was his first master; but it is strange that such a man should be settled in a village.

Ibn Fāris studied in Ḳazwīn, notably with ʿAlī b. Ibrāhīm al-Ḳaṭṭān (d. 345/956), by then already in his old age (Yāḳūt, op. cit., xii, 220). From Ḳazwīn he received a second nisba, al-Ḳazwīnī, but for a particular reason, according to al-Ḳifṭī (Inbāh, i, 94, lines 4-5); in Zandjān he heard Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. al-Khaṭīb, rāwiya of Thaʿlab. He studied also in Baghdād, and in Mecca when making the pilgrimage.

Ibn Fāris lived in Hamadhān and there acquired a great reputation as a scholar. Among his pupils were the future vizier al-Ṣāḥib b. ʿAbbād and Badīʿ al-Zamān al-Hamadhānī, the author of the Maḳāmāt, who owed much to him but who later broke with his master as the result of a reprimand. Though renowned in Hamadhān, Ibn Fāris, who was attached to Ibn al-ʿAmīd (Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥ. and Abu 'l-Fatḥ ʿAlī), was looked upon with disfavour in Rayy by al-Ṣāḥib Ibn ʿAbbād, who had supplanted that family in the vizierate. Ibn ʿAbbād gave a cold reception to the gift of the K. al-Ḥadjar of Ibn Fāris; but when his reputation led to his being summoned to Rayy by Fakhr al-Dawla ʿAlī b. Rukn al-Dawla b. Buwayh to be tutor to his son Madjd al-Dawla Abū Ṭālib, his relations improved with the powerful vizier, who honoured and protected Ibn Fāris, or "shaykhunā Abu 'l-Ḥusayn", as he was pleased to call him; and the latter dedicated to him his work al-Ṣāḥibī. Ibn Fāris died in Rayy in 395/1004, according to the most generally accepted date. From his stay in Rayy he was called al-Rāzī.

Ibn Fāris is an attractive figure. He had a warm heart which is said to have led him to strip himself rather than send any beggar away empty-handed, and he had the gift of writing verses about his misfortunes which strike a touching personal note. But deeper internal conflicts can be discerned within him.

Ibn Fāris had an unbiased mind. It is remarkable that in the 4th/10th century, an age dominated grammatically by Sībawayhi and the Baṣrans, he should have returned to the freedom of thought of the Kūfans and should once again have introduced grammatical discussion in his K. Kifāyat al-mutaʿallimīn fi'khtilāf al-naḥwiyyīn (title from Yāḳūt, Udabā', iv, 85). The guiding principle of the K. Maḳāyīs al-lugha is interesting; inspired by al-Khalīl, its plan was novel—to link the meanings of words in their roots to uṣūl, basic meanings, and thereby to establish a semantic affiliation. On the other hand, in the matter of the origin of the language, he is one of the most obtuse of theorists: everything is tawḳīf, the subject of divine revelation, aṣl and farʿ alike (al-Ṣāḥibī, 96, lines 6-9), which excludes any kind of semantic evolution. It seems in fact that Ibn Fāris was restrained by religious scruples: the Ḳur'ānic verse (II, 29/31), wa-ʿallama Ādama 'l-asmā'a kullahā, showed him the universality of the tawḳīf (see al-Ṣāḥibī, 31-2).

Ibn Fāris had an open mind which was not afraid of innovation; thus, in his Risāla against Abū ʿAmr Muḥ. b. Saʿīd, he upheld freedom to follow the times in the Arab quarrel of Ancients and Moderns, and he compiled his K. al-Ḥamāsa al-muḥdatha. On the other hand, he appears to have been impervious and even hostile to philosophy, which was not merely useless but a danger to faith (according to al-Ṣāḥibī, 77, l. 12 ff., passages which besides are difficult to interpret exactly).

Ibn Fāris pursued his activities in many fields—grammar, poetry, fiḳh, tafsīr—but lexicography was his favourite domain and to the Arab world he remained al-lughawī. He wrote some forty works, both long and short; the most carefully prepared list is by the editor of the Maḳāyīs (i, 25-37): 11 works have been published, 2 of these in part only, 7 are still in manuscript; there are 24 of which only the title is known at present. We may particularly regret the K. Kifāyat al-mutaʿallimīn fi'khtilāf al-naḥwiyyīn and the K. al-Intiṣār li-Thaʿlab (perhaps the same as the first-named under another title) and his Ḥamāsa, referred to above and mentioned by the Fihrist (80). Published works: (I) K. al-Mudjmal fi 'l-lugha, published in part, Cairo, 1 vol., 1331 (according to the editor of the Maḳāyīs, i, 35), 1332/1914, 319 pp. (according to Sarkīs, 200); numerous MSS, see Brockelmann, I 130, I[2] 136, S I, 198. Ibn Fāris endeavoured to present the vocabulary in a clear and authentic fashion (al-wāḍiḥ, al-ṣaḥīḥ), by means of brief definitions, illustrated with numerous poetic quotations; he postponed the task of grouping together the post-classical vocabulary (according to S I, 198) to the Mutakhayyar al-alfāẓ (quoted by al-Djurdjānī, Mukhtār al-alfāẓ). In the preface, he names al-Khalīl and Ibn Durayd as his authorities; a verse by Ibn Fāris (Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, iv, 92) states that the Mudjmal supersedes the K. al-ʿAyn and the K. al-Djīm; like the latter, it is arranged according to the first radical consonant and begins with hamza; but the influence of al-Khalīl is further manifested by the arrangement in separate chapters, under each initial letter, firstly of the muḍāʿaf (Type 122), then of the triliteral, then the quadriliteral and quinquiliteral; al-Fīrūzābādī, who loved and praised Ibn Fāris, studied and criticised the Mudjmal (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, v, 407) and he must evidently have incorporated a certain amount of it into the Ḳāmūs. The work is certainly of great value and deserves a scholarly edition. (2) K. Maḳāyīs al-lugha, published by ʿAbd al-Salām Muḥ. Hārūn, 6 vols., Cairo 1366-71/1947-52; a detailed Muḳaddima, i, 3-47 (with independent pagination, used in this article). The guiding principle of this original dictionary has been described above, but for the quadriliterals and quinquiliterals Ibn Fāris often had recourse to another principle, al-naḥt, in which he saw a kind of ḳiyās (see the end of the K. al-Bāʾ, i, 328-36, for a description of his methodology). The arrangement of the vocabulary is the same as in the Mudjmal. (3) al-Ṣāḥibī fī fiḳh al-lugha wa-sunan al-ʿArab fī kalāmihā, a mediocre edition, Cairo (1328/1910). This title has given rise to the mistaken belief that it designated two works, a Fiḳh al-lugha and also al-Ṣāḥibī; thus Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, iv, 84, Ibn Ḳāḍī Shuhba, MS Damascus Ẓāhiriyya, no 438 (Taʾrīkh), 189-90, and others. The K. al-Ṣāḥibī is a new work of its kind, a small-scale Muzhir. For the first time, we see an author endeavouring to go beyond the purely grammatical or lexicographical framework in the study of the Arabic language, to reach the level of linguistic speculation and, in what is already a rather systematic general plan, to gather together the Arabs' ideas regarding language, their Arabic language, and any historical or other information that might throw light upon or enlarge his knowledge of it. It is fortunate that a new and careful edition has been published (see Bibl.). In this work, the K. al-Ṣāḥibī, Ibn Fāris clearly reveals his belief in the superiority of Arabic in the dispute with the Shuʿūbiyya, and provides the Arabs with weapons to use against their adversaries. (4) K. al-Lāmāt, the use of la-, li- in grammar, published by G. Bergsträsser, in Islamica, i (1925), 77-99; a short ch. in al-Ṣāḥibī, 112-6 (see the discussion of the two texts by Bergsträsser, ibid., 97-9). (5) Maḳālat kallā wa-mā djāʾa minhā fī Kitāb Allāh (mentioned in al-Ṣāḥibī, 162, l. 16), published by ʿAbd al ʿAzīz al-Maymanī (A. Memon) al-Radjakūtī, in Thalāth rasāʾil, Cairo 1344. (6) K. al-Itbāʿ wa 'l-muzāwadja, a collection of words of the same pattern always used in pairs, published by R. Brünnow, in Orient. Stud. Th. Nöldeke ... gewidmet, i, Giessen 1906, 225-48. See the study by Ch. Pellat, in Arabica, iv (1957), 131-49 and ch. 28 of the Muzhir of al-Suyūṭī. (7) K. Sīrat al-Nabī, a short sīra, published under the title Awdjaz al-siyar li-khayr al-bashar, Algiers 1301, Bombay 1311. According to the editor of the Maḳāyīs (i, 31), the K. Akhlāḳ al-Nabī is a different work. (8) K. Futyā faḳīh al-ʿArab, a collection of questions, juridical riddles so to speak, based on a rare meaning of a word (a genre imitated by al-Ḥarīrī in his 32nd Maḳāma, cf. al-Suyūṭī, Muzhir[3], i, 622-37); published by Ḥusayn ʿAlī Maḥfūẓ, Damascus 1377/1958, 52 pp. in 8°. (9) K. Abyāt al-istishhād, a collection of lines of verse which may serve as proverbs in relevant situations; published by the editor of the Maḳāyīs, in Nawādir al-makhṭūṭāt, i, 137-61 (2nd series, Cairo 1371/1951). Not mentioned in the historical sources under this title, it is perhaps the same as the K. Dhakhāʾir al-kalimāt of Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, iv, 84 (according to the editor, i, 138). (10) K. al-Nayrūz, an etymological study of this muʿarrab word and a study of the words of the pattern fayʿūl in Arabic; published by the same, ibid., ii, 17-25, 5th series, Cairo 1373/1954. (11) Extract from the Risāla against Ibn Saʿīd and selection of verse in the Yatīmat al-dahr of al-Thaʿālibī, iii, 397-404 (ed. of Muḥ. Muḥyi 'l-Dīn ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd).

IBN AL-FARRĀʾ, MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤUSAYN B. MUḤAMMAD B. KHALAF B. AḤMAD B. AL-FARRĀʾ, also known under the name of ḳāḍī Abū Yaʿlā, was one of the masters of the Ḥanbālī school in Baghdād towards the end of the reign of al-Ḳādir (381-422/991-1031) and during that of al-Ḳāʾim (422-67/1031-75); born in Muḥarram 380/April 990, he died on 19 Ramaḍān 458/15 August 1066.

His father (d. 390/1000), who was a Ḥanafī and held the office of notary (shāhid), was said to have refused the office of ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt which had been offered to him by the caliph al-Muṭīʿ and the Būyid prince Muʿizz al-Dawla. It was in the Ḥanbalī doctrine, however, that the young Ibn al-Farrāʾ was trained after his father's death and it is said that he even became the favourite disciple of Ibn al-Ḥāmid, with whom he studied the famous Mukhtaṣar of al-Khiraḳī (d. 363/974).

He succeeded Ibn al-Ḥāmid on the latter's death in 403/1012, made the Pilgrimage to Mecca in 414/1025 and, on his return, devoted himself to teaching ḥadīth and Ḥanbalī fiḳh. In 421/1030 or 422/1031, he refused the post of shāhid to the Ḥanafī Chief Ḳāḍī Abū ʿAbd Allāh b. Mākūlā (d. 447/1055), in spite of the persuasions of the sharīf Abū ʿAlī al-Hāshimī (d. 428/1037). He finally accepted this post, however, some years later, probably in 428/1037, as a result of the intervention of the great patrons of Ḥanbalism Abū Manṣūr b. Yūsuf (d. 460/1067) and Abū ʿAbd Allāh b. Djarāda (d. 470/1077). In 429/1038 he was fiercely attacked by a group of Ashʿarī theologians, who accused him of having supported, in his Kitāb al-Ṣifāt, an anthropomorphist view of God (Kāmil, viii, 16 and 104). In 432/1040 (or, according to other sources, in 433/1041), he formed part of a large audience, which included the famous zāhid Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḳazwīnī (d. 442/1050), at the solemn reading of the Ḳādiriyya in the caliph's palace. He is also mentioned as being present, in 445/1053, at the meeting which was held in the Dār al-Khilāfa under the presidency of Ibn al-Muslima to define the official doctrine of the caliphate in matters of dogma, in particular on the Divine attributes and the uncreated nature of the Ḳurʾān. These details indicate that Ibn al-Farrāʾ was probably, like his Shāfiʿī contemporary al-Māwardī, a member of the entourage of the vizier Ibn al-Muslima.

It was in fact at the suggestion of Ibn al-Muslima and through the good offices of Abū Manṣūr b. Yūsuf that Ibn al-Farrāʾ, in 447/1055, after the death of Ibn Mākūlā, agreed to become ḳāḍī of the Ḥarīm, a section of the caliph's palace, but stipulating his own conditions: that he should not be expected to take part in official processions or to meet the important persons received by the caliph, and should be excused from attending in person at the palace; that he should be allowed to spend one day each month at Nahr al-Muʿallā and another at Bāb al-Azadj, nominating during his absence a deputy (nāʾib) at the Ḥarīm. To his duties there, was later added responsibility for Ḥarrān and Ḥulwān. Ibn al-Farrāʾ, who remained in office until his death, also taught ḥadīth each Friday in the al-Manṣūr mosque.

Ibn al-Farrāʾ produced many works. The principal ones are listed in the Tabaḳāt al-Ḥanābila (ii, 205; cf. Brockelmann, I, 502 and S I, 686) by his son, the ḳāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥusayn (d. 527/1133). His commentary on the Mukhtaṣar of al-Khiraḳī has for long been highly esteemed. His treatise on public law, the K. al-Aḥkām al-sulṭāniyya (published in Cairo in 1357/1938) reveals some surprising similarities with that of al-Māwardī while nevertheless differing from it on many points; both similarities and differences may be explained by the fact that the two men belonged to the entourage of Ibn al-Muslima, but that one was Shāfiʿī and the other Ḥanbalī

Perhaps the most famous work of Ibn al-Farrāʾ is his K. al-Muʿtamad, of which he produced two redactions of unequal length (the shorter is preserved in manuscript at Damascus in the Ẓāhiriyya); the Muʿtamad, modelled on the treatises of kalām, with a preamble sketching a theory of knowledge, is one of the first great works of this type to be written by a Ḥanbālī. Ibn al-Farrāʾ was responsible also for several manuals setting out Ḥanbalī doctrine, both in the field of the uṣūl al-fiḳh and in that of the furūʿ.

Ibn al-Farrāʾ was much involved in the politico-religious struggles of his time and was the author of a great number of refutations, the echo of which is often apparent in the Muʿtamad but the manuscripts of which appear now to be lost: among them were refutations (rudūd) of the Karrāmiyya, the Bāṭiniyya, the Mudjassima, the Ashʿarīs and, in a general way, of the supporters of kalām such as Ibn al-Labbān (d. 446/1054). There should also be mentioned his K. al-Īmān (manuscript in the Ẓāhiriyya) and in particular his K. Ibṭāl al-taʾwīlāt li-akhbār al-ṣifāt, in which he contrasted the unquestioning faith (taslīm) of the Ḥanbalīs with the semi-rationalism (taʾwīl) of Ashʿarism (on this work, cf. Ṭabāḳat al-Ḥanābila, ii, 207 ff.; Ibn Taymiyya, in MRK, i, 445).

Most of the great Ḥanbalīs who died in the second half of the century followed, to varying extents, the teaching of Ibn al-Farrāʾ. Among them were the sharīf Abū Djaʿfar (d. 470/1077), who was one of the most obstinate opponents of the nascent Ashʿarism; Abu 'l-Fatḥ al-Ḥarrānī (d. 476/1083), who was ḳāḍī of Ḥarrān and was killed, with his two sons, in his struggle against the Shīʿī amīr Muslim b. Ḳuraysh; Abu 'l-Faradj al-Shīrāzī (d. 486/1094), who worked actively in spreading Ḥanbalism in Palestine and Syria, with the support of the amīr Tutush. Abū Muḥammad al-Tamīmī (d. 488/1095), Abu 'l-Fatḥ al-Ḥulwānī (d. 505/1112) and Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb al-Kalwadhānī (d. 510/1116), together with many others, are also often considered as followers of Ibn al-Farrāʾ.

Ibn al-Farrāʾ left three sons who are mentioned in the history of his madhhab. The most famous of them was the shaykh Abu 'l-Ḥusayn (d. 525/1131; Dhayl, i, 212-4; Brockelmann, S I, 557), the author of Ṭabaḳāt al-Ḥanābila.

A brother of Ibn al-Farrāʾ, the traditionist Abū Khāzim Ibn al-Farrāʾ (d. 430/1039; Muntaẓam, viii, 102), is sometimes mentioned as being a Muʿtazilī. He should not be confused with his nephew, Abū Khāzim Ibn Abī Yaʿlā (d. 527/1133), known as a jurisconsult and traditionist.

Ibn al-Farrāʾ's prestige, within his school, was such that for three centuries, until the middle of the 8th/14th century, he was referred to by all the Ḥanbalīs simply as "al-ḳāḍī"; afterwards, however, Muwaffaḳ al-Dīn b. Ḳudāma (d. 620/1222) grew in importance with his Mughnī, and the Ḥanbalīs of the end of the 9th/15th century tended to give the title of al-ḳāḍī to al-Mardāwī (d. 885/1480; Brockelmann, S I, 130).

IBN FIRISHTE [see FIRISHTE-OGHLU].

IBN FŪRAK, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Fūrak al-Anṣārī al-Iṣbahānī, Ashʿarite theologian and traditionist, was born about 330/941, perhaps in Ispahan. In ʿIrāḳ, both at Basra and at Baghdad, he studied Ashʿarite kalām under Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Bāhilī along with al-Bāḳillānī [q.v.] and al-Isfarāʾinī [q.v.], and also traditions under ʿAbd Allāh b. Djaʿfar al-Iṣbahānī. From ʿIraḳ he went to Rayy, then to Nīshāpūr, where a madrasa was built for him beside the khānḳāh of the ṣūfī al-Būshandjī. He was in Nīshāpūr before the death of the ṣūfī Abū ʿUthmān al-Maghribī in 373/983, and probably remained there until shortly before his own death in 406/1015, when he was summoned to Ghazna by the sultan Maḥmūd. This was probably at the instance of members of the Karrāmiyya sect, against whom he had been disputing in Nīshāpūr. They tried to prove to sultan Maḥmūd that he was a heretic, but he seems to have defended himself successfully, and to have been poisoned by the Karrāmīs on his way back to Nīshāpūr. The version according to which Maḥmūd was responsible for poisoning him, is improbable.

Writings. His main work in the eyes of later generations was Kitāb Mushkil al-ḥadīth wa-bayānihi (with many variants of the title). This attempts to explain difficult phrases in such a way as to avoid both anthropomorphism and a Muʿtazilī view (extracts with German translation, Raimund Köbert, Analecta Orientalia 22, Rome 1941; full Arabic text, Hyderabad 1362/1943; cf. R. Arnaldez, Grammaire et théologie chez Ibn Hazm de Cordoue, Paris 1956, 30 f.). The titles of other extant works and stray references in heresiographers (Ibn Ḥazm, Fiṣal, iv, 209, 214, 215, 224; al-Baghdādī, Uṣūl al-dīn, 253; Abū ʿUdhba, al-Rawḍa al-bahiyya, 14, 44) show that he took a part in contemporary theological discussions on such questions as: the use of the istithnāʾ in respect of one's faith; whether a saint may know he is a saint (cf. also Hudjwīrī, Kashf al-mahdjūb, tr. R. A. Nicholson, 214); the application of atomistic conceptions to man; the sinlessness of prophets; the relation of God's attributes and names to human attributes. Much of his disputation was against Karrāmīs in Nīshāpūr and Ghazna; but his views differed slightly at certain points from other Ashʿarites. He was a Shāfiʿī, but wrote a book on Ḥanafī fiḳh, and on the strength of this receives a brief notice (no. 185) in Ibn Ḳuṭlūbughā's Tādj al-tarādjim.

Influence. It seems improbable that al-Ashʿarī was a mere eponym (as suggested by J. Schacht, in Stud. Isl., i, 33-5), but the early development of Ashʿarite theology is obscure. A lost work by Ibn Fūrak entitled Ṭabaḳāt al-mutakallimīn is the main source for our knowledge of al-Ashʿarī and his writings, and was extensively used by Ibn ʿAsākir in his Tabyīn kadhib al-muftarī (esp. 123; cf. also R. J. McCarthy, The theology of al-Ashʿarī, Beirut 1953, index). Since Ibn Fūrak's master al-Bāhilī was a pupil of al-Ashʿarī, and since Ibn ʿAsākir has other early sources, it would seem that Ibn Fūrak's material can be relied on. At Nīshāpūr Ibn Fūrak seems to have played a part in securing the adoption of Ashʿarite theology by a group of mystics (cf. L. Massignon, *Essai*², 315), which included al-Maghribī and al-Daḳḳāḳ; the famous Ḳushayrī [q.v.] was a pupil.

IBN AL-FURĀT, name of a number of persons who held the offices of secretary or vizier under the ʿAbbāsid caliphs or the Ikhshidid *amīr*s and who belonged to a Shīʿī family. The earliest member of the family of whom anything is known is ʿUmar b. al-Furāt, who represented the ʿAlid ʿAlī al-Riḍā and was executed in Baghdād in 203/818-9, on the orders of Ibrāhīm b. al-Mahdī at the time when the ʿIrāḳīs were in revolt against the Shīʿī policy of al-Maʾmūn. A certain Muḥammad b. Mūsā seems to have been the first to hold important administrative office, and it was his sons, the Banu 'l-Furāt, who appeared on the political scene at the end of the 3rd/9th century, in the entourage of the Shīʿī vizier Ismāʿīl b. Bulbul [q.v.].

(1) ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. MŪSĀ B. AL-ḤASAN B. AL-FURĀT, imprisoned at the end of the caliphate of al-Muʿtamid following the fall from favour of Ismāʿīl b. Bulbul, was set free by the caliph al-Muʿtaḍid, who, at the beginning of his reign, commissioned him to restore the state finances, entrusting him with the direction of the land department of ʿIrāḳ, then, for some months, with the control of that of the whole empire. Abu 'l-ʿAbbās, assisted by his brother Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī, then proceeded to obtain financial statements from the Sunnī secretaries, particularly from the members of the Banu 'l-Djarrāḥ. He retained his office under al-Muktafī but encountered the hostility of the new vizier al-Ḳāsim b. ʿUbayd Allāh; he died, however, before the latter could take any action against him (291/904).

Bibliography: D. Sourdel, Vizirat, index.

(2) ABU 'L-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD, born in 241/855, was several times vizier of the caliph al-Muḳtadir. At first deputy to his brother Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad under the caliphates of al-Muʿtaḍid and of al-Muktafī, he became the right-hand man of the vizier al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan, and then was himself chosen as vizier by the young al-Muḳtadir after the failure of the plot of Ibn al-Muʿtazz (Rabīʿ I 296/December 908). Ibn al-Furāt, all-powerful during this first period as vizier and controlled only from a distance by the group of the Dignitaries (Sādāt), which included in particular the caliph's mother and the chief eunuchs of the Palace, made the mistake of indulging imprudently, and on several occasions, in embezzlement of large sums, which led to his dismissal in Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 299/July 912. He was re-appointed vizier in Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 304/June 917, and this time became the victim of the difficulties caused by the revolt of the governor of Ādharbaydjān; he was again dismissed in Djumādā II 306/November 918. He was imprisoned in the Palace throughout the vizierate of his successor and released at the time of the revolution of Ḥāmid b. al-ʿAbbās [q.v.], to be appointed vizier yet again (Rabīʿ II 311/August 923). This third and final vizierate of Ibn al-Furāt was to prove a particularly dramatic one: the minister, assisted by his son al-Muḥassin, had no hesitation in taking a brutal revenge on those who, in the preceding years, had treated him badly, nor in using violence to extort large sums of money from all those who had accepted office during his predecessor's vizierate.

The methods which Ibn al-Furāt and his son used this time soon aroused among the caliph's entourage high feelings, which were increased still more by the news of the attack on the Pilgrims by the Ḳarmaṭīs in Muḥarram 312/April-May 924. Under pressure from the chamberlain and some of the officers in charge of the guards, al-Muḳtadir therefore decided to arrest the vizier (Rabīʿ I 312/June 924). Ibn al-Furāt and his son were brought to trial, but the somewhat insolent attitude of the former minister had the effect of turning the caliph against him, while the newly-appointed vizier instigated some sections of the army to demand that the prisoners be executed without further ado. The caliph, yielding to popular fury, gave orders to the Prefect of the Police, Nāzūk, to put them to death (Rabīʿ II 312/July 924).

Such was the ignominious end of a man who had been a prominent financier and a politician, but had never shown himself to be a loyal servant of the caliph. An educated man of great culture, an experienced administrator in the organization of the financial services, he had demonstrated his ability to solve rapidly what appeared to be the most complicated problems, restraining effectively when necessary the frauds which seem to have been very common at this time at the various levels of the central organization; remarks attributed to him indicate also that he had a clear grasp of the conditions of economic life in the ʿAbbāsid empire and of the measures which would permanently increase the resources of its Treasury.

Highly intelligent and of great eloquence, Ibn al-Furāt had gained the sympathy of the young al-Muḳtadir, whose mentor he had been and who showed, until the last moment, his admiration for a man who was always to exert a sort of fascination over him. He was moreover a perfect courtier, whose ostentatious generosity and seeking after luxury were part of a policy of enhancing his prestige. Concerned with his own personal glory, which at times coincided with that of the caliph, he restored the authority of the central government in a province such as Fārs, but was too often concerned primarily with increasing his own wealth, that of his collaborators and that of the members of the secret politico-religious party to which he belonged and which was an extremist sect of the Twelver movement.

(3) Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Djaʿfar b. Muḥammad, brother of the above, was in 296/908 put in charge of the land department of the East and of the West, but died in 297/909-10.

(4) Abu 'l-Fatḥ al-Faḍl b. Djaʿfar, called also Ibn Ḥinzāba (from his mother's name), son of the above and nephew of the vizier, replaced his father in 297/909-10 at the head of the land department for the East, where he remained until 299/911-2, and again held this office from 304/917 to 306/918 during the second vizierate of his uncle, then from 315/927 to 318/930, during the second vizierate of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā [q.v.] and the vizierate of Ibn Muḳla [q.v.]; he was put in charge of the land department of the Sawād in 319/931, thanks to the influence of the amīr Muʾnis, then again of that of the East from 319/931 to 320/932, under the vizierate of al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḳāsim, a minister of Shīʿī sympathies who surrounded himself with former collaborators of Ibn al-Furāt. He finally became himself vizier, in 320/932, but only for a few months. Unable to improve the very dangerous political and financial situation, he had to encourage the caliph to repel the advance of the commander-in-chief Muʾnis, who had then returned from Upper Mesopotamia, and to march at the head of his own troops against the rebellious leader: during the fighting which ensued the caliph was killed. Al-Faḍl was next, during the caliphate of al-Rāḍī, put in control of Egypt and Syria with the title of inspector; he then restored the emirate of Egypt to Muḥammad b. Ṭughdj, then was appointed to the vizierate in 325/937 by the chief amīr Ibn Rāʾiḳ, to whose daughter he married his son. In 326/937, he retired and left ʿIrāḳ for Egypt. He died and was buried at Ramla in Palestine in 327/938.

(5) Abu 'l-Faḍl Djaʿfar b. al-Faḍl, son of the above, born in 308/921, was vizier of the Ikhshidids of Egypt, in charge of the administration of the country in the time of the amīrs Anudjūr (334/945-6) and ʿAlī (349/960), then of the eunuch Kāfūr (355-7/966-8), who, after having been regent, succeeded in getting himself recognized as ruler by the caliph of Baghdād, but died soon after this. Djaʿfar remained in office during the eventful year between the death of Kāfūr and the arrival of the Fāṭimids, but he failed to remain in command of the situation created by the dynastic crisis and the threat from outside. Various extortions led to mutinies by the Kāfūrid and Ikhshidid contingents, which took place on two occasions, ending in the pillage of Djaʿfar's palace and obliging him to go into hiding. Al-Ḥasan b. ʿUbayd Allāh, a relative of the new amīr and governor of Syria, thought it his duty to intervene and had Djaʿfar arrested. He was, however, released soon afterwards and appointed governor of Egypt. As such he received the emissaries of the Fāṭimid general Djawhar [q.v.] and facilitated the entry of the Fāṭimid troops into Egypt, but he later refused the vizierate which was offered to him. He died in 391/1001, during the reign of the caliph al-Ḥākim, who was to execute his son Abu 'l-ʿAbbās in 405/1014-5 after having appointed him vizier for a few days.

Djaʿfar b. al-Faḍl left behind him the reputation of a generous patron of poets and scholars, having in particular invited to Egypt the traditionist al-Dāraḳuṭnī, but also that of an eccentric who had acquired a collection of snakes and scorpions which terrified his neighbours.

IBN AL-FURĀT, Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm b. ʿAlī al-Miṣrī al-Ḥanafī (735-807/1334-1405), Egyptian historian, author of a vast universal history, Taʾrīkh al-duwal wa 'l-mulūk, of which he finished completely only the volumes covering the years after 500/1106-7. The majority of the fragments which survive (mainly in Vienna) are autographs and the work does not seem to have been much copied, or indeed much valued in its own time (perhaps because of suspicions concerning its style and orthodoxy), although it was used by al-Maḳrīzī and others. Its value rests not only in its being very detailed, but also in the wide range of its sources, which are often cited side by side verbatim and chosen with great broad-mindedness, the Shīʿī Ibn Abī Ṭayyiʾ and the Christian Ibn al-ʿAmīd, for example, appearing together with writers of irreproachable Muslim orthodoxy. Not all the volumes are of equal interest today, their value varying according to whether or not the sources used themselves survive: the volumes covering the first two-thirds of the 6th/12th century are of considerable interest owing to the wide use made of the lost chronicle of the Shīʿī of Aleppo, Ibn Abī Ṭayyiʾ, of the Egyptian Ibn Ṭuwayr, etc.; those covering the Ayyūbid period and that of the early Mamlūks are of less importance, though not without interest, while those concerning the period of the author's own life are once again important. Apart from a few extracts here and there, there have, up to now, been published only two volumes (vol. ix of Vienna) covering the years 789-99/1387-97 (by C. K. Zurayḳ, Beirut 1936 and, with Nadjla ʿIzz al-Dīn, 1938), and two others (vols. vi and vii) covering the years 672-96/1274-97 (same editors, 1939-42); nothing has been found on the period of over a century which separates them. There do exist, however, in addition to a few volumes on the early periods (Paris, London, Bursa), the whole of those for the years 500-65 and 585-696 (the lacuna which until recently existed between 625 and 638 has just been filled by the discovery of a volume in Morocco, of which photographs have been sent to the American University of Beirut, which published the volumes edited by Zurayḳ). Similarly, the years 563-8 and 585 (which come together in vol. iv of the Vienna MS) have been published by M. Ḥasan M. al-Shammāʿ, Baṣra 1967. The manuscripts for the 6th/12th, 7th/13th, and 8th/14th centuries all belong to the autograph series Vienna AF 814 into which may be inserted the MS Vatican V 720 (years 639-58) and the manuscript of Morocco. Al-Sakhawī (see, e.g., F. Rosenthal, Historiography, 419) accuses Ibn al-Furāt of vulgarity of style, but this can apply only to the later years, the remainder of the work consisting of extracts from earlier writers.

IBN AL-FUWAṬĪ, KAMĀL AL-DĪN ʿABD AL-RAZZĀḲ B. AḤMAD, historian and librarian, born in Baghdād on 17 Muḥarram 642/25 June 1244. At the age of fourteen, he was imprisoned by the conquering Mongols and remained in this situation for, it seems, less than two years. In 660/1261-62, he joined the great scholar and wazīr, Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī [q.v.], in Marāgha where he became the librarian of the Observatory Library. In 679/1280-81, he returned to his native Baghdād and was soon appointed director of the Mustanṣiriyya Library. Apart from occasional trips within ʿIrāḳ, he travelled to Ādharbaydjān in 704/1304-5 to the court of the Īlkhānid Öldjeytü and spent about three years in the various cities of the region. After a two-year stay in Baghdād, he again returned to Ādharbaydjān in 710-11/1310-12. Back in Baghdād in 712/1312-13, now approaching his seventies, he was dismissed from his position by the new administrator of *waḳf*s. In 716-18/1316-18, we again find him in Ādharbaydjān. He returned to Baghdād in 718/1318, where he died, after having been incapacitated by a stroke, at the beginning of the year 723/January 1323.

Established in two centres of a highly flourishing intellectual life, Ibn al-Fuwaṭī came to know the leading scholars of his time. He did much copying of manuscripts (for himself and, mainly, as a source of income), a few of which are preserved. His own literary labours, primarily in the fields of history and biography, were extensive, and the large works he commenced remained incomplete and largely unpublished. It was possibly their size and incomplete state that contributed to their having been comparatively little used by later generations and to their eventual loss. Their loss is particularly regrettable since they contained enormous amounts of information collected by an alert and open-minded scholar who did not fail to observe a painter illustrating the world history of Rashīd al-Dīn (Talkhīṣ, iv, 258), and who, in keeping with an often followed practice, elicited much material personally, as, for instance, in the case of Ibn Kammūna (Talkhīṣ, iv, 161; L. Nemoy, in RÉJ, cxxiii (1964), 507-10). The only, at least partly, preserved work is his large biographical dictionary arranged according to nicknames and honorary titles, entitled (Talkhīṣ) Madjmaʿ al-ādāb fī muʿdjam al-alḳāb, a first-class reference tool, unique of its kind. About two-thirds of it survives in manuscripts written by the author himself, the fourth volume, from ʿIzz al-Dīn to Ḳayl, written in 712/1312 (Damascus Ẓāhiriyya, Cat. ʿIshsh, p. 165), and the fifth volume covering the letters k, l, and m (in Lahore, also an autograph). The latter has been published by M. ʿAbd al-Ḳuddūs al-Ḳāsimī in the Oriental College Magazine of Lahore (Suppl. 1939, and vols. xvi-xxiii, 1940-47). The edition of vol. iv by Muṣṭafā Djawād began to appear in Damascus in 1962.

Ibn al-Fuwaṭī also wrote a centennial history, apparently the first to be expressly designated as such in the title, al-Ḥawādith al-djāmiʿa wa-'l-tadjārib al-nāfiʿa fī 'l-miʾa al-sābiʿa. An annalistic history covering the years 626-700/1228-1301 was published as this work by Muṣṭafā Djawād in Baghdād in 1351. There is no manuscript authority whatever for the ascription of this published text to Ibn al-Fuwaṭī, and more recently it has been shown by Muṣṭafā Djawād with incontrovertible arguments that this ascription cannot be correct. The work, which, in particular through its reports on unusual occurrences of daily life in Baghdād, is of very great interest, goes back to a contemporary or near-contemporary writer, but its true authorship remains to be ascertained. Ibn al-Fuwaṭī refers, in connection with an event of the year 712, to his annalistically arranged al-Taʾrīkh wa-'l-ḥawādith (Talkhīṣ, iv, 139), which may be identical with al-Ḥawādith al-djāmiʿa (cf. Dhahabī, Ḥuffāẓ, iv, 274-6: Ḥawādith al-miʾa al-sābiʿa wa-ilā an māta), or another more comprehensive historical work of his.

Other works, known by title or through rare quotations, are a poetical-biographical anthology, Naẓm al-durar al-nāṣiʿa fī shuʿarāʾ ahl al-miʾa al-sābiʿa (Talkhīṣ, iv, 253, 424, 864, 1101; also, part 3, 151 f., 436, and, probably, 57, 62, 89), and a collection possibly of similar contents, Durar al-aṣdāf fī ghurar al-awṣāf (Talkhīṣ, iv, 280). He wrote genealogical tables (Kitāb al-nasab al-mushadjdjar, Talkhīṣ, iv, introd. 59 f.), on the men named ʿAbd al-Karīm (al-Durr al-naẓīm fī-man tasammā ʿAbd al-Karīm, Talkhīṣ, iv, 1195), and on scholars with gentilics derived from the professions and crafts (like his own, "maker of fuwaṭ, cloth wrappers of various kinds") (Badāʾiʿ al-tuḥaf fī dhikr man nusiba min al-ʿulamāʾ ila 'l-ṣanā'iʿ wa- 'l-ḥiraf, cf. Talkhīṣ, iv, introd. 60 f.), as well as a list of homonyms in tabular form (al-Muʾtalif wa-ʾl-mukhtalif), and other works. His earliest work, written while he was still in his teens, was in praise of wax candles (fī waṣf al-shamʿa, Talkhīṣ, iv, 45). Another early work written in Marāgha was, it seems, a handbook for those working in the Observatory there, Kitāb Man ḳaṣada 'l-raṣad (Talkhīṣ, iv, 569).

Bibliography: In addition to all the later reference works in which Ibn al-Fuwaṭī is listed, the most accurate data on his life can be found in the Talkhīṣ, as was shown by Muṣṭafā Djawād in the detailed biography prefixed to his edition. IBN GABIROL, ABŪ AYYŪB SULAYMĀN B. YAḤYĀ (in Hebrew: Shelōmōh ben Yehudāh; the Latin Avencebrol; Gabirol, or rather Gebirol, is perhaps Djubayr plus the Romance diminutive suffix -ol), Jewish poet and philosopher, born at Malaga circa 411/1021-2, died at Valencia 450/1058 (but this date is not absolutely certain). In addition to his works, mainly poetry, written in Hebrew, which do not concern us here, Ibn Gabirol wrote in Arabic a short treatise on morals (Iṣlāḥ al-akhlāḳ), which summarizes without much originality (but adapting them to the needs of the Arabic-speaking Jewish public) the usual commonplaces of this literary genre [see AKHLĀḲ]; a collection of ethical sentences, which is preserved, apart from a few fragments, in a Hebrew version (Mibḥar ha-penīnim "Selected pearls"), the attribution of which is, however, uncertain; and, most important, a lengthy metaphysical treatise in dialogue form: the Arabic original of this, which, apart from a small number of quotations, is lost, most probably had as its title Yanbūʿ al-ḥayāt, Fons vitae in the Latin version made in the middle of the 12th century by the Toledan translator John of Spain with the help of Dominicus Gundissalinus. The Hebrew extracts, made by Shemṭōb Ibn Palḳera, are a century later; unlike the Latin version, which was well-known and used by the great Latin scholars such as Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, etc. (who did not suspect that the author was Jewish but took him for an "Arab"), these extracts remained practically unknown until they were identified by Salomon Munk in the middle of the 19th century.

The philosophical system of Ibn Gabirol, so far as it can be deduced from the Fons vitae, which is only the first part of a work which was never completed, is characterized by the fact that it applies the distinction of form and matter to simple (non-material) substances. Although in the "Fountain of Life" Ibn Gabirol refrains from referring explicitly to any religious text whatsoever, in it he conceives the universe as a product of the Divine Will, on the nature of which it is difficult, however, in spite of the relative abundance of texts, to form an opinion. There is no doubt that Ibn Gabirol belongs to the Neoplatonist "intellectual group" which produced also such varied works as the "Theology of Aristotle", the "Liber de Causis", the texts attributed to the "Greek Master" (al-shaykh al-yūnānī), the fragments of the pseudo-Empedocles, Isaac Israeli, the Ikhwān al-Ṣafāʾ, Ibn Masarra and others [see ANBADUḲLĪS, AFLĀṬŪN, BURUḲLUS, IBN MASARRA, IKHWĀN AL-ṢAFĀʾ]. Nevertheless, in the present state of knowledge, it is not possible to assign to him definite sources or to establish with certainty the precise origins of his metaphysical concepts. Furthermore, in spite of the praise given to him by his compatriots, the Muslim Ibn Ṣāʿid and the Jew Moses Ibn ʿEzra, no echo of his philosophical thought is found in Islam, and indeed, it is very little known or esteemed among the Jews, who have forgotten Ibn Gabirol the philosopher as readily as they have carefully preserved his Hebrew secular and religious poetry. It is only through his poetry and in particular his meditation in rhymed prose "The Kingly Crown" (Keter Malkūt) that something of his philosophical doctrine has penetrated into subsequent Jewish thought; we are not concerned here with the traces, in any case weak and open to debate, which his speculations have left in Jewish mysticism (Kabbala).

(G. VAJDA)

IBN GHALBŪN, Muwallad leader who, at the time of the reyes de taifas, emerged as ruler of Molina de Aragón, the small town situated at the highest point of the land lying between the Tagus and Jalón rivers, its territory belonging partly to Aragón in the north and partly to Castille in the south. El Cid, on settling at el Poyo de Calamocha, conquered Ibn Ghalbūn, who became his exceedingly loyal subject, as is related with striking emphasis by el Cantar del mio Cid.

He had been known hitherto only by his *ma*ʿ*rifa*, but it is now known that his name was ʿAzzūn, since one of his two sons was called Abu ʾl-Ghamr b. ʿAzzūn and the other ʿAlī b. ʿAzzūn, transformed into Gharrūn in the manuscript of al-Mann bi ʾl-imāma. All these names are honorific additions in -on, so frequent in the Hispano-Muslim upper classes, such as Ibn Badrūn, Ibn Zaydūn, Ibn Khaldūn, and many others.

When Dona Jimena and her daughters went to Valencia to rejoin the Campeador, who had just conquered the city, ʿAzzūn b. Ghalbūn cordially welcomed the horsemen sent to escort the ladies and added two hundred cavalry to their retinue; from Medinaceli onwards, he honoured the wife and daughters of El Cid, with Alvar Fañez, and had them splendidly accommodated at Molina. When the Almoravid army took up its position in front of Valencia with the purpose of reconquering the city, Ibn Ghalbūn did not follow the example of the petty kings of Albarracín, Alpuente, Lérida and Tortosa, who complied with the order to join the army sent by Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn against El Cid; the Cantar praises him yet again for the noble way in which he welcomed and accompanied the daughters of El Cid and the princes of Carrion on their unfortunate wedding journey, but the minstrel, instead of dealing dispassionately with this episode—so ill-fated in its outcome—cloaks it in a legend and, carried away by his manifest hatred when dealing with the courtly faction of El Cid's enemies, he derides the princes' cowardice at the battle of Cuarte and their panic before the lion let loose at the Valencian court, and lingers over the scene at Corpes, as cruel as it was unjust; such is his hatred that he goes so far as to ascribe to the princes the intention of killing Ibn Ghalbūn in order to steal from him the riches with which he had so splendidly regaled them; after the failure of this plan as a result of the denunciation of a Latinized Moor, he depicts El Cid's faithful friend as a perfect gentleman who cast their dishonourable conduct in their teeth, yet refrained from punishing them because they were the sons-in-law of his great friend El Cid to whom he restored his daughters.

So ends, in the Cantar, the passage through history of this Muslim leader, so highly praised for his loyalty and devotion to the Campeador, but we have strong reasons to tone down these eulogies, since the same person affirms: "Even if we wish him ill, we cannot do him harm, for his star is so favourable that, in peace as in war, he will always triumph; he is very dull-witted who does not recognize this truth". This realistic, indeed cynical approach has been clearly confirmed, for we now know that, once El Cid was dead and Valencia had been reconquered by the Almoravids, Ibn Ghalbūn saw the possibility of resisting and conquering the Aragonese on the battlefield; without hesitation, he hastened with his men to take part in the battle of Cutanda against Alfonso I, el Batallador, in the summer of the year 514/1120, alongside the governors of Lérida, Valencia and Granada, with the other local leaders who, like himself, had acknowledged and supported with their arms the rule of ʿAlī b. Yūsuf. This interesting unpublished item of information is revealed by al-Bayān al-mughrib.

Nothing more is known about Ibn Ghalbūn, as the territory of Molina de Aragón was before long occupied by the conqueror of Cutanda and subsequently became the domain of Enrique de Lara and his descendants. It is very probable that he retired to Andalusia where we find two of his sons who, at the collapse of the Almoravid empire, following in their father's footsteps, succeeded in setting themselves up as petty kings of taifas at Jerez and Ronda. The elder, Abu ʾl-Ghamr ʿAzzūn, was quick to acknowledge the Almohades when they landed in Spain and gave them proofs of the sincerity of his allegiance, which were far greater and more effective than the gallant courtesies of his father towards El Cid. In contrast to the other petty Andalusian kings who rose up against ʿAbd al-Muʾmin, from the moment that he learnt of the revolt of al-Massī and of his first victory, he not only remained loyal, but also collaborated with Barrāz in the capture of Seville and with the brothers of al-Mahdī in expelling the Almoravids from Algeciras; he even accompanied them when they went to present themselves in Marrākush.

When Alfonso VII besieged Cordova, he contributed with great decisiveness and speed to the lifting of the siege by bringing into the stronghold the Almohad troops which were stationed in the Sierra of Cordova; finally, at the side of Sayyid Yūsuf, the son and future successor of ʿAbd al-Muʾmin, he took part in the battle of Zaʿabula or Zaghabūḳa in Rabīʿ I 553/April-May 1158, in the region of el Viso and Mairena del Alcor, to the north of Alcalá de Guadaira, against the army from Avila commanded by the famous count Sancho Gimeno, the Hunchback; during the rout, this son of Ibn Ghalbūn died a martyr's death.

His brother Abu ʾl-ʿAlā, who helped him to seize Ronda, as well as the descendants of both brothers, occupied high posts in the Almohade administration and distinguished themselves by their loyalty, to which the Caliph Yaʿḳūb al-Manṣūr bore witness most vividly when, in his testamentary speech, he recommended one of them as being "among the most intelligent and perfect men who have given their allegiance to the cause of Ibn Tūmart".

IBN GHALBŪN [see MUḤAMMAD B. KHALĪL].

IBN GHĀLIB, Muḥammad b. Ayyūb al-Gharnāṭī, historian and geographer, living in Granada in the 6th/12th century. His fame rests on an excellent work entitled Farḥat (or Fardjat) al-anfus fī taʾrīkh al-Andalus; the text has been lost, but lengthy extracts have been reproduced by al-Maḳḳarī, Ibn Saʿīd, Ibn al-Khaṭīb and others, and an abridged version of the geographical part, Taʿlīḳ muntaḳā min Farḥat al-anfus fī taʾrīkh al-Andalus, has been preserved (ed. Luṭfī ʿAbd al-Badīʿ in RIMA, i/2 (1955), 272-310). The passages quoted by al-Maḳḳarī are numerous, but the most extensive (Analectes, i, 184-90) gives interesting details about the habitats of the Arab tribes in Spain. The abridged version of the geographical part is much more valuable, for it contains the most important passages of the "Description of Spain" by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Rāzī [see AL-RĀZĪ] the text of which E. Lévi-Provençal tried to reconstruct without being able to take advantage of Ibn Ghālib's work, which was still unpublished and unknown (see La "Description de l'Espagne" d'Aḥmad al-Rāzī, in al-Andalus, xviii/1 (1953), 51-108).

It is this Taʿlīḳ which supplies some details on the life of Ibn Ghālib. From it we learn that he was in the service of Abū Saʿīd ʿUthmān b. ʿAbd al-Muʾmin, governor of Granada and of many other Spanish provinces on behalf of his father ʿAbd al-Muʾmin and of his brother Abū Yaʿḳūb Yūsuf, from 552/1160 till his death in 571/1175-6 (see A. Huici Miranda, Hist. pol. del imperio almohade, Tetuan 1957, ii, 618-9). Al-Khazradjī (apud al-Maḳḳarī, Nafḥ, Cairo 1949, ii, 126) declares that Ibn Ghālib wrote a great historical work going from the Creation to the history of Spain under the dynasty of ʿAbd al-Muʾmin, and adds that he left Spain in 565/1169-70. Thus the Farḥat al-anfus was a work on the history of al-Andalus, preceded by some chapters on universal history and on the geography of Spain.

IBN GHĀNIM, ʿIzz al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Salām b. Aḥmad b. Ghānim al-Maḳdisī al-Wāʿiẓ, author of works on mysticism or edification, of whose life little is known. He is said to have died in 678/1279.

The best-known of his works is the Kashf al-asrār ʿan (al-)ḥikam (al-mūdaʿa fī) al-ṭuyūr wa 'l-azhār, published and translated by Garcin de Tassy, Les oiseaux et les fleurs, Paris 1821 (tr. reprinted in 1876 in Allégories, récits poétiques, etc.; German tr. Peiper, Stimmen aus dem Morgenlande, Hirschberg 1850; lith. text, Cairo 1275, 1280; Būlāḳ ed. 1270, 1290; Cairo 1280, etc.). There may also be mentioned: Ḥall al-rumūz (numerous manuscripts); al-Ḳawl al-nafīs fī taflīs Iblīs, Caire 1277, etc. (dialogue with Satan); and al-Rawḍ al-anīḳ fi 'l-waʿẓ al-rashīḳ (in manuscript).

Another Ibn Ghānim al-Maḳdisī, Nūr al-Dīn ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, was a Ḥanafī faḳīh born in Cairo in 920/1514, and died there on 18 Djumādā II 1004/18 February 1596. Among his works may be mentioned the Bughyat al-murtād fī taṣḥīḥ al-ṣād (printed with the Muḳābasāt of al-Tawḥīdī), and some Ḥawāshī ʿala 'l-Ḳāmūs (see Brockelmann, S II, 234, 395).

IBN GHĀNIYA [see ghāniya, banū].

IBN GHANNĀM, Abū Ṭāhir Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā b. Ghannām al-Ḥarrānī al-Numayrī al-Ḥanbalī al-Maḳdisī (d. 693/1294), is the author of a treatise on oneiromancy that was widely circulated, on account of its alphabetical arrangement which makes it rapid and simple to consult. He was thus the innovator of a system which, after his time, became widely adopted. His treatise, entitled al-Muʿallam ʿalā ḥurūf al-muʿdjam, led oneiromancy away from the traditional paths by renouncing the plan inspired by that of the Book of Dreams of Artemidorus of Ephesus (ed. T. Fahd, Damascus 1964, PIFD) and sanctioned by Naṣr b. Yaʿḳūb al-Dīnawarī [q.v.] and by inaugurating the method of classification which was to be called the "key to dreams". The manuscript versions of this treatise are very numerous; the earliest that we have seen are: Istanbul,—Saray, Ahmet III, 3173 (729/1328-9) and 3172 (743/1342-3), Aya Sofya, 1730 (804/1401-2); Çorum, 3093 (826/1413-4); Istanbul Un. Lib. 4864 (920/1514-5) and Kastamonu, 2997 (954/1547-8). The Bursa manuscript, Ulucami 1986, is not dated, but it appears to be of considerable age; the end of the treatise is to be found on a leaf at the beginning of MS 1987, dated 745/1344-5; numerous lacunae in it have been filled in by a recent hand. Abū Ḥāmid Muḥ. al-Ḳudsī made an abridgement of it (cf. Saray, Ahmet III, 3164).

Another innovation is also owed to him, the versification of oneirocritical material in order to render it more easily memorized; indeed, he wrote a poem in radjaz, entitled ʿArūs al-bustān fi 'l-nisāʾ wa 'l-aʿḍāʾ wa 'l-insān (the poem entitled Durrat al-aḥlām, part of which follows his own poem in MS Berlin 4264 and which Brockelmann, II, 498, attributes to him, is by Djamāl al-Dīn al-Dimyāṭī; cf. Süleymaniye-Yozgat, 788/1, fols. 1-52 r.) which is less widely distributed than al-Muʿallam (cf. Lâleli, 1636bis; Berlin, 4263); in it he tells us that he was the disciple of Djamāl al-Dīn Ibrāhīm b. al-Sabtī al-Baghdādī. This procedure was to be developed by Zayn al-Dīn b. al-Wardī (d. 749/1349) in his al-Alfiyya al-Wardiyya, a youthful work, published in Cairo from 1285 A. H. onwards and with a commentary by ʿAbd al-Raʾūf al-Munāwī (d. 1031/1621; cf. Lâleli, 1659; Istanbul Un. Lib. A 4240), Muḥ. b. Djābir al-Miknāsī al-Ghassānī (d. 827/1424), the author of a long manẓūma fi 'l-taʿbīr (cf. Lâleli, 1661; Aya Sofia, 1729; comp. Brockelmann, S II, 367) and Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. al-Sakan al-Muʿāfirī al-Mufassir (cf. Köprülü, 1202, dated 911/1505-6; Saray, Ahmet III, 3162, dated 920/1514). We may note that this system was already known to the Byzantines (cf. the collections in verse attributed to Astrampsychos and Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, d. 829, ed. by N. Rigaltius, following the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus of Ephesus and those of Ἀχμὲτ υἱὸς Σηρεΐμ, Paris 1603).

Finally, according to Brockelmann, S I, 913, Ibn Ghannām is the author of a poem entitled Ḳilādat al-durr al-manthūr fī dhikr al-baʿth wa 'l-nushūr, ed. Cairo 1302, in the margin of the Kharīdat al-ʿadjāʾib of Sirādj al-Dīn Abū Ḥafṣ ibn al-Wardī (d. 850/1446).

IBN GHANNĀM, Shaykh Ḥusayn b. Ghannām al-Iḥsāʾī, who died in 1225/1810 at al-Dirʿiyya, the first Wahhābī capital in Nadjd (Ibn Bishr, ʿUnwān, i, 149), was a faithful adherent of the Wahhābiyya [q.v.] and its first authentic chronicler. Little is known about his early life at al-Aḥsāʾ except that he studied theology and philology under the ʿulamāʾ there. He later moved to al-Dirʿiyya, where he at first attended the lectures of Shaykh Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, and thereafter taught Arabic and theology. The Shaykhs ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and Sulaymān, the two famous ʿulamāʾ and grandsons of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, were among his pupils at al-Dirʿiyya (Ibn Bishr, ibid.). Ibn Bishr mentions al-ʿIḳd al-thamīn fī sharḥ Uṣūl al-dīn as one among many theological works by Ibn Ghannām (ibid.). He does not name any of the others, but Ibn Ghannām refers in his Rawḍa (p. 45) to another work of his, Rafʿ al-malām ʿan al-aʾimma al-aʿlām. His most famous work is Rawḍat al-afkār wa 'l-afhām li murtād ḥāl al-imām wa taʿdād ghazawāt dhawī 'l-islām (British Museum MSS Add. 19799-800 and Add. 23344-5; lith. Bombay 1919; Cairo 1949). Botb manuscripts and printed copies are very rare outside Saudi Arabia.

The Rawḍa is in two volumes:

(1) Rawḍat al-afkār, a theological exposition of Wahhābism divided into five chapters; the first reveals the religious situation in Arabia and the neighbouring Muslim territories where, according to the Rawḍa, Muslims are "sunk in the abyss of paganism, steeped in shame and defiled by the taint of corruption". Chapter two details the genealogy of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhāb and his rise to fame. The Rawḍa differs markedly from another contemporary account, the Lamʿ al-shihāb. The comments of the author in the final three chapters reveal his vast theological knowledge. He is here commenting on some letters of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhāb sent to various dignitaries within and outside the Arabian peninsula. From internal evidence it is clear that the Rawḍa was written after the death of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhāb.

(2) al-Ghazawāt al-bayāniyya wa 'l-futūḥāt al-rabbāniyya wa-dhikr al-sabab alladhī ḥamala ʿalā dhālik is the earliest chronicle of the Wahhābī movement detailing its expansion in Arabia. It begins with the events of 1159/1746 and ends abruptly with the events of 1212/1797, despite the fact that the author lived until 1225/1810. It is an invaluable source for the 18th century history of Arabia, which surpasses in wealth of detail Ibn Bishr's ʿUnwān al-madjd. It is curious that the latter author, though a Wahhābī, does not mention Ibn Ghannām's History. Close examination of the two texts, however, reveals that Ibn Bishr modelled his work, which carries the Wahhābī history down to 1851, on Ibn Ghannām's Ghazawāt (with the principal difference that Ibn Bishr does not digress to describe religious matters).

Ibn Ghannām's Ghazawāt was used extensively by H. St. J. Philby and other writers in western languages, e.g., Amīn al-Riḥānī, G. Rentz and R. B. Winder, in compiling their works on Arabia (cf. Bibl.).

IBN AL-GHARĀBĪLĪ [see IBN ḲĀSIM AL-GHAZZĪ].

IBN GHARSIYA, Abū ʿĀmir Aḥmad, Andalusian writer and poet, who spent his life at Denia in the service of the Slav (and former slave) Mudjāhid al-ʿĀmirī [q.v.], the ruler of this province from 400/1010 to 436/1044, and of his son ʿAlī Iḳbāl al-Dawla (436-68/1044-76). Both father and son had need of authors and poets to exalt the merits of the Slavs and to contest the alleged superiority of the other reyes de taifas of Arab origin; Ibn Gharsiya offered himself for this and, seizing the opportunity of an argument that had taken place between himself and a man of letters from Cordova called Abū Djaʿfar Aḥmad b. al-Djazzār (or al-Kharrāz according to Ibn Bashkuwāl, Ṣila, 9; Ibn al-Abbār, Takmila, 157, and al-Maḳḳarī, Analectes, ii, 280, 327), he wrote a violent, insulting and bitter risāla against the Arabs, glorifying the Slavs, the Rūm and all the non-Arabs (ʿadjam); this risāla is perhaps the only real manifestation of Shuʿūbiyya in Muslim Spain; it takes up all the arguments against the Arabs put forward by all the Shuʿūbīs of the East, and presents them in a complicated style. This work brought fame to Ibn Gharsiya and provoked a number of contemporary authors to draw up even more violent replies in favour of the Arabs. Ibn Bassām reproduced the risāla and some of its replies in the Dhakhīra (iii, MS coll. Gayangos de la Real Acad. de la Historia, Madrid, no. 12, fols. 120 ff.); the text with some replies can be found again in MS 538 of the Escorial.

Besides the risāla we have some verses by Ibn Gharsiya, reproduced by Ibn Saʿīd, in praise of Iḳbāl al-Dawla (also called Muʿizz al-Dawla). According to Ibn Saʿīd (Mughrib, ii, 406-7) and Yūsuf b. al-Shaykh al-Balawī (Alif bā', Cairo 1287, i, 350), Ibn Gharsiya was of Basque origin; having been taken prisoner in his childhood he was brought up in the Islamic faith. Although he was proud of his non-Arab origin he was a fervent Muslim, very much attached to the Arabic language. No further information has come to light about his life and work.

Bibliography: mentioned in the text. The Risāla was published for the first time by I. Goldziher with a study on the Shuʿūbiyya in Muslim Spain in his article: Die Šuʿūbiyya unter den Muhammedanern in Spanien, in ZDMG, 1898; ed. by ʿAbd al-Salām Hārūn, Cairo 1950, with the replies; ed. by Aḥmad Mukhtār al-ʿAbbādī in his essay: al-Ṣaḳāliba fī Isbānyā (publ. of the IEI Madrid), 1950, 31 ff. IBN AL-GHASĪL [see ʿABD ALLĀH B. ḤANẒALA].

IBN GHĀZĪ, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad al-ʿUthmānī, Moroccan scholar of the 9th/15th century, was born at Meknès in 858/1454 and died in 919/1513 at Fez, where his tomb may still be seen. Of his many works (full list in Chorfa, p. 230, n. 2) the most useful to present-day scholars is al-Rawḍ al-hatūn fī akhbār Miknāsat al-Zaytūn (Fez 1326/1908; partial tr. Houdas, Monographie de Méquinez, in JA, i (1885), 101-47).

IBN GHURĀB, Saʿd al-Dīn Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Razzāḳ (ca. 779/1377-808/1406), was for ten years during the reigns of Sultan Barḳūḳ and his son Faradj an important figure in the civilian bureaucracy of the Mamluk state. In his brief lifetime, Ibn Ghurāb typifies, in some ways, the precarious career of a Mamluk bureaucrat. His grandfather, Shams al-Dīn Ghurāb, was a Copt who, after conversion to Islam, served as Controller (nāẓir) of Alexandria, a post he passed on to his son ʿAlam al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Razzāḳ, the father of Ibrāhīm. From childhood Ibrāhīm was under the tutelage of the Majordomo (ustādār) of Sultan Barḳūḳ, Djamāl al-Dīn Maḥmūd, who took him to Cairo and later entered him into his household service. Ibrāhīm is held responsible for Maḥmūd's fall from favour, imprisonment and expropriation, receiving as a reward first the post of Controller of the Special Bureau (nāẓir al-dīwān al-mufrad), and shortly thereafter that of Controller of Privy Funds (nāẓir al-khāṣṣ) in 798/1396, when he was not yet 20 years old. His career continued to flourish during the remaining years of Sultan Barḳūḳ's reign. In 801/1399 he added the position of Controller of the Army (nāẓir al-djaysh) to his previous post and manoeuvred his less-talented older brother, Fak͟hr al-Dīn Mād̲j̲id (d. 811/1409), into the position of vizier. Owing to internal Mamluk squabbles after Barḳūḳ's death, Ibrāhīm and Mād̲j̲id were dismissed and imprisoned, then reinstated, but once again forced to flee Cairo during the year 802/1400. Reinstated once again in 803 as Majordomo, and adding the title of Emir of the Council (amīr mad̲j̲lis) in 804, Ibrāhīm was again in trouble a year later but recovered his political position to such an extent that within a short time he became the real power in the state (cf. Ibn Iyās, i, 347). He was named Privy Secretary (kātib al-sirr) and Head of the Advisory Council (ra'‌s mas͟hwara). Temporarily blocked during the two and a half month period in which Sultan Farad̲j̲ was deposed and his younger brother ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz reigned, Ibrāhīm was instrumental in returning Farad̲j̲ to the throne and was rewarded with the rank of Emir of the First Class. Shortly thereafter, he fell ill and died after a long illness, not yet thirty years old. At the time of his death he was referred to as "al-ḳāḍī al-amīr . . .".

The Arabic sources are sharply divided in their attitude towards Ibn G͟hurāb. His personal generosity, especially during the great plague of 807/1405, is highly praised by Ibn Tag͟hrībirdī (Manhal, i, 93) and Ibn Iyās (Ta'rīk͟h, i, 348), and his character is lauded (Ibn Tag͟hrībirdī, vi, 277), but he is also sharply denounced as having ruined the countryside by his rapacious levies (cf. ʿAlī Mubārak, al-K͟hiṭaṭ al-tawfīḳiyya, i, 43) and his manipulation of the price of gold (Maḳrīzī, K͟hiṭaṭ, ii, 420). His tomb in the desert north of Cairo still exists under the name of turbat al-S͟hayk͟h G͟hurāb (Bulletin du Comité de l'art arabe, Index Général, p. 61) and a k͟hānḳāh built by him in Cairo preserves a fragmentary inscription giving his titulary of the period 803-5/1401-3 (CIA, Egypte, i, 627).

IBN AL-HABBĀRIYYA, ABŪ YAʿLĀ AL-S͟HARĪF NIẒĀM AL-DĪN MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. ṢĀLIḤ AL-ʿABBĀSĪ AL-HĀS͟HIMĪ, Arab poet of the Sald̲j̲ūḳid period, a descendant of the ʿAbbāsid prince ʿĪsā b. Mūsā [q.v.], who is named after his maternal grandfather, a certain Habbār. He was born probably in Bag͟hdād (though it is also said that he was born in Ād͟harbayd̲j̲ān) before the middle of the 5th/11th century and followed the traditional pattern of study so thoroughly as to be included among the transmitters of ḥadīt͟h, but he could not bring himself to take an interest in theological discussions and preferred to spend his time in the night haunts of Ḳuṭrabbul [q.v.] in the company of wits and the gilded youth of the time; his frequenting of these places led him to an inclination for sexual perversions, as he himself admits in his verses. However, his great poetic talent, his incisive wit, and his mastery in the use of the Arabic language saved him from complete degeneration by leading him to devote himself to poetry. In order to obtain the money necessary for his life of pleasure he was forced to sing the praises of the great men of his day, at first of the D̲j̲ahīrids [see D̲J̲AHĪR] of Bag͟hdād. But his inclination for satire made him unsuited to this kind of servile flattery and he soon fell foul of his patrons; when, for example, the young Ibn D̲j̲ahīr became for the second time vizier of the caliph in 484/1091, he greeted this appointment with a biting satire which was soon on everyone's lips. His habit of attacking his contemporaries soon made him unbearable, and he was forced to go and try his fortunes in Iṣfahān, in the circle of Niẓām al-Mulk [q.v.], who finally admitted him to his entourage; by his tactlessness, however, he incurred the wrath of his patron, who, after having ordered his execution, finally pardoned him thanks to the intervention of the faḳīh Ṣadr al-Dīn Muḥammad al-K͟hus͟handī. He also enjoyed the patronage of Tād̲j̲ al-Mulk and of Mad̲j̲d al-Mulk, but a poem in which he expressed his rancour against all the important persons of the time—the caliph al-Muḳtadī (467-87/1075-94), Malikshāh (465-85/1072-92), Niẓām al-Mulk, and Tād̲j̲ al-Mulk himself—earned him so many enemies that after the assassination of Tād̲j̲ al-Mulk (in 486/1093), who had re-admitted him to his favour, he was forced to leave Iṣfahān and go, at a date unknown, to Kirmān; here he addressed his eulogies to the vizier Mukram b. al-ʿAlā' and particularly to the Sald̲j̲ūḳid Īrāns͟hāh [q.v.], who reigned there from 489 to 494/1096 to 1101. But it was to his former patron, Mad̲j̲d al-Mulk, that he dedicated, between 489 and 492, his verse rendering of Kalīla wa-Dimna entitled Natā'id̲j̲ al-fiṭna fī naẓm Kalīla wa-Dimna; and it was to the Mazyadid Ṣadaḳa b. Manṣūr that, after the foundation of al-Ḥilla (495/1101-2), he sent his other book al-Ṣādiḥ wa 'l-bāg͟him. At this time he had not left Kirmān, where he died probably in 509/1115-6 (rather than 504/1110-1) at a very advanced age (95 years, it is said).

Ibn al-Habbāriyya left a Dīwān which must have been very extensive, since it consisted of three or four volumes, but there remain only a few extracts from it, which have survived thanks to ʿImād al-Dīn al-Iṣfahānī (K͟harīdat al-Ḳaṣr, MS Leiden Or. 21a); the genres most fully represented are suk͟hf [q.v.], satire, and next panegyrics and love poetry. In the first two genres the poet imitates Ibn al-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ [q.v.], as ʿImād al-Dīn noticed, but he seems, like his model, to present a curious example of split personality, for he can on occasion compose more respectable poems and, what is more, set himself up as the preacher of a high moral standard. Ibn al-Habbāriyya is in fact the author not only of the verse rendering (in rad̲j̲az metre) of Kalīla wa-Dimna mentioned above (Bombay 1304/1886 and 1317/1899; Baʿabda (Lebanon) 1900, by Niʿmat Allāh al-Asmār, who took some liberties with the original text) but also of the Kitāb al-Ṣādiḥ wa 'l-bāg͟him, a collection of *urd̲j̲ūza*s totalling 2,000 verses and consisting first of an episodic story where a character in a tale tells in his turn another tale, then of animal stories inspired by Kalīla wa-Dimna, and finally of some moralizing passages; this work, on which the writer is said to have worked for ten years, is very popular in the East, where it has been published in three editions: Cairo 1292/1875-6, Beirut 1886, Cairo 1936. The Fulk al-maʿānī is a kind of anthology in 12 chapters consisting of anecdotes in prose and verse (see Sibṭ Ibn al-D̲j̲awzī, Mir'āt al-zamān, MS Paris 1505, 281a-284a; Barthold, in Zap. Vost. Otd. Imp. Ark͟h. Obč., xviii, 0144 ff.). Yāḳūt (Irshād, vi, 297) mentions in passing a K. al-Laḳā'iṭ, which was probably a work of lexicography. His urdjūza on chess formed part of the Ṣādiḥ; it is to be found at the end of the Paris manuscript of the Kharīdat al-ʿadjā'ib.

IBN AL-ḤABḤĀB [see ʿUBAYD ALLĀH B. AL-ḤABḤĀB].

IBN ḤABĪB, ABŪ MARWĀN ʿABD AL-MALIK B. ḤABĪB AL-SULAMĪ, Andalusian scholar claiming descent from the Arab family of Sulaym b. Manṣūr; he was born at Ḥiṣn Wāṭ (identified by Simonet with Huétor Vega), about 180/796 and died at Cordova in 238/853. He studied at Elvira and Cordova, and after he had made the pilgrimage and become acquainted with the doctrine of Mālik [q.v.] at Medina became one of his most ardent propagandists in Muslim Spain, where the school of al-Awzāʿī [q.v.] had dominated until then. By virtue of his exceptional erudition he became known as the scholar of Spain par excellence and was compared with Saḥnūn b. Saʿīd [q.v.], the famous jurist of Ifrīḳiya. According to his own account, his works numbered 1050, but of them none remain but an unpublished manuscript preserved in the Bodleian at Oxford, which, despite its antiquity, is of little value. This account, in which he mingles Biblical history with that of Muḥammad and the first Caliphs, the history of al-Andalus with theological questions, is full of fabulous material. Travellers from Spain, greeted in the East as ignorant rustics, accepted as historical truth Egyptian legends which spoke of a country of djinns, of enchanted palaces, of moving statues, and of devils imprisoned in boxes by Satan, such as are reproduced in the History of the conquests of Egypt and the Maghrib by the Egyptian Ibn ʿAbd al-Ḥakam [q.v.].

IBN ḤABĪB, BADR AL-DĪN ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-ḤASAN B. ʿUMAR AL-DIMASHḲĪ AL-ḤALABĪ AL-SHĀFIʿĪ (710/1310-779/1377), scholar and jurist, author of several historical, juridical, and poetic works, was born in Damascus. His father Zayn al-Dīn ʿUmar (663/1265-726/1326) was appointed Market-inspector (muḥtasib) and teacher of tradition in Aleppo, and the family moved to that city. In 733/1332 and again in 739/1338, Ibn Ḥabīb made the pilgrimage to Mecca and during these journeys visited Cairo, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Hebron. He held judicial posts in Aleppo such as Scribe of the Judiciary (kātib al-ḥukm) and Scribe of the Chancery (kātib al-inshā'). He became a well-known writer in his own lifetime. In 755/1354 he visited Tripoli, where he was honoured and rewarded by the Mamluk viceroy of that town, Mandjak al-Nāṣirī, who persuaded him to remain there for two years. In 759/1358, after Mandjak became viceroy of Damascus, he invited Ibn Ḥabīb to that city from his home in Aleppo and the scholar, once more the centre of attention and respect, remained there for three years before returning to Aleppo, where he lived until his death in 779/1377.

Of his many works, largely in the form of poetry or rhymed prose, only ten are known to be extant. By far the most famous of these is his history (in rhymed prose) of the Mamluk Empire from its beginning to his own time, 648/1250-777/1375, called Durrat al-aslāk fī dawlat (mulk) al-atrāk. His son, Zayn al-Dīn Ṭāhir, continued the work from 778 to 801 (1376-1399). In 1846 H. E. Weijers and A. Meursinge published the Introduction, the first year, and excerpts from succeeding years, primarily the valuable biographical notes. In 1913 P. Leander published the Introduction and the first eight years in full. Another work, Nasīm al-ṣabā, consisting of poetry and rhymed prose about nature and human existence, has been reprinted at least three times during the past century. Some of his other extant unpublished works are a history of princes and prophets from ancient times to his day, Kitāb al-Mushadjdjar fi 'l-ta'rīkh (see Rosenthal, Historiography[2], 97); a history of the Mamluk sultan Ḳalāwūn and his sons (Tadhkirat al-nabīh fī ayyām al-Manṣūr wa-banīh); a formulary for juridical decisions (Kashf al-murūṭ ʿan maḥāsin al-shurūṭ); and several collections of poetry, mostly in praise of the Prophet Muḥammad.

A most critical evaluation of his work as an historian comes from Ibn Taghrībirdī, who wrote (Nudjūm, v, 331): "He was the paragon of his age in the scribal art (insha') and in formulating judicial decisions (shurūṭ) ... His History is in radjaz-metre and is of little worth and quite inexact. I have, therefore, cited it only rarely. If a rhyme did not please him he would omit a datum. This is not my way of writing history".

IBN ḤABĪB, MUḤAMMAD [see MUḤAMMAD B. ḤABĪB].

IBN AL-ḤADDĀD, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD B. ʿUTHMĀN AL-ḲAYSĪ, Andalusian poet from Cadix (Wādī Āsh), whence his nisba, al-Wādī Āshī; Ibn al-Abbār, Takmila, 133, says that he was also called Māzin. He spent the greater part of his life at Almeria, as court poet to al-Muʿtaṣim (Muḥammad b. Maʿn b. Ṣumādiḥ, 443-90/1051-97). Towards 461/1068-9 he had to flee from Almeria and take refuge for some time in Saragossa in order to escape the wrath of Ibn Ṣumādiḥ, against whom he had written some satirical verses. Later he returned to Almeria where he remained till his death in 480/1088.

Ibn al-Ḥaddād was a poet, a prose writer and a scholar. His poetry is abundant, diverse, rich and full of agreeable images and subtle metaphors, but less so in his panegyrics than in his love poems. Well known among his poems are those dedicated to a Christian nun called Nuwayra who, according to Ibn Faḍl Allāh al-ʿUmarī (Masālik al-abṣār, Cairo 1924, i, 385), was a Coptic nun living in the convent of Rīfa, to the north of Asyūṭ, on the eastern bank of the Nile. Ibn al-Ḥaddād had seen her while going through Ḳūṣ to ʿAydhāb in order to embark for the Ḥidjāz; her beauty dazzled him to the extent that he forgot to make his pilgrimage and settled near the convent for a long time; she continued to inspire him long after his return to Spain. The odes addressed to Nuwayra are his best poetry. The dīwān of Ibn al-Ḥaddād was voluminous and the poems were even arranged in alphabetical order of the rhymes. He was particularly proud of a ḳaṣīda in sīn which he called ḥadīḳat al-ḥaḳīḳa (garden of truth) and of which we only possess two verses; they show his tendency to meditation and his liking for ḥikma poetry which he called falsafiyyātī (my philosophical poems). His prose is pedantic and encumbered with far-fetched images and expressions; most of the prose passages reproduced by Ibn Bassām show a deep unhappiness and a quarrelsome nature. Ibn al-Abbār attributes to him a work on prosody entitled al-Mustanbaṭ.

IBN ḤADJAR AL-ʿASḲALĀNĪ, Shihāb al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad b. Nūr al-Dīn ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, Egyptian ḥadīth scholar, judge, and historian (773-852/1372-1449), whose life work constitutes the final summation of the science of ḥadīth and makes him one of the greatest and, at the same time, most typical representatives of Muslim religious scholarship. He himself did not know the origin of his family name Ibn Ḥadjar. The nisba ʿAskalānī was considered by family tradition to go back to 587/1191, when Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn ordered ʿAskalān [q.v.] to be destroyed and its Muslim inhabitants resettled elsewhere. Ibn Ḥadjar's forebears went to Alexandria and eventually to Cairo, where Ibn Ḥadjar was born on 22 Shaʿbān 773/28 February 1372. His paternal grandfather seems to have been a cloth manufacturer in Alexandria. His father, who was in or approaching his fifties when Ibn Ḥadjar was born, had received a good legal training but had been forced to give up an incipient career in the judiciary. He was a devoted writer of occasional poetry. He published a collection of poetry in praise of the Prophet and the Sanctuary in Mecca as well as an urdjūza recounting those acts of divine grace of the holy man al-Ṣanāfīrī (d. 26 Shaʿbān 772/15 March 1371, cf. Durar, iv, 131 f.) which he had witnessed personally. He died on Wednesday, 23 (25) Radjab 777/19 December 1375. His son later remembered him only dimly "like some unreal phantom of the imagination" (cf. Durar, iii, 117, and Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, vi, 252 f.). Ibn Ḥadjar was now a full orphan, as his mother Tudjdjār had died earlier. It seems to have been Tudjdjār who brought additional wealth and connexions into the family. She belonged to a certain Ziftāwī family, and her brother was a Kārimī [q.v.] merchant. She had been married before to Shihāb al-Dīn Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Muhaymin, an adherent of Ibn al-ʿArabī's mystic philosophy, and she left a considerable fortune to her son from this marriage (Ḍawʾ, ii, 184); thus, she must have been of independent means.

Ibn Ḥadjar's father had another son from a previous marriage, who was a promising scholar but died young. Tudjdjār bore him a daughter born in Arabia on the pilgrimage and appropriately named Umm Muḥammad Sitt al-Rakb (b. Radjab 770/February 1369, d. Djumādā II 798/February-March 1396). She was three years older than her brother and was "my mother after my mother's death." She later married Muḥammad b. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz of the well-known Kharrūbī family of Kārimī merchants, whose maternal grandfather Nāṣir al-Dīn al-Bālisī represented another influential Kārimī family and who himself died in 833/1429-30 as a very wealthy man (Ḍawʾ, viii, 246 f.), although his father had managed to run through several fortunes and had died bankrupt (Ḍawʾ, vi, 92). For the young son, Muḥammad, and the daughter, Fawz, of Umm Muḥammad, their twenty-four year old uncle Ibn Ḥadjar solicited a number of idjāzas (cf. H. Ritter, in Oriens, vi (1953), 82, and Ḍawʾ, xii, 116). Another Kharrūbī, Zakī al-Dīn Abū Bakr b. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, who, starting out as a scholar, had become extremely wealthy and the head of his family through repeated inheritances (Durar, i, 450 f.), entered Ibn Ḥadjar's life upon the death of his father who had designated Zakī al-Dīn as the principal guardian of his son. In 784/1382-3, Zakī al-Dīn took the eleven-year old Ibn Ḥadjar on the Pilgrimage to Mecca (where he had already been once before with his father). He returned with him in 786 and died soon after, in Muḥarram 787/February 1385. He is supposed to have been a second cousin of the Kharrūbī who married Ibn Ḥadjar's sister.

Ibn Ḥadjar's background was that of long established mercantile wealth and of the kind of usually non-professional but very intense interest in religious learning that was characteristic of the Muslim upper middle classes. The loss of his parents meant no material deprivation for him (for instance, he was able to stay in the house in which he was born until he married). It seems to have had a somewhat retarding influence on his early education inasmuch as he went to school only when he was five. He had memorized the Ḳurʾān by the age of nine. The sojourn in Arabia with Zakī al-Dīn meant no interruption of his studies. These began in earnest after his return to Egypt and Zakī al-Dīn's death. According to the custom of the time, he recorded his studies in the minutest detail, with the names of all his teachers and the books he read, in a series of works, such as al-Muʿdjam al-mufahras (autograph Istanbul, Murad Molla 603, cf. Ritter, loc. cit.; important mss. in Cairo, muṣṭalaḥ al-ḥadīth 82, and in Leningrad, cf. V. Rosen, in Bulletin de l'Acad. Impér. des Sciences de St. Pétersbourg, xxvi (1880), 18-26, reprinted in Mélanges Asiatiques, viii (1881), 691-702), the Madjmaʿ al-muʾassas bi(li)-'l-Muʿdjam al-mufahras (Cairo, muṣṭalaḥ al-ḥadīth 75; M. Weisweiler, Istanbuler Handschriftenstudien, Leipzig 1937, no. 105), the Maḳāṣid al-ʿaliyyāt (ʿaliyya) fī fihrist al-marwiyyāt (al-kutub wa-'l-adjzāʾ al-marwiyya) (= ms. Berlin 10123; Y. al-ʿIshsh, Fihris Makhṭūṭāt Dār al-Kutub al-Ẓāhiriyya, Damascus 1366/1947, 310), and the Mashyakha (Istanbul, Feyzullah 534, cf. Ritter, loc. cit.), to which should be added his Tadhkira with the autograph *idjāza*s of his teachers (Istanbul, Aya Sofya 3139, cf. Ritter, loc. cit.). Another of Ibn Ḥadjar's guardians and early academic teachers, Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad b. ʿAlī Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭān, influenced the direction of his studies in an important respect. He introduced him to historical literature and stimulated his interest in the historical side of religious studies. When Ibn Ḥadjar decided to specialize in ḥadīth, Zayn al-Dīn al-ʿIrāḳī (d. 806/1404) became his principal teacher. He also seems to have profited greatly from his contact with ʿIzz al-Dīn Ibn Djamāʿa with whom he studied from 790/1388 until Ibn Djamāʿa's death in 819/1416. However, none of his teachers exercised upon him the overpowering influence which he himself came to exercise later on upon some of his students.

Ibn Ḥadjar took his first steps into scholarly ḥadīth research at the age of twenty. The decision to devote himself entirely to it came three years later, in 796/1393-4. In Shaʿbān 798/May 1396 his guardian and teacher, Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭān, arranged for him to marry a girl from a highly respected family, then about eighteen years old, Uns, a daughter of the Inspector of the Army (nāẓir al-djaysh) ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Aḥmad. On her mother's side, she was a great-granddaughter of a daughter of Mankūtimur, who had inaugurated the College named after him shortly before his death in 698/1298. Ibn Ḥadjar moved into the family mansion of his wife, where he lived until he died. There were later marriages, but no other wife of his was ever brought into the house to live with Uns under the same roof. Uns herself survived him by almost fourteen years (d. Rabīʿ I 867/November-December 1462, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 10 f.) He had spent the months preceding his marriage in Alexandria, in study and research, and the following year, in Shawwāl 799/July 1397, he left for the Ḥidjāz and the Yemen on a journey which extended into 801/1398. The year thereafter, he studied in Palestine and Syria. Although he later went on the Pilgrimage several times, re-visited the Yemen in 806/1403, and undertook a lecture and study tour of Syria in 836-7/1432-3 in the entourage of Barsbāy [q.v.], his student travels ended when he returned from Syria in 803/1400. The last years of the eighth century also saw the beginnings of his work as an author. His earliest recorded publication was a paper on prosody written in 795/1392-3. A laudatory book-notice (taḳrīẓ) on al-Damāmīnī's Nuzūl al-ghayth dating from the same year is quoted by al-Sakhāwī, Djawāhir, fol. 190a. Much of the poetry in his highly esteemed Dīwān (preserved in manuscript) was also the product of his younger years. Many of his large later works were conceived and begun during this period.

His professional career followed the usual pattern of lecturer, professor and head of college, and, finally, judge, with many other activities, such as those of muftī, preacher, and librarian, included. There were some minor annoyances as well as the customary frequent interruptions in his tenure of the judgeship, but otherwise his career proceeded smoothly toward ever growing fame and success. His lectures on ḥadīth started in Shawwāl 808/March 1406 in the Shaykhūniyya. Later on, he gave lectures .lso in the renovated Djamāliyya when it was opened in Radjab 811/November 1408, and in the Mankūtimuriyya (Djumādā II 812/October 1409). His principal academic association was with the Khānḳāh al-Baybarsiyya. He was installed as its head in control of both educational and administrative matters (mashyakha and naẓar) on 3 Rabīʿ I 813/6 July 1410. In 816/1413, he lost the position but was re-instated in Rabīʿ II 818/June 1415, to retain the position for almost thirty-one years until he was ousted on 20 Djumādā I 849/24 August 1445. He transferred his teaching activities to the Dār al-Ḥadīth al-Kāmiliyya, while all the time using his influence in attempts to regain control of the Baybarsiyya. On 2 Rabīʿ II 852/6 June 1448 his efforts were successful, and he taught again in the Baybarsiyya for the few remaining months before his final illness in Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda of the same year (January 1449). An improvement introduced during his administration of the Baybarsiyya was an alphabetical filing system for the beneficiaries of the institution, which was imitated by other colleges and by the Dīwān al-Djaysh. In addition to other lecturerships in ḥadīth and, occasionally, in tafsīr and fiḳh, Ibn Ḥadjar held the office of muftī in the Dār al-ʿAdl from 811/1408-9 until his death, and that of associate preacher and imām in the Mosque of al-Azhar and the Mosque of ʿAmr. In 826/1423, he took over the administration of the library of the Maḥmūdiyya with its approximately 4,000 valuable manuscripts. During his librarianship, which lasted until his death, he compiled two catalogues, one arranged alphabetically and the other according to topics.

A judgeship, which he did not accept, was offered to him in the Yemen in his early years. Reluctantly, he had been holding an associate judgeship in conjunction with Djalāl al-Dīn al-Bulḳīnī when his great opportunity came on 27 Muḥarram 827/31 December 1423 (Djawāhir: Saturday, 22 Muḥarram/Sunday, 26 December). He was dismissed for the first time less than eleven months later, but the office of Chief Judge of Egypt (and Syria) remained his for a combined total of about twenty-one years. He was re-instated on 2 Radjab 828/20 May 1425; dismissed on 26 Ṣafar 833/24 November 1429, and re-instated on 26 Djumādā I 834/9 February 1431; dismissed on 5 Shawwāl 840/12 April 1437, and re-instated on 6 Shawwāl 841/2 April 1438; dismissed in Muḥarram 844/June 1440, and re-instated on 26 Ṣafar 844/27 July 1440; dismissed on 15 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 846/17 March 1443, and re-instated after two days (followed by another even briefer period out of office in Rabīʿ I 848/June 1444); dismissed on 11 Muḥarram 849/19 April 1445 (after the collapse of a minaret with much loss of life, when attempts were made to hold the office of the Chief Judge responsible for the safety of the structure), and re-instated on 5 Ṣafar 850/2 May 1446; dismissed in Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 850/March 1447, and re-instated on 8 Rabīʿ II 852/11 June 1448. He lost the office finally on 25 Djumādā II 852/26 August 1448. A few months later, about an hour after the evening prayer in the night of Saturday, on 28 Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 852/Saturday, 22 February 1449, he died. His last will and testament, with a variety of individual bequests, has been preserved (Djawāhir, fols. 324b-325b; also ms. Istanbul, Reis ül-küttap 498, fols. 173b-175a). His physical appearance and his qualities of character as well as his religious and moral behaviour are described by his pupil al-Sakhāwī as completely conforming to the ideal standards of Islam, and there seem to have been few dissenting voices among his biographers, al-Biḳāʿī being a notable exception (cf. Ḍawʾ, i, 104 f.). He was a good chess player, and he seems to have remained fond of poetry throughout his life.

Amidst all the success and acclaim which he found as a scholar, teacher, and official, his family life was not free of great disappointments. His wife, Uns, bore him no living male children but only five daughters, and he survived all of them by many years. His eldest daughter, Zayn Khātūn (802-833/1399-1429/30, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 51), married a Mamlūk official, Shāhīn al-ʿAlāʾī (d. 860/1456, cf. Ḍawʾ, iii, 296). Their surviving son, Yūsuf (828-99/1425-93, cf. Ḍawʾ, x, 313-18; Brockelmann, S II, 76; F. Rosenthal, A history of Muslim historiography, Leiden 1952, 370), made something of a name for himself as a scholar, but he hardly fulfilled Ibn Ḥadjar's hope for a successor. He aroused al-Sakhāwī's ire by presuming to correct alleged mistakes in the work of his grandfather. The second daughter, Farḥa (804-28/1402-25, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 115), barely lived long enough to be married to Muḥibb al-Dīn Ibn al-Ashḳar (d. 863/1458-9). The third and fifth daughters, Ghāliya (807-19/1405-16, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 85) and Fāṭima (817-19/1414-16, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 88), did not even reach early maturity. The fourth, Rābiʿa (811-32/1408-28/29, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 34), was married at the age of fifteen to the elderly former judge Shihāb al-Dīn Ibn Maknūn, who died soon after (779-829/1377-1426, cf. Ḍawʾ, ii, 208); in a second marriage, she married the widower of her late sister Farḥa, Ibn al-Ashḳar. A Tatar (Turkish) slave girl of Uns, whom he removed from his house by subterfuge, gave Ibn Ḥadjar his only surviving son, Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad (b. 18 Ṣafar 815/30 May 1412, d. 16 Djumādā II 869/13 February 1465, cf. Ḍawʾ, vii, 20). There is good reason to suspect that he was not qualified for the scholarly positions in which his father tried to place him, nor was he a good administrator of either college finances or his own. Of Ibn Ḥadjar's marriages in his later years, that to Laylā bint Maḥmūd b. Ṭūghān (d. about eighty years old in 881/1476, cf. Ḍawʾ, xii, 123), contracted in Aleppo on his journey to Syria in 836/1432, lasted until his death.

Ibn Ḥadjar's enduring fame was earned by his numerous works mainly on the science of ḥadīth and covering its entire range. Their volume alone presupposes the expenditure of a staggering and almost incredible amount of time and labour. Only some of the most famous ones can be mentioned here. In his lifetime, he was most admired for his work on al-Bukhārī. He securely established his scholarly reputation in his early thirties when, in 804/1401-2, he completed the draft of, and three years later published a work on the *isnād*s of the Ṣaḥīḥ, entitled Taʿlīḳ al-Taʿlīḳ (Djawāhir, fol. 61a; Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ed. Flügel, i, 534 f., ed. Yaltkaya and Bilge, i, 552). The introduction to his great commentary on the Ṣaḥīḥ, entitled Fatḥ al-bārī (Brockelmann, S I, 262; Cairo 1959-63), was completed in 813/1410-11, and the commentary itself came gradually into being in lecture courses extending from 817/1414 to its final completion on 1 Radjab 842/18 December 1438. The fame of the work was so great that in 833/1429-30 the Timurid ruler of Fārs and Sidjistān, Shāh Rukh, asked Egypt's ruler Barsbāy to secure for him copies of the material published so far, as was done also by the Ḥafṣid Abū Fāris ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz from the other end of the Muslim world. Of Ibn Ḥadjar's large biographical dictionaries, al-Iṣāba fī tamyīz al-ṣaḥāba (Calcutta 1856-93) deals with the men around Muḥammad, and the Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb (clean-copied in part already in 807/1404-5, ed. Ḥaydarābād 1325-7) and the Lisān al-Mīzān (Ḥaydarābād 1329-31) with traditionists, the latter (finished in draft form in 847/1443-4) also including many men having very tenuous connexions with ḥadīth. The biographies of Egyptian judges, Rafʿ al-iṣr (Cairo 1957-61; a MS written by his grandson Yūsuf is preserved in Istanbul, Süleymaniye, Molla Çelebi 123), show Ibn Ḥadjar's literary interests in addition to his concern with his own position in history, while al-Durar al-kāmina fī aʿyān al-miʾa al-thāmina (Ḥaydarābād 1348-50), containing biographies of all the noteworthy individuals who died in the 8th/14th century, is the first of the all-inclusive centenary biographical collections. An annalistic supplement to the Durar, with the individual biographies arranged alphabetically within each year, was continued by Ibn Ḥadjar down to the year 832/1428-9 (ms. photo. Cairo, taʾrīkh 4767, possibly identical with the autograph known to al-Sakhāwī, Djawāhir, fol. 183b, as being in the possession of Ibn al-Lubūdī in Damascus). An annalistic history of noteworthy events from 773/1372, the year of his birth, to 850/1446 has the title Inbāʾ al-ghumr (cf. O. Spies, Beiträge zur arabischen Literaturgeschichte, in Abh. K. M., xix/3 (1932), 85-7; Hasan Habashi, Historical studies on the Inbāʾ al-Ghumr of Ibn Ḥajar, unpublished Ph. D. thesis, London 1955). Most of the above-mentioned works, and everything else he wrote, are admittedly to a large degree mechanical compilations; the bulk of their material (except for contemporary data) consists of excerpts from one or more similar compilations by earlier authors. However, Ibn Ḥadjar was extremely thorough and aimed at completeness. He was never quite satisfied with the amount of information he was able to gather. His approach was, within limits, critical. He always looked out for additional material with which to enrich and clarify the information furnished by his predecessors. In this spirit, he created handbooks of an enormous scope and laudable accuracy. They summarize practically all the earlier relevant literature and have remained indispensable reference works for present-day scholars.

IBN ḤADJAR AL-HAYTAMĪ, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥadjar, Shihāb al-Dīn, al-Haytamī (not al-Haythamī) AL-SAʿDĪ (after the Banū Saʿd in the Sharkiyya province of Lower Egypt, where his family was originally settled), a famous scholar and prolific writer of the Shāfiʿī school. On account of the lawlessness in Sharkiyya, an ancestor, who was nicknamed Ḥadjar because of his taciturnity, moved to the village of Maḥallat Abi 'l-Haytam in Gharbiyya province, and there Ibn Ḥadjar was born towards the end of the year 909/1504 (some say in Radjab, the month in which he was to die). While still a child, he lost his father and then his grandfather, but his father's teachers, Shams al-Dīn b. Abi 'l-Ḥamāʾil (d. 932/1526), a noted mystic, and Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Shanāwī, a disciple of this last, looked after his maintenance and education. Al-Shanāwī placed him in the sanctuary of Sayyid Aḥmad al-Badawī in Ṭanṭā and, after he had completed his elementary education there, sent him to the Azhar mosque in Cairo where he continued his studies from 924/1518, having a very hard time at first. His main teacher at the Azhar mosque was Zakariyyāʾ al-Anṣārī (d. 926/1520; Brockelmann, II, 122, S II, 117). Ibn Ḥadjar studied the usual branches of Islamic and Arabic learning, and also medicine; lists of his teachers, many of whom, beginning with Zakariyyāʾ al-Anṣārī, were disciples of Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAskalānī and of al-Suyūṭī [qq.v.], are found in the preface to his Fatāwā, in al-Nūr al-sāfir, and in *EI*¹. At the end of 929/1523, while he was not yet 20 years old, his teachers gave him on their own initiative the idjāza to give *fatwā*s and to teach. He married the niece of al-Shanāwī, at the suggestion of this last, in 932/1526, and performed the Pilgrimage in 933/1527, remaining in Mecca during the following year. During this stay in Mecca, he started writing on fikh, but not before Ḥārith al-Muḥāsibī [q.v.] had appeared to him in his sleep and encouraged him. When he was still a student, Ibn Ḥadjar had expressed his ambitions as an author on fikh in a Freudian dream which he himself related (preface to the Fatāwā). Having returned to Egypt, he made a second Pilgrimage in 937/1531, again followed by a year's sojourn in Mecca. After a third Pilgrimage in 940/1533, he settled there permanently and devoted himself to authorship and teaching. Although his reputation spread far and wide, his authority in Mecca was not entirely undisputed (see al-Fākihī, in Chroniken der Stadt Mekka, ed. Wüstenfeld, iii, 56 ff.), and he engaged in a series of vigorous polemics with Ibn Ziyād, the Shāfiʿī muftī of Zabīd (d. 975/1568; Brockelmann, II, 532, S II, 555). He died on 23 Radjab 974/3 February 1567 and was buried in the cemetery of Maʿlāt. He seems to have been quite untouched by the political upheavals occurring during his lifetime.

Ibn Ḥadjar's main work is his commentary on the Minhādj al-ṭālibīn of al-Nawawī [q.v.], called Tuḥfat al-muḥtādj li-sharḥ al-Minhādj; he began writing it on 12 Muḥarram 958/20 January 1551. With the Nihāya of al-Ramlī [q.v.], it became one of the two authoritative textbooks of the Shāfiʿī school, and it has often been printed. Whereas the followers of Ibn Ḥadjar (chiefly in Ḥidjāz, Yaman, Ḥaḍramawt and East Africa) and the followers of al-Ramlī had at first disputed fiercely with one another, the opinion finally prevailed that both were to be regarded as equally authoritative and indispensable expounders of the correct Shāfiʿī doctrine. Of almost equal importance are his *fatwā*s on fikh, al-Fatāwā al-kubrā al-fikhiyya, Cairo 1308, collected by one of his disciples; they include several lengthy treatises with separate titles, e.g. his two polemics against Ibn Ziyād; many of the *fatwā*s, and also, incidentally, some of Ibn Ḥadjar's other writings, are concerned with contemporary problems. One of these writings is al-Ṣawāʿiḳ al-muḥriḳa fi 'l-radd ʿalā ahl al-zaygh (or al-rafḍ) wa'l-zandaḳa, a defence of the legitimacy of the offices of the first four Caliphs against the claims of the Shīʿa; this work, completed in Shawwāl 950/January 1544, grew out of lectures which Ibn Ḥadjar gave, in answer to numerous requests, in the Great Mosque of Mecca; it had an immediate success, spread in a few years "in innumerable copies to the remotest countries", and has often been printed. Another is the Kaff al-raʿrāʿ ʿan muḥarramāt al-lahw wa'l-samāʿ, against music and games as practised in contemporary society. His Kitāb al-Zawādjir ʿan iḳtirāf al-kabāʾir (editio princeps Būlāḳ 1284) is the most important work in existence on the practical morality of Islam. Towards the end of his life, Ibn Ḥadjar in his Thabat (or Muʿdjam) gave an account of his teachers in traditions (ḥadīth) and their chains of authorities. For details on all this and other works, see Brockelmann.

IBN AL-ḤĀDJDJ, name of several persons, including in particular a famous Mālikī jurist, four grammarians, two Andalusian men of letters of the Naṣrid period and a poet and theologian who wrote a commentary on al-Sanūsī.

The Mālikī jurist was ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. MUḤAMMAD AL-ʿABDARĪ AL-FĀSĪ, born in Cairo in 737/1336. He is known especially for his Madkhal al-sharʿ al-sharīf, printed in Cairo in 1329. In it he appears as a scholar anxious to popularize his learning, as a jurist who was to a certain extent a director of conscience, being one who considered "knowledge" and "action" to be inseparable. He also based his work on the principles according to which "an act of worship without the exact intention cannot be in accordance with the Law", and he stated that "an act of worship consists of two parts: the first is the attitude of the body, the second the intention of the heart, but it is the second which is the more important". In this can be clearly seen the application of the principles of the Iḥyāʾ (he quotes al-Ghazālī, i, 12) to the Mālikī formalism which was very ready to identify, in the name of intention (niyya), the science of law with the analysis of spiritual matters.

Bibliography: Brockelmann, S II, 95; Bustānī, Dāʾirat al-maʿārif, ii, 428.

Among the grammarians was ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS B. MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD AL-AZDĪ AL-ISHBĪLĪ (d. 647 or 651/1249 or 1253). He was the author of a commentary on the Kitāb of Sībawayh, of an abridgement of the Mustaṣfā of al-Ghazālī, of a work on the imāmate, etc.; see al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 156.

SHĪTH B. IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. ḤAYDARA AL-KINĀWĪ AL-ḲIFṬĪ (d. 598 or 599 1002-3), was a poet, a wit and a traditionist as well as a grammarian. He was the pupil of Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī of Alexandria. He seems to have excelled in didactic poetry, which accorded particularly well with the wide extent of his learning. This specialist in adab and grammar, himself an eminent stylist, was the author of various treatises on philology as well as of a homily addressed to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. He also wrote on Māliki law (see Yāḳūt, Cairo ed., xi, 278); cf. al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 267.

Two 19th century grammarians were also called Ibn al-Ḥādjdj. They were ABU 'L-ʿABBĀS AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD AL-SULAMĪ (d. 1273/1856) and ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. ḤAMDŪN AL-SULAMĪ (d. 1274/1857). They both wrote commentaries on the classic al-Alfiyya (see Sarkīs, 70).

Among the Andalusians, ABU 'L-BARAKĀT MUḤAMMAD AL-BALĀFIḲĪ (d. 771/1370) was one of the persons who were most characteristic of his period. Mme. Soledad Gibert has written an exhaustive monograph on him in al-Andalus, xxvii (1963), 381-424. Ibn Djazarī considered him to be, in addition to his other talents, an outstanding "reader" of the Ḳur'ān (ed. Bergsträsser, no. 3391).

Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān b. Yaʿḳūb b. Saʿīd produced a poetic version of the little ʿAḳīda of al-Sanūsī [q.v.]; see Brockelmann, S II, 355; Bustānī, Dā'irat al-maʿārif ii, 428. (J.-C. VADET)

IBN AL-ḤĀDJDJ, ABŪ ISḤĀḲ IBRĀHĪM B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-NUMAYRĪ, Andalusian scholar and poet of the 8th/14th century. Born at Granada in 713/1313, he left Spain in 737/1337 and did not return until 759/1358, having during his absence made two journeys to the East and served as kātib under the Marīnids and Ḥafṣids. Until his death in about 785/1383 he held the office of ḳāḍī and undertook various ambassadorial missions for the Naṣrids.

Of his literary output, known by twenty titles, nothing is known to remain but fragments of verse scattered through various anthologies, biographical dictionaries, etc. This corpus has yet to be examined in detail. It is divided into three distinct groups and it is not firmly established that they are all by the same Ibn al-Ḥādjdj.

IBN AL-ḤADJDJĀDJ, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH AL-ḤUSAYN B. AḤMAD B. MUḤAMMAD B. DJAʿFAR B. MUḤAMMAD, a Shīʿī Arab poet in the time of the Būyids [q.v.]. Born in Baghdād in about 330/941-2, of a family of government officials and secretaries, he completed the traditional studies and was partly trained by Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm al-Ṣābi' (313-84/925-94 [see AL-ṢĀBI']) who made him take up an administrative career, but he very quickly perceived that his poetic talents could prove more profitable and resigned his post. At first he was connected with the vizier al-Muhallabī [q.v.] for whom he wrote a panegyric and a satire on al-Mutanabbī (see R. Blachère, Abou ṭ-Ṭayyib al-Motanabbî, Paris 1935, 224-5), and whose death (353/963) he lamented. He next attached himself to the viziers Abu 'l-Faḍl al-ʿAbbās al-Shīrāzī and Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Muḥammad b. al-ʿAbbās, for whom he acted as a kind of entertainer, and fell out with a ḥādjib of ʿIzz al-Dawla [q.v.] as a result of which he was committed to prison for a time. Shortly afterwards, on the strength of a poem addressed to the last-named, he succeeded in getting himself appointed muḥtasib of Baghdād, under the vizierate of Ibn Baḳiyya (362-6/973-7 [q.v.]) and even in resuming this position after being compelled to surrender it. At this period he also came in touch with Abu 'l-Fatḥ Ibn al-ʿAmīd [see IBN AL-ʿAMĪD, II] who greatly admired his poetry, and then received some kind of pension from Ibn ʿAbbād [q.v.] and profited from the bounty of the Būyid rulers; but it was principally the viziers and other eminent persons whose company he sought, living very familiarly with them and enjoying their protection and liberality, and this appears to have been his real objective. He even received 1,000 *dīnār*s from a Fāṭimid whom he eulogized and who feared his attacks. Thus, by the practice of what was perhaps a kind of blackmail, he succeeded in amassing a fortune, which he was clever enough to make still more productive, purchased estates, and even farmed the taxes in certain villages; in short, he became an influential man of affairs, and lived in prosperity until his death, which took place on one of his estates in Djumādā II 391/May 1001; he was buried in Baghdād at the feet of Mūsā al-Kāẓim [q.v.].

A muḥtasib and man of affairs, a family man devoted to his kin, such is one aspect of Ibn al-Ḥadjdjādj's personality; but there is another, entirely different one which leaps to the eye as soon as one begins to read his poetry, so different indeed that some have found it possible to speak of a dual personality. But his poetry, very extensive since his Dīwān comprised ten volumes, also presents itself in two contradictory aspects: on the one hand, Ibn al-Ḥadjdjādj wrote mediocre and traditional panegyrics, following the neo-classical line; on the other hand, and of greater importance, he made himself the champion of a new type of poetry characterized by what he himself called sukhf [q.v.], giving to this term the sense of obscenity in scurrilous and vulgar language, lewdness, insolent grossness, cynical and aggressive non-conformism; sexuality and scatology are the basic features of this poetry, which respects nothing, neither Islam, nor the most honourable personages, nor even the poet himself. This sukhf is either the sole component of a short piece, or else one of the elements of a poem apparently serious. In Ibn al-Ḥadjdjādj there are thus two men, two poets, even two styles; in the traditional poetry, the expression is polished, the resources of badīʿ are called into play, while in the sukhf the poet abandons himself to his inspiration and does not hesitate to use gutter slang, which gives his work a completely original flavour and makes him the master of the genre; an innovator, he had scarcely any rivals, and Ibn al-Habbāriyya [q.v.], who might come to mind, is far from possessing his verve.

The Dīwān of Ibn al-Ḥadjdjādj has always been very much sought after, to the point that certain authorities have had to forbid the reading of it (see Machriq, x, 1085), but it has not yet been published, despite the existence of a complete manuscript in Baghdād, in the Library of Waḳfs; other libraries possess odd volumes (Dār al-kutub, Cairo, Adab 7342, Maktaba Taymūriyya, 468, 606, 657; Brit. Mus. Or. 4591, Add. 7588; Göttingen, ar. 76). His contemporary and friend al-Sharīf al-Raḍī (d. 406/1116 [q.v.]) had made a selection of serious poems under the title al-Naẓīf min al-sakhīf, while al-Asṭurlābī (d. 534/1139-40) had concerned himself more particularly with the sukhf; his collection entitled Durrat al-tādj fī shiʿr Ibn al-Ḥadjdjādj (MS Paris B.N., 5913) copied and glossed by Ibn al-Khashshāb [q.v.] was the subject of an unpublished work, presented as a thèse complémentaire at the Sorbonne in 1953, by ʿAlī Āl-Ṭāhir who introduced it with a study on Ibn al-Ḥadjdjādj. Finally, Ibn Nubāta al-Miṣrī (686-768/1287-1366 [q.v.]) also made a selection of poems under the title Laṭāʾif al-taltīf (MS Copenhagen, 260).

IBN AL-ḤĀDJIB, Djamāl al-Dīn Abū ʿAmr ʿUthmān b. ʿUmar b. Abī Bakr al-Mālikī, Māliki faḳīh and grammarian who owes his popular name to the fact that his father, a Kurd, was chamberlain (ḥādjib) to the amīr ʿIzz al-Dīn Mūsak al-Ṣalāḥī. He was born at Asnā, a village in Upper Egypt, after 570/1174-5. He studied the Islamic sciences in Cairo with great success, particularly with al-Shāṭibī and Muḥammad al-Ghaznawī. After that, at least for some years, he must have lived and taught in Cairo, as is shown by the Amālī dated from that town, the earliest in 609/1212-3, the latest in 616/1219-20. Ibn Ḳāḍī Shuhba (401) places his departure for Damascus in 617/1220-1; this is also the earliest date for the Amālī from that town. In Damascus, Ibn al-Ḥādjib taught in the Mālikī zāwiya of the Great Mosque. A dispute with the Ayyūbī Ismāʿīl al-Ṣāliḥ led to his expulsion from the town (639/1241-2 in Brockelmann, I², 367; 638/1240-1 in Ibn Ḳāḍī Shuhba, 401). He returned to Cairo, and then went to settle in Alexandria, but died there shortly afterwards on Thursday 26 Shawwāl 646/11 February 1249. Among his pupils we find Ibn al-Munayyir, one of the masters of Abū Ḥayyān al-Gharnāṭī.

Ibn al-Ḥādjib earned a reputation as a Mālikī faḳīh, but he is primarily known as a grammarian (naḥwī); as a jurist, he was the first to combine in his writings the doctrines of the Egyptian Mālikīs with those of the Mālikis of the Maghrib; as grammarian, his general method was one that had already been long practised—résumé and commentary. But he mastered his material to the point of being able to condense it into two very short works, al-Shāfiya for ṣarf (morphology treated in the Arab manner) and al-Kāfiya for naḥw (syntax). These two short works enjoyed very great fame and made the reputation of Ibn al-Ḥādjib. They provided material for a host of commentators. Moreover, by separating ṣarf and naḥw, here going beyond the Mufaṣṣal of al-Zamakhsharī, he returned to the tradition of Ibn Djinnī and al-Māzinī.

Works: (1) al-Shāfiya, printed several times, notably in Cairo. Ibn al-Ḥādjib naturally produced a commentary on it (mentioned by Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, iv, 3). Of the numerous commentaries, the best is that of Raḍī ʾl-Dīn al-Astarābādhī. A very convenient edition, based on an old manuscript, has been produced in Cairo (1358/1939), 3 vols, plus one vol. for the Sharḥ shawāhidi by ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Baghdādī. (2) al-Kāfiya, printed for the first time in Rome in 1592; since then, many times, in Delhi, Cawnpore, Calcutta, Tashkent, Istanbul and Būlāḳ. Of the very numerous commentaries (among them that of the author, published in Istanbul 1311), the best is again that of Raḍī ʾl-Dīn al-Astarābādhī. This last has been published several times; the edition to be most recommended seems to be that of Istanbul 1275, 2 vols. But there is still no really convenient edition of this remarkable work, such as that of the Sharḥ on the Shāfiya referred to above.—On the commentaries and existing MSS, see Brockelmann, I², 367-8, S I, 531-5. (3) al-Amālī: his oral teaching, dictated to his hearers or to his son al-Mufaḍḍal. Brockelmann here distinguishes two series, including different dates (unpublished; MSS: I², 371-2, S I, 537): (a) on the Ḳurʾān, al-Mutanabbī and other poets, etc. (b) on some passages from the Ḳurʾān and especially on the Mufaṣṣal of al-Zamakhsharī. (4) al-Ḳaṣīda al-muwashshaḥa bi ʾl-asmāʾ al-muʾannatha, a versified enumeration (in Kāmil) of feminine nouns without a feminine termination; published in A. Haffner and L. Cheikho, Dix anciens traités de philologie arabe (2nd ed., Beirut 1914), 157; reproduced in Dāʾirat al-maʿārif of F. A. al-Bustānī, ii, 1958, 426. (5) Risāla fi ʾl-ʿushr, on the forms of the adjectives awwal and ākhir used with ʿushr "a tenth"; in MS, Berlin, 6894. (6) Sharḥ al-Muḳaddima al-Djuzūliyya; in MS, Fās, Ḳarawiyyīn (see Brockelmann, S I, 539 and 541). (7) K. al-Maḳṣad al-djalīl fi ʿilm al-khalīl: an account of Arabic prosody, versified (in the Basīṭ metre); in manuscript in several libraries (Brockelmann, I², 371, S I, 537); moreover (ibid.) references to the manuscripts of seven commentators. Freytag published this Arabic prosody in verse (334-43), with German translation, in his Darstellung der arabischen Verskunst (Bonn 1830). (8) An ʿAḳīda: profession of Muslim faith; in MS (Brockelmann, S I, 539; for correction, Esc.² 1561, 6). (9) Iʿrāb baʿḍ āyāt min al-Ḳurʾān al-ʿaẓīm, in manuscript at Aleppo, in the ʿUthmāniyya madrasa (and not in Mecca); see MMIA, xii, 470 and 471 foot. (10) Muntahā ʾl-suʾāl wa ʾl-amal fī ʿilmay al-uṣūl wa ʾl-djadal: a treatise on the sources of law according to the Mālikī school; in manuscript (Brockelmann, I², 372 and S I, 537). Ibn Ḥādjib made extracts from it: ʿUyūn al-adilla (MS, Paris, 5318) and an abridgement, Mukhtaṣar al-Muntahā fi ʾl-uṣūl (numerous MSS, Brockelmann, ibid.). This Mukhtaṣar was the subject of numerous commentaries (and then of glosses on the commentaries, and super-glosses; see ibid.). It has been published (Būlāḳ 1316-9), with the Commentary of ʿAḍud al-Dīn al-Īdjī (al-ʿAḍudiyya), and different glosses; also published, Cairo 1326. (11) al-Mukhtaṣar fi ʾl-furūʿ or Djāmiʿ al-Ummahāt or simply al-Mukhtaṣar al-farʿī (titles as given by Muḥ. Ben Cheneb, in EI¹, s.v. Ibn al-Ḥādjib). This compendium of Mālikī law is still in manuscript (see Brockelmann, I², 373 and S I, 538-9). It was commented on (al-Tawḍīḥ) by Khalīl b. Isḥāḳ al-Djundī (Sīdī Khalīl in Algeria) who, in regard to law, looked on Ibn al-Ḥādjib as his model; also in manuscript, as are the glosses (see Brockelmann, ibid.).

IBN ḤĀDJIB, ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Nuʿmān, called Ibn Ḥādjib al-NUʿMĀN, secretary, anthologist and wit of the Būyid period (340-423/951-1031). He came of a family of viziers and secretaries which was particularly in favour with the Būyids of Iran, who were probably the authors of his success. He also served the caliphs al-Tāʾiʿ and al-Ḳādir. He was a bitter rival of Abu ʾl-ʿAlāʾ ibn Turayk, who at one time succeeded in supplanting him at the court of al-Ḳādir. He had a very wide knowledge of literature. According to the Fihrist, 116, he compiled a sort of anthology of the court poets, including viziers, secretaries and men of letters (from the Barmakids to his own period). Combining worldly tact with the polished learning of a man of letters, having only minor responsibilities which did not interfere with his life of cultured leisure, a "connoisseur" in both pleasure and adab, Ibn Ḥādjib was an example of the many dilettantes who at that time frequented the ʿAbbāsid and Būyid courts.

IBN AL-ḤAḌRAMĪ, ʿAbd Allāh b. ʿAmr (or ʿĀmir) b. al-Ḥaḍramī, an agent of Muʿāwiya who is remembered for an incident in 38/658, during the period which followed the battle of Ṣiffīn [q.v.] and the arbitration. After the occupation of Egypt by ʿAmr b. al-ʿĀṣ [q.v.], Muʿāwiya, turning his attention towards ʿIrāḳ, realised that he had to begin with Baṣra, where he could count on more adherents than in Kūfa. After consulting ʿAmr, he then decided to send Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī to Baṣra and gave him precise instructions: his agent was to base his propaganda on the recent successes of the Umayyads and the doleful memories of the Battle of the Camel [see djamal]; he was to distrust the Rabīʿa (ʿAbd al-Ḳays), win the friendship of the Azd and rely on the Muḍarīs (Tamīm) in order to secure acceptance of the arbitration and to try to withdraw the town from ʿAlī's authority. In fact, the Baṣrans were very divided, and their chief concern was to live in peace. Thus, from the time of his arrival, Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī encountered very strong opposition, and the neutrality of al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays [q.v.] was not unconnected with his final failure. Nevertheless he succeeded in rallying part of the inhabitants who were ready to "avenge the blood of ʿUthmān", to such good effect that the temporary governor, Ziyād b. Abīhi, was terrified and had to abandon the dār al-imāra to seek refuge with the Azd. Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī's supporters then tried to seize the governor's residence, but al-Aḥnaf intervened and order was temporarily restored. It was at that point that ʿAlī sent to Baṣra Aʿyan b. Ḍubayʿa al-Mudjāshiʿī, who, after a day during which the opposing groups had not been sufficiently inflamed for any fighting to break out, was assassinated, probably by the Khāridjīs. The lack of enthusiasm of the Azd, who refused to fight, delayed events still further, but the situation developed after the arrival of Djāriya b. Ḳudāma [q.v.], sent by ʿAlī. While the Azd were trying to bring Ziyād back to the dār al-imāra, Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī started to fight, but he was beaten and compelled to take refuge in the house of a certain Sunbīl who had given him hospitality at the time of his arrival. Djāriya, following up his advantage, surrounded and set fire to Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī's hiding-place, and he and his companions perished. Muʿāwiya, his hopes disappointed, had to wait until 41/661, when at last Baṣra was brought under his authority, through the energetic intervention of Busr b. Abī Arṭāt [q.v.].

IBN ḤAMĀDU (Ibn Ḥammād), Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥammād b. ʿĪsā b. ʿAbī Bakr al-Ṣanhādjī, a Berber ḳāḍī and historian related to the Banū Ḥammād [q.v.] and a native of a village near their Ḳalʿa [q.v.]. After studying at the Ḳalʿa and in Bougie, he was ḳāḍī of Algeciras and Salé (unless there is some confusion on the part of the writer of the Mafākhir al-Barbar (65), who gives him the kunya of Abu ʾl-Ḥasan, he was also ḳāḍī of Azammūr in 616/1219), and he died in 628/1231.

His Kitāb al-Nubadh al-muḥtādja fī akhbār mulūk Ṣanhādja bi-Ifrīḳiya wa-Bidjāya, which was used by several later historians, in particular Ibn Khaldūn (ʿIbar, vii, 43) and the anonymous author of the Mafākhir al-Barbar (ed. E. Lévi-Provençal, Rabat 1934, 51), appears to be lost, but there survives his short history of the ʿUbaydids, written in 617/1220 and preserved in manuscript in Paris (Bibl. Nat.,1868) and Algiers (1988, 3); it was first translated in part by Cherbonneau (in JA, 1862, ii, 470 ff., 1869, i, 199 ff.), and later was edited and translated in full by M. Vonderheyden (Histoire des rois ʿobaïdites, Algiers-Paris 1927). Ibn Ḥamādu also wrote poems, some specimens of which have been preserved by al-Tidjānī (Riḥla, ed. Ḥ. Ḥ. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, Tunis 1377/1958, 116-7).

This Ibn Ḥamādu should not be confused with his homonym Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Ḥamādu al-Burnūsī al-Sabtī who lived in the 6th/12th century and was the pupil of the ḳāḍī ʿIyāḍ [q.v.]; he is the author of a Kitāb al-Muḳtabis fī akhbār al-Maghrib wa ʾl-Andalus, now lost.

IBN ḤAMĀMA [see bilāl b. rabāḥ].

IBN ḤAMDĪS, ʿAbd al-Djabbār Abū Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Azdī, Arab poet of Muslim Sicily. From the date of his death (527/1132-3) and some verses in which he refers to himself as an octogenarian, it may be deduced that he was born, at Syracuse, in about 447/1055, i.e., just before the Christian conquest of the island, which was begun in 1060 and completed by the joint action of Robert and Roger d'Hauteville, called to Sicily by Ibn al-Thumna [q.v.], amīr of Catania.

Practically nothing is known of the period of his youth, which the poet must have spent in Sicily, but judging from allusions in his poems (Dīwān, ed. C. Schiaparelli, nos. 27, 110, 127, 157, 269, etc.) to revels and deep drinking, it seems to have been a gay one. And even allowing for the conventional use of these poetic motifs, which are found in almost all Bacchanalian Arabic poetry, one thing is clear: the poet's sincere nostalgia for certain places on the island, objects of his longing, whose location remains unknown to us apart from Syracuse and Noto, which are occasionally mentioned in his poems.

Nor is it known whether the poet took part in some of the battles against the Normans before he left Sicily for Spain in 471/1078-9. At Seville he was received at the court of the prince al-Muʿtamid Ibn ʿAbbād (Dīwān, 344), who attracted to himself poets and men of letters. In this first exile he was fortunate to live in a literary circle of which the prince was the patron and animating spirit, to take part in the gay life of the ʿAbbādid capital, and to follow the political and military events of that time, which are reflected, joyful or sad according to the circumstances, in some of his *ḳaṣīda*s. In this connexion should be mentioned the two works (Dīwān, nos. 277 and 283) in which Ibn Ḥamdīs celebrates the exploits of al-Muʿtamid at the famous battle of al-Zallāḳa [q.v.] in 479/1086, in which the Almoravids and the Andalusians were allied against the Christians under Alfonso VI.

When, following the conquest of his capital by the Almoravids (August 1091), al-Muʿtamid left Seville, Ibn Ḥamdīs left for Ifrīḳiya and the Maghrib; he then appears sometimes in Aghmāt, where the defeated prince was a prisoner (an occasion which gives rise to a touching exchange of verses between the two, Dīwān, nos. 152, 153 and 335), sometimes with the Zīrids of al-Mahdiyya or at Bidjāya, where the Ḥammādid al-Manṣūr b. Aʿlāʾ al-Nās (483-97/1090-1104) had settled with his troops and his court; it is one of the palaces built by this prince to which the poet's ḳaṣīda no. 347 refers.

Ibn Ḥamdīs had not yet left Tunisia at the time of the failure of the expedition mounted by Roger II of Sicily against al-Mahdiyya, which was placed under the command of George of Antioch. This was in July 1123: the Norman fleet was overtaken by a storm, with the result that only part of the troops reached the African shore; after an initial success the Normans were surrounded and massacred. For the poet the moment of exultation had arrived: fate had given him the joy of knowing that the Normans, who had overrun his "native land of Sicily", had been crushed by the Muslims, and the poet, though now almost 70, still found the energy to sing of their exploits (Dīwān, no. 143).

The exact place where Ibn Ḥamdīs died is not known: to judge from the remarks which precede the ḳaṣīda no. 301, it was Bidjāya, or, more probably, on the island of Majorca in 527/1132-2.

The poetical works of Ibn Ḥamdīs collected in his Dīwān, of which two manuscripts exist, consist of: some *ḳaṣīda*s of Sicilian inspiration, the principal themes of which are nostalgia for his birthplace and exhortations to his fellow citizens of Sicily to resist the Normans (Dīwān, nos. 75 and 270); poetic epistles and elegies (Dīwān, nos. 245, 297, 330, etc.); panegyrics, or occasional poems made for the *amīr*s, ministers and other personalities of the period with whom he came in contact: the ʿAbbādid al-Muʿtamid (Dīwān, nos. 86, 88, 101, 120, 127, etc.) and his son al-Rashīd (Dīwān, no. 58), the Zīrids Yaḥyā b. Tamīm (Dīwān, nos. 33, 34, 62, 132, 218, 228, etc.), ʿAlī b. Yaḥyā (Dīwān, nos. 63, 64, 134-41), al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī (Dīwān, nos. 35, 142-4), the Ḥammādid al-Manṣūr (Dīwān, nos. 284 and 314); sententious moralizing and didactic *ḳaṣīda*s, or those expressing various states of the poet's soul (especially Dīwān, nos. 188, 189, 193, 220 and 238); Bacchic compositions (Dīwān, nos. 56 and 57), and finally a large number of *ḳaṣīda*s, or rather fragments, to be classified under the heading of waṣf, which are mainly about Sicily and Andalusia, or various subjects such as nature, war, animals, hunting, etc. (Dīwān, nos. 3, 6, 17, 21, 23, 31, 81, 116, 161). Ibn Ḥamdīs declares (Dīwān, no. 328) his aversion for satire and indeed no poems of hidjāʾ are found in the Dīwān.

Ibn Ḥamdīs's style and his use of poetic language are both unequal: in his poems, together with great verbal and syntactical simplicity, is found the frequent use of an excessively precious vocabulary and of constructions which are merely tricks of paronomasia and alliteration, puns used to mask the poverty of the thought behind them. In this respect it is fairly clear that Ibn Ḥamdīs succumbed to the charm, or rather the fashion, of the poetical neo-classicism represented by al-Mutanabbī, under whose influence the poet came, especially in panegyric; but his real poetic talent is seen more often in the descriptive fragments, which may have been influenced by the Andalusian poetic environment.

Bibliography: The first scholar to be interested in Ibn Ḥamdīs was M. Amari, who in his Biblioteca arabo-sicula (Arabic text, Leipzig 1857; Ital. tr., Turin 1881-2) published a certain number of poems relating to Sicily, and in his *Storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia*², Catania 1933-9, ii, 592-602 collected information on the poet's life from different sources. Later, the whole of the Dīwān was edited, on the basis of the two surviving manuscripts, by C. Schiaparelli (Rome 1897) who prepared a complete Italian translation of it, which remains unpublished. A new edition, based on only one of the manuscripts (that of the Vatican) and with a certain number of emendations, was published at Beirut in 1960, by Iḥsān ʿAbbās, who was able to add to the first edition of the Dīwān about 100 verses from various sources. Translations into European languages of verses of Ibn Ḥamdīs are found in: A. von Schack, Poesie und Kunst der Araber in Spanien und Sicilien, Berlin 1855, ii, 16-33; L. IBN ḤAMDŪN, name of the members of the family of the Banū Ḥamdūn, a line of "boon-companions" (nudamāʾ) of the caliphs, who flourished mainly in the first half of the 3rd/9th century. A great deal of information is available on Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Dāwūd b. Ḥamdūn, a contemporary of the caliphs al-Muʿtaṣim, al-Wāthiḳ and al-Mutawakkil, but very little on the other members of the family. Unfortunately the Arabic sources, accepting the claims of the Banū Ḥamdūn to noble descent, have endowed them with a disproportionately long genealogical tree in which it is difficult to distinguish the fictitious persons from those who really existed. This is why Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm is given successively, in Yāḳūt, the names of Ibn Ḥamdūn and Ḥamdūn. The Fihrist mentions a "family of the Ḥamdūn" (Āl Ḥamdūn) in which it does not attempt to distinguish the various members. Ibrāhīm b. Ḥamdūn, again according to Yāḳūt, was also called Ibn Ḥamdūn. Finally, Ismāʿīl is referred to sometimes as the father of Ḥamdūn (Ḥamdūn b. Ismāʿīl) and sometimes as the grandfather of Aḥmad. When allowance is made for this genealogical pride of the "boon-companions", whose position made them the equal of favourites, scribes and even viziers, in matters concerning more particularly the Banū Ḥamdūn the following facts may be accepted: there existed originally an ancestor Ḥamdūn (isnād: Ḥamdūn → ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Naṣr of the Aghānī). This Ḥamdūn was certainly at the court of the caliph al-Rashīd. He was succeeded in office by his son or grandson, Aḥmad, who experienced changes in fortune under al-Mutawakkil, who, with his fickle moods, subjected him to some very strange treatment. His ear was cut off on the caliph's orders; certain manifestations of his artistic sensibility led to his being exiled for long periods in Ahwāz or Sind. From the tangled biographical history of the Banū Ḥamdūn there may be obtained an idea of the duties which devolved on the "boon-companions" of the ruler: to show appreciation of the merits of the court poets or favourites, to take part in their master's hunting parties, and to serve, on occasion, as the agent of those in power (cf. the connexion between Aḥmad and the vizier Fatḥ b. Khāḳān; the secret message sent from the ruler to Aḥmad during a riot in Baghdād). All these small details of life at court give the Banū Ḥamdūn a minor place in the history of Arabic literature.

IBN ḤAMDŪN, ABU 'L-MAʿĀLĪ MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤASAN, the author of a vast and highly informative collection dealing with a great variety of adab subjects and entitled al-Tadhkira, which enjoyed much popularity during the Mamlūk period. Born in Radjab 495/April-May 1102 as one of the sons of an official well versed in financial and administrative matters, of a family which claimed to be related to the Ḥamdānids' ancestor Ḥamdūn, he entered government service, attaining the offices of ʿāriḍ al-ʿaskar (Inspector of the Army) under al-Muktafī and ṣāḥib dīwān al-zimām (Director General of Internal Revenue, Minister of Finance) under al-Mustandjid. He did not occupy the latter post for very long. He was thrown into prison, where he died at the beginning of the year 562/October-November 1166 (but Ibn Khallikān reports also a later date, Tuesday, 11 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda/29 August 1167). Family tradition indicated as the reason for his imprisonment the caliph's discovery of passages in the Tadhkira that he considered disrespectful to the government and dynasty, even though Ibn Ḥamdūn had been very circumspect in his writing, as his son Abū Saʿd al-Ḥasan told his friend Yāḳūt; Abū Saʿd (547-608/1152-1211), a great bibliophile who later in his life became impoverished, therefore refrained from publishing anything he wrote.

Bibliography: Al-Kātib al-Iṣfahānī, Kharīda (ʿIrāḳī section), Baghdād 1375/1955, i, 184 f.; Ibn al-Djawzī, Muntaẓam, x, 221 f.; Ibn al-Dubaythī, al-Mukhtaṣar al-muḥtādj ilayhi, Baghdād 1371/1951, 33; Ibn Khallikān, no. 626, and later authors; further, Brockelmann, I, 333, S I, 493. For the biography of his son Abū Saʿd, cf. Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, iii, 215-17 (important correction in the Cairo ed., ix, 187), for those of his brothers, Abū Naṣr Muḥammad and Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Naṣr, see Ibn al-Fuwaṭī, Talkhīṣ Madjmaʿ al-ādāb, Baghdād 1962-, iv, 1161-3 and 1166 f. With the exception of Book Two of the Tadhkira (Cairo 1345/1927, al-Rasāʾil al-nādira, 3), containing material on politics in the fürstenspiegel tradition, only small passages of the work have been published from time to time.

IBN ḤĀMID, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH AL-ḤASAN B. ḤĀMID, killed in 403/1012 by Bedouins on his return from the Pilgrimage to Mecca, is one of the most prominent Ḥanbalī scholars of Baghdād under the Būyids. Among his teachers of ḥadīth or fiḳh were several famous traditionists or jurisconsults, such as Abū Bakr al-Nadjdjād (d. 348/959) and Abū Bakr al-ʿAzīz (d. 363/973), better known under the name of Ghulām al-Khallāl [q.v.].

In addition Aḥmad b. Sālim al-Khatlī taught him the Mukhtaṣar of al-Khiraḳī (d. 363/973), which was to form part of the education of many generations of Ḥanbalī jurisconsults. Ibn Ḥāmid's main career was as a teacher; he is said to have enjoyed a certain esteem with the caliph al-Ḳādir (d. 422/1031) but he refrained from taking any active part in the political life of his time.

His biographers attribute to him a large number of works which appear today to be lost. The most famous is his Kitāb al-Djāmiʿ fi 'khtilāf al-fuḳahāʾ, which seems to have been an outline of Ḥanbalī doctrine within the framework of an exposition of the divergences of the various schools. He also wrote a commentary (sharḥ) on the Mukhtaṣar of al-Khiraḳī, which was for long regarded as authoritative. Two others of his works are often mentioned in the literature of his school, one on dogmatic theology (uṣūl al-dīn), the other on legal methodology (uṣūl al-fiḳh).

Among the best-known pupils of Ibn Ḥāmid may be mentioned the following: Abū Bakr al-Rawshanānī (d. 401/1011), who was also a pupil of Ibn Baṭṭa al-ʿUkbarī (d. 387/997); Abū Isḥāḳ al-Barmakī (d. 445/1054), a specialist in the law of inheritance; Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Fuḳāʿī (d. 424/1033), who taught in the mosque of al-Manṣūr; Abū Ṭālib Ibn al-Baḳḳāl (d. 440/1048), known as a jurisconsult and controversialist; and finally, and most important, the ḳāḍī Abū Yaʿlā ibn al-Farrāʾ (d. 458/1066), who succeeded Ibn Ḥāmid as a teacher and soon became recognized as the main teacher of Ḥanbalism in Baghdād in the first half of the 5th/11th century.

IBN ḤANBAL [see AḤMAD B. ḤANBAL].

IBN HĀNIʾ AL-ANDALUSĪ, MUḤAMMAD B. HĀNIʾ B. SAʿDŪN AL-ANDALUSĪ, famous court poet of the Banū Ḥamdūn, rulers of Masīla, and of the fourth Fāṭimid caliph, al-Muʿizz li-dīn Allāh; he belonged to the Yemenī tribe of Azd, who, ever since the conflict between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya, many times supported the S̲h̲īʿī cause. His Ifrīḳiyan descent was in a direct line from one of the most illustrious amīrs of the famous family of the Muhallabids, Yazīd b. Ḥātim, who governed Ifrīḳiya for the ʿAbbāsids from 155 to 171/772-87, distinguishing himself by an energetic policy of pacification and administrative reorganization.

Nevertheless, hardly anything is known of the life of Ibn Hāniʾ. The information about him found in the Sunnī as well as the Ismāʿīlī sources is concerned almost exclusively with his career as a writer of panegyric poetry, at the court of Masīla and then at that of al-Manṣūriyya. The fact that he belonged to the Ismāʿīlī sect surrounded him, even in his own lifetime, with an aura of mystery which is very difficult to penetrate.

He was born in Seville in the reign of the first Umayyad caliph, al-Nāṣir li-dīn Allāh, probably between 322 and 326/934-8. His father, a native of Ifrīḳiya, seems to have settled at Seville after having lived at Cordova, probably at the time when the young amīr of al-Andalus, having pacified the kingdom of his ancestors, had just proclaimed himself caliph, while at the other end of Barbary the first Fāṭimid, al-Mahdī bi'llāh, was reasserting in his new capital of al-Mahdiyya, and after the failure of his two attempts against Egypt, his expansionist ambitions concerning the throne of Cordova. Such information as exists on the Fāṭimid propaganda seems to indicate that Hāniʾ, himself a poet, was one of the many missionaries (duʿāt) whom the Ismāʿīlī imām maintained in Muslim Spain after the foundation of the Fāṭimid anti-caliphate in 297/909-10. Ismāʿīlī agents had already been working for a long time among the Mozarab supporters of Ibn Ḥafṣūn and with the Arab nobles of Kalbī descent, settled in Seville and other fortified towns, whom ʿAbd al-Raḥmān III, after his grandfather, the amīr ʿAbd Allāh, had great difficulty in reducing. Hāniʾ, like the many other Fāṭimid agents disguised as merchants, ascetics or men of science and letters, must have found, from Seville to Elvira and even Cordova, a fertile field for the dissemination of the Ismāʿīlī daʿwa. In addition, the intellectual development of the young Muḥammad b. Hāniʾ, at first at Seville itself, then in Cordova and Elvira, demonstrates the Ismāʿīlī influence which his father must have had on him, as well as the philosophic teaching which the disciples of Ibn Masarra (d. 319/931) continued to disseminate. The future panegyrist of al-Muʿizz in fact pursued his studies in a period when the rationalist theories of Muʿtazilism and the metaphysical theories of Ibn Masarra, close to those of the Ismāʿīlī Bāṭiniyya, were spread among a heterogeneous population which was composed for the greater part of muwallads and of Arabs of Yemenī extraction, hostile to the power of the Umayyads and susceptible to Fāṭimid propaganda. At Elvira (near to Bobastro, a fief of the Mozarabs who had for long been in revolt against Cordova) as at Seville (a bastion of the Banu 'l-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲ and other great families of the Yemenī nobility), the young poet lost no time in expressing publicly in a region so hostile to the Umayyads his Ismāʿīlī convictions. But having made himself conspicuous by publishing his pro-Fāṭimid sympathies, at a time when in Cordova, thanks to the energetic support of al-Nāṣir, the strictest type of Sunnī orthodoxy, that of Mālikism, had gained the ascendancy, the young Ibn Hāniʾ was bound eventually to become the object of persecutions. Neither Seville nor Elvira, having finally submitted to the central power, could with impunity offer him protection, in spite of the great authority which its protectors, the Banu 'l-Ḥad̲j̲d̲j̲ād̲j̲, had nevertheless retained.

Thus Ibn Hāniʾ was obliged to leave al-Andalus for Ifrīḳiya, particularly since, with the accession of al-Muʿizz in 341/952-3, the fortunes of the Fāṭimids, after a brief eclipse due to the K̲h̲ārid̲j̲ī insurrection of Abū Yazīd [q.v.], were once more enjoying a brilliant success.

In 347/958, the Fāṭimid army, on a campaign in the extreme Mag̲h̲rib under the command of D̲j̲awhar, had arrived in northern Morocco. After this, Ibn Hāniʾ had no hesitation in leaving al-Andalus for good, to join, outside Ceuta, the Fāṭimid general, of whose glory he immediately began to write, vehemently condemning the "accursed" Umayyads. From this time there began for the young poet a brilliant career as a panegyrist, an ardent defender of the cause of the Fāṭimids, who were intensifying their imperialist propaganda in the West as well as in the Muslim East. The sources stress Ibn Hāniʾ's role as propagandist. Among the lords of Masīla, the brothers D̲j̲aʿfar and Yaḥyā (the former being the foster-brother of al-Muʿizz), Ibn Hāniʾ received a great welcome.

At the court of al-Manṣūriyya, where the talented poets included al-Fazārī and Ibn al-Iyādī, the young Ibn Hāniʾ distinguished himself by the zeal which he showed in praising the merits of the imāms and in composing very extravagant panegyrics to the glory of al-Muʿizz. His poems, which immediately became widely read, ensured that the imperial aims and the doctrines of the masters of Ifrīḳiya became widely known within their territories, and also beyond their frontiers as far as Cordova to the west and Bag̲h̲dād to the east.

Thus his poetry is of documentary value in providing information on the political propaganda of the Fāṭimids, who were certainly planning to oust the ʿAbbāsid "usurpers" but who also never missed an opportunity of making known their claims in Muslim Spain, where their hereditary enemies, the Umayyads, were attempting to prevent the infiltration of their doctrines and to put a stop to their subversive intrigues. In addition to their considerable use to the historian of the Fāṭimids, those famous panegyrics dedicated to al-Muʿizz have also an undeniable literary value, despite the exaggerated condemnation of them by Maʿarrī and the more temperate criticism of Ibn S̲h̲araf. There is no doubt that Ibn Hāniʾ is a great poet, the first great poet of the Muslim West. His taste for hyperbole and the secret of his symbolism can be explained by his Ismāʿīlī faith and the sincerity of his adoration for his imām. Ibn Hāniʾ's works may for this reason form an enigma for readers who do not possess the knowledge, albeit elementary, of Ismāʿīlī doctrine which is required to understand his poetry and appreciate its true value.

His death also is shrouded in mystery. The circumstances of it are confusing: it may have been a political murder carried out by agents in the pay of the ʿAbbāsids or the Umayyads, or perhaps a crime passionnel after a carousel. Even the date is uncertain. Ibn K̲h̲allikān states that he tried in vain to establish it with certainty and found it only in the Ḳurād̲h̲āt al-dhahab of Ibn Rashīḳ (where it does not in fact appear). The generally accepted date in 362/973.

There has not yet been a critical edition or an exhaustive study of his poems. There have, however, been published several ordinary editions of the dīwān (which deserves more detailed attention)—at Būlāḳ and at Beirut, the latest in 1952.

IBN AL-ḤANNĀṬ, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. SULAYMĀN AL-RUʿAYNĪ AL-ḲURṬUBĪ AL-KAFĪF, Andalusian poet and kātib, considered one of the greatest scholars of the early 5th/11th century in the field of Arabic language and literature. Son of a grain merchant (hence the name by which he was commonly known, often wrongly written Ibn al-Khayyāṭ), he owed his chance to study to a family of ḳuḍāt at Cordova, the Banū Dhakwān [see IBN DHAKWĀN], who had taken him under their care. He was afflicted from birth by a malformation of the eyes and lost his sight at an early age, but this did not prevent him from acquiring wide learning, interesting himself even in astronomy and philosophy, and towards the end of his life practising successfully the art of healing. During the first years of the 5th/11th century, he composed some poems in praise of the Ḥammūdids ʿAli and al-Ḳāsim b. Ḥammūd, and in some of his verses there can be traced pro-ʿAlid sentiments, but it does not seem that he should be considered as truly Shīʿī. Besides, he was appointed kātib by the Umayyad Hishām III (418-22/1027-31). According to his biographers, it was because of his interest in logic that he was accused of heresy and banished from Cordova; he took refuge with Muḥammad b. al-Ḳāsim b. Ḥammūd (428-40/1036-48) at Algeciras, whence he followed the course of events, congratulating Ibn ʿAbbād (d. 434/1042), writing the funeral eulogy of Abu 'l-Ḥazm Djawhar (d. 435/1043) and acclaiming the accession of al-Muẓaffar at Badajoz [see AFṬASIDS] in 437/1045, shortly before his death at the end of the same year.

In the literary field, his disputes with Ibn Shuhayd [q.v.] are well known, and indeed the two men held completely opposing ideas, Ibn al-Ḥannāṭ remaining the supporter of the style which is characterized by a sometimes immoderate use of badīʿ and of gharīb. His rhyming prose, with its relatively long clauses, is still pleasant to read.

IBN ḤARB [see ʿABD ALLĀH B. SABAʾ; AL-KINDĪ, IBN ḤARB].

IBN HARMA, IBRĀHĪM B. ʿALĪ B. SALAMA (b. ʿĀmir) B. HARMA AL-FIHRĪ, ABŪ ISḤĀḲ, Arab poet of Medina, born in 90/709, who, if his genealogy is authentic, belonged to the tribe of Ḳuraysh. Little is known of his life. A supporter of the ʿAlids, he attended and panegyrised ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Ḥasan [q.v.] and al-Ḥasan b. Zayd [q.v.], but he is said to have refrained from giving his support to Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh [q.v.] when the latter revolted against the ʿAbbāsids. The Aghānī names several persons for whom he had occasion to exercise his poetic gifts, but it must be remembered that after singing the praises of some Umayyads—especially al-Walīd b. Yazīd—he tried in 140/757 to gain the favour of al-Manṣūr, who pardoned his past conduct; perhaps he also approached al-Mahdī, for it is possible that he lived until about 170/786. He was buried at Baḳīʿ [q.v.], but by then he had fallen into such complete obscurity that no writer is able to give the exact date of his death. Al-Zubayr b. Bakkār, however, wrote a Kitāb Akhbār Ibn Harma (Fihrist, Cairo ed., 161).

The physical and moral portrait of Ibn Harma is scarcely an attractive one. Ugly, small in stature, importunate and avaricious, he was furthermore addicted to drink, a vice which earned him some disappointments, although it is related that al-Manṣūr found a way to safeguard him by decreeing that he would be punished by 80 lashes of the whip if found drunk, but that the policeman who brought him before the governor of Medina would receive 100 lashes.

Of his poetry, handed down by his rāwī Ibn Rubayḥ, and collected together by al-Aṣmaʿī, and later by Ibn al-Sikkīt, al-Sukkarī and al-Ṣūlī, all that survives is a small number of verses scattered through works of adab. His quite extensive Dīwān included ḳaṣīdas of Bedouin type, some satires, and some erotic and Bacchic poems, but it is important to note that al-Aṣmaʿī and Abū ʿUbayda described Ibn Harma as one of the poets who have "sealed (khatama) poetry" and represent the rearguard (sāḳa) of classicism; he is thus one of the last to be regarded by philologists as an authority on the subject of the Arabic language. Al-Djāḥiẓ gives particularly the text of his short fable of the lizard and the frog and, in another context, places him in the same rank as Bashshār [q.v.] for the use of badīʿ [q.v.]; indeed, he seems to have been one of the first poets to exploit the resources of the "trade", as is proved by a ḳaṣīda consisting solely of undotted letters.

IBN AL-ḤASAN AL-NUBĀHĪ [see AL-NUBĀHĪ].

IBN ḤAWḲAL, ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM B. ʿALĪ AL-NAṢĪBĪ,

Arab geographer of the second half of the 4th/10th century, one of the best exponents, with his contemporary al-Muḳaddasī [q.v.], of geography based on travel and direct observation (ʿiyān).

Ibn Ḥawḳal was born in Naṣībīn (Nisibis) in Upper Mesopotamia (al-Djazīra). He probably spent his early years in this region before beginning, on 7 Ramaḍān 331/15 May 943, an impressive series of journeys, the course of which it is possible to trace, at least in outline, by means of the few dates given in his work: North Africa, Spain and the southern edge of the Sahara (336-40/947-51), Egypt and the northern regions of Islam: Armenia and Ādharbaydjān (about 344/955), al-Djazīra, ʿIrāḳ, Khūzistān and Fārs (350-8/961-9), Khʷārazm and Transoxania (about 358/969), and finally Sicily (362/973), after which we lose trace of him.

It may be said with fair certainty that Ibn Ḥawḳal was engaged in the activities of a merchant and missionary. As to the first, there may be noted the details (often with figures) of prices, products and of economic activity in general. As for his politico-religious sympathies, the Fāṭimid professions of faith which are found in his work indicate that he was at least sincerely in sympathy with the movement; although it is difficult to state categorically that he was a Fāṭimid dāʿī, with the convinced and militant attitude which this implies, the interest which he took in Fāṭimid policy certainly appears quite clearly. It is within this context that it is possible to explain, among other details, the passages on Nubia or on the history of North Africa, also Ibn Ḥawḳal's opinions on Umayyad Spain and Kalbī Sicily, his occasional complaints against the administration of Fāṭimid Egypt being explained by strictly commercial considerations.

Apart from a work on Sicily, which has not survived, Ibn Ḥawḳal's main work was a description of the Islamic countries, known under the titles Kitāb al-Masālik wa 'l-mamālik or Kitāb Ṣūrat al-arḍ. It has so far been impossible to establish with certainty the history of the text; it nevertheless seems clear that it appeared in several successive redactions. The first is dedicated to the Ḥamdānid Sayf al-Dawla and is therefore earlier than 356/967, when this ruler died. The second, full of criticism of this dynasty and dedicated to a person who has not been identified, must have appeared in about 367/977. Finally, a definitive and complete version of the work must have appeared in about 378/988. The appearance of the work in successive versions is clearly the reason for some of the obscurities to be found in it and in particular those which appear on more than one point in the description of Sicily.

Another, and perhaps the most important, source of confusion is to be found in his plagiarizing, more or less closely, the text of al-Iṣṭakhrī [q.v.], which Ibn Ḥawḳal took as the basis for his own description. No detail can be extracted from Ibn Ḥawḳal's work and no judgement pronounced on it before the origin of the passage in question has been determined. Moreover, the patient and systematic comparison of the two texts has the advantage of illustrating Ibn Ḥawḳal's originality compared with his predecessor. It appears on the whole that, leaving aside certain alterations of style intended, in Ibn Ḥawḳal's opinion, to raise the tone, to amplify a phrase or to set his personal mark on al-Iṣṭakhrī's text, all the modifications made by Ibn Ḥawḳal certainly confer on his work a breadth and a personality incomparably larger than those of its predecessor, worthy though the latter was.

To begin with, Ibn Ḥawḳal probably intended nothing more than to make, in the form of corrections, his contribution to the corpus of the geographical school of al-Balkhī [q.v.]. To judge from the terms in which he describes his meeting with al-Iṣṭakhrī and the encouragement which the latter gave him, it was as a collection of maps of the Islamic world alone that Ibn Ḥawḳal first envisaged his geographical work. However, very soon the facts which he accumulated during his travels must have encouraged him to devote the greater part of his effort to the text itself, which in al-Balkhī, and even still at several places in al-Iṣṭakhrī, was only secondary, being initially merely a commentary on the maps in the old tradition of the ṣūra Maʾmūniyya. Ibn Ḥawḳal's innovation therefore was first to transform this commentary into a work in its own right, considerably expanded and independent of the maps.

Another modification was that, without in the plan of the work going beyond either the general framework of Islam or, in the description of details, the boundaries of each province (iḳlīm) dealt with one by one, Ibn Ḥawḳal, adopting in this an outlook of administrative geography as found for example in al-Djayhānī [q.v.], adds to his description remarks on various countries or peoples bordering on the Islamic world which he considers to be of particular importance: notable examples are the passages on the Turks, the Khazars, the towns of southern Italy, the Sudanese and the Nubians.

Within the Muslim region proper, he similarly provides additional facts, the important pages here being those devoted to the West (the Maghrib, Spain, Egypt, and Sicily) and the North-East (Khurāsān and Transoxania in particular). Nevertheless it would be wrong, however great their interest, to limit our attention to these pages. Everywhere, in fact, Ibn Ḥawḳal imposes on the work of his predecessor, even if only by corrections of detail or of the order of words or lines, the stamp of his own work, the main aim of which is to place the book firmly within his own period. His constant care to depict a region precisely in the state and at the date that he himself had seen it, and occasional references to the distant or more recent past, give to his text, besides a vividness of description and even a depth of feeling which sometimes appear, undoubted value for the historian. This is particularly true of the notes on economic matters, which form a complete break with convention; for one thing, Ibn Ḥawḳal is much less interested in rare or precious products than in the basic agricultural and manufactured products, and secondly he was able to study on the spot a given economic situation in relation to a particular period or with reference to an implicit norm. He was the only Arab geographer of the period who really sketched a vivid picture of production.

An edition of Ibn Ḥawḳal was published by De Goeje (Leiden 1873). This is now superseded by that of Kramers (Leiden 1938). A translation of the text which had been prepared by Kramers was published with revision by G. Wiet, Configuration de la terre (Paris-Beirut 1964).

Bibliography: In addition to the introductions by J. H. Kramers and by G. Wiet, we give here, from a relatively abundant bibliography, the most recent works, which discuss the points at issue: Brockelmann, I, 263, S I, 408; Kaḥḥāla, Muʿdjam al-muʾallifīn, xi, 5; R. IBN ḤAWSHAB [see manṣūr al-yaman].

IBN AL-ḤAWWĀS, ʿAlī b. Niʿma, was one of the *ḳāʾid*s who shared Sicily after the last Kalbī amīr al-Ḥasan—called al-Ṣamṣām—the brother of the amīr Aḥmad al-Akḥal (409/1019-429/1038), who was deposed in 444/1052-3 (according to Ibn Khaldūn: 431/1039-40). This was the most obscure and chaotic period of Muslim Sicily, racked by civil wars and the rivalries of the local leaders who sought at the same time to bring about Byzantine intervention and the landing in the island of a Zīrid army. In this disturbed atmosphere, the ḳāʾid Ibn al-Ḥawwās managed to remain lord of Agrigento, Castrogiovanni and Castronuovo with their surrounding districts, while his brother-in-law, Ibn al-Maklātī, occupied Catania, which was soon taken from him—together with his wife (Maymūna, Ibn al-Ḥawwās's sister) and his own life—by his rival Ibn al-Thumna [q.v.], lord of Syracuse.

Some time afterwards the two brothers-in-law fought each other over an entirely family matter; following his victory, near Castrogiovanni, over his adversary, Ibn al-Ḥawwās became the only powerful ḳāʾid in almost the whole of Sicily and he was able to retain this position until the arrival of the Normans, who had been invited by the defeated Ibn al-Thumna to cross the straits. They landed towards the end of February 1061, and Count Roger's first encounters with the Muslims were so unsuccessful that the Normans were obliged to withdraw. But some months later Messina fell into the hands of the attackers, who, reinforced by the troops of Ibn al-Thumna, attacked and defeated the Muslims near Castrogiovanni, without however succeeding in forcing their enemies, who were besieged in the fortress, to capitulate. Ibn al-Ḥawwās fell, two or three years after these events, in the fighting which broke out between his troops and the Zīrid Ayyūb, the son of Tamīm b. al-Muʿizz, who had landed in Sicily with the reinforcements coming from Ifrīḳiya to support the Muslims against the Normans.

Bibliography: The bibliography relating to the events in which Ibn al-Ḥawwās was principally concerned is almost all to be found in the sources noted by M. Amari, Storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia[2], Catania 1933-9, s.v., and published in his Biblioteca arabo-sicula, Leipzig 1857; see also H. R. Idris, Zīrides, index. (U. Rizzitano)

IBN AL-HAYTHAM, Abū ʿAlī al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan (or Ḥusayn) b. al-Haytham al-Baṣrī al-Miṣrī, was identified towards the end of the 19th century with the Alhazen, Avennathan and Avenetan of mediaeval Latin texts. He is one of the principal Arab mathematicians and, without any doubt, the best physicist.

In respect of his biography we have numerous lacunae. He was born in Baṣra in about 354/965; during the reign of al-Ḥākim (386-411/996-1021) he went to Egypt where he tried to regulate the flow of the Nile. He abandoned this task when he realized its impossibility, in spite of his fears of the caliph's anger. On the death of the latter he returned to Cairo, where he earned his living by copying scientific, and particularly mathematical, manuscripts. He died in 430/1039.

His writings, consisting of more than a hundred titles, have been listed by Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa. Most of these works—some of them very short—are devoted to mathematics and physics, but he also wrote on philosophical and medical subjects. Throughout these latter works can be seen his profound knowledge of the Greek authors, notably Ptolemy, whom he edited, studied and criticized (cf. Pinès, Congrès Int. Hist. des Sciences, x (1962), and M. Schramm, Ibn al-Haythams Weg zur Physik, 1963, bibliographical lists iii, 38 and iii, 64).

The works best known to us are:—(1) Maḳāla fi 'stikhrādj samt al-ḳibla (cf. C. Schoy, Abhandlung über die Bestimmung der Richtung der Qibla, in ZDMG, lxxv (1921), 242-53) in which he established the theorem of the cotangent:

(2) Maḳāla fī hayʾat al-ʿālam (which had two Hebrew translations, three Latin—one edited by J. M. Millás, Las traducciones orientales ..., 285-312—one Persian and one Castilian) on astronomy. This work had a great influence on later writers such as Averroes, al-Djaghmīnī, al-Ḳazwīnī and Peurbach (cf. W. Hartner, The Mercury Horoscope ..., 122-35). (3) Kitāb fi 'l-manāẓir, clearly commented on by Kamāl al-Dīn al-Fārisī (died ca. 720/1320; ed. Ḥaydarābād 1347-8/1928-30). This work was translated into Latin and published in Basle in 1572 by F. Risner under the title Thesaurus Opticus. In the fifth maḳāla Alhazen's mathematical genius attained its highest development when he resolved the problem which today bears his name: two points, A and B, are fixed on the plane of a circle with centre O and radius R. Find in the circle (idealized in a mirror) the point M where the ray of light emitted by A must be reflected in order that it may pass through B. Alhazen's demonstration, which is very complex, leads to an equation of the fourth degree which he resolves by the intersection of an equilateral hyperbole with a circle. Leonardo da Vinci later became interested in the problem, which he could only solve mechanically, for lack of mathematical means. C. Huygens (d. 1696) finally gave the most elegant and simplest solution (cf. Enciclopedia delle matematiche elementari, i/2, 388-9). (4) Maḳāla fi ḍawʾ al-ḳamar, an important work on account of the ideas expounded on light, colours and the celestial movements. (5) Fi 'l-marāyā 'l-muḥriḳa bi 'l-dawāʾir (cf. Schramm, ii, 18 and iii, 8), translated by E. Wiedemann in Bibliotheca Mathematica, x (1910), 293-307. (6) Fi 'l-marāyā 'l-muḥriḳa bi 'l-ḳuṭuʿ on parabolic mirrors (translated by J. L. Heiberg and E. Wiedemann, in Bibliotheca Mathematica, x (1910), 201-37). (7) Fi anna 'l-kura awsaʿ al-ashkāl al-mudjassama allatī iḥāṭuhā mutasāwiya wa-anna 'l-dāʾira awsaʿ al-ashkāl al-musaṭṭaḥa allatī iḥāṭuhā mutasāwiya, translated and commented on by H. Dilgan (Actes IX[e] Congrès Internat. d'Hist. des Sciences, 1959, 453-60). In it he demonstrates that "of two regular polygons inscribed in the same circle, that which has the greater number of sides has also the larger surface and the larger perimeter". Fi 'l-makān wa 'l-zamān (cf. Schramm, ii, 2 and iii, 68). (13) Fi 'rtifāʿ al-ḳuṭb (tr. C. Schoy, in De Zee, x (1920), 586-601). (14) Fī ṣūrat al-kusūf (tr. E. Wiedemann, in SBPMS Erlg., xlvi (1914), 155-69) in which is expounded for the first time the use of the camera obscura in the observation of solar eclipses. (15) Fi 'stikhrādj masʾala ʿadadiyya (tr. E. Wiedemann, in SBPMS Erlg., xli (1909), 11-3. (16) Liber de crepusculis et nubium ascensionibus, tr. Besides the contributions already mentioned, it should be noted that Ibn al-Haytham established that the astronomic twilight began or finished when the negative height of the sun reached 19° and, proceeding from there, he fixed the height of the atmosphere at 52,000 paces; he correctly explained atmospheric refraction and the augmentation of the apparent diameter of the sun and moon when they are near the horizon; like Ibn Sīnā and al-Bīrūnī, he established that rays of light start from the object to travel towards the eye, and not the reverse as Euclid, Ptolemy and al-Kindī maintained; he discovered spherical aberration—but he did not consider the caustic curve; he determined that the Milky Way was very remote from the earth and that it did not belong to the atmosphere, since it had no parallax. In the field of mathematics he neatly resolved the problem of al-Mahanī, wrote a treatise on magic squares and made some contributions to commercial mathematics (cf. E. Wiedemann, Über eine besondere Art des Gesellschaftsrechens nach ..., in SBPMS Erlg., lviii (1928), 191-6).

In his Risāla fī ṣināʿat al-shiʿr mumtazidja min al-Yūnānī wa'l-ʿArabī (Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿa, ii, 94), Ibn al-Haytham probably combined the Greek and Arab conceptions of literary criticism.

IBN ḤAYYĀN, Abū Marwān Ḥayyān b. Khalaf b. Ḥusayn b. Ḥayyān, without doubt the greatest historian of the Middle Ages in all Spain, both Muslim and Christian. The Arab biographers tell us little about his life or personality. He was born in Cordova in 377/987-8; his father, who was secretary to the vizier al-Manṣūr [q.v.], must have greatly influenced his education and the formation of his strongly pro-Umayyad views; he had three teachers: the grammarian Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥubāb, the celebrated man of letters Ṣāʿid of Baghdād, and the traditionalist Ibn Nabal; we now know from his own admission that Abu 'l-Walīd Ibn Djahwar, ruler of Cordova, rescued him from poverty by conferring on him the office of letter-writer in the government chancellery. We know with what extreme virulence he wrote of numerous personalities of his time, his bitterness towards the divisions and anarchy in the kingdoms of the Ṭawāʾif, and also at the scantiness of the sources at his disposal when he was writing the history of the fitna; however, living as he did at the culmination of the Middle Ages, he was able to draw on the work of his predecessors. to write the history of his own turbulent century and to set standards for subsequent chroniclers. He died in Rabīʿ I 469/October 1076.

Among the works attributed with greater or less certainty to Ibn Ḥayyān, two titles stand out: the Muḳtabis and the Matīn. In the most vivid and brilliant period of Hispano-Arabic culture, Ibn Ḥayyān undertook to write the history of al-Andalus on the grand scale. When dealing with events prior to his own time, he limited himself to the compilation of earlier accounts and laid no claim to originality. Such is the Muḳtabis, literally "plucking [a brand] from the fire" and hence metaphorically "the book of one who copies the work of others"; it is thus an assemblage of earlier writings, which are copied with indications, as in a modern edition, of the gaps found in the original.

The style is thus not his own but that of his sources; its merit is therefore variable. By gathering together quotations from works most of which are lost, he enables us to appreciate the annals of al-Andalus in an incomparable historical fresco which, although having as its central figure the person of the sovereign, may be regarded as an expression of reality —one however that cannot be corrected either by archive documents or by the writings of political and religious opponents of the Umayyad régime.

Ibn Ḥayyān's original work—the most important in the whole Muslim historiography of the Peninsula—is the Matīn, which covers the history of his own times, namely, nearly the whole of the 5th/11th century, in sixty parts or volumes with an admirable attention to detail and an exactitude which are highlighted by a rare political understanding of events. Although all the volumes of the Matīn are lost, the author's great admirer Ibn Bassām [q.v.] has preserved for us such numerous and extensive passages that, thanks to the (still incomplete) edition of the Dhakhīra published in Egypt, it has become possible to reconstruct—admittedly with difficulty—a large part of the vanished text: this arises from the scrupulous fidelity, rare in mediaeval literature, with which Ibn Bassām always indicates the beginning and end of the passages transcribed.

"Whenever one considers any particular aspect of Hispano-Umayyad history", states its most authoritative historian, E. Lévi-Provençal, "one is nearly always obliged to revert to Ibn Ḥayyān. Without his Muḳtabis, we should have no quotations from the two Rāzīs, nor from two other chroniclers of the 10th century, almost as important and of the same school, the Ḳurayshī Muʿāwiya ibn Hishām ibn al-Shabānisī and another Cordovan oi Arab stock, al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad ibn Mufarridj. Without him, we should not be able to check, thanks to numerous quotations, the greater part of the chronicle of Ibn al-Ḳūṭīya and extensive passages from the writings of al-Khushanī and Ibn al-Faraḍī in less abridged versions than those which have been published. Lastly, without Ibn Ḥayyān the skeletal compilation (talkhīṣ) of Ibn ʿIdhāri [in al-Bayān al-mughrib] would never have seen the light of day, nor propably, as a result, would Dozy's history."

The third part of the Muḳtabis has been published by M. M. Antuña, under the title: Chronique du règne du calife umayyade ʿAbd Allāh à Cordoue, Paris 1937, and has been translated into Spanish by Kh. Ghorayyib, in Cuadernos de historia de España, Buenos Aires 1952; E. Lévi-Provençal and E. García Gómez have published the Textos inéditos del "Muqtabis" . . . sobre las origenes del reino de Pamplona, in al-Andalus, xix (1954).

IBN ḤAYYŪS, Abu 'l-Fityān Muḥammad b. Sulṭān b. Muḥammad b. Ḥayyūs al-Ghanawī, Syrian poet of the 5th/11th century. Born at Damascus in Ṣafar 394/December 1003, he seems to have been at first attached to the Banū ʿAmmār [see ʿammār] of Tripoli in Syria, although he is referred to as being in Aleppo in 429/1037-8; his sympathy with the Fāṭimids of Egypt caused him to fall out of favour with the Banū ʿAmmār, who had become independent, and in 464/1072 he was summoned to Aleppo by the Mirdāsid [q.v.] Maḥmūd b. Naṣr (457-67/1065-75), in whose praise he began to write. On the death of his patron, he wrote a marthiya which was also an eulogy of Naṣr b. Maḥmūd (467-8/1075-6). After the latter had been assassinated, Ibn Ḥayyūs remained at the court of his successor, Sābiḳ b. Maḥmūd, though this did not prevent his addressing praises also to Muslim b. Ḳuraysh, who captured Aleppo in 473/1080; as a reward Muslim gave him al-Mawṣil as a fief, but the poet died before he was able to take possession of it, in Shaʿbān 473/January-February 1081.

Ibn Ḥayyūs, who is considered as one of the greatest Syrian poets of the 5th/11th century after al-Maʿarrī, left a Dīwān which was published in Damascus by Khalīl Mardam in 1951 (2 vols.).

IBN ḤĀZIM [see muḥammad b. ḥāzim].

IBN ḤAZM, patronymic of an Andalusian family, several members of which played an important rôle during the Umayyad caliphate. The most famous of them is without doubt Abū Muḥammad ʿAlī Ibn Ḥazm [see the following article], but some brief details on the Banū Ḥazm are given here, since confusions often arise.

(1) ʿAlī's father was Abū ʿUmar Aḥmād b. Saʿīd b. Ḥazm b. Ghālib b. Ṣāliḥ b. Khalaf. A dignitary at the court of the ḥādjib al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī ʿĀmir and that of his son al-Muẓaffar, he was greatly affected by the serious events which occurred in 399/1009 [see al-andalus] and died on 28 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 402/21 June 1012. See Ibn Bashkuwāl, Ṣila, no. 40; al-Ḍabbī, Bughya, no. 412; E. Lévi-Provençal, Hist. Esp. Mus., index; idem, En relisant le "Collier de la Colombe", in al-Andalus, xv/2 (1950), 345-7.

(2) ʿAlī's elder brother, Abū Bakr, of whom only the kunya is known, was born in 379/989 and died at the age of 22 during the epidemic of plague which ravaged Cordova, in Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 401/June 1011. It was to him that Ibn Shuhayd [q.v.] dedicated his Risālat al-Tawābiʿ wa 'l-zawābiʿ, which indicates the date at which this work was written. See Ibn Ḥazm, Ṭawḳ al-ḥamāma, ed. and tr. L. Bercher, 303, 309; E. Lévi-Provençal, Hist. Esp. Mus., ii, 64-5; idem, En relisant . . ., 346-7.

(3) ʿAlī's son, Abū Rāfiʿ al-Faḍl, entered the service of the ʿAbbādids of Seville and was killed at the battle of al-Zallāḳā [q.v.] in Radjab 479/October 1086. He is the author of a historical work entitled al-Hādī ilā maʿrifat al-nasab al-ʿabbādī. See Ibn al-Abbār, Ḥulla, ed. Muʾnis, ii, 34.

(4) Another Ibn Ḥazm fairly often mentioned is ʿAlī's cousin Abu 'l-Mughīra ʿAbd al-Wahhāb Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥazm. Secretary to the administration and a wit, he was appointed vizier by al-Mustaẓhir during the brief caliphate of the latter (414/1023) and then entered the service of the petty kings of Saragossa; he was vizier of Mundhir b. Yaḥyā when the town fell, in 431/1040, and was imprisoned and then probably released after a ransom had been paid. He died in 438/1046. He had belonged to the group of young Cordovan aristocrats of brilliant literary talent, and his relations with Ibn Shuhayd were well-known; according to Ibn Khāḳān (Maṭmaḥ, 22 = al-Maḳḳarī, Analectes, i, 408-9), Ibn Shuhayd was not a good influence on Abu 'l-Mughīra, who led a more sober life after his friend's death. Ibn Ḥayyān (apud Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, i/1, 111), who thought very highly of his qualities as a poet and prose writer, states that he wrote in his youth a number of works, and adds that he always won any arguments with his cousin because of his ready wit and his learning. It appears that he enjoyed some degree of fame even beyond the frontiers of Muslim Spain, since it was to him that the Ḳayrawānī Ibn al-Rabīb [q.v.] addressed the famous epistle in which he criticized the Andalusians for not perpetuating the memory of their famous men; Abu 'l-Mughīra replied to these criticisms at some length, but Ibn Bassām (Dhakhīra, i/1, 113-6) did not consider it necessary to preserve the whole of the text of this reply, and in particular made the regrettable decision to suppress the list of Andalusian works with which it ended. It is known that ʿAlī Ibn Ḥazm also replied to this letter and that the text of his reply survives, probably in full [see ibn al-rabīb]. In addition Ibn Bassām and al-Maḳḳarī have reproduced a certain number of prose and verse texts by Abu 'l-Mughīra which clearly show considerable literary qualities. See Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, i/1, 110-52; Ibn Ḥazm, Ṭawḳ al-ḥamāma, ed. and tr. L. Bercher, 237; Ibn Khāḳān, Maṭmaḥ, 22; al-Maḳḳarī, Analectes, index; Ibn al-Khaṭīb, Aʿmāl al-Aʿlām, 197; H. IBN ḤAZM, Abū Muḥammad ʿAlī b. Aḥmad b. Saʿīd, born at Cordova in 384/994, died at Manta Līsham in 456/1064, Andalusian poet, historian, jurist, philosopher and theologian, one of the greatest thinkers of Arabo-Muslim civilization, who codified the Ẓāhirī [see ẓāhiriyya] doctrine and applied its method to all the Ḳurʾānic sciences.

The life of Ibn Ḥazm and the political events of his time. E. García Gómez has pointed out that the period in which Ibn Ḥazm lived corresponds to the "most tragic moments of Muslim Spain" and to "the decisive crisis of Islam in Andalusia". His family origins are obscure; the most probable suggestion is that he was descended from Christian converts to Islam. His grandfather Saʿīd settled at Cordova; his father Aḥmad rose to a high position in the administrative hierarchy, becoming vizier to al-Manṣūr and to his son al-Muẓaffar: he had enough skill and pliability to remain faithful to the Umayyad caliph, who was officially on the throne, without arousing the suspicions of the ḥādjib al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī ʿĀmir.

Ibn Ḥazm spent his early years in the surroundings of the harem. Asín Palacios and García Gómez have stressed this point: "an impressionable child and abnormally highly-strung", the revelation of sexual matters and the discovery of the subtle feminine psychology were to have a profound influence on him. This is true; but Ibn Ḥazm should not all the same be regarded as having been a neurotic and morbidly amoral person. Until the age of fourteen the child led a pampered and easy life; but after that he was to suffer from the repercussions of the political struggles between Andalusians, Berbers and Slavs. His father fell into disgrace after the fall of the ʿĀmirids and the replacement of the caliph Hishām II by Muḥammad al-Mahdī; he was forced to leave his palace of Madīnat al-Zāhira. His affairs were not improved by the assassination of al-Mahdī and the return to the throne of Hishām, since the Slav general Wāḍiḥ had him imprisoned and confiscated his possessions. The family then established itself firmly in the service of the legitimist party. Aḥmad took part in an unsuccessful plot against the Slavs. It was in these unhappy circumstances that he died in 402/1012. A period of violence had begun; the house of Ibn Ḥazm's family at Balāṭ Mughīth was destroyed in 403/1013. He himself was forced to take refuge in Almeria, where he was able to enjoy a respite until 407/1016, the year in which the governor of this town made an agreement with the Berbers to overthrow Sulaymān. Ibn Ḥazm, suspected of carrying out pro-Umayyad propaganda, was imprisoned for some months and then banished.

Accompanied by his friend Muḥammad b. Isḥāḳ, Ibn Ḥazm found refuge at Ḥiṣn al-Ḳaṣr, which, according to García Gómez, is not the present day Aznalcazar near Sanlúcar, but was in the region of Malaga or of Murcia. The two friends did not remain there for long: having heard that an Umayyad claimant to the throne, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān IV al-Murtaḍā, who had been living in Valencia, was raising an army against the Berbers of Cordova, they set out to join him. Ibn Ḥazm became al-Murtaḍā's vizier and fought in his army before Granada. He was taken prisoner and then released. In about 412/1022, Ibn Ḥazm, who had retreated to Jativa, began to write the Ṭawḳ al-hamāma, which contains many autobiographical passages relating to the above events.

The Berbers retained Cordova until 414/1023, when al-Ḳāsim b. Ḥammūd was overthrown. The new caliph, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān V al-Mustaẓhir, appointed his friend Ibn Ḥazm as vizier; unfortunately, he was assassinated after seven weeks, and Ibn Ḥazm was once again put into prison. He reappears in 418/1027 at Jativa. According to al-Djayyānī, reported by Yāḳūt, he became vizier again under Hishām al-Muʿtadd. But his experience of political life had destroyed the ideals he had had in his youth. From now on he devoted himself, in semi-retirement, to intellectual work and study, to writing his books and teaching. His virulent attacks against the Mālikī fuḳahāʾ who, always supporting those in power, held sway in the schools and exerted their influence on political and social life, his stand against the ʿAbbādids of Seville whose impostures he denounced, in short his radical non-conformity, earned him the hatred of the official thinkers and the hostility of the rulers, who found such a person undesirable in their territory. This was the period of the Mulūk al-Ṭawāʾif (Reyes de Taifas), which began after the abolition of the caliphate of Cordova, so that the convinced legitimist could not avoid making enemies almost everywhere. Ibn Ḥazm withdrew to the country of his family at Manta Lisham. Little is known of the end of his life, apart from the fact that measures were taken to silence him: in order to make it difficult for him to teach, the formation around him of groups of students was forbidden; only a few disciples, among them the historian al-Ḥumaydī, were brave enough to seek him out and listen to him. He died in his village, leaving, according to his son Abū Rāfiʿ, 400 works.

Ibn Ḥazm and the cultural life of his time. Ibn Ḥazm received a very thorough education. In the Ṭawḳ and in his treatise on the merits of Muslim Spain he gives some information on his teachers and he demonstrates that he was truly a man of his time, well-informed on all the main currents of thought, interested in all that was written, and eager to learn. Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Yazīd al-Azdī al-Miṣrī taught him traditions, grammar and lexicography, rhetoric, dialectic, and theology (Ṭawḳ, ch. 28). Abu 'l-Khiyār al-Lughawī, the jurisconsult, was his teacher for fiḳh (Ṭawḳ, ch. 26). Abū Saʿīd al-Fatā al-Djaʿfarī gave a commentary on early poetry in the Great Mosque at Cordova (Ṭawḳ, 21). For ḥadīth he was taught by Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Djasūr (Ṭawḳ, 30). In his treatise on Spain, Ibn Ḥazm mentions, as his ustādh for philosophy, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Madhḥidjī, whose treatises he says were famous. In addition to these teachers there should be mentioned his relationship with the poets, scholars and men of letters who were his contemporaries. He refers to them in his works, often cordially. There exists a collection of Epistles addressed to important persons among his friends on religious or intellectual matters. It seems that Ibn Ḥazm was deeply concerned with the problem of spiritual education as a means of saving and promoting human culture (that is, the Arabic culture of his time), if we may judge by his Risāla fī marātib al-ʿulūm, which is a complete plan for education. In it he demonstrates that all sciences are related, that they demand researches which are not possible without renouncing a life of pleasure, and that their use is to lead man to victory and to well-being in the next world. There is no thinker more typical of his century than Ibn Ḥazm.

Character of Ibn Ḥazm. It would certainly be an exaggeration to claim that Arabic literature as a whole is impersonal: the great writer and the great thinker may always be discerned through his work. Ibn Ḥazm is no exception. For the modern reader, he is the author in the field of Arab Islam who remains the most alive and the most vigorous. Asín Palacios has shown that he had retained from his early years, passed among the women in the harem, an exaggerated sensitivity which later appeared as a very sensitive conscience: in matters concerning his personal loves, or in his political, social, scientific or religious life, he always regarded with repugnance any falseness, simulation or deceit. He realized that the human soul, if left to itself, spontaneously inclines towards dishonesty, and therefore he mistrusted those internal recesses of the soul in which are hidden unexpressed and unexpressible intentions, double meanings whose ambiguity leads to indecision. His experience as an adult of those in power or seeking power confirmed in him a mournful scepticism. It may be said that the ideas which govern all his works were controlled by these basic reactions to the human vices as he saw them practised in his own day. He was taught by Islam that there is no refuge from such evils except in God and he adhered to this belief with all the force of his being. It should not be forgotten that he himself lived out his own belief with intensity before giving expression to it dogmatically in a vast system in which it is set out together with all its various consequences, and before defending it passionately against those people whom it exposed and who attacked it in their own defence.

Ibn Ḥazm confronted all these inconstancies of man and society as a man passionately convinced of the truth, and all his researches led towards a truth supported by incontrovertible evidence with incontestable proofs. This Truth is the God of Islam, Who is the foundation of all the other truths. The Muslim faith, in its authenticity, is the basis of a truly human life; but it must be purified of all that men have added, suppressed or modified. Although God is the basic refuge, Ibn Ḥazm, meditating in his own way on this faith, discovered in the statements of the law solid bases which can be relied on and used as arguments to combat error and deceit. First, in spite of, and perhaps even because of, his misanthropy, Ibn Ḥazm recognized friendship and gave it an important place in his ideal conception of human relations. He considered that true friendship is the source of truth, frankness, mutual understanding, and sincerity. It is in friendly relations that verbal statements may be taken at their face value, without any need to suspect something left unsaid or thoughts skilfully and shrewdly disguised. This strongly held opinion explains Ibn Ḥazm's religious respect for the language itself, in which his Ẓāhirī doctrine has its roots. In the same order of ideas, but at another level, Ibn Ḥazm was convinced that the supposedly rational arguments of the philosophers, of the theologians and of certain jurists merely revealed their passions, prejudices and personal preferences, all things unjustifiable in themselves but given a semblance of legitimacy by means of false reasoning. From them stem the innumerable deviations of those who, instead of listening to God, submit to the promptings of presumptuous human reason. This argument contains the origin of Ibn Ḥazm's system of logic, in which reason plays a part, but one rigorously defined, limited and subordinated to the teaching provided by the Word of God. Finally, Ibn Ḥazm relies on his acute sense of reality. The reality created by God has much to teach men, provided that they know this and are willing to observe it by following the advice of the Ḳurʾān. Exasperation often causes the writings of sensitive thinkers to tend towards morbidity, but nothing of this is found in Ibn Ḥazm; his works show not the slightest trace of schizophrenia. Although he cuts himself off from the world, he does not evade it; although he dreams of an ideal, he does not merely cultivate it secretly within himself. He remains a fighter, a man of action, whether he enters the field of politics or whether he carries on polemic in his books. The enemies he is fighting are men of flesh and blood, whose doctrines he studies with care and whose formulas he closely examines. He could perhaps be accused of making no attempt to understand his opponent thoroughly, of being content merely to point out illogicalities and inexact or fallacious expressions, and of using sometimes, to this end, rather specious arguments. But the fact is that he regards them as men not to be trusted, with whom it is not possible to engage in a true dialogue, since they distort language to make it fit in with their whims and force words to say what they do not naturally mean. Together with this search for precise terminology, which prevents his arguments from having any formal or abstract character, he displays a great power of observation, which is apparent especially in the choice of examples drawn from his personal experience or from enquiries which he has made himself. Thus, concerning the zakāt on agricultural products and its collection, he says a few words on agriculture in Spain; concerning the parable of the grain of mustard seed in the Gospel he has conducted researches on the size of the plant which grows from it; concerning measures, he mentions a mudd which he has seen in a family and establishes through whose hands it has passed in succession until he demonstrates, as in an isnād, that it came from Medina, dated from the time of the Prophet, and thus constituted an authentic standard measure. Many other such examples could be given.

But although he has a liking for concrete detail and precise information, Ibn Ḥazm is noted for his sense of synthesis. His great concern is to demonstrate the consistency of the numerous Ḳurʾānic and prophetic texts on which Muslim faith and practice are based. His theories of knowledge, language, logic and interpretation are always directed to this end. In carrying out his project he explains ideas and the relations between them with perfect clarity; his style is at the same time limpid, supple and vigorous. From this point of view, his works conform completely with the Western ideal. There may be mentioned his reference to "talkers of nonsense who embroider the truth, who arrogate to themselves the name of theologians, who string together in their drivelling talk thousands of words, the last of which cancel out the earlier ones". This judgement is typical of Ibn Ḥazm, and demonstrates the importance which he attached to coherence both in the sequence of ideas and in style. In fact he stresses, in the search for and the statement of the truth, the role played by the memory (as did Descartes later): the necessity of retaining in the mind the whole thread of the proof and the discourse; if there is a lapse of memory, error occurs. His personal genius is based on considerable powers of memory and of systematic construction, in which the mass of details, always well marshalled, never blurs the clear outline of the main arguments.

Ibn Ḥazm as psychologist and moralist. Ibn Ḥazm's temperament, his spiritual qualities and his powers of observation and analysis make him a very subtle psychologist and a notable moralist. This appears throughout his writings, but may be seen more particularly in two of his works: the Ṭawḳ al-ḥamāma and the Kitāb al-Akhlāḳ wa 'l-siyar. The first is a treatise on love and lovers. This subject was often treated by the commentators of the early poetry (nasīb of the ḳaṣīda; ghazal); in this sense Ibn Ḥazm had predecessors, the most important of whom were al-Djāḥiẓ and Ibn Dāwūd al-Iṣfahānī. His treatise belongs to a literary genre which was to become much favoured, that which may be termed the "Code of Love" and which very soon became a collection of clichés, anecdotes and observations, illustrated, more or less aptly, by numerous poetic quotations. Already the Kitāb al-Zahra of Ibn Dāwūd may be criticized as being of this type, and Ibn Ḥazm does not seem to have avoided it entirely. But although from the time the genre was first used the theme was fairly trite, skilled writers like al-Djāḥiẓ and Ibn Ḥazm were able to give it an original twist. The bibliography in García Gómez lists the studies of the Ṭawḳ from this point of view. Here it may be mentioned that Ibn Ḥazm gradually detaches himself from the stereotyped productions of a light literature and that his discourse becomes increasingly serious. His secular subject becomes full of moral and religious reflexions; the use of more personal examples and of direct observation lends it progressively more depth and psychological truth, while at the same time a hint of pessimism and of bitterness becomes more apparent. It is probable that the work was not written all at the same time, and that it reflects a certain development in the author's experience. An example is the passage which begins with these words: wa laḳad ra'aytu 'mra'atan kānat mawaddatuhā fī ghayri dhāt Allāh (ed. L. Bercher, 348). In it can be felt a certain religious and human feeling, an existentialist dialectic of love. The chapter entitled Ḳubḥ al-maʿṣiya contains completely personal autobiographical details which have the ring of truth, together with some very vivid notes on feminine psychology. Ibn Ḥazm's gifts as a psychologist and a moralist are well enough demonstrated by some remarks on apparent resignation (ch. 24, ed. Bercher, 238), also by some remarks on the apparent and the hidden meaning in the words of lovers (p. 180), and remarks on the dialectic of consolation (ḳunūʿ), in particular among poets who attempt to satisfy themselves "by means of externalizing the passion which grips them (gharaḍ; on the meaning of this word, cf. Dozy, Supp.), by displaying their mastery of profound ideas and extraordinary designs: each of them speaks according to the strength of his nature, but they merely use the language in an arbitrary way (taḥakkum bi 'l-lisān), produce turgid discourses (tashadduḳ fi 'l-kalām), and revel in rhetoric (istiṭāla bi 'l-bayān), all of which is completely without authenticity"; they are demonstrated also by some remarks on the different motives which exist for apparently identical conduct and on the part played by ostentation (riyā'), and by many other passages of the same type. These remarks however also indicate the way in which Ibn Ḥazm made use of these abilities: in a ruthless analysis of the motives, intentions and secret meanings which reveals the reticences or dissimulations concealed under the cover of expression in speech. When a man speaks about himself, and in order to express himself, he does not follow the rules of a language which was made for accurate communication, but he distorts it to his own personal requirements to dissimulate and deceive. When Ibn Ḥazm, in the Ṭawḳ, uses the term iẓhār, it is always in a pejorative sense: a man does not show himself as he really is but adopts a mask. This is why, after criticizing human words, he seeks authentic truth in the Word of God. His basic argument is exactly the same as that of many Muslim mystics, but he has no confidence in man and is reluctant to search in the depths of human consciousness for a state of authentic sincerity in which is revealed the presence of Divine action. He considers that the artificial nature of consciousness always constitutes a barrier. He therefore exhorts man to escape from himself in order to submit to a purely objective reality, the text of the revealed Ḳur'ān and of the inspired ḥadīth taken "as it is", i.e., in its ẓāhir. To be united with God is to listen to what He says and understand it in order to obey Him meekly and scrupulously. Man does not find truth and certainty in himself but in God, that is to say in the texts at whose level is achieved the only union possible: the union in understanding, fahm.

The Kitāb al-Akhlāḳ wa 'l-siyar fully confirms the above conclusions; we limit ourselves to referring to paragraph 267 (ed. and tr. N. Tomiche, 74/96), and, on the goal pursued, to paragraph 5 (13/8) which concludes: "Know therefore that there is only one object to be sought: to banish anxiety, and that one way alone leads to it: the service of God (al-ʿamal li-'llāh)". Thus all of Ibn Ḥazm's psychology and moral science concentrates on action, but an action purged of any internal motive and entirely determined by the thought of God.

Ibn Ḥazm as a theoretician of language. Lies and error are obviously linked to speech. It can be said, in brief, that for Ibn Ḥazm the evil in this consists in making use of language for personal ends instead of serving it. In fact there exists in language a reality: instituted by God (cf. Ḳur'ān, II, 31), it contains in itself a truth and is the only means of discovering the truth and of expressing it, so long as it is not cut off from its divine roots (aṣl al-lugha) in order to make of it the plaything of human passions, which results in destroying it in every language and in depriving it of any efficacity (ibṭāl al-lugha). In the use of a language, the speech ought never to become conventional (the theory of the tawḳīf opposed to that of the iṣṭilāḥ) nor enigmatic: it should say everything openly, since its function is to bring about mutual comprehension (tafāhum). This is why perfect speech (and this is eminently the case of the Word of God) must be expressed completely by its ẓāhir. Any attempt to discover a hidden meaning (bāṭin) is useless; it leads to arbitrary judgements and leaves room for the passions and the suggestions of the human soul. Thus, in the realm of pure grammatical theory, Ibn Ḥazm strongly opposed all the theories which explained syntax by "hidden meanings". The psychological intentions of the speaker or the listener should not interfere with the meaning of the speech, the only element which has any value. The words by themselves have a significant meaning (dalīl) or a designative meaning (ishāra); he who uses them must do so with their proper meaning and not alter it by substituting his own subjective one. The ideas of maʿnā and of murād bihi are therefore perfectly objective and are dependent only upon the structure of the speech and the language in which they come into existence. Similarly, there are basic categories of speech (ʿanāṣir al-kalām) which modify the general conclusion of every word spoken: the imperative, the indicative, and the interrogative among others, which are the internal moods of speech and which affect the linguistic material by enabling it to evoke from the listener or the reader a certain response. Ibn Ḥazm also considered, but with detachment, the problem of the origin of languages in reflecting on the language of Adam; but in fact he does not make a categorical statement on this. In short, what constitutes for him the value of Arabic is the fact that it is the language of the Ḳur'ān, the seal of Revelation. It should be added that Ibn Ḥazm had some interesting intuitive theories on this problem, in particular that of an evolution and of a relationship between languages; but he did not develop them, probably because he did not possess the means, and certainly he did not regard this as a central problem.

The logic of Ibn Ḥazm. Ibn Ḥazm's theory of speech is entirely directed towards the formation of a system of logic capable of analysing the revealed and prophetic texts in the essence of their ẓāhir without the risk of debasing them by substituting for that which God means that which man wishes to understand. From this point of view, although he was acquainted with Aristotle and in spite of his own command of logic in the arguments which he advances against his opponents, his tendency is to reduce the importance and the range of application of logical procedures conceived as the instruments of an independent reason. He believes in the value of reason, but conceives its legitimate use only in the sense in which God makes use of it in the Ḳur'ān (cf. the verses which include the verb ya'ḳilūn); it is first the faculty of the necessary rational intuitions (the principle of contradiction, the principle that the whole is greater then the part, etc.). Next it is the faculty which understands the senses of creatures and, consequently, it must never in its use become divorced from the results of perception through the senses which it is its task to penetrate. It is reason also which understands words and to which the Word of God is addressed. Thus it has the power to distinguish the true from the false, but always in relation to a fact which is presented to it either by the experience of the senses or by speech. It has also the capacity to reach immediate inferences readily checked by the facts. But it has absolutely no power to discover a truth which has not been given to it, and still less to create or reconstruct one. It is unable to make any value judgement, particularly concerning the moral questions of good and evil. It does not carry with it any speculative or practical imperative which demands that God take it into consideration. Reason is not a ruler but a worker. Entirely subordinated to the service of the understanding of the "signs" of God, it is reason which performs id̲j̲tihād, but this personal effort contributes nothing, does not produce any material progress in knowledge; it must result only in a more perfect understanding of the revealed texts and in a knowledge of them which is formally more solid and clear.

Furthermore, Ibn Ḥazm does not recognize an area of logical realities consisting of genus and species, of specific differences, of characteristics. He does not abstain from using these terms, but he does so always in the sense which they have in language (fi 'l-lug̲h̲a) and never according to their technical acceptation, except in the case of polemic. Above all he refrains from building up a metaphysical system based on these so-called logical realities. There is no "Ḥazmian theory" of substance and accident, of act and power, of natures, etc. When he makes use of these words it is either in polemic, or to express a common idea, or in referring to the Ḳur'ān or to ḥadīth. Thus, in his Fiṣal, there is a chapter in which he demonstrates that the word "nature" (ṭabī'a) may be used because the Prophet used it in referring to the character of some of his contemporaries. This is very far from the philosophic doctrine of the "natures" as the falāsifa received it from the Greeks.

It is true that in his Kitāb al-Taḳrīb Ibn Ḥazm presents a summary of Aristotelian logic, but it should not be concluded from this that he understood it in the spirit of Aristotle. The examples which he gives and which he draws from the Ḳur'ān and from ḥadīth are already an important indication of this. But nevertheless it is undeniable that, regarded in itself, the logic of Aristotle is closely connected with language; as an instrument for the analysis of linguistic expression it is natural for a Muslim to take an interest in it, and on this point Ibn Ḥazm's attitude is clear. In a dialogue preserved by al-Tawḥīdī between Abū Sa'īd al-Sīrāfī and Mattā b. Yūnus, Abū Sa'īd rejects Aristotelian logic on the ground that it is linked with the Greek language and could not be of the slightest use to the Arabs. In this work Ibn Ḥazm makes a point of mentioning several times that what he obtains from Aristotle is common to all languages and hence can be of profit in the study of Arabic. If the transmission of logic is a grace (luṭf) of God, this is because this science is based on "the capacity for understanding which God has created in man". This leads to the central importance of fahm. It is thus, for example, that the scientific difference is not at all to be regarded as a constituent element of a concept and still less, beyond the concept, as a constituent element of a nature or of a metaphysical essence, but merely as a means of distinguishing (tamyīz) names and beings from one another.

Thus this recourse to Aristotle does not in the least contradict the logical conceptions set out elsewhere by Ibn Ḥazm (in particular in the Kitāb al-Iḥkām). It should however be remembered that several Muslim writers on logic have claimed that Ibn Ḥazm's conception of Aristotelian logic was not authentic, and indeed it is possible in one sense to say that he did not understand the full philosophical implications of Aristotle's work. It is probably more exact to say that he did not wish to attribute such wide implications to logic.

Ibn Ḥazm regarded logic as intended to extract the precise meaning of the texts on which the Muslim faith is based and also (and this is perhaps his chief aim) to reconcile the various texts of the Ḳur'ān and of ḥadīth whose agreement is not immediately obvious and which sometimes appear flatly contradictory. It is therefore a matter of a logic of the bayān. The ẓāhirī conception of language led to a ẓāhirī system of logic which, in its turn, produced a ẓāhirī theology and system of law.

The basic rule is that it is necessary at first to consider all the elements in a text in their general meaning ('ala 'l-'umūm). It applies in the first place to the 'anāṣir al-kalām, which should be understood in their strongest sense: thus a verbal imperative has the general meaning of an obligatory command and should be so understood unless another text is found which is an indication (dalīl) that what is involved is not an order, but an invitation or a piece of advice. Similarly a negative imperative has the immediate meaning of a prohibition, and only secondarily, as the result of a dalīl, can it be considered as a dissuasion. In the second place words are to be understood in the widest sense of their lexicographical meanings. If it is necessary to restrict them to a particular meaning ('ala 'l-k̲h̲uṣūṣ), a dalīl must be found. It can thus be seen that by "generality" Ibn Ḥazm does not mean a conceptional generality: in Arabic the various meanings of a word often have no semantic relation to one another; the 'umūm is thus only the sum of the meanings of a word. If there is no restrictive indication, and if all the possible meanings equally apply, then all may be retained. If certain of them do not apply, then concrete experience plays the part of dalīl, providing sufficient indication that these should be excluded. It is also the relations between the 'umūm and the k̲h̲uṣūṣ which are the basis of the theory of istit̲h̲nā' (exception). When two texts do not agree, the particular is discarded in favour of the general. These are the basic principles of methodology which Ibn Ḥazm persistently applied to all the problems of fiḳh and kalām, adapting them with extreme ingenuity to each case.

Ibn Ḥazm and the sources of the law. As far as the Ḳur'ān is concerned, Ibn Ḥazm's interpretation is always a literal one and a wide one, according to his system of applying the rule of generalization in the understanding of texts. In this way he succeeded in deriving, from verses which appear to have only a limited application, ideas on which he built a whole juridical system. Thus (VI, 164): "wa-lā taksibu kullu nafs^{in} illā ʿalayhā" and (II, 286) "lā yukallifu 'llāhu nafs^{an} illā wusʿahā lahā mā kasabat wa ʿalayhā mā 'ktasabat" are two verses proposed as the Ḳur'ānic foundation for the doctrine of association (Kitāb al-Shirka). It is true that in these matters Ibn Ḥazm is not the only jurist to show great skill in exploiting the texts. In other cases he takes the verses in a very limited sense; for example in the treatise on loans and pledges, on the principle that, in a contract, any condition which is not found in the Book of God is null, he takes the terms of Sūra II, 282 in a very narrow sense.

To ḥadīth he applies very severe standards and, in his juridical controversies, he rejects the majority of those on which his adversaries rely. He applies moreover the ordinary rules of that criticism which he set out himself in his Kitāb al-Iḥkām, showing in this an undeniable sense of history.

He was, in contrast to the Shāfiʿīs, the great opponent of reasoning by analogy (ḳiyās), which he dismisses by demonstrating on the one hand the vagueness of the idea of resemblance and on the other the arbitrary element which exists in the wish to define a point of analogy. In his treatise on law (Kitāb al-Muḥallā), when he is attacking a ḳiyās, he always concentrates on stressing the inconsistencies which it produces: why make use of analogy in one case and not in another?

He also reduced the scope of idjmāʿ by bringing it back to the consensus of the Companions, the only one which is possible and certain.

Ibn Ḥazm as a jurist. He is the most representative of the Ẓāhirī school. On the theoretical level he was a fierce opponent of Ḥanafism and to a lesser degree of Shāfiʿism. But on the theoretical and the practical levels his great enemy was the Mālikism which was strong in Spain in his time. It may even be said that Ibn Ḥazm espoused Ẓāhirism because he saw in it an effective means of opposing and of condemning the tyranny of the Mālikī jurists. In this sense his work as a jurist constituted a liberation of the faithful. There are five aḥkām: the prescribed and the forbidden, that which is advised and that which is reprehended, and the permitted. In order to claim that an act falls into one of the first four categories, it is necessary to adduce a text in its ẓāhir. If no text can be brought, it is clear that the act in question falls into the final category, that of the mubāḥ.

Insensible to the demands brought about by historical changes, Ibn Ḥazm applied himself to reconstructing a legal system stripped of all that he considered to be additions made by the jurists who came after the Prophet and the Companions. He therefore greatly simplifies the law on many points: particularly clear examples of this are found in the chapter on the zakāt in his Kitāb al-Muḥallā, where, for agricultural products, he retains only wheat, barley, dates and zabīb, eliminating all the other types of cereals, fruits and fresh vegetables, and plants used for textiles, dyes and medicines, which other schools had added. Similarly in the muʿāmalāt, he limits considerably the forms of association by strict application of the principle that to each person is returned the fruit of his labour. His treatise on sale is also a return to a legislation inspired by such elementary forms of commerce as those for which the Prophet had laid down rules. On certain points, this return to the situation of the past presents great advantages: for example, in his treatise on marriage Ibn Ḥazm takes a very liberal attitude, defending the rights of women as established by the Ḳur'ān and the Prophet and, in particular, reducing considerably the scope of the right of djabr.

The reason that he did not see the need to develop the law as a consequence of political and social evolution was that he regarded the Law as being primarily a religious reality which gives man the opportunity to obey God and to submit to Him. It is also the link binding the Umma, in its religious form. As for the decisions to take and the conduct to follow at a certain time or in a certain place, it is permissible for a man to seek for the best solution, provided that it is not in any respect contrary to the basic rules established by God. But there is no question of extending these rules themselves. Ibn Ḥazm's juridical work therefore is based on the uṣūl al-fiḳh, but in a special sense. He considers that in fact in the Ḳur'ān everything is aṣl: a Ḳur'ānic rule which could be regarded as of very specialized application is a principle in itself, exactly the same as a very general rule. One should not infer, as did al-Shāfiʿī, starting from what he regarded as a particular case, a general motivation (ʿilla) from which there could be drawn (by taʿlīl) new applications. The Laws of God do not obey any ʿilla; they were not formed either by virtue of any standards of value in themselves or with the intention of dealing with a particular situation of humanity at a certain moment in history. God acts as He wishes and pays regard to nothing but His own will.

Conceived in this way, there is a risk that the law becomes entirely unrelated to the present—which is a form of eternity. Ibn Ḥazm can be accused of this in many instances. Nevertheless, among these abstract and formal considerations, his genius is able to stress some important ideas: respect for the right to the fruits of labour, the obligation to increase the value of, and to develop, one's possessions in the common interest, respect for the law concerning land (clearly expounded in the treatises on muzāraʿa and mughārasa). Finally it should be noted that, although the law properly so-called is confined within narrow limits as being divine law, the field of the mubāḥ is correspondingly enlarged and admits of human initiative; and furthermore human relationships are not exclusively juridical: thus a disposition which may not be written in as a condition in a contract may perfectly well be adopted "through the goodwill" of one of the parties to the contract. Although this is not binding and confers no legal right, it is nevertheless a good action and one which God will reward.

Ibn Ḥazm as "historian of religious ideas". This is the description given to him by Asín Palacios in the important work which he devoted to his life, his works and in particular to the Fiṣal, which is actually an encyclopaedia of religious knowledge, concerning the different religions which had, or had formerly had, any connexion with Islam. The fullness and accuracy of its documentation certainly class it as a historical work. It is clear that

Ibn Ḥazm had read widely, and he reveals that he had himself carried out some of the enquiries and research necessary for it. This is certainly true of the information which he collected on the Jews and the Christians, and it can be seen especially from his polemic with Ibn Naghrila, a Jew of Granada. Thus he is well informed both on the past history of these religions and on their present states. He does not omit, for example, to point out when an ancient doctrine is still held in his time or when it has been modified. His qualities as a historian are undoubted, but the Fiṣal is not only the work of a historian: it is that of a man inspired by a theological ideal. Its general plan is a sign of this: Ibn Ḥazm begins with basic philosophical questions, those concerning knowledge and the possibility of attaining a truth, then he classifies the answers which have been given, eliminating that of the "Sophists", that is the sceptics, and retaining that which admits that it is possible for man to apprehend the truth. He then proceeds to study the problem of the eternity of the world and to reject those doctrines which teach this in favour of an examination of those which believe in a Creation; and by the same process, he deduces the truth of monotheism, and then the reality of a God Who sends to men a revelation through prophets. Thus by degrees he approaches the fundamental dogmas of Islam, whose features are stated more and more clearly as the errors are demolished. In pursuing this line Ibn Ḥazm examines, in order to criticize them, various philosophical and religious systems: speculations on time, space and bodily matter; the astral religions, dualism, metempsychosis, the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, the various conceptions of prophecy in Judaism and in Christianity (concerning the person of Jesus). Finally, when it begins to deal with Islam, the Fiṣal becomes a treatise of heresiography which concentrates on theological and juridical ideas and not on the history of the sects. The various controversial problems of Muslim theology are considered and resolved according to the principles of a systematic Ẓāhirism. Two points should be mentioned: in discussing the non-Muslim religions, Ibn Ḥazm does not attempt to understand them in themselves; he is interested in them only in relation to dogmas or problems which enable him to compare them with Islam. Thus he attacks the Jews for their limited conception of Prophecy and of the Law, and he attempts to find out their opinions on "abrogation", an idea which is essentially Muslim. Similarly, he attacks the Gospels, demonstrating that they show no guarantee of being a revealed text, since they have not the nature of one (the Ḳur'ān being taken as the criterion), and that they do not even achieve the credibility of ḥadīth, since they are totally lacking in isnād (Ibn Ḥazm demonstrates this from the prologue to St. Luke's Gospel). The second point to be noted arises from the first: Ibn Ḥazm is always well informed, whether he is writing of non-Muslims or of Muslims whom he is criticizing. He sets out the positions of his adversaries honestly, accurately, and often in detail: this shows him to be a good historian of ideas. Unfortunately he never attempts to understand the importance and the gravity of the problems which occupy the men with whom he disagrees. Starting from the Ḳur'ānic principle that one may not question God, he regards philosophical and theological speculation as no more than the expression of the vain curiosity of a disobedient human spirit. Thus, from the beginning he has no sympathy with the basic steps which form the various points at issue. This is why his sole aim is to trap his interlocutors by means of his dialectic, to make them contradict themselves by processes which are merely splitting hairs over verbal expressions or disproving the validity of their ideas by confronting them with facts of experience which are striking rather than convincing. To give one simple example: he accuses the Muʿtazilīs, who set a limit to the power of God, of attributing to God a weakness greater than that ever experienced by bugs, fleas or worms. Although he does not always go to such extremes, Ibn Ḥazm often has a tendency to do so. This seems more likely to be a result of anger than of innate temperament. Behind these exaggerations there lies a state of mind, an outlook on the world, and a Ẓāhirī conviction. Ibn Ḥazm does not enter into the deeper thoughts of others but he is very well able to understand their methods of argument: he therefore skilfully makes use of the argumentum ad hominem.

The Islam of Ibn Ḥazm and his theology. At the beginning of the Kitāb al-Muḥallā there is a chapter entitled al-tawḥīd, which consists of a summary of the ʿaḳīda of Ibn Ḥazm. The first obligation upon every man, without which there is no islām, is to know in his heart with certainty and complete sincerity, with a knowledge in which there remains no trace of doubt, and also to pronounce with his tongue, that there is no god but God and that Muḥammad is His Messenger. He does not consider the question of the ʿaḳd bi 'l-ḳalb as implying the development of an interior religious life. It is an "act of the soul" which, during religious worship, accompanies the actions of the body. This statement is based solely on the Ḳur'ān (XCVIII, 5). Ibn Ḥazm's thinking on this point is clearly shown in another passage, on the subject of the niyya, of which he states that in order for it to be authentic there is no necessity for it to be guaranteed by another earlier niyya, since then there would be an intention of the intention, and this would proceed to infinity. He mistrusts the recesses of the human conscience. It is not necessary to cultivate in oneself, in one's heart, a perfect purity of intention; the heart intervenes only in order to extend itself beyond its own confines, on hearing the word of God, to takeit s part in the prescribed external actions. The necessity for a verbal profession of faith is implied in the ḥadīth of the Prophet: "I have received the order to fight against men until they testify . . .". Only the tongue can be compelled by force; this being so, Ibn Ḥazm demonstrates by philosophic methods, by a study of temporality and of time, that the world is created (muḥdath), that it has a Creator (muḥdith, called also khāliḳ), and that this Creator is unique. He created the world without any reason forcing Him to do so (bi-ghayri ʿilla awdjabat ʿalayhi). The soul is created; it is no different from the spirit: it is the living part of man, the part endowed with sensibility and with speech. Some *ḥadīth*s refer indifferently to either the soul or the spirit as being in the hands of God when a person is asleep. The Throne is created, for it is said of God that He is the Ruler of the Throne (IX, 130), and whatever has a master is created. Finally, nothing may be likened to God.

Prophecy is a means by which true knowledge may be obtained. The proof of this is that there are many facts which we can know only if they are reported to us (knowledge by khabar). Muḥammad is the seal of the prophets: God by his milla has cancelled all the others and He requires all men and all *djinn*s to follow the Ḳur'ānic Law. There have been other prophets, some mentioned in the Ḳur'ān and others not (IV, 149). It is an obligation (farḍ) to believe in them all. They are men created like all other men and are servants of God.

Paradise is a place of sojourn created for the believers. Hell is a created abode, but no believer remains there eternally. God decides which Muslims shall go there: those whose great sins (kabā'ir) outweigh their good actions. Later, through intercession (s̲h̲afā'a), they are permitted to leave it and to enter Paradise. These two abodes are eternal. Those in Paradise eat, drink, have sexual relations, wear clothes and experience pleasure without ever knowing any suffering. Those in hell are submitted to the tortures which are described in the Ḳur'ān. All this is true literally, not metaphorically, for the Ḳur'ān is tibyān li-kulli s̲h̲ay' (XVI, 89); it is necessary to believe in the truth of all the invisible realities which are spoken of in the Book, even though the reader may not understand how they are so (nu'minu bi-hā wa-lā nadrī kayfa hiya). Anyone who refuses to accept one letter of the Ḳur'ān which is in the hands of the Muslims, from the Fātiḥa or Umm al-Kitāb right up to the two final sūras (al-mu'awwid̲h̲atān), is a kāfir. No person possesses a secret concerning religion (cf. II, 159, 174 and III, 187). It is necessary to believe in the angels, in the d̲j̲inns, in the Resurrection, in the ṣirāṭ, in the scales, in the basin, in the pages on which the angels record the actions of men and in the final rendering of the account of those acts: all this is real. Examples of this account: if a man thinks of a good action and does not do it, this is recorded to his credit as one good action; if he performs it, it is recorded as ten; if he thinks of a bad action and refrains from committing it for God's sake, this is recorded for him as a good action; if he is forced to refrain from it or refrains for any other reason, it is not recorded at all; if he commits it, it is recorded against him as one single bad action. If an unbeliever commits a bad action, then becomes a Muslim and continues in this evil, account is taken in the next life of what he did in his s̲h̲irk and in his islām; if he repents in his islām, that which he did in his s̲h̲irk is disregarded; if he has done good while an unbeliever and then embraces Islam, he is rewarded for his good works done both while he was an unbeliever and while he was a Muslim; if he remains an unbeliever, he is rewarded in this world for the good he has done, but gains nothing from it in the next life.

If anyone, through his ignorance or misunderstanding of Arabic, is incapable of knowing all this, he must, when it has been explained to him, believe in his heart and utter with his tongue the profession of faith, adding that all which Muḥammad revealed is true and that all religions apart from his are false.

No person is allowed to refer to God by names other than those which He has used of Himself, nor to describe Him in different terms from those which He Himself has taught us. One may not use derivations (is̲h̲tiḳāḳ) in order to apply to Him a name which He has not given to Himself. Thus, He is seated on the Throne, but he may not be invoked by calling him the Seated. On His attributes, Ibn Ḥazm states that God's knowledge is ḥaḳḳ. It is eternal and extends to all that is and all that shall be; Similarly there are no limits to His power, which is capable of bringing about that which is impossible (muḥāl); God has power even over that which will never be (XIX, 35). It is He Who orders all that He has created, Who makes necessary the necessary (awd̲j̲aba 'l-wād̲j̲ib) and Who makes possible the possible (amkana 'l-mumkin), etc. God possesses: 'izza, d̲j̲alāl, ikrām, yad, yadāni, 'ayn, a'yun, kibriyā'. All this is true. It stems from Him and from no-one else. It is not possible to identify, as the Mu'tazila do, God's knowledge with His essence, that is with Him Himself, since in no text is God referred to as Knowledge. The same reasoning applies to His other attributes. When men say "Knower", meaning "God", we understand exactly the same by the two names. But when we say that God is the knower of all things, we think of the things as being known by God. These names, in relation to God, are descriptions (a'lām) which are not derived from His attributes. Conversely, it is not permitted to derive attributes from them. In this, Ibn Ḥazm disagrees with the As̲h̲'arīs who practice is̲h̲tiḳāḳ. Their mistake, he maintains, was to wish to preserve the reality of the names of God while remaining within the Mu'tazilī system of formulating problems. A careful reading of the Ḳur'ān reveals, as Ibn Ḥazm saw, that there is no risk of the attributes multiplying the Divine Essence, but that they are a sort of extension of the tawḥīd and of the laysa ka-mit̲h̲lihi s̲h̲ay': there is no knowledge except in God; there is no power except in God, since He is the one who knows and is powerful. And it is He from whom we learn this.

The vision which the faithful will have of God derives from a faculty (ḳuwwa) which they do not possess in this world. Certainly on earth man can see colours and forms, but God is far above this. Furthermore, unlike the sight of ordinary things, which may not be seen clearly or the sight of which may cause distress, the Prophet has stated that nobody will be harmed by his vision of God (lā tuḍāmūna fī ru'yatihi).

God created human actions, both good and bad. He must be regarded as the creator of free choice (ik̲h̲tiyār), of the will (irāda), and of knowledge (ma'rifa) in human souls. In the Fiṣal Ibn Ḥazm states that God created istiṭā'a. In short, man is created free in all his acts, and that wisely, for God puts each being in his rightful place. Freedom belongs to man while still remaining in the hand of God.

All these articles of faith, briefly set out in this chapter of the Muḥallā, are developed in the course of many controversies, in particular with the Mu'tazilīs and the As̲h̲'arīs, in the Fiṣal.

Concerning the relations of faith with istidlāl, it is stated, in this Kitāb al-Tawḥīd, that he who believes firmly in his heart and who declares his faith with his tongue receives help from God, whether or not this is accompanied by recognizable indications. This question forms the subject of a very interesting risāla, on Faith, addressed by Ibn Ḥazm to his friend Ibn al-Ḥawwāt̲h̲. In it Ibn Ḥazm studies the delicate problem of taḳlīd and demonstrates that to follow the teaching of the Prophet is not to imitate blindly.

It can thus be seen that the principles of the ẓāhir were extended from juridical methodology to theological. This simplifies the problems and may appear inadequate to a theoretician. But it is a fact that life has its own logic, which easily surmounts the insurmountable theoretical contradictions which defeat speculative logic. In following the teaching of language, which is the very expression of life, Ibn Ḥazm was able easily to deride the embarrassments of kalām and condemn it.

Ibn Ḥazm's political ideas. By tradition and through the events of his life, Ibn Ḥazm was a legitimist, a partisan of the Umayyads. It may seem surprising that a religious thinker of such strict principles should have supported a dynasty which the Muslim historians have often reproached for its lack of fidelity to the spirit of Islam. Ibn Ḥazm's reasons probably arose mainly from personal motives of loyalty and friendship. In addition however, he seems to have regarded the Umayyads as representing Arabism. All his religious thought moves against an Arabic background. This appears in an unusual way in his work entitled D̲j̲amharat ansāb al-ʿArab. He writes "God has said: We have created you from a male and a female and We have divided you into nations and into tribes so that you shall recognize each other, but assuredly the most noble among you in the eyes of God is the most devout. Although God has decreed that the most noble is the most devout, even if he be the son of a black prostitute, while the rebel and the unbeliever is placed at the lowest level, even if he be the son of prophets, He has nevertheless made it an aim, by creating us in nations and in tribes, that men should give recognition to each other. Consequently the science of genealogy is of necessity a science of great dignity". There are various types of genealogical research. Some are religious and obligatory for all Muslims, such as knowing the genealogy of the Prophet or making sure that the caliphate is in the hands of a Ḳurays̲h̲ī, or of ascertaining the family connexions of the person with whom one wishes to marry in order to avoid entering the prohibited degrees. Others are farḍ ʿala 'l-kifāya: thus it is necessary for the Umma to retain the memory of the genealogy of the Muhād̲j̲irūn and the Anṣār. Another application which he gives is: "Certain jurists make a distinction, in regard to the levying of the poll-tax and the right to take into slavery, between Arabs and non-Arabs. Thus they make a distinction between the status of the Christians of the tribe of Tag̲h̲lib and that of the remainder of the People of the Book . . .". This being so, Ibn Ḥazm generalizes: "God has related to us in the Ḳurʾān the issue of the generations from which the prophets have emerged. This constitutes the science of genealogy. The Prophet himself spoke of ancestral descent: 'We are', he said, 'sons of al-Naḍr b. Kināna'; and he recalled the subdivisions of the tribes of the Anṣār, when he assessed their respective merits . . .".

This justification for research into the genealogies of the Arabs clearly shows that Ibn Ḥazm attached to it great importance. He delights in comparing the character of the Spaniards and the Ḳuraysh̲īs, in their good qualities and in their faults. The letter on the merits of the inhabitants of al-Andalus preserved by al-Maḳḳarī contains some significant details on this point, while at the same time it reveals in Ibn Ḥazm a certain chauvinism. He certainly praises Bag̲h̲dād and Baṣra, which were in advance of the other towns in raising the standard of learning. He adds: "As for our own countries, they are in this matter in the situation referred to in the proverb: the people to whom least attention is paid in a country are its inhabitants. I have read in the Gospels that Jesus said: No one is a prophet in his own country". There was no better way of saying that it was time for Spain to stop admiring the East and to think of appreciating its own glories. It seems that the three ideals which were held by Ibn Ḥazm were Ẓāhirism, Arabism and Umayyad Spain. When his political ideal was lost, it can be understood how he devoted all his energies to the other two, seeing in them the only hope of salvation, or at any rate a sufficient reason for continuing the struggle.

After his death, Ibn Ḥazm was attacked by the ḳāḍī Ibn al-ʿArabī [q.v.], who was much influenced by the thinking of al-G̲h̲azālī, in a work entitled Ḳitāb al-Ḳawāṣim wa 'l-ʿawāṣim. In the 6th/12th century, this great adversary of their school was attacked by some Mālikī theologians: ʿAbd al-Ḥaḳḳ b. ʿAbd Allāh and Ibn Zarḳūn (who wrote a Ḳitāb al-Muʿallā, against the Muḥallā). On the other hand, the botanist Ibn al-Rūmiyya and the great mystic of Murcia, Ibn al-ʿArabī [q.v.], were supporters of Ibn Ḥazm. Ibn al-ʿArabī wrote, under the title of Muʿallā, a summary of the Muḥallā. He showed himself to be Ẓāhirī in matters of law, but, still more important, the concept of the ẓāhir played an important part in the mystic anthropology of Ibn al-ʿArabī, who is however classed among the greatest esoteric thinkers.

Today, as is demonstrated by numerous studies on him in Muslim countries, also by research and by editions of manuscripts, there is a renewed interest in Ibn Ḥazm. A study of him can certainly be of benefit to contemporary Islamic thought and help it to solve many problems.

IBN ḤIBBĀN, ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ḤIBBĀN AL-TAMĪMĪ AL-BUSTĪ AL-SHĀFIʿĪ, traditionist. He was born at Bust [q.v.] ca. 270/883-4 into a family of Arab descent (see his pedigree in Yāḳūt, i, 613 and Ibn Ḥadjar, Lisān al-Mīzān, v, 114). He travelled in search of traditions through many countries from Transoxania to Egypt (list of places and scholars visited, in Yāḳūt, i, 613-5). Of his teachers none had a greater influence upon him than Abū Bakr Ibn Khuzayma al-Shāfiʿī of Nīsābūr who taught him how to ascertain the true meaning of a tradition and to deduce from it all its legal implications. After his return to Sidjistān he was opposed by some Ḥanbalīs because he taught that Allāh is infinite and rejected their anthropomorphic belief in al-ḥadd li-'llāh (Subkī, Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya, ii, 141 f.; i, 190; Ibn Ḥadjar, Lisān al-Mīzān, v, 113). They even accused him of zandaḳa because he said that prophecy consists in knowledge and in action (al-nubuwwa ʿilmun wa ʿamal; Ibn Hadjar, op. cit., v, 113, 12). So he went to Samarḳand, where, by his great knowledge of ḥadīth and fiḳh as well as by his sagacity and sound judgement, he won the favour of some influential persons and was appointed (ca. 320/932) judge of Samarḳand, where the amīr Abu 'l-Muẓaffar built for him and his many pupils a ṣuffa (see Idrīsī, d. 405/1014, Ta'rīkh Samarḳand quoted by Ibn Ḥadjar, op. cit., v, 114). In this position he had many enemies; one of them, al-Sulaymānī (311-404/923-1014), asserts that Ibn Ḥibbān owed his appointment to Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Muṣʿabī, for whom he had written a book on the Ḳarmaṭīs, and that the people of Samarḳand drove him out (Yāḳūt, i, 619, 17). From his pupil Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyiʿ (331-405/933-1014) we learn (Dhahabī, Tadhkirat al-ḥuffāẓ, iii, 126; Yāḳūt, i, 615) that he met Ibn Ḥibbān for the first time in Nīsābūr in 334/945-6 and served him as his mustamlī. Then Ibn Ḥibbān went to Nasā' as judge; in 337/948 he came back to Nīsābūr and built a khānḳāh. Three years later he left Nīsābūr for good and went back to Sidjistān. According to al-Sulaymānī (Yāḳūt, i, 619) he presented Ibn Bābū with his book on the Ḳarmaṭīs and was given a post in the administration. He died at Bust in his eighties on 21 Shawwāl 354/20 October 965. His tomb was still visited in the days of Yāḳūt.

Ibn Ḥibbān was a prolific writer, as is shown by some 40 books of his which al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī recommended for study. He had left his house and library at Nīsābūr as an endowment so that scholars might copy his works. But most of them had perished in the stormy times after his death (Yāḳūt i, 616, 6-618,5; 618,21-619,4). Few of them have come down to us; amongst them al-Musnad al-ṣaḥīḥ ʿala 'l-taḳāsīm wa 'l-anwāʿ; in it the traditions are more systematically arranged than in the books of his predecessors. It was still studied in the 19th century (Shawkānī, Ithāf al-akābir, 69; see also Ibn Sālim al-Makkī, al-Imdād, 54, and Kūrānī, al-Anam, Ḥaydarābād 1328, 35). His (Ta'rīkh) al-Thiḳāt is an authoritative work on the trustworthiness of the transmitters of traditions, currently referred to by Dhahabī, Ibn Ḥadjar and other critics. A short extract of it is the Kitāb Mashāhīr ʿulamā' al-amṣār, ed. M. Fleischhammer in Bibliotheca Islamica, xxii (1959). We also possess one of his books on adab, the Rawḍat al-ʿuḳalā' wa-nuzhat al-fuḍalā', Cairo 1328.

IBN ḤIDJDJA, ABŪ BAKR (or ABU 'L-MAḤĀSIN) TAḲĪ 'L-DĪN B. ʿALĪ B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-ḤAMAWĪ AL-ḲĀDIRĪ AL-ḤANAFĪ AL-AZRĀRĪ, one of the most famous poets and prose-writers of the Mamlūk period. Born in 767/1366 at Ḥamāt, he first practised the trade of a button-maker (azrārī), then applied himself to study, travelling for this purpose to Damascus, Mosul and Cairo. On his return from Egypt in 791/1389, he witnessed the great burning of Damascus during the siege by Barḳūḳ [q.v.], which gave him the theme for his first literary work, an epistle to Ibn Makānis (MS Berlin no. 9784). Thanks to the patronage of al-Bārizī, private secretary to the Sultan al-Mu'ayyad (815-24/1412-21), he held the office of munshī in the dīwān of Cairo; in 822/1419 he accompanied the amīr Ibrāhīm on his campaign into Asia Minor. After al-Bāzirī's death (in 830/1427), he returned to Ḥamāt, where he died on 15 Shaʿbān 837/27 March 1434.

Ibn Ḥidjdja left an important body of works, both in prose and in poetry. Of his poems, which he collected under the title al-Thamarāt al-shahiyya fi 'l-fawākih al-ḥamawiyya wa 'l-zawā'id al-miṣriyya (MSS: Cairo, Berlin, Escorial), the most famous is his Badīʿiyya (or Taḳdīm Abī Bakr), in praise of the Prophet; comprising 143 verses, it contains 136 figures of badīʿ, mentioned by name. On it, in 826/1433, the author wrote a commentary entitled Khizānat al-adab wa ghāyat al-arab (publ. Calcutta 1230 as an appendix to the Dīwān of al-Mutanabbī; Būlāḳ 1273, 1291; Cairo 1301). As his Badīʿiyya was written to rival those of ʿIzz al-Dīn al-Mawṣilī and Ṣafī al-Dīn Ḥillī, he attempted to prove its superiority in Thubūt al-ḥudjdja ʿalā 'l-Mawṣilī wa 'l-Ḥillī li-'bn Ḥidjdja (MS: Berlin). His anthology of poetry and prose, Thamarāt al-awrāḳ, contains the account of the author's travels from Cairo to Damascus (publ. Būlāḳ, on the margins of the Muḥāḍarāt al-udabā' of al-Rāghib al-Iṣfahānī; Cairo 1300, having on the margins his Ta'bīl al-gharīb; on the margins of al-Ibshīhī's al-Mustaṭraf, Cairo 1320-1). Another anthology, Madjrā 'l-sawābiḳ, contains verses of Ibn Ḥidjdja and Ibn Nubāta on horses (MS: Gotha).

His treatise on badīʿ, Kashf al-lithām ʿan wadjh al-tawriya wa 'l-istikhdām, was printed at Beirut in 1312. His Yāḳūt al-kalām fī mā nāb al-Shām was published in MMIA, xxxi (1956). Ibn Ḥidjdja also made new versions and synopses of several older works, notably Ibn al-Habbāriyya's al-Ṣādiḥ wa 'l-bāghim (see the synopsis in al-Shirwānī, Nafḥat al-Yaman, Cairo 1325, 161-7); but his most famous and most valuable work is his collection of official letters, diplomas and private correspondence written while he was working at the Mamlūk chancery, Ḳahwat al-inshā' (numerous MSS, notably Dār al-Kutub and Escorial).

IBN HINDŪ, ABU 'L-FARADJ ʿALĪ B. AL-ḤUSAYN AL-KĀTIB, secretary of the chancery, man of letters, poet and physician, a native of Rayy but educated at Nīshāpūr, where he was introduced to Greek science. He belonged at first to the dīwān of ʿAḍud al-Dawla, for whom he wrote a number of letters; he appears at Arradjān in 354/965 during the visit of al-Mutanabbī, and he seems to have remained in the service of the Buwayhids until his death, probably in 410/1019 rather than 420/1029.

In addition to a Dīwān, which is in part preserved in later anthologies, he was the author of a number of works, one of which, Miftāḥ al-ṭibb, is still in manuscript, and another, al-Kalim al-rūḥāniyya min al-ḥikam al-yūnāniyya, was published in Damascus in 1318/1900; there is attributed to him also a K. al-Nafs, al-Maḳāla al-mushawwiḳa fi 'l-madkhal ilā ʿilm al-falak (al-falsafa?), al-Risāla al-mashriḳiyya, Unmudhadj al-ḥikma.

IBN ḤINZĀBA [see IBN AL-FURĀT].

IBN ḤIRZIHIM, ABU 'L-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. ISMĀʿĪL B. MUḤAMMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH, jurist and ṣūfī of the school of al-Ghazālī. He was a native of Fās. Al-Tādilī, his earliest biographer, does not give the date of his birth. It may however be conjectured that he was born during the second half of the reign of Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn; he died in the last ten days of Shaʿbān 559/July 1164, that is to say about sixteen years after the fall of the Almoravid dynasty.

While quite young, he knew and associated with a shaykh by the name of Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-Naḥwī (d. 513/1119-20), who was very devoted to the doctrine of al-Ghazālī. But it was above all to his paternal uncle, Abū Muḥammad Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ḥirzihim, that ʿAlī owed his initiation into the Ṣūfism of al-Ghazālī. This relative (with whom he must not be confused) had made the journey to the East and stayed in Syria and Palestine, where he had the good fortune to meet the master Abū Ḥāmid. ʿAlī Ibn Ḥirzihim, in his turn, had the opportunity, when teaching in Fās, to confer the benefits of his learning upon such distinguished intellects as the young and attentive Abū Madyan Shuʿayb who, eager for instruction, travelled to Morocco in search of teachers.

During the difficult days when the Almoravid inquisition was becoming rigorous, Ibn Ḥirzihim remained faithful to his convictions. But, in the stifling atmosphere created by the intransigent Mālikism of the Almoravid fuḳahā', he probably suffered agonies of doubt and fear. One day, he is said to have resolved to burn the copy of the Iḥyā' that he had been keeping in his house, in spite of the threats and demands of the authorities. He was then subjected, in a dream, to a severe beating, the effects of which he could still feel even after waking up. This divine warning proved salutory. Under various circumstances he indeed showed that he was not in the least afraid to risk his life and peaceful existence in order to defend and win respect for his opinions. He suffered imprisonment in Fās. The miraculous intervention of the still living saint Abū Yaʿzā, the Sīdī Bū ʿAzzā of the people, saved him. But it was the incident which marked the death of Ibn Barradjān which allowed Ibn Ḥirzihim to express with full force his condemnation of the persecution waged by the fuḳahā' against Ṣūfism and philosophical speculation.

ʿAlī b. Yūsuf having ordered the corpse of Ibn Barradjān [q.v.] to be thrown onto the town dung-heap, Ibn Ḥirzihim, who was staying in Marrākush at the time, made a vigorous protest against the degrading decree and, disregarding the prince's orders, caused the population of the capital to be publicly invited to do honour to the Ṣūfī scholar by a funeral that was worthy of him.

Ibn Ḥirzihim cannot be compared, for talent and intellectual lustre, with Ibn al-ʿArīf, Ibn Barradjān or even with Abū Bakr al-Mayūrḳī of Granada, the three representatives, with Ibn al-Ḳasī, of the Spanish Ṣūfism so implacably opposed to the Almoravid régime; nevertheless he belongs incontestably, like Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-Naḥwī, with that group of shaykhs, few in number but courageous and at times brilliant, who, in Spain particularly and to a lesser extent in the Maghrib, had the courage and strength of character to make a solemn protest against the severities and abuses of the Almoravid inquisition, thus helping to prepare for the fall of the dynasty, which Ibn Tūmart, another shaykh claiming kinship with the school of al-Ghazālī, was to overthrow.

Sīdī ʿAlī's tomb stands some fifteen kilometres to the south-east of Fās, at Sidi Ḥarāzem, where there is a hot spring much frequented by the townsfolk.

IBN HISHĀM, ABŪ MUḤAMMAD ʿABD AL-MALIK, a scholar best known for his work on the biography of Muḥammad. His family was usually said to be of Ḥimyarite origin, and had moved from Baṣra to Egypt, where he was born and spent his life. His knowledge of genealogy and grammar was outstanding. He died in Egypt on 13 Rabīʿ II 218/8 May 833 or in 213/828. His Kitāb al-Tīdjān on South Arabian antiquities is extant. He is chiefly famous, however, for his edition of the Sīra (Life of Muḥammad) of Ibn Isḥāḳ [q.v.], which became the basic work on this subject. The Sīra of Ibn Isḥāḳ is not preserved as a single work, but passages from it, which have been omitted by Ibn Hishām, are preserved in the writings of historians like al-Ṭabarī and al-Azraḳī. Comparison shows that what Ibn Hishām has omitted was chiefly material not directly relevant to the career of Muḥammad. He also gave more accurate versions of some of the poems in the Sīra, and explained difficult words and phrases. This accounts for the great popularity of Ibn Hishām's edition. (The additions by Ibn Hishām can be conveniently studied in A.

Guillaume's translation of Ibn Isḥāḳ, where they have been separated from the main text.) Ibn Hishām derived his knowledge of Ibn Isḥāḳ's work from Ziyād al-Bakkāʾī (d. 183/799), who lived mostly in Kūfa, and may have travelled to ʿIrāḳ for purposes of study. (For al-Bakkāʾī, cf. Ibn Khallikān, no. 247; de Slane, i, 545). The chief transmitter of Ibn Hishām's work was a pupil of his called Ibn al-Barḳī (see al-Dhahabī, Tadhkirat al-ḥuffaẓ, Ḥaydarābād 1955-8, class 9, nos. 45, 46). See also SĪRA.

IBN HISHĀM, DJAMĀL AL-DĪN ABŪ MUḤ. ʿABD ALLĀH B. YŪSUF B. ʿABD ALLĀH B. YŪSUF B. AḤMAD B. ʿABD ALLĀH AL-NAḤWĪ, faḳīh and grammarian, was born in Cairo in Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 708/April 1310. There he studied the Islamic sciences, particularly under ʿAbd al-Laṭīf b. al-Muraḥḥal, Tādj al-Dīn al-Fākihānī and Tādj al-Dīn al-Tibrīzī. From the Spanish grammarian Abū Ḥayyān al-Gharnāṭī he heard only the exposition of the Dīwān of Zuhayr Ibn Abī Sulmā. Thereafter he was hostile to him.

Ibn Hishām lived in Cairo; we know of only two journeys, made to Mecca in 749/1348 and 756/1355. A Shāfiʿī faḳīh, he became a professor of Tafsīr (Ḳurʾānic exegesis) at the Ḳubba Manṣūriyya. Being unable to obtain a professorship in a madrasa of his own madhhab, he went over to the Ḥanbalīs, who provided what he was seeking in one of their madrasas in Cairo (according to Brockelmann, II², 27); this was five years before his death. It is not clear why this celebrated man was kept in the background. The reason may have been jealousy. In any case, it is certain that his reputation was very great. Ibn Khaldūn (Muḳaddima, iii, 249; Eng. tr., Rosenthal, iii, 289) recognized Ibn Hishām as one of those very rare men who, in the history of Arabic grammar, have succeeded in mastering the whole of their subject. He did indeed have an extremely good knowledge of its entire systematization. He for his part was not without envy: al-Shawkānī (i, 401) suggests that his hostility to Abū Ḥayyān was the result of a secret desire to gain recognition and greater eminence, by attacking a master with a great reputation for learning.

In grammar, Ibn Hishām's general method was one that had been long practised—résumé and commentary (or simply commentary). Just as Ibn al-Ḥādjib [q.v.] had composed and commented on al-Shāfiya and al-Kāfiya, Ibn Hishām wrote the Ḳaṭr al-nadā and the Shudhūr al-dhahab and commented on them; but he succeeded in producing a far-reaching work, with an unusual method of presentation, the Mughnī 'l-labīb, a description of syntax arranged to start from each particle, either conjunction, preposition or some other, in alphabetical order. This work won the complete admiration of Ibn Khaldūn (iii, 283; tr. Rosenthal, iii, 324-5).

Ibn Hishām died in Cairo while still quite young on Friday 5 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 761/18 September 1360, leaving a considerable number of grammatical works, several of which are lost—nos. 4, 5, 7, 10, 13, 15, 21, 24, 25 (list, Tardjamat Ibn Hishām, 7-8, by the editor of the Sharh Shudhūr al-dhadab and the Sharḥ Ḳaṭr al-nadā, see below).

Remarks: (1) In the Arabic historical sources on the question of Ibn Hishām's full name, two forms are to be distinguished, that of Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī, his earliest biographer, followed by Brockelmann II², 27, and S II, 16, and retained here; and that of al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 293, reproduced in *EI*¹ in the corresponding article: it suppresses b. Yūsuf b. ʿAbd Allāh and adds the nisba al-Anṣārī. With the evidence at present available the question cannot be settled. (2) Ibn Taghrībirdī (v, 173) speaks of an Ibn Hishām who was at first Ḥanafī, then Ḥanbalī. Brockelmann (II², 27 and S II, 16) concludes from this that Ibn Hishām successively adopted the three madhhabs, Ḥanafī, Shāfiʿī and Ḥanbalī. This is not evident: Ibn Taghrībirdī mentions only two rites and he may have been mistaken about the first.

Works: (1) Ḳaṭr al-nadā wa-ball al-ṣadā and its Sharḥ, translated into French by A. Goguyer (Leiden 1887). (2) Shudhūr al-dhahab fī maʿrifat kalām al-ʿArab and its Sharḥ. These both deal for the most part with syntax, and are developed at moderate length, the second a little more fully than the first (numerous commentaries). They have been published several times; note the very convenient edition of Muḥ. Muḥyi 'l-Dīn ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, Cairo, 11th ed. 1963/1383 for the 1st; 5th ed. 1951/1371 for the 2nd. (3) Mughnī 'l-labīb ʿan kutub al-aʿārīb, the great treatise on syntax. A first draft made in Mecca (749/1348) was lost on the return journey; the present text was rewritten, also in Mecca (756/1355; see the beginning of the work). This treatise was printed several times, notably at Cairo in 1302 (2 vols. with the commentary of Muḥ. al-Amīr in the margin), 1305, 1307, 1317, and 1348; 1385/1965, 2nd ed. of Muḥ. Muḥyi 'l-Dīn ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, the most practical one. Numerous commentaries are in existence; note al-Fatḥ al-ḳarīb of al-Suyūṭī, for the Shawāhid, published Cairo 1322, 1324, etc. (4) al-Iʿrāb ʿan ḳawāʿid al-iʿrāb, an introduction to the study of the Arabic sentence, published (73-92) and translated into French (155-223) by S. de Sacy in his Anthologie grammaticale arabe (Paris 1829), published (after the Sharḥ Ḳaṭr al-nadā) Būlāḳ 1253; several commentaries. (5) Mūḳid al-adhhān wa-mūḳiẓ al-wasnān, on some grammatical difficulties, Cairo 1279, in a Madjmūʿa. (6) Awḍaḥ al-masālik ilā Alfiyyat Ibn Mālik, a commentary on this Alfiyya (also known incorrectly under the title al-Tawḍīḥ); printed several times, particularly Cairo 1304, 1316.

The four following studies, in manuscript, were included by al-Suyūṭī in al-Ashbāh wa 'l-naẓāʾir fi 'l-naḥw (published Ḥaydarābād, 2nd ed., 4 vols., 1359-61), respectively at ii, 298-316, iii, 187-205, iv, 32-40, and 111-22; references omitted by Brockelmann.—(7) Sharḥ al-Ḳaṣīda al-lughziyya fi 'l-masāʾil al-naḥwiyya, commentary on versified grammatical puzzles. (8) Risāla fi 'ntiṣāb (Iʿrāb) lughat^an^ wa-faḍl^an^ wa-iʿrāb khilāf^an^ wa-ayḍ^an^ wa 'l-kalām ʿalā halumma djarr^an^, grammatical study on these expressions; it is the same as Masāʾil fi 'l-naḥw wa-adjwibatuhā. (9) Masʾalat iʿtirāḍ al-sharṭ ʿala 'l-sharṭ, discussion of a particular construction of conditional propositions. (10) Fawḥ al-shadhā fī masʾalat kadhā, a revised edition, on the question of kadhā, of the K. al-Shadhā fī aḥkām kadhā of Abū Ḥayyān. (11) Alghāz, a collection of grammatical difficulties, dedicated to the sultan al-Malik al-Kāmil (d. 757/1356), printed Cairo 1304. (12) Sharḥ Bānat Suʿād, commentary on the poem of Kaʿb b. Zuhayr in honour of the Prophet, edited by I. Guidi (Leipzig 1871) and Cairo 1304, 1307.

In al-Ashbāh wa 'l-naẓāʾir of al-Suyūṭī, referred to above, iv, 2-32 and 41-50, various grammatical studies of Ibn Hishām can also be read; we should note 2-9, on interrogation and its particles, 23-6 and 28-9, on some verses of the Ḳur'ān; then other studies, iv, 92-111. A list of the other works still in manuscript will be found under nos. 7, 8, 10, 17, 18, 21, 22, 24, and 25 of Brockelmann; note no. 17 on a subject that is unusual for Ibn Hishām.

Note: Another edition of Shudhūr al-dhahab and its Sharḥ was published in Cairo 1381/1962, by ʿAbd al-Mutaʿāl al-Ṣaʿīdī.

Bibliography: In addition to the references in the text: first, Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī, al-Durar al-kāmina, ii, 308-10 (no. 2248), Ḥaydarābād 1349; Suyūṭī refers to this and reproduces it, Bughya, 293 (except for the form of the name), in résumé Ḥusn al-muḥāḍara, i, 257, Cairo 1321; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, vi, 191-2, has simply copied the text of the Bughya; Ibn Taghrībirdī, v, 172-3, only adds Ḥanafī (see above) and the mention of the cemetery; Shawkānī, al-Badr al-ṭāliʿ, i, 400-2, Cairo 1348, depends on Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī; the K. al-Rawḍ al-ʿāṭir, 148 v. of Nuʿmānī (in MS, Berlin 9886) could not be used; M. S. Howell, Gr. of Cl. Ar. Lang., i, Preface, xxvi-xxviii; Brockelmann, II², 27-31 and S II, 16-20, provide information about existing manuscripts and commentaries. (H. Fleisch)

IBN HUBAL, Muhadhdhib al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Aḥmad, physician, born in Baghdād in about 515/1122, who at first studied grammar and fiḳh in the Niẓāmiyya but rapidly turned to medicine. He next became physician in ordinary to the Shāh-i Arman in Khilāṭ and acquired great wealth, then entered the service of Badr al-Dīn Lu'lu' in Mārdīn, and finally went to al-Mawṣil. At the age of 75 he had the misfortune to become blind, but lived on until 610/1213. His chief work is entitled al-Mukhtārāt fi 'l-ṭibb (ed. Ḥaydarābād, 4 vols., 1362-4/1943-4); De Koning has published two chapters of it in his Traité sur le calcul dans les reins et dans la vessie, 186 ff. Ibn Hubal, who was also a poet, left a son, Shams al-Dīn Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad, who in his turn became a physician and practised at the court of the Saldjūḳid Kaykāwus, where he died.

IBN HUBAYRA, name of two persons, ʿUmar b. Hubayra and his son Yūsuf b. ʿUmar, who were both governors of ʿIrāḳ under the Umayyads; they both belonged to the Ḳaysī party [see ḳays], that is to say that of the Arabs of the north in their struggle against those of the south. Involved as they were in the great struggles for the succession on behalf of the caliphs who were the candidates of one or the other party, opposing the Yemenīs solidly implanted in Kūfa, representing order in a very troubled period, induced to stir up the tribal rivalries of the populations which they governed—with so many facts to their discredit, the two Ibn Hubayras have not a very good record in history. Of the father ʿUmar it is known that after taking part in the Holy War against the Byzantines (97/713), he became governor of ʿIrāḳ under Yazīd II, the mortal enemy of the Yemenī party. In 102/720, a year after Yazīd II's accession, he succeeded Maslama b. ʿAbd al-Malik, and like him (having the same outlook as a result of having fought in his company on the Byzantine frontier) he was probably entrusted with the liquidation of the party of the Banu 'l-Muhallab. Khurāsān forming also part of the area of which he was in charge, he began by delegating his responsibilities there, at the express command of the caliph, to a Ḳaysī lieutenant, Saʿīd b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī, who was able to stir to enthusiasm the warriors of Islam and strike terror into the people of Ṣoghdiana, who were still hesitant to embrace the cause of their Arab conquerors. Nevertheless, Saʿīd b. ʿAmr was soon replaced by a Bakrī, Muslim b. Saʿīd b. Aslam b. Zurʿa. Ibn Hubayra remained firm in his support of the Arabs of the north, al-Farazdaḳ stating on one occasion that he was their glory and supreme support (Dīwān, ed. Ṣāwī, 416). Harsh in his treatment of those he conquered, Ibn Hubayra seems to have governed in the name of Arabism and Islam, regarded as a religion of the sword. His methods of governing, however, were not above reproach, although in fact this great Arab nobleman, proud of belonging to the Ghaṭafān, was accused more of cynicism than of corruption. One of the first acts of the caliph Hishām, on his accession in 105/724, was to replace Ibn Hubayra by the Yemenī Khālid al-Ḳasrī, who was well disposed towards the Ḳurayshīs.

Yūsuf, the son of ʿUmar b. Hubayra, was also governor of ʿIrāḳ, from 129-32/741-9; before being appointed to this office, he had, on the orders of the caliph Hishām, taken extremely severe measures against Khālid al-Ḳasrī, who had profited from his father's fall from favour. His triumph came too late however, and his term as governor was merely a lengthy struggle for a lost cause. He was obliged to conquer his province by degrees: he began by defeating the Khāridjīs at ʿAyn al-Tamr; in addition to thus pacifying the Sawād, he succeeded in regaining Ahwāz, the Djibāl and the Djazīra. He was less fortunate in his struggle against Abū Muslim, whose revolt occurred during his governorship. He did not hasten to the help of Naṣr b. Sayyār, the governor of Khurāsān. When Ibn Hubayra's troops finally went into action the cause of the Umayyad caliphate, represented by the caliph Marwān II, was already lost and Ibn Hubayra had to abandon Marwān to his fate. ʿĀmir b. Ḍubāra, Ibn Hubayra's chief lieutenant, was killed at Djabalḳ; Yūsuf was unable to hold Kūfa, disturbed by the revolt of the Yemenīs, and fled to Wāsiṭ, where, after being besieged for over eleven months, he was forced to yield to Abū Muslim's lieutenant, Ḥasan b. Ḳaḥṭaba. He was brutally killed with the officers of his entourage. Like his father, Yūsuf defended to the end the cause of the Arab aristocracy, of the "Arab empire", against the mawālī, who had been able to win over to their cause a large section of the Yemenī party while deserting the leaders of this same party in favour of the new ʿAbbāsid propagandists. Although incapable of realizing the scope, and still less the development, of this conspiracy, the two Ibn Hubayras were not without energy or planning ability.

IBN HUBAYRA, ʿAwn al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Shaybānī al-Dūrī al-Baghdādī, wazīr for sixteen years without interruption, until his death, under the ʿAbbāsid Caliphs al-Muḳtafī (530/1136-555/1160) and al-Mustandjid (555/1160-566/1170). He was born in Rabīʿ II 499/ Dec. 1105-Jan. 1106, in the village of Dūr in the district of Dudjayl, northwest of Baghdād, where he spent the early part of his youth. He went to Baghdād as a young man, and studied Ḥanbali fiḳh under Abū Bakr al-Dīnawarī (d. 532/1138) and adab under the renowned Ḥanbalī philologist al-Djawālīḳī (d. 540/1145). He also studied traditions under several masters and was for some time the disciple of the ascetic preacher Abū Yaḥyā Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Zabīdī, with whom he roamed the streets of Baghdād proclaiming the incomparable attributes of God.

Under the caliphate of al-Muḳtafī, Ibn Hubayra entered government service and gradually worked his way up to be this caliph's wazīr. With Ibn Hubayra the influence of the last Saldjūḳids came to an end. He also had a hand in Nūr al-Dīn's conquest of Fāṭimid Egypt. The Ḥanbalī school flourished under his ministry and patronage, and its institutions of learning continued to multiply, a trend which had been taking place before his advent and which explains in part his accession to power. He had many enemies, who apparently succeeded in poisoning him through his own physician, who is said to have been killed six months later, also by poisoning. Ibn Hubayra died on 12 Djumādā I 560/ March 1165.

During his lifetime, Ibn Hubayra was no less active in the field of learning than he was in politics. He composed a commentary in several volumes of the two canonical collections of traditions, those of al-Bukhārī and Muslim, entitled al-Ifṣāḥ ʿan maʿānī 'l-Ṣiḥāḥ. While commenting on one of the traditions which involved an explanation of the term fiḳh, he digressed into a long treatise on questions of law, both those concerning which the founders of the four schools of law were in agreement, as well as those upon which they disagreed. The idea so interested him that he caused specialized scholars of all four schools of law to be brought to Baghdād from outlying provinces at a reputed expense of over one hundred thousand *dīnār*s. This he allegedly did in order to be certain of the accuracy of his work; but this gathering of scholars from many parts of the Muslim world at the expense of the wazīr must have also had its political importance. Several copies were made of this work, which found its way into the libraries of governors and *wazīr*s of provinces, as well as those of the Caliph al-Mustandjid and the Ayyūbid Sultan Nūr al-Dīn Zangī. This work, properly called al-Ishrāf, but also al-Ifṣāḥ, after the original and more voluminous work, was edited by Rāghib al-Ṭabbākh (Aleppo 1929).

Ibn Hubayra has other works to his name: al-Muḳtaṣad, a grammar for which Ibn al-Khashshāb (d. 567/1172) wrote a commentary in four volumes; an abridgment of the Iṣlāḥ al-manṭiḳ of Ibn al-Sikkīt; al-ʿIbādāt al-khams, according to the Ḥanbalī school of law; Urdjūza fi 'l-maḳṣūr wa 'l-mamdūd; Urdjūza fī ʿilm al-khaṭṭ.

His contemporary Ibn al-Djawzī (d. 597/1200) compiled a work based exlusively, it would appear, on statements which he had heard from Ibn Hubayra, entitling it: al-Muḳtabas min al-fawāʾid al-ʿAwniyya (i.e., ʿAwn al-Dīn Ibn Hubayra). In another work, Maḥḍ al-maḥḍ, Ibn al-Djawzī compiled an anthology of highlights from Ibn Hubayra's original Ifṣāḥ, i.e., the commentary on the traditions of al-Bukhārī and Muslim.

Most of what we know of Ibn Hubayra comes to us from his contemporary Ibn al-Djawzī, but more extensively from his biographer, the Ḥanbalī Ibn al-Māristāniyya (d. 599/1202), from whose work, not extant, much of the Dhayl of Ibn Radjab is derived.

IBN ḤUBAYSH, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Yūsuf b. Abī ʿĪsā al-Anṣārī al-Mursī, Spanish traditionist. Ibn Ḥubaysh was born in 504/1110 in Almeria of a family originally from Shāriḳa (Jérica), Valencia. After preliminary studies in Almeria he passed to Cordova in 530/1135 for three years, and having returned to Almeria, was present when in 542/1147 that city fell to the Christians under al-Sulayṭīn, 'the little Sultan', i.e., Alphonso VII of León. After an interview with the latter, during which he traced the genealogy of Alphonso back to the Emperor Heraclius, Ibn Ḥubaysh and his family were allowed to go free. He subsequently held posts in Djazīrat Shaḳr (Alcira), Valencia, for approximately 12 years. In or about 556/1161 he went to Murcia as preacher (khaṭīb) in the principal mosque. Twenty years later he became Ḳāḍī of Murcia, and held the office till his death in 584/1188. One of his accomplishments, as recorded by a pupil (Ibn al-Abbār, Takmila, ii, 574), was to have had by heart all or most of al-Taʾrīkh al-kabīr, an extensive work on Ḥadīth by Ibn Abī Khaythama (d. 279/893, cf. Brockelmann, I, 272).

Ibn Ḥubaysh appears to have planned a continuation of the Kitāb al-Ṣila of Ibn Bashkuwāl [q.v.], which was never carried out. However, his notes and materials came into the hands of Ibn al-Abbār [q.v.], who made use of them in his own Takmila ('Completion') of the Kitāb al-Ṣila. The literary work of Ibn Ḥubaysh by which he is principally remembered was the Kitāb al-Ghazawāt, or Kitāb al-Maghāzī ('Book of the Raids'), in full Kitāb (Dhikr) al-Ghazawāt al-ḍāmina al-kāfila wa 'l-futūḥ al-djāmiʿa al-ḥāfila al-kāʾina fī ayyām al-khulafāʾ al-ūlā al-thalātha. As the name indicates, this gave an account of the victorious expeditions in the first half of the 7th century A.D., for the most part, under the Caliphs Abū Bakr, ʿUmar and ʿUthmān. Ibn Ḥubaysh received a commission for the book from the Almohad Abū Yaʿḳūb Yūsuf [q.v.] in 575/1179-80 on the same day as he was appointed Ḳāḍī (see above), i.e., when he was nearly 70.

The work survives in several manuscripts, and has been utilized by De Goeje (Mémoire sur le Fotouh as-Shâm, Leiden 1864; *Mémoire sur la conquête de la Syrie*², Leiden 1900) and by Caetani (Annali dell' Islam, Milan 1905), the latter in extracts made by J. Horowitz. More recently W. Hoenerbach has underlined the use made by Ibn Ḥubaysh of the Kitāb al-Ridda of Wāḳidī, a good early source (Waṯīma's Kitāb ar-Ridda aus Ibn Ḥağar's Iṣāba, Akad. d. Wissens. u. d. Lit. in Mainz, Abh. d. Geistes- u. Sozialwissenschaftl. Kl., 1951, Nr. 4, 220 ff.). In general, though Ibn Ḥubaysh was acquainted with Ṭabarī's Annals (Taʾrīkh al-rusul wa 'l-mulūk), he disposed of further materials, and for the early period of the Islamic conquests is doubtless an authority who deserves to be consulted.

Ibn Ḥubaysh, called by Ibn al-Abbār the last of the great traditionists of Western Islam (wa-kāna ākhira aʾimmati 'l-muḥaddithīn bi 'l-Maghrib), yet had several pupils of at least respectable attainments, notably Ibn Diḥya (Brockelmann, I, 310, cf. 371; Pons Boigues, No. 238), the two brothers Ibn Ḥawṭ Allāh (Pons Boigues, Nos. 223 and 229) and al-Kalāʿī (Brockelmann, I, 371; Pons Boigues, No. 239). Al-Kalāʿī wrote a Kitāb al-Iktifāʾ bimā taḍammanahu min maghāzī rasūl Allāh wa-maghāzī al-thalāthati ʾl-khulafāʾ, in the second part of which he followed especially his teacher Ibn Ḥubaysh. Existing manuscripts of the Kitāb al-Iktifāʾ, which are rather numerous, may therefore be consulted for the text of the Kitāb al-Ghazawāt of Ibn Ḥubaysh.

IBN HŪD [see HŪDIDS].

IBN HUDHAYL, ABU ʾL-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. ʿABD AL-RAḤMĀN AL-FAZĀRĪ AL-ANDALUSĪ, a man of letters and writer of Granada during the second half of the 8th/14th century, who lived at the court of the Naṣrids [q.v.] of Granada. At the request of sultan Muḥammad (V) b. Yūsuf b. Ismāʿīl known as al-Ghānī (who reigned in 755/1354 and 763/1362), Ibn Hudhayl wrote his masterpiece, the K. Tuḥfat al-anfus wa shiʿār sukkān al-Andalus (MSS B. N. Madrid, no. 5095 and Escurial, Cod. 1652), a treatise on the "holy war" (djihād) aimed at convincing the Andalusian Muslims of the need to resume the profession of arms and to establish once again a cavalry worthy of comparison with that of their illustrious conquering ancestors [see FARAS and FURŪSIYYA]. It would seem that this first attempt at propaganda for the military career on behalf of the "noble cause" aroused almost no enthusiasm among the population of Granada, who preferred the peaceful pursuits of cultivating the land, commerce and the arts to the violence of warfare. Thus, some thirty years later, when the Christian peril was every day becoming more clearly defined, Ibn Hudhayl was once more urged to rouse their energies from torpor, this time, however, by prince Muḥammad VII al-Mustaʿīn (794-810/1392-1408), grandson of Muḥammad V; having no wish to compose a new work, he therefore produced an abridged version of his earlier work, under the title K. Ḥilyat al-fursān wa shiʿār al-shudjʿān.

The content and aim of these two treatises (which are in fact only one) are expressed clearly in the introduction by the author himself, who writes: "...the present work, devoted to combat and warfare, to war-horses and arms, to the features that must be looked for in the horse, to the spots that must be shunned and condemned, to everything that is concerned with the conditions of horses, and finally to the teaching of riding and its complements ... Thanks be to God, this work is adequate in the art that it expounds; in its spirit, it constitutes an efficaceous method, a memento for the man who concerns himself with warfare, a guide for the man who practises fighting with lance and sabre". This quotation follows the French translation of the K. Ḥilyat al-fursān made by L. Mercier, who has the distinction of being the discoverer, editor and translator of Ibn Hudhayl.

In addition to this master-work, which is of the highest importance for the knowledge of the equestrian and military arts in mediaeval Islam, we also possess several other works of Ibn Hudhayl, of less interest, and concerned with veterinary science in the K. al-Fawāʾid al-musaṭṭara fī ʿilm al-bayṭara (Madrid 1935), with belles-lettres in the K. Maḳālāt al-udabāʾ wa munāẓarāt al-nudjabāʾ, and with politics in the K. ʿAyn al-adab wa ʾl-siyāsa wa zayn al-ḥasab wa ʾl-riyāsa. Two other works, on piety, are also attributed to him, only the titles of which survive, the K. Tadhkirat man ittaḳā and the K. Kamāl al-bughya wa ʾl-nayl.

Although almost nothing is known of the life of Ibn Hudhayl, from the tenor of his writings it is easy to imagine him as the ideal type of Spanish Muslim gentleman at the end of the 8th/14th century, sprung from a noble family, of perfect education and highly cultured, the image of the man of gentle birth who differed from his Christian neighbour only in his faith.

IBN AL-ʿIBRĪ (BAR HEBRAEUS, Syriac BAR ʿEBHRĀYĀ) GᵉRĪGHŌR (YŪḤANNĀN) ABU ʾL-FARADJ, author of a history in Arabic, translator and the last classic in Syriac literature, was born in A.D. 1225-6 at Malatya; he owes to the Jewish descent of his father the nickname under which he became famous. During the Mongol invasion of 1243 Ibn al-ʿIbrī's father obtained the post of physician in the entourage of a Tatar general, and in the following year settled with his family at Anṭākiya, which was still in the hands of the Franks. The son was versed in Syriac, Arabic and Hebrew, and studied medicine and rhetoric as well as theology at Anṭākiya and Ṭarābulus (Syria). After having been a monk for about three years, he was ordained Jacobite bishop of Gūbbāsh near Malatya in September 1246, and was transferred to the neighbouring see of Laḳabbīn a year later. In 1253 he was appointed Metropolitan of Aleppo, a position that he succeeded in retaining during the serious rifts in the Jacobite hierarchy at that period. Ibn al-ʿIbrī was present at the capture of the city by the Tatars in January 1260. In 1264 he became Maphrᵉyānā, i.e., head of the Jacobite church in the territories formerly under Persian rule. Thenceforward he travelled widely throughout his vast diocese, protecting the fortunes of his co-religionists during that troubled epoch. He made prolonged visits to Baghdād and to the Mongol court, where he was acquainted with princes and princesses; he had attended the Mongol ruler as physician in 1263. He commissioned the building of several churches and monasteries. When Ibn al-ʿIbrī died at Marāgha in Ādharbaydjān on 29 July 1286, Nestorians, Greeks and Armenians united with Jacobites in paying tribute to his qualities of tolerance and energy and to his independence in the face of pressure by religious and political leaders. He was buried in the monastery of Mār Mattai at Mosul.

Ibn al-ʿIbrī's brother enumerates thirty-one works—and this is not an exhaustive list—by the polymath, on theology, philosophy, history, grammar and science in addition to poetry and belles lettres. His principal work in Arabic is Mukhtaṣar ta'rīkh al-duwal (Historia compendiosa dynastiarum authore Gregorio Abul-Pharajio, ed. E. Pocock, Oxford 1663, Suppl. 1672; ed. A. Ṣāliḥānī, Beirut 1890), compiled at the request of Muslim friends. It is an abbreviated translation of the first part of his Syriac Chronography treating of political history from the Creation to his own times; the Arabic version has additions on Bible history (which it was superfluous to incorporate in the Syriac original) and on the mathematical and medical literature of the Arabs. The first part of the Syriac Chronography itself uses Arabic and Persian sources for Islamic history, and quotes the Persian history of Shams al-Dīn Ṣāḥib-Dīwān (d. 683/1284) for the Mongol period. The second and third parts of the Chronography, dealing respectively with the history of the Western Jacobite church and that of the Eastern Jacobite and Nestorian churches, were not translated into Arabic.

The extent to which Ibn al-ʿIbrī adopted the literary tastes of his Muslim contemporaries is revealed by his Keṯhābhā dheThunnāyē meghaḥḥekhāne (Laughable stories, Syriac text with Eng. tr. by E. A. W. Budge, London 1897), a collection of anecdotes reminiscent of adab literature but unexpected from the pen of a distinguished Christian prelate; a translation into Arabic appears not to have survived. Ibn al-ʿIbrī's treatises on theology and philosophy are strongly influenced by Muslim authors, notably al-Ghazālī. He translated from Arabic into Syriac Zubdat al-asrār by his contemporary Athīr al-Dīn al-Abharī, and he produced Syriac renderings of Ibn Sīnā's K. al-Ishārāt wa 'l-tanbīhāt and ʿUyūn al-ḥikma. Ibn al-ʿIbrī's remarkable Keṯhābhā dheṢemḥē ("Book of rays") on Syriac grammar follows the pattern laid down by al-Zamakhsharī; his medical works include a shortened translation into Syriac of al-Ghāfiḳī's al-Adwiya al-mufrada, while a translation of Ibn Sīnā's Ḳānūn remained unfinished at his death.

Ibn al-ʿIbrī's writings are not distinguished by great ability or by originality of thought or style; his contribution to literature commands respect rather by its sheer bulk and the fidelity with which he reproduces earlier writers. He sought to transmit the work of Christians to an Arabic-reading public, but his immediate objective was the transmission of general culture, whether Hellenistic or Muslim, to his co-religionists in their own language. By the 7th/13th century, however, the revival of Syriac outside the liturgy was beyond even his erudition and sustained effort. He was, as has been indicated, himself largely under the influence of Arabic—this is strikingly shown too by the naive etymologies of his Syriac chronicles. It is significant that the inscription over Ibn al-ʿIbrī's grave at Mār Mattai is written in Karshūnī—the script is Syriac, but the language is Arabic.

IBN ʿIDHĀRĪ, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. ʿIdhārī al-Marrākushī, Maghribī historian, of whom all that is known is that he lived in the second half of the 7th/13th century and the first decades of the 8th/14th, that he was ḳā'id of Fez, and that in the year 712/1312-3 he was still writing his chronicle. To judge from his works, he must have possessed a good knowledge of the history of the caliphs, imāms and amīrs of the East, about whom he wrote in a work which he himself quotes but which has not survived. The extant chronicle of this historian is entitled al-Bayān al-mughrib fī (ikhtiṣār) akhbār mulūk al-Andalus wa 'l-Maghrib. In this chronicle, which is divided into three sections, the author sets forth—in that part of the work which has been published—an account, in analytical form and in talkhīṣ, of the history of Ifrīḳiya from the conquest of Miṣr in the year 20/640-1 to the capture of al-Mahdiyya by the Almohads in 602/1205-6, with the various dynasties and principalities which followed one another during this period (first part); the conquest of the Iberian peninsula and the history of the emirate, caliphate and the kingdoms of the taifas occupy the second part; while accounts of the Almoravid dynasty and the Almohads in the Maghrib and in al-Andalus until their disappearance make up the third part. The text of the first part and of the first half of the second, up to the year 387/997, was published by R. Dozy, Histoire de l'Afrique et de l'Espagne, Leiden 1848-51, 2 vols. (together with Corrections sur les textes du Bayáno 'l-Moghrib, Leiden 1883); this edition has been superseded by the one which G. S. Colin and E. Lévi-Provençal (Leiden 1948-51, 2 vols.) have made with the help of new, more complete, manuscripts. Translations have been made of the first edition, into Spanish by F. Fernández González (Granada 1860; somewhat defective) and into French by E. Fagnan (Algiers 1901-4, 2 vols.). The end of the second part, which covers the years 392-460/1002-1068 in the incomplete manuscript which has come down to us, has been the subject of an edition by E. Lévi-Provençal, Bayān, iii, Paris 1930, which should be used in conjunction with the Observations sur le texte du tome III du Bayān d'Ibn ʿIḏāri, in Mélanges Gaudefroy-Demombynes, Cairo 1937, 241-58, also by E. Lévi-Provençal, who has published a translation of various fragments of this text in R. Dozy, Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, Leiden 1932, appendix to vol. iii, and in al-Andalus, xiii (1948), 149-51 (trans. E. García Gómez). It is the third part of the Bayān which has particularly benefited from the discovery of new manuscripts in recent years. From the Almoravid Bayān, A. Huici has published and translated fragments relating to the earliest years of Almoravid society up to 541/1146, with gaps from 469-495/1076-1102 (Un fragmento inédito de Ibn ʿIḏārī sobre los almoravides, in Hespéris Tamuda, ii/1 (1961), 43-111), and E. Lévi-Provençal has published and translated fragments corresponding to the years 485/1092, 487/1094 and 496/1102 and relating to the conquest of Valencia by al-Mazdalī (the whole translated by E. García Gómez in La toma de Valencia por el Cid, in al-Andalus, xiii (1948), 97-156). The text of the Almohad Bayān, more complete, is contained in El Anónimo de Madrid y Copenhague, Valencia 1917, which A. Huici has made known, in the Notes d'histoire almohade, iii (text and tr. by E. Lévi-Provençal), in Hespéris, x (1930), 49-90, and, in definitive and more complete form, in the III parte de al-Bayān al-Mugrib por Ibn ʿIḏārī, edited by A. Huici, in collaboration with Muḥ. b. Tāwīt and Muḥ. Ibr. al-Kattānī, Tetuan 1963; A. Huici has published translations from the manuscript of the Almohad Bayān in Colección de crónicas árabes de la Reconquista, ii-iii, Tetuan 1953-4 and, recently, in Ibn ʿIḏārī: al-Bayān al-Mugrib. Nuevos fragmentos almoravides y almohades, Valencia 1963.

In short, the historical work of Ibn ʿIdhārī, in the light of the criticisms which his method has provoked, including, among others, those of Cl. Sánchez Albornoz (En torno a los orígenes del feudalismo. Parte segunda: Los árabes y el régimen prefeudal carolingio. Fuentes de la historia hispano-musulmana del siglo VIII, ii, Mendoza 1942, 327-35) and A. Huici (Col. Crónicas árabes de la Reconquista, ii, pp. XI and XII), but also of the merits with which one may credit him when one analyses his sources, constitutes, as a compilation of chronicles many of which have been lost, a basic source containing sound and detailed information, indispensable to the historian of the Maghrib and of al-Andalus.

IBN IDRĪS [I], name currently given to ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. IDRĪS B. MUḤAMMAD AL-AZAMMŪRĪ AL-ʿAMRĀWĪ AL-FĀSĪ, vizier and man of letters highly regarded in Morocco, whose fame went beyond the borders of his country. We do not know the exact date (1118/1784?) of his birth in Fās, where his family, of very modest situation, claimed to be of Sharīfī origin. After serious studies, Ibn Idrīs started to earn his living as a copyist and school-master, but his culture and talents were very soon observed by the great historian of the dynasty of the ʿAlawids, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim al-Zayyānī [q.v.], who urged him to polish his writings and presented him to the future sultan Mawlāy ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, to whom he became secretary. On his patron's accession to the throne in 1237/1822, Ibn Idrīs was summoned to the vizierate, to replace his former fellow-student, the poet and historian Akansūs [q.v.]. As a result of calumnies, he fell into disgrace in 1247/1831 and was even tortured on his master's orders. In 1835 the sultan renewed his confidence in him and restored him to the office of vizier, with the additional post of ḥādjib [q.v.], which he held with distinction and skill until his death on 4 or 5 Muḥarram 1264/12 or 13 December 1847. He left an immense fortune to his son. He seems to have died as the result of brutalities inflicted on him at the command of Mawlāy ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who had been exasperated to hear that his vizier was trying to win the favour of the Algerian amīr ʿAbd al-Ḳādir [q.v.]. It is also said that, after he had learnt of certain of the sultan's excesses, the latter apparently decided to do away with this embarrassing witness of acts contrary to Islamic morality.

It is to Ibn Idrīs that is due the renaissance in Morocco of the fine official epistolary style, which had fallen into decline. Possessing very sure taste, he successfully employed rhymed prose without either exaggeration or obscurity. As a poet, he was also highly esteemed by the Moroccan élite. He had a gift for improvisation. It was always with wit, and often with sincerity, that he wrote of the prince whom he served, the saints of his country, the feast of the mawlid [q.v.] or the gardens of Marrākush. He also wrote a long and violent poem against the French occupation of Algeria. His as yet unpublished dīwān is in the library of the royal palace at Rabat. His beautiful house, surrounded by a large park, is still known in Marrākush by the name ʿArṣet ben Drīs.

IBN IDRĪS [II], ABU 'L-ʿALĀʾ IDRĪS, son of the above, was born in Fās where he made a serious study of literature. As private secretary to sultan Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, he was sent on a diplomatic mission to the French emperor Napoleon III. His task was to solicit his intervention with the Spanish government, in order to secure a reduction in the indemnity owed by Morocco after the unfortunate Hispano-Moroccan war of 1845. During July and August 1860, he spent six weeks in Paris where he left excellent impressions. From his journey he brought back an account (riḥla) entitled Tuḥfat al-malik al-ʿazīz bi-mamlakat Barīz in which, in elegant language, he described the French provinces through which he had travelled, the public buildings he had seen, the receptions he had attended, the customs he had observed, etc. This account was published in Fās in 1327/1907. Ibn Idrīs was entrusted with another diplomatic mission, to Spain; he died of the plague, in Rabat, on 14 Djumādā II 1296/5 June 1879.

IBN AL-IFLĪLĪ (or simply AL-IFLĪLĪ), ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM IBRĀHĪM B. MUḤAMMAD B. ZAKARIYYĀʾ AL-ZUHRĪ, philologian, teacher and man of letters, born in Cordova in 352/963 of a family from al-Iflīl, in Syria(?). After receiving a classical education, he acquired the reputation of a great connoisseur of Arabic poetry, grammar and gharīb [q.v.]; though he was ignorant, it is said, of prosody, he prided himself on his poetry, but al-Ḥidjārī (apud Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, 73) criticizes his verse and prose compositions as too lifeless, and will not allow more than two verses of his to be acceptable.

To judge by a passage of the Risālat al-tawābiʿ wa 'l-zawābiʿ (apud Ibn Bassām, Dhakhīra, i/1, 233 ff. = ed. B. al-Bustānī, 168 ff.) of Ibn Shuhayd [q.v.], he seems to have been thickset, to have limped and to have been afflicted with a very large nose. According to the same author (apud Ibn Bassām, i/1, 207-8 = Pellat, in al-Andalus, 1956/2, 283), it is this scarcely prepossessing physique which for a long time prevented him from following the profession of kātib [q.v.], for which he believed himself destined. However, during the fitna, he entered the service of the Ḥammūdids [q.v.] and was at last appointed kātib under al-Mustakfī (414-6/1024-5), but, according to Ibn Ḥayyān (apud Ibn Bassām, i/1, 241), he did not give satisfaction and was dismissed because he used a pedantic and affected style. Under Hishām III (418-22/1027-31) he was accused of impiety and imprisoned at the Muṭbaḳ [see ḲURṬUBA]; afterwards trace is lost of him until his death at Cordova on Sunday 13 Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 441/9 April 1050.

Ibn al-Iflīlī, who taught grammar and adab in general, is severely criticized by Ibn Shuhayd (especially apud Ibn Bassām, i/1, 206-7) who strongly opposes the accepted teaching methods of his time; and he equally rebukes him for his obstinacy and vanity, which others have in their turn criticized. The fame of this philologian rests, however, on his teaching, which attracted many pupils, among whom al-Aʿlam al-Shantamarī [see AL-SHANTAMARĪ] is probably the most famous, and on his commentary on the Dīwān of al-Mutanabbī, an authoritative work in Spain (see al-Maḳḳarī, Analectes, ii, 118 = Pellat, in al-Andalus, 1954/1, 84; H. Pérès, Poésie andalouse, 35; al-Ṣafadī, Nakt, 314). In this commentary, of which a few scattered manuscripts survive (see R. Blachère, Motanabbî, 295, n. 8), each verse is briefly paraphrased and each poem preceded by an introduction on the circumstances of its composition.

IBN AL-IKHSHĪD, ABŪ BAKR AḤMAD B. ʿALĪ B. MAʿDJŪR, Muʿtazilī of Baghdād (270-326/883-938). He had a reputation for eloquence and command of the Arabic language and for generosity to scholars, to whom he made over the greater part of the revenues of a property which he possessed. In ḥadīth, he was a highly-esteemed transmitter, according to al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, who makes no suggestion that he was a heretic. His authority was Djaʿfar al-Faryābī. In the field of fiḳh, he followed the Shāfiʿī school and was considered well-versed in its doctrines. In kalām he was said to be opposed to al-Kaʿbī and Abū Hāshim al-Djubbā'ī. He probably represented a form of Muʿtazilism which was more pietistic and more popular, more in accordance with his Shāfiʿī ideas and his knowledge of ḥadīth and of tafsīr. The Fihrist gives a list of his works, which include a commentary on the Tafsīr of al-Ṭabarī and a refutation of the Murdji'a [q.v.].

IBN AL-ʿIMĀD, ʿABD AL-ḤAYY B. AḤMAD, a Syrian teacher of the Ḥanbalī school (1032-1089/1623-1679), completed, in 1080/1670, a large biographical history, entitled Shadharāt al-dhahab fī akhbār man dhahab, which is annalistically arranged and covers the Hidjra years one to 1000. Although historical events are occasionally mentioned, the work concentrates on obituary notices, often rather detailed. The author intended it to be a help for impecunious scholars like himself who were unable to acquire a large library of their own. Owing to its late date of composition and its comprehensive character, it is still useful as a preliminary source of information, and as such it is often referred to in these pages. The absence of a serviceable index in the available edition (Cairo 1350-51) is, therefore, most regrettable.

IBN AL-IMĀM AL-SHILBĪ, ABU ʿAMR ʿUTHMĀN B. ʿALĪ B. ʿUTHMĀN, an Andalusī man of letters, biographer and historian of the 6th/12th century; born in Silves, he studied in Cordova and Seville, where he became a disciple of Abū Bakr Ibn al-ʿArabī. As an admirer of his contemporaries Ibn Bassām [q.v.] and Ibn Khāḳān [see AL-FATḤ IBN KHĀḲĀN], he decided to write a sequel to their works, and to include the biographies that they had omitted and those of his contemporaries, as far as 550/1155-6 (he died shortly after that date). His work is now lost, but later compilers have preserved numerous extracts from it; the title appears in various forms but is generally abbreviated to Simṭ al-djumān, and the full title was probably Simṭ al-djumān wa-saḳaṭ al-la'ālī' wa-siḳṭ al-mardjān. In his Mughrib Ibn Saʿīd reproduces about 35 excerpts from the Simṭ, some of which are long enough to give an idea of its content and style. To judge by these extracts, the Simṭ is closer in style and character to the Dhakhīra of Ibn Bassām than to the Maṭmaḥ and the Ḳalā'id of Ibn Khāḳān; his prose, which is not always in rhyme, occasionally provides valuable details of real historical importance (e.g., Mughrib, i, 60-2). The specimens of poetry and prose reproduced by Ibn al-Imām are of the same type as those to be found in Ibn Saʿīd, and it may be said that a quarter of the Mughrib is taken from the Simṭ.

IBN ʿINABA (form most common in ʿIrāḳo-Persian circles; variants: ʿUḳba, ʿUtba, ʿAnbasa) DJAMĀL AL-DĪN AḤMAD B. ʿALĪ ... B. ʿINABA AL-DĀWŪDĪ AL-ḤASANĪ, Imāmī genealogist, the most highly esteemed of Ṭālibī nassāba. He was born circa 748/1347 (date calculated by reference to the fact that in 764, "at the end of adolescence", he became the pupil of Ibn Muʿayyā) and died at Kirmān on 7 Ṣafar 828/29 December 1424. He was the pupil of the genealogist Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-ʿUbaydī and, indirectly, of Ibn al-Muṭahhar al-Ḥillī and of Djalāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḳāsim ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd Ibn Fakhkhār. The person who had the greatest influence on his education was his father-in-law Ibn Muʿayyā (Tādj al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. al-Ḳāsim). The latter, who was connected with the futuwwa [q.v.], held an eminent position, as much because he had obtained idjāzas from thirty ʿulamāʾ (notably from Ibn al-Muṭahhar al-Ḥillī, Ibn Ṭāʾūs and Ibn Fakhkhār) as because he counted among his pupils al-shahīd al-awwal of the Twelvers, Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad b. Makkī al-ʿĀmilī; for twelve years he was Ibn ʿInaba's teacher in law, ḥadīth, genealogy, mathematics, poetry, etc.

Ibn ʿInaba's work sets a complex problem. According to the list in the Aʿyān al-Shīʿa, it consists of: (1) ʿUmdat al-ṭālib fī ansāb Āl Abī Ṭālib (known as al-kubrā) completed in 814/1411-2 and surviving in a copy in the collection of the Taymūriyya; according to one tradition, the work is dedicated to Tīmūrlang, but it was in fact written for the Ḥusaynid Djalāl al-Dīn al-Ḥasan b. ʿAmīd al-Dīn ʿAlī b. ʿIzz al-Dīn al-Sharaf Muḥammad b. Abī 'l-Faḍl ʿAlī; this presumably corresponds to the edition of Bombay 1318/1900-1. (2) ʿUmdat al-ṭālib ... al-ṣughrā, dedicated to the Sayyid Muḥammad b. Fallāḥ al-Mushaʿshaʿī, al-Mahdī (or to his father); it is based, with some additions, according to the Kashf al-ẓunūn, on the Mukhtaṣar of Ibn al-Ṣūfī and the Taʾlīf of Abū Naṣr Sahl b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Bukhārī. This distinction between the two ʿUmdas, denied by al-Kantūrī, who considers them to be identical, is supported by Khiyābānī and in the preface to the edition of Nadjaf 1918, in which the "little" ʿUmda is regarded as the only one to have survived; it appears in the manuscripts with slight variations in the title (ansāb, or nasab or manāḳib) and in the arrangement of the material, always, however, subdivided into five faṣls, corresponding to the five sons of Abū Ṭālib. This ʿUmda seems to be that published in the Lucknow ed. (n.d. [1302/1884-5]), which dates it to 802/1399-1400, and in the undated but recent Beirut ed. (3) A Kitāb fi 'l-ansāb, probably in Persian; according to the editors of the Nadjaf text, it was an abridgement of the ʿUmda, which may have been the same as the Kitāb Ansāb Āl Abī Ṭālib mentioned in the Dharīʿa, but might also be identified with two other works mentioned in the Dharīʿa itself, al-Tuḥfa al-djamāliyya and the Tuḥfat al-ṭālib, which are mentioned also by other authors. The problem remains unsolved, particularly since Khiyābānī considers the two Tuḥfas to be only one work. (4) Baḥr al-ansāb fī nasab Banī Hāshim, consisting of a muḳaddima and five chapters, of which Dj. Zaydān mentions a manuscript in the Khedivial library in Cairo and to which the Dharīʿa and Khiyābānī also refer.

IBN ʿIRĀḲ, Abū Naṣr Manṣūr b. ʿAlī, an astronomer and mathematician who flourished ca. 1000 A.D. (the date of his death is uncertain), best known as the teacher of al-Bīrūnī [q.v.], was the student of Abu 'l-Wafā al-Buzdjānī [q.v.]. He was related to the Ibn ʿIrāḳ family that ruled Khwārazm before its conquest by Maḥmūd of Ghazna [q.v.], and this accounts for his titles: al-amīr and mawlā amīr al-muʾminīn.

He is also known for his revision, completed in 398/1007-8, of the Arabic version of Menelaus's Spherics (ed. and trans. by Krause, 1936), of which the original Greek text is lost. Fifteen shorter mathematical and astronomical treatises, found in MS Bankipore arab. 2468, were published in 1948. These include treatises on the astrolabe; discussions of various problems in earlier zīdjes (sets of astronomical tables); a solution of a difficulty in Euclid's Elements, Book XIII; and a treatise, djadwal al-daḳāʾiḳ, concerning special trigonometric functions.

In al-Bīrūnī's Treatise on chords, Ibn ʿIrāḳ is cited as the discoverer of several mathematical proofs; in al-Bīrūnī's Chronology of ancient nations (ed. and trans. C. E. Sachau) he is credited with a method for determining solar apogee from three arbitrary points on the ecliptic "which is as much superior to that of the modern [Islamic] astronomers as the method of the latter is superior to that of the ancient astronomers"; and Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī [q.v.] cites his work in trigonometry.

IBN ʿIRS (A.; pl. banāt ʿirs, rarely abnāʾ/banū ʿirs), denotes the weasel, Mustela nivalis, the smallest of the mustelidae (sarʿūb, pl. sarāʿib), whose area of distribution includes almost all the countries of Islam. The geographical forms of the weasel, with Mustela nivalis nivalis and minuta in the North and Mustela nivalis boccamela and subpalmata in the Mediterranean zone, present only slight differences of coat and size, and the species possesses a character of uniformity which is also found in the dialectal names of ʿirsa in Egypt, b-el-ʿirs in Syria and ʿIrāḳ, and ben-l-ʿirs and ʿarūsat al-fīrān in the Maghrib. The terms sunʿuba and kalkasa are now entirely obsolete; and it is only in Palestine that it may be confused with the sable, Mustela zibellina, under the name sammūr, and in Algeria with the polecat, Mustela putorius, under the descriptive name fārat al-khayl (= "rat/mouse of horses").

The Arab authors, both encyclopaedists and naturalists, are very laconic on the subject of the weasel and for the most part are content to repeat, in this connexion, the fabulous inventions of the Greeks on its habit of dropping its young through the throat or ear, its precaution of chewing some rue (sadhāb) before attacking snakes (cf. Aristotle, Hist. des animaux, tr. J. Tricot, Paris 1957, ii, 601 and al-Djāḥiẓ, Ḥayawān, iv, 228), the way in which it inserts itself into the crocodile's belly when the creature yawns, in order to devour its entrails, a practice which is also attributed to the ichneumon of Egypt (nims), and its determined pursuit of shrews and field-mice to the very end of branches of trees to make them fall off into the mouth of its companion which has remained on the ground.

The pelt of the weasel has never been an article of furriery, and certain translators have been mistaken in identifying it with the fanak [q.v.], confusing it with the fur of the stoat or ermine, Mustela erminea, in its summer coat, which at that season differs only in the black tip of the tail that is peculiar to itself and that it retains all the year round, in spite of its white winter coloration; fanak also denoted the furs imported from central Europe, of the mink, Mustela lutreola, and those of some canidae, such as the fennec, the jackal and the fox, from the Maghrib [see IBN ĀWĀ].

On the other hand, it is in the realm of hunting that the weasel has played a part in Islam, for it figures in the list of beasts of prey or carnivores that are "accredited" (muʿallamāt, ḍawārʾ, djawāriḥ*), recognised as lawful instruments of the chase, on the same footing as fowling-birds [see BAYZARA and FAHD]. Indeed, if we remember that the weasel was, with the beech-marten, Martes foina (dalaḳ, sinsār), and long before the domestic cat, with the civet, Viverra civetta (zabāda, sinnawr zabād), the genet Genetta genetta (djarnīṭ, ḳaṭṭ al-zabād, kadīs, zurayḳāʾ) and the ichneumon or Egyptian mongoose, Herpestes ichneumon (nims, fār Firʿawn), a familiar guest attached to the hearth in all oriental and Mediterranean antiquity (for people sought, by adopting these quickly domesticated little animals, not only a faithful companion but also an effective means of destroying the rodents and reptiles that infested their dwellings), it is not surprising that the hunter very soon had the idea of taking advantage of the extremely bloodthirsty instincts of this miniature wild beast, its feline suppleness, its agility in creeping noiselessly into the narrowest fissure, the lightning speed of its leap, the inexorable vice-like grip of its jaws, its great aptitude for being trained, the few attentions that it required and the extreme ease of carrying it about on account of its small size. Numerous items of evidence can be found on the use of the weasel in hunting in the treatises of Muslim writers on hunting; thus Kushādjim (4th/10th century), in his K. al-Maṣāyid wa 'l-maṭārid (Baghdād 1954, 228-9) which, in the prose sections, is a compilation from sources more than a century earlier, devotes several lines to this form of hunting. For his part, the anonymous author of the K. al-Bayzara (Damascus 1953, 29), Master Falconer to the Fāṭimid caliph al-ʿAzīz bi 'llāh (364-86/975-96), records that the weasel formed part of the hunting equipment of the kings of Persia and ranked with the hounds, cheetahs and falcons which these princes kept in great numbers. As for the famous gentleman hunter Usāma Ibn Munḳidh (d. 584/1188), lord of Shayzar, he notes in his "Recollections of war and the chase" (K. al-Iʿtibār, ed. Princeton 1930, chap. III, 213) that his venerated father, when leaving Iṣfahān, which he had visited for reasons of business, found himself presented by the local authorities with several trained falcons and a weasel trained (ibn ʿirs muʿallam) to retrieve game-birds from within impenetrable thickets or to flush them out so that they might be taken by the falcons; thus the puny weasel was successfully substituted for the retrieving-dog. The still unpublished source, the K. al-Djamhara fī ʿulūm al-bayzara (Escurial-Madrid, MS ar. 903) of ʿĪsā b. ʿAlī Ḥassān al-Asadī (7th/13th century) specifies that in this period, in Baghdād, the weasel, then called barūraz ("... al-barūraz wa huwa ibn ʿirs ...", fol. 29 v. and 76 r.-v.), was the indispensable aid in hunting wheatear (faḳāḳ) with the merlin (yuʾyuʾ), for these little birds, at sight of the falcon, darted into thorny bushes, and only the appearance of the weasel, held on a leash, forced them to fly out. This very diverting method of hunting was much appreciated since, being very inexpensive, it could be practised by the most impoverished and by children. Following the same procedure, the weasel, fastened at the neck or waist to a long leash, was used to dislodge the fox when it had gone to ground in its earth; terror made it take to flight, or else, its throat having been seized by these little jaws of steel, it was forcibly dragged out by the leash fastened to its assailant, which would never release its hold.

In the light of these texts, it can be said that the part taken by the weasel in hunting, in the East, was more important than that taken in the West by the ferret, Mustela putorius furo (ibn miḳraḍ; Maghrib: nims through confusion with the ichneumon), a form that, through domestic isolation, has degenerated from a race of polecats imported, as early as the Roman epoch, from the mountain massifs of the Maghrib. Moreover, the certainty of the essentially European origin of the ferret, provided by the scientific data of modern mammalogy, rules out any simple connexion between ibn ʿirs and this bastard member of the mustelidae which is incapable of living in freedom and, at most, is good only for driving rabbits out of their burrows.

The flesh of the weasel, like that of all carnivores, is forbidden as food in Islam, but early medicine recognized certain therapeutic properties in it, as also in the brain, blood and fat of this animal.

IBN ʿĪSĀ, MAḤAMMAD (sic) B. AḤMAD B. ʿĪSĀ AL-ṢANHĀDJĪ, ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH, a Moroccan man of letters (to be distinguished from his homonym, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā al-Maghribī, d. in Damascus in 1016/1607; Brockelmann, S II, 334). His father, who died in 955/1548-9, was also a renowned man of letters. Ibn ʿĪsā, "no mean poet and a superb prose stylist", was secretary of the sultans ʿAbd Allāh al-G͟hālib bi 'llāh (964-81/1557-74) and Abū Marwān ʿAbd al-Malik (983-6/1576-8), became wazīr al-ḳalam al-aʿlā, "First Secretary of State", to the sultan Aḥmad al-Manṣūr al-D͟hahabī ([q.v.], 986-1012/1578-1603), and was attached to the staff of the sultan's son Maʾmūn, governor of Fās from 986/1578. It was no doubt in the service of this sultan that he composed his Kitāb al-mamdūd wa 'l-maḳṣūr min sanāʾ al-sulṭān Abi 'l-ʿAbbās al-Manṣūr, the title of which al-Maḳḳarī admired. He was, nevertheless, imprisoned in Fās and his property was confiscated by Maʾmūn, who was notorious for his bad character, and he died, and was perhaps even killed, in prison in 990/1582-3. Maʾmūn was later reproached for this act. A fragment of an anonymous chronicle containing, among others, copies of documents composed by Ibn ʿĪsā, is either part of his work or derived from it; one report, addressed to the sultan in 988/1579-80, presages the fall from favour of the author.

IBN ʿĪSĀ b. MADJD al-DĪN [see AḲ ḤIṢĀRĪ].

IBN-i ISFANDIYĀR, Bahāʾ al-Dīn Muḥammad b. Ḥasan, Persian historian. Our knowledge of him is based almost entirely on the scanty information which he provides about himself incidentally in the introduction to his Taʾrīk̲h̲-i Ṭabaristān, a history of his native land, Ṭabaristān, and the only work of his known. He was attached to the court of the Āl-i Bāvand rulers of Ṭabaristān, and received generous patronage from Ḥusām al-Dawla Ardas̲h̲īr b. Ḥasan (567/1171-2—602/1205-6). In 606/1210, returning from Bag̲h̲dād to ʿIrāḳ-i ʿAd̲j̲am, he learned of the assassination of his patron's son and successor Rustam b. Ardas̲h̲īr. Grieved by this event, he spent two months in Rayy, where in the course of his reading he came across a copy of Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Yazdādī's Arabic work (now apparently lost) on the history of Ṭabaristān. To make it more widely known, he decided to make a translation of it into Persian, supplementing it with an account of his patron, Ardas̲h̲īr, his ancestors and his descendants. Soon after preparing a first draft, however, he received a letter from his father, who entreated him to put an end to his wanderings and settle at home, apparently Āmul. His visit to his father was marred, however, by disturbances in the region, and following an urge to travel again, he soon left Āmul for K̲h̲ʷārazm, which he describes as a prosperous city and a great seat of learning. Here, after a sojourn of five years, during which he apparently gathered further material for his History, he found in a bookshop a copy of Ibn al-Muḳaffaʿ's translation into Arabic of the epistle of Tansar [q.v.], the chief priest of Ardas̲h̲īr the Sāsānid, to D̲j̲usnasaf, the prince of Ṭabaristān. By including in his History a translation into Persian of the epistle, he has preserved for us this significant piece of Pahlavi literature (see A. Christensen, Iran sous les Sassanides, Paris 1944, pp. 58-9, and pahlavi).

The Taʾrīk̲h̲-i Ṭabaristān, which he was still writing in 613/1216-7, contains much useful historical, geographical and biographical information. It is also of literary interest, and preserves a number of verses in Ṭabarī dialect. A later and anonymous hand has brought the history of events from 606/1210, when the first domination of the Āl-i Bāvand ended in Ṭabaristān, up to ca. 750/1349, when their second domination came to an end. The added section, found in most manuscripts, is taken mostly from Awliyāʾ Allāh Āmulī's Taʾrīk̲h̲-i Rūyān, completed apparently in 764/1362.

IBN ISḤĀḲ, Muḥammad b. Isḥāḳ b. Yasār b. K̲h̲iyār (according to some sources, b. K̲h̲abbār, or Kūmān, or Kūtān), one of the main authorities on al-sīra al-nabawiyya, along with Mūsā b. ʿUḳba and al-Wāḳidī. His kunya is variously given as Abū ʿAbd Allāh or Abū Bakr. On the whole, the former is the better substantiated and the confusion may have resulted from the fact that he had a brother called Abū Bakr (Udabāʾ, vi, 400). He was born in Medina in about 85/704, and, according to the majority of the sources, died in Bag̲h̲dād in 150/767 —alternative dates for his death are 151, 153 and, in one case (Wafayāt, i, 612), as early as 144/761-2. He was buried in the cemetery of K̲h̲ayzurān, near the grave of Abū Ḥanīfa.

His grandfather, Yasār, was among those taken prisoner at ʿAyn al-Tamr in 12/633-4 and, according to Yāḳūt and al-Bag̲h̲dādī, was one of the first captives sent by K̲h̲ālid b. al-Walīd to Abū Bakr in Medina. He became the slave of Ḳays b. Mak̲h̲rama b. al-Muṭṭalib b. ʿAbd Manāf b. Ḳuṣayy and, having accepted Islam, was manumitted and became his mawlā, thus acquiring the nisba al-Muṭṭalibī. His three sons, Mūsā, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, and Isḥāḳ, were all known as transmitters of ak̲h̲bār. Isḥāḳ married the daughter of another mawlā and from this marriage Ibn Isḥāḳ was born.

There are no details of his early life, but in view of the family nature of early ak̲h̲bār and ḥadīt̲h̲ transmission, it was natural that he should follow in the footsteps of his father and uncles and become specialized in these branches of knowledge. He must have acquired an early reputation as a scholar for al-Zuhrī, who died in 124/741-2, to have spoken of him as "the most knowledgeable of men in mag̲h̲āzī" (ʿUyūn al-at̲h̲ar, i, 8). In 119/737 he came to Alexandria and studied under Yazīd b. Abī Ḥabīb. Subsequently, as Ibn Ḥad̲j̲ar puts it, "he related on the authority of a group of the people of Egypt traditions which no one else related on their authority, so far as I know" (Tahd̲h̲īb, ix, 44). J. Fück has suggested that Ibn Isḥāḳ returned to Medina from Egypt, before departing finally for ʿIrāḳ. There are frequent references to his having left Medina "of old". This is substantiated by the fact that he has only one transmitter among the people of Medina, Ibrāhīm b. Saʿd (Udabāʾ, vi, 399). His leaving Medina is usually attributed to the enmity of two men, His̲h̲ām b. ʿUrwa and Mālik b. Anas. His̲h̲ām b. ʿUrwa is said to have objected to Ibn Isḥāḳ relating traditions on the authority of his wife, Fāṭima bint al-Mundhir b. al-Zubayr. As J. Horovitz has pointed out, Yāḳūt was mistaken in identifying Hishām with the governor of Medina who ordered Ibn Isḥāḳ to be scourged for dallying with women at the rear of the mosque, since Hishām was governor of Medina for a four-year period up to 86/705, the approximate date of Ibn Isḥāḳ's birth; if the story has any validity, it might refer to Hishām's son, Ismāʿīl, who was governor from 106/724-5 (op. cit. in Bibl., 169).

The antagonism of Mālik towards Ibn Isḥāḳ was of a different order. It could have been due to professional jealousy, as the story related by ʿAbd Allāh b. Idrīs suggests: "I was with Mālik b. Anas when a man said to him: 'Muḥammad b. Isḥāḳ says: Present to me the knowledge of Mālik, for I am the man to check it'. Mālik said: 'Look at this anti-Christ saying 'Present to me the knowledge of Mālik'" (Udabāʾ, vi, 400). Another possibility, as A. Guillaume has suggested (Life of Muhammad, Introd., xiii), is that differences may have arisen between them over the contents of Ibn Isḥāḳ's lost book of Sunan. This could well have been so, for although later authorities such as Ibn Ḥanbal did not accept Ibn Isḥāḳ as an authority on legal matters, the latter did lay claim to being an authority on fiḳh, as we can see from the reference in Ibn Ḥadjar: "Ibrāhīm b. Saʿd had, on the authority of Ibn Isḥāḳ, about 17,000 *ḥadīth*s on legal decisions, apart from maghāzī" (Tahdhīb, ix, 41). Another suggestion is that Mālik "objected to Ibn Isḥāḳ tracing the ghazawāt of the Prophet by means of the sons of Jews who had become Muslims and remembered the story of Khaybar and other matters" (Tahdhīb, ix, 45). Yet another explanation of Mālik's enmity towards Ibn Isḥāḳ is based upon the fact that Mālik objected to him on the grounds of his being a Shīʿī and a Ḳadarī (Udabāʾ, vi, 400; ʿUyūn, i, 9; Tahdhīb, ix, 42). The same charge was levelled against al-Wāḳidī and others ... "Aḥmad b. Yūnus said: The scholars of maghāzī were Shīʿī, like Ibn Isḥāḳ and Abū Maʿshar and Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-Umawwī and others" (Udabāʾ, vi, 400).

Having left (or been forced to leave) Medina, Ibn Isḥāḳ went first to al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad, governor of al-Djazīra, then to Abu 'l-Djaʿfar al-Manṣūr at al-Ḥīra, before finally settling in Baghdād. These peregrinations are reflected in the different *riwāya*s of his Sīra. There are some fifteen of these, with Kūfa, Rayy and Baṣra figuring most prominently (Fück, 44) and with only a single Medina riwāya. In addition to the Sīra, he is credited with a Kitāb al-Khulafāʾ, which al-Umawwī related on his authority (Fihrist, 92; Udabāʾ, vi, 401) and a book of Sunan (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, 1008).

As is usual in the literature of djarḥ wa taʿdīl, we find the early Muslim critics expressing diametrically opposed judgements on Ibn Isḥāḳ. In addition to the favourable assessment of al-Zuhrī referred to earlier, ʿĀṣim b. ʿUmar b. Ḳatāda was of the opinion that "knowledge will remain amongst us as long as Ibn Isḥāḳ lives" (ʿUyūn, i, 9; Udabāʾ, vi, 400; Tahdhīb, ix, 44). Shuʿba regarded him as "amīr al-muʾminīn in tradition" (Tahdhīb, ix, 44). Abū Zurʿa, al-Madīnī, Ibn Maʿīn and Ibn Saʿd regarded him as sound in tradition. On the other hand, al-Nisāʾī and Yaḥyā b. Ḳaṭṭān did not accept him in matters of ḥadīth. Al-Athram, Sulaymān al-Taymī and Wuhayb b. Khālid regarded him as a liar—a charge which relates to ḥadīth and is separate from the oft-quoted accusation contained in al-Djumaḥī, Ibn al-Nadīm and Yāḳūt that Ibn Isḥāḳ included verses in his Sīra knowing them to be forged. Al-Bukhārī and Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Numayr were not satisfied with his riwāya. Ibn Ḥanbal, whilst accepting him on matters relating to maghāzī, did not draw upon him for ḥadīth because he objected to his use of the collective isnād: "I see him relating on the authority of a group of people a single ḥadīth and he does not distinguish the words of this one from the words of that" (Tahdhīb, ix, 43). To single out Ibn Isḥāḳ on this score is an unfair stricture, since the use of the collective isnād is a not uncommon feature in the writings of the early authorities on the sīra-maghāzī.

IBN ISRĀʾĪL AL-DIMASHḲĪ, MUḤAMMAD B. SAWWĀR B. ISRĀʾĪL B. AL-KHIḌR B. ISRĀʾĪL AL-SHAYBĀNĪ, Ṣūfī and poet (603-77/1206-78). Amidst the mediocre poetic talents prevailing in Egypt and Syria during the 7th/13th century, Nadjm al-Dīn Abu 'l-Maʿālī Ibn Isrāʾīl occupies a place of distinction, while providing a typical example of the numerous writers of insipid poetry who flourished during that century. His life is perhaps of greater interest than his work; born in Damascus, where he studied, he embarked upon a strange career as a dubious mystic and pleasure-loving poet. He joined the suspect Ṣūfī order founded by Abū Muḥammad ʿAlī al-Ḥarīrī (d. 645/1247-8), whose character and doctrine were severely critized by orthodox authorities such as Shams al-Dīn al-Dhahabī The bad reputation of this shaykh cast a shadow of suspicion upon Ibn Isrāʾīl which was to persist throughout his life. However, Ibn Shākir al-Kutubī states that he received the khirḳa of the Ṣūfī from the hands of Shihāb al-Dīn al-Suhrawardī, which is not possible, since the latter died in 579/1183.

Ibn Isrāʾīl began to travel up and down the land, in the manner of the poor Ṣūfīs (ʿalā ḳadam al-fuḳarāʾ), though he did not refrain from indulging in such passing pleasures (ḳaḍāʾ al-awḳāt al-ṭayyiba) as presented themselves. He frequented the company of the rich and influential, belonged to their coteries, wrote poems in their praise, etc. His dīwān is far more a reflexion of this worldly life than of his alleged mysticism, although it begins with a poem in praise of his shaykh al-Ḥarīrī. He once claimed authorship of a poem by his contemporary and rival Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Munʿim al-Khiyāmī (d. 685/1286), and the matter had to be submitted to the arbitration of Ibn al-Fāriḍ, who discovered the truth.

IBN AL-IṬNĀBA AL-KHAZRADJĪ, ʿAMR B. ʿĀMIR B. ZAYD MANĀT (see his genealogy in Ibn Saʿd, viii, 264, 2 in the article on his granddaughter Kabsha bint Wāḳid b. ʿAmr, wife of ʿAbd Allāh b. Rawāḥa [q.v.]), a pagan Arab poet named after his mother al-Iṭnāba, who belonged to the Banu 'l-Ḳayn b. Djasr of the Khuzāʿa. He was leader of al-Khazradj [q.v.] in their feuds with al-Aws [q.v.], whose chief was Muʿādh b. al-Nuʿmān, father of the well-known Companion of the Prophet Saʿd b. Muʿādh. Ibn al-Iṭnāba restored peace between the Aws and the Khazradj by paying the blood-money after they had fought against each other at the fortress of Fāriʿ (Ibn al-Athīr, i, 500-2, where he is erroneously called ʿĀmir b. al-Iṭnāba). He was on friendly terms with Khālid b. ʿĀmir, the powerful leader of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿa; when the latter was treacherously killed by al-Ḥārith b. Ẓālim al-Murrī at the court of king Abū Ḳābūs al-Nuʿmān III (reigned ca. 580-602), Ibn al-Iṭnāba reviled him for his cowardice, but al-Ḥārith took him by surprise, so that Ibn al-Iṭnāba had to ask his pardon (Ibn al-Athīr, i, 419 f.). In the fanciful account of this incident given in the Aghānī[1], x, 30 on the authority of Abū ʿUbayda, Ibn al-Iṭnāba is called "king of the Ḥidjāz" and represented as wearing a crown (tādj) and drinking wine whilst his slave girls were singing his invective against al-Ḥārith. After this quarrel Ibn al-Iṭnāba's friend Zayd al-Khayl al-Ṭā'ī (d. 10/631-2) raided the Banū Murra, took al-Ḥārith b. Ẓālim prisoner, but pardoned him.

Ibn al-Iṭnāba's fame as a poet rests on some "incomparable" verses (Ibn Ḳutayba, ʿUyūn al-akhbār, ii, 191, 10; 193, 3) on bravery on the battlefield, especially the line "And I say unto my soul, whilst it heaves (from fear) and is frightened: keep thy ground, and thou wilt be praised or else find rest". With these verses Muʿāwiya encouraged himself at Ṣiffīn, when he was at the point of turning his back (Ṭabarī, i, 3300; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 753, etc.). The Ikhwān al-Ṣafā' (Rasā'il, Cairo 1347, i, 154) adduce them as proof for the tremendous influence which poetry can have on man's actions. They belong to a poem (Ibn al-Athīr i, 501; Early Arabic Odes chosen ... by S. M. Husain, no. 12, etc.) which the poet probably composed whilst trying to mediate between the Aws and the Khazradj. In a ḳaṣīda (given by Ibn al-Athīr, i, 502; see also Ibn al-Shadjarī, Ḥamāsa, 52 f. and Abū Tammām, Ḥamāsa, 714 f.) the poet glorifies his clan and himself.

His invective, mentioned above, against al-Ḥārith b. Ẓālim (Aghānī[1], x, 30) was set to music and sung by ʿAzza al-Maylā' [q.v.] (Aghānī[1], xvi, 14; x, 31).

IBN IYĀS (also written AYĀS), ABU 'L-BARAKĀT MUḤAMMAD B. AḤMAD, ZAYN (SHIHĀB) AL-DĪN AL-NĀṢIRĪ AL-DJARKASĪ AL-ḤANAFĪ, born 6 Rabīʿ II 852/9 June 1448, died ca. 930/1524, historian of the decline and fall of Mamlūk rule in Egypt and of the first years of the dominion of the Ottoman Turks after their victory over the Mamlūks in 923/1517. Since early in the 19th century Ibn Iyās has been recognized as a prime source for the events of that period and his major work, Badā'iʿ al-zuhūr fī waḳā'iʿ al-duhūr (Būlāḳ ed., hereafter abbreviated Ibn Iyās) has appeared in several editions. Indicative, however, of the relatively unimportant position held by Ibn Iyās among his contemporaries—but also of the decline of historical writing in Egypt until the end of the 12th/18th century—is the fact that no biography of this author has been found. The few biographical data known must be gleaned from his own writings. What we learn from this source is important and sheds an interesting light on the history of at least one Mamlūk family during part of the Ḳalāwūnid and the whole of the Circassian period.

A great-grandfather of the author, Özdemir (Azdamur) al-ʿUmarī al-Nāṣirī al-Khāzindār (d. 771/1370) served in various functions under the sultans Ḥasan and al-Ashraf Shaʿbān. Among these were those of Emir of Arms (amīr silāḥ), 757, Viceroy of Tripoli, 764, then Viceroy of Aleppo, then again Emir of Arms in 768. He was imprisoned for a time and on his release was named Viceroy of Damascus but died before taking office (cf. Ibn Iyās, i, 221). A daughter of Özdemir married a young Mamlūk, Iyās al-Fakhrī, also called "min Djunayd" in reference to his first owner, and "al-Ẓāhirī," to indicate that he later passed into the possession and service of Sultan al-Ẓāhir Barḳūḳ. Iyās (ca. 780-830/ca. 1378-1427) rose to the rank of Second Executive Secretary (dawādār thānī) under Sultan al-Nāṣir Faradj, the son of Barḳūḳ (cf. Ibn Taghrībirdī, fol. 27b; Wiet, Manhal, no. 563).

The author's father, Aḥmad, as the grandson of one Mamlūk amīr and the son of another, was no longer eligible for inclusion among the military élite of *amīr*s but became one of the awlād al-nās [q.v.] which, according to Ibn Iyās, was equivalent to the adjnād al-ḥalḳa and served, in his time, as a sort of military reserve responsive to the Sultan's command. Ibn Iyās cites an instance, under Sultan Ḳā'itbāy, where each of the reservists was required to serve on an expedition or furnish either a substitute or 100 *dīnār*s (cf. Ibn Iyās, ii, 93). From his son's account, Aḥmad b. Iyās (824-908/1421-5102) seems to have been a prominent man closely related to many emirs and high officials. Of his 25 children, only three, two boys and a girl, survived him. The daughter married a Mamlūk, Ḳurḳmās al-ʿAlā'ī (d. 877/1472), who was Emir of the Horse (amīr ākhūr); one son was Warden of the Armoury (zardkāsh); and the other was the author (cf. Ibn Iyās, ed. Mostafa, iv, 47).

Of the few facts we know about the life of Muḥammad b. Iyās, perhaps the most important is that he studied under two prominent scholars of his time: the polymath al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505) (cf. Ibn Iyās, ii, 119, 271, 307, 339, 392), for whom he seems to have had little respect, and ʿAbd al-Bāsiṭ b. Khalīl al-Ḥanafī (d. 920/1514), the Ḥanafī jurist and historian (cf. ibid., 104, 105 and passim). The bulk of the corpus of Ibn Iyās's writings (six titles in all, cf. Brockelmann, S II, 405) is historical in nature. His aim seems to have been to write a complete history of Egypt beginning with the Pharaonic era down to his day. In essence, he has given us, in his major work

Badāʾiʿ al-zuhūr fī waḳāʾiʿ al-duhūr, a perfunctory survey of all Egyptian history down to the Mamlūk period, followed by a brief year by year summary of events, growing progressively more detailed as he nears his own time. In the first published versions in three volumes (Cairo, 1301-06/1884-88; reprinted Būlāḳ, 1311-12/1894), the history of Egypt from the beginning to the year 815/1412 is covered in the first volume, the second deals with the years 815-906/1412-1501, the end of the reign of al-ʿĀdil Ṭūmān Bāy, and the third with the years 922-8/1516-22, the reign of the last Mamlūk sultan al-As͟hraf Ṭūmān Bāy, omitting the reign of Sultan al-G͟hawrī (906-21/1501-15). This brief résumé both indicates the disproportionate coverage allotted to various periods and points to the problem whether the entire work is to be attributed to Ibn Iyās. The account of al-G͟hawrī's reign, while missing from the manuscripts on which the Cairo-Būlāḳ editions were based, is found in other manuscripts and was included in a re-edition of the parts of the work dealing with the years 872-928/1467-1522, i.e., that period of which Ibn Iyās was an eyewitness observer (3 vols. ed. by P. Kahle, M. Mostafa, M. Sobernheim, Bibliotheca Islamica, v, 1931-39; revised ed., M. Mostafa, 1960-63). While earlier portions of the work (from the reign of Ḳāʾit Bāy) are written in a brief, almost vernacular style, the final section, from 922/1516 onwards, is not only fuller and more detailed, but also more finished and polished in style, leading K. Vollers (in Revue d'Égypte, 1895, 544-73) to the conclusion that Ibn Iyās may not have been the author of this later section, a view disputed by M. Sobernheim (EI[1], ii, 414), who saw in this difference in style the possible conflation of two versions or the combination of a personal diary with a court circular. These later portions include detailed reports on life in Cairo, especially at the Mamlūk court, obituaries of famous men, poems (many of them by the author) in honour of scholars as well as men in power, accounts of civil calamities, records of prices and market trends, as well as details on causes célèbres of the day. The work is of great value, therefore, on a number of levels. As an eyewitness account, and, moreover, by a writer close to the ruling circles, it is similar to the work of Ibn Tag͟hrībirdī half a century earlier, although Ibn Iyās certainly lacks the historical sense and the style of the earlier author. It is of great value as an attempt by a contemporary observer to evaluate and explain the defeat of the Mamlūks by the Ottoman Turks. The author is highly critical of Sultan al-G͟hawrī, whom he blames for the financial plight of the state, and seems aware that corrupt administration, internecine strife in Mamlūk circles, and the neglect of artillery all contributed to the Mamlūk defeat. Finally, the language of portions of the text, reflecting the vernacular in Cairo of the author's day, is of value to students of Arabic dialectology.

The other works attributed to Ibn Iyās are: Mard͟j al-zuhūr fī waḳāʾiʿ al-duhūr, a popular history of the patriarchs and prophets, perhaps not by Ibn Iyās; Nas͟hḳ al-azhār fī ʿad͟jāʾib al-aḳṭār, a cosmography with specific reference to Egypt, written in 922/1517 and much used by 19th-century scholars; a little-known work of which only one manuscript is extant: Nuzhat al-umam fi 'l-ʿad͟jāʾib wa 'l-ḥikam; extracts from Badāʾiʿ, entitled D͟jawāhir al-sulūk; and Muntaẓam badʾ al-dunyā wa-taʾrīk͟h al-umam in three volumes (attribution uncertain, cf. C. Cahen, in REI, iii (1936), 358), these last two extant in one copy each in Istanbul.

IBN ĶABṬŪRNU, (Ķabṭūrna, Ķubṭūrna or Ķubṭurna), the name of three brothers, all Andalusī men of letters. They were natives of Badajoz, where their family was said to be one of the oldest and most illustrious in the whole western part of al-Andalus. To judge by the name, this family is of Iberian origin; Dozy (Suppl., ii, 302) and Simonet (Glosario, 97) suggest that Ķabṭūrnu represents the classical Latin caput followed by the mediaeval Latin torno ('I turn'); hence the tentative interpretation of E. García Gómez, vuelvo la cabeza, a family name which need not astonish us since we know the equally curious Ibn Arfaʿ Raʾsu.

Of the three brothers, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz is the least known. Apart from a brief notice in the Rāyāt of Ibn Saʿīd (no. xxxv, Arabic text, 30, Spanish tr., 163) and two verses reproduced in almost all the anthologies, nothing is known about him.

Abū Bakr ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz is the most eminent of the three brothers. He is held in high regard both as prose-writer and as poet, and it is often said that ʿAbd al-Mad͟jīd Ibn ʿAbdūn (d. 520/1126 or 529/1134) and he are the two greatest writers of the western part of al-Andalus. Yet the few specimens of his prose and poetry that we possess in no way justify this claim. On the contrary, his poetry is artificial and cold, while his prose is pedantic and superficial. Very probably he owes his fame to his wealth and political influence in his capacity of secretary to ʿUmar al-Mutawakkil, petty king of Badajoz (464-88/1072-94). With his brothers he was later employed in the chancellery of the Almoravids. He died in the reign of ʿAlī b. Yūsuf b. Tās͟hfīn after 520/1126 (Ibn al-Abbār, Takmila, no. 1743).

His brother Abū Muḥammad Ṭalḥa was of even slighter talent and importance. He too was secretary in the chancellery and died before him (Ibn al-Abbār, Takmila, no. 259).

In spite of the tragic circumstances in which they lived, the Banū Ķabṭūrnu enjoyed an easy and carefree existence, as if they were unaware of—or indifferent to—the tragic events of their time. Our sources portray the three brothers as irresolutely leading a somewhat decadent dolce vita, scenes from which they describe in short verses of rococo style. This child-like vision of an unbroken life of pleasure has ever since stimulated the imagination of later poets and writers and has led them to repeat, over and over again, verses similar to those of the Banū Ķabṭūrnu.

IBN AL-ḲĀḌĪ, Shihāb al-Dīn Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abi 'l-ʿĀfiya al-Miknāsī, a Moroccan polygraph whose biographical works are highly regarded, was born in Fās in 960/1553, of a famous family belonging to the large tribe of the Zanāta [q.v.]. His father supervised his education and made him undertake serious study with the best teachers in the Maghrib, in particular with shaykh Abu 'l-Maḥāsin Yūsuf al-Fāsī. After this he even won a certain renown as an expert on arithmetic and the division of inheritances. Being anxious to complete his education, Ibn al-Ḳāḍī took advantage of his pilgrimage to Mecca to spend two years studying with the great doctors of the Muslim East. His return, in 986/1578, coincided with the accession of the Saʿdid sultan Aḥmad al-Manṣūr [q.v.] with whom he became intimately acquainted. In 944/1586 he wished to return to the East by sea, but was captured by Christian pirates. After eleven months of painful experiences, almost certainly in Spain, his master ransomed him for 20,000 ounces. In gratitude, Ibn al-Ḳāḍī dedicated all his works to his royal benefactor, in whose entourage he continued to live, apparently without any official duties. At some undetermined date he was appointed ḳāḍī of Salā (Salé), but was recalled for an unknown reason. He then finally settled in his native town and devoted himself to teaching. His biographers record that at the end of his life he was expounding the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī [q.v.] and that he had the honour to have as his disciple al-Maḳḳarī [q.v.], the distinguished author of the Nafḥ al-ṭīb, who recited the prayer for the dead over his grave in Fās, on 6 Shaʿbān 1025/19 August 1616 (or perhaps some months earlier in the same year).

Those works of Ibn al-Ḳāḍī whose titles have been preserved are fourteen in number. The most famous are two collections of biographies of great documentary value: (1) Durrat al-ḥidjāl fī asmāʾ al-ridjāl, a dictionary of famous men of Morocco, including also a series of biographies of illustrious doctors of Islam, and intended to complete the Wafayāt al-aʿyān of Ibn Khallikān [q.v.]; the work has been edited by I. S. Allouche under the title Durrat al-hijal, Répertoire biographique d'Ahmad Ibn al-Qadi, 2 vols., Rabat 1934-6; (2) Djadhwat al-iḳtibās fī man ḥalla min al-aʿlām madīnat Fās, as the title indicates a dictionary of the important personages and scholars who have lived in Fās, but also a very useful topographical guide to the town, where the work was lithographed in 1309/1892. Pleasant to read, it gives the first general picture of the literary movement in Morocco under the Marīnid and Saʿdid dynasties.

Of his historical works, all of which are unpublished, we should mention al-Muntaḳā al-maḳṣūr ʿalā maʾāthir khilāfat al-Manṣūr (var. ʿalā maḥāsin al-khalīfa Abi 'l-ʿAbbās al-Manṣūr); this panegyric of the great sultan is a literary anthology rather than a history of the sovereign and has been widely used by later writers, particularly by al-Ifrānī [q.v.] and al-Nāṣirī [q.v.].

IBN ḲĀḌĪ SAMĀWNĀ [see badr al-dīn ibn ḳāḍī samāwnā].

IBN ḲĀḌĪ SHUHBA, an appellation of members of a family of religious scholars from Damascus called so after an ancestor who had been ḳāḍī of Shuhba in Ḥawrān.

1. The most widely known member of this family is Abū Bakr b. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, Taḳī al-Dīn, known as an author of biographical works, although his main reputation during his lifetime rested on fiḳh. He was born in 779/1377, and he died suddenly and painlessly in 851/1448. His most senior teacher was Sirādj al-Dīn al-Bulḳīnī [q.v.]. He taught at a number of madrasas in Damascus, was an inspector of the Nūrī hospital there, became a ḳāḍī and finally Chief Ḳāḍī 842-44/1438-40 (with an interruption). He was a member of a delegation sent by Sultan Djuḳmāḳ to Shāh Rukh. His son relates that after his death he often appeared in good dreams. His most detailed existing biography is by his disciple, al-Sakhāwī (see Bibl.).

His main work is the important Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya, arranged in 29 chapters covering 20 years each, until 840/1436; this was used by Wüstenfeld (see Bibl.); an edition is being prepared in Baghdād.

Bibliography: al-Sakhāwī, al-Ḍawʾ al-lāmiʿ, xi, 21-5; Ibn Taghrībirdī, vii, 314; al-Suyūṭī, Naẓm al-ʿiḳyān, ed. Hitti, no. 51; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, vii, 269; F. Wüstenfeld, in Abh. G. W. Gött., xxxvi-xxxvii, 1890-91 (esp. vol. xxxvi, 24-7); Brockelmann, II, 63, S II, 50.

2. His son, Badr al-Dīn Muḥammad, d. 874/1470, wrote a biography of his father and a few other works which are mentioned in Brockelmann, II, 37, S II, 25. Badr al-Dīn's son, Taḳī al-Dīn Muḥammad, is also attested as an author (Brockelmann, S II, 25).

3. The uncle of no. 1, Yūsuf b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar, d. 789/1387, made extracts from the Kitāb al-Maghāzī of Mūsā b. ʿUḳba [q.v.]; cf. E. Sachau, SBPr. Ak. W., Phil.-hist. Kl., 1904, xi, 6; Brockelmann, I, 141.

IBN ḲALĀḲIS, Abu 'l-Fatḥ (var. Futūḥ) Naṣr (Allāh) b. ʿAbd Allāh, an Arab poet, writer and letter-writer known by the familiar name of Ibn Ḳalāḳis (or also al-Ḳāḍī al-aʿazz). Born in 532/1137 in Alexandria, where he spent his childhood, he afterwards went to Cairo to study, and the sources record that he had Abū Ṭāhir al-Silāfī [q.v.] as his shaykh.

We do not know for what reason Ibn Ḳalāḳiṣ in about the middle of 1169 visited Sicily, where he lived until the end of the following year, but it may be conjectured that he went there at the invitation of certain friends who will be mentioned below.

Towards the end of 1169, or at the beginning of 1170, the poet was in the Yemen, at Aden and Zabīd, and also in ʿAydhāb on the Egyptian Red Sea coast, for reasons which may have been both commercial and political, as can be deduced from the fact that ʿUmāra al-Yamanī [q.v.], the famous Fāṭimid poet, was among those who urged Ibn Ḳalāḳis to visit the Shīʿī wazīr of Aden, Abū Bakr al-ʿĪdī. But on his return from his business journey or mission, he underwent the same experience as he had suffered in Sicily when embarking to return to Egypt—a shipwreck, which on this occasion obliged him to seek hospitality from the sultan of the Dahlak Islands in the Red Sea. He died in ʿAydhāb in 567/1172.

Ibn Ḳalāḳis has left a record of his stay in certain towns in Sicily (Termini, Cefalù, Caronia, Patti, Olivieri—rather than "Lipari", as M. Amari has preferred to read, see Storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia[2], Catania 1933, iii, 790—Milazzo, Messina and Syracuse), chiefly in al-Zahr al-bāsim fī (var. min) awṣāf Ibn al-Ḳāsim, which, to judge by the fragments in prose and verse brought together in the Kharīda of al-ʿImād al-Iṣfahānī (section devoted to the poets of Egypt, ed. Aḥmad Amīn, Shawḳī Ḍayf and Iḥsān ʿAbbās, Cairo, i, 1951, 2nd ed. n.d., i, 145-65) must be regarded, at least in the muḳaddima, as a description of the poet's travels in Sicily as well as of his sojourn with a patron of the period, the ḳāʾid Abu 'l-Ḳāsim b. Ḥammūd, known as Ibn al-Ḥadjar (see M. Amari, op. cit., passim) to whom, as to his sons Abū Bakr, ʿUmar and ʿUthmān, the poet dedicated his ḳaṣīdas.

It still remains to identify the other persons encountered at Palermo and mentioned not only in the work named above, but also in his Dīwān (ed. Khalīl Muṭrān, Cairo 1905; a more comprehensive ed. has been prepared in Paris), and above all in his unpublished collection of letters (Tarassul Ibn Ḳalāḳis, MS of the Dār al-Kutub in Cairo: al-Maktaba al-Taymūriyya, Adab no. 617). This consists of letters addressed to: (1) Djurdannā in al-Zahr al-bāsim (Kharīda, i, 165, where it is so vocalized by the editors; in the dīwān, it is جرزدن), described as wazīr to the "ṣāḥib Ṣiḳilliyya", which suggests a "Giordano" (a very common name in the Norman period), one of William's ministers, a name not, however, mentioned in that king's entourage; (2) Ghārāt b. Djawshan or Djūshan (Tarassul, fol. 34), an eminent personage at the court of William; (3) al-Sadīd al-Ḥuṣrī (ibid., fol. 47-8), which suggests the "Sedictus" mentioned in M. Amari, op. cit., iii, 510 and n. 2; (4) Ibn Fātiḥ (ibid., fol. 43), who is described as a faḳīh.

Bibliography: To the sources named by M. Amari, op. cit., passim, Brockelmann, I, 261 and S I, 461 and in the article, add the references in Iḥsān ʿAbbās, al-ʿArab fī Ṣiḳilliyya, Cairo 1959, 287-94 (see the review by U. Rizzitano, in Il contributo del mondo arabo agli studi arabo-siculi, in RSO, vi (1961), especially 78-89).

IBN AL-ḲALĀNISĪ, Abū Yaʿlā Ḥamza b. Asad ... al-Tamīmī (ca. 465-555/1073-1160), a member of an important family of Damascus, who for a time was raʾīs of that town, and above all was its historian for the period extending from the middle of the 4th/10th century to 555/1160.

The History of Ibn al-Ḳalānisī, known simply by the title Dhayl taʾrīkh Dimashḳ, consists of two parts, the limits being somewhat imprecise. The first part, the opening pages of which are lost, and which goes down approximately to the time of the author's youth, is based on earlier Syro-Egyptian archives and minor chronicles and not (or at least far less than has been thought) upon the lost History of Baghdād of Hilāl al-Ṣābiʾ. For the remainder, Ibn al-Ḳalānisī essentially reports, again in addition to information drawn from archives, the events which had been witnessed either by himself or by contemporaries who had given him first-hand accounts. The Dhayl, which has no literary pretensions, provides us with a personal account of politico-social life in Damascus and, around it, in central Syria and Palestine, that is not without partiality but is extraordinarily vivid, in comparison with the main body of Arab historiography. It is a work of very great merit, and the almost exclusive source of what Ibn al-Athīr, Sibṭ Ibn al-Djawzī and Abū Shāma, as well as all the succeeding authors who depended on them, knew of the history of central Syria during the first half-century of the period of the Crusades. Unfortunately, having been discovered only at the beginning of this century and translated still later, it has been insufficiently exploited in the standard Histories of the Crusades and of the Latin East.

Bibliography: The Dhayl was published, from the unique manuscript, by Amedroz in 1908; an English tr. (with some intentional omissions) was made by H. A. R. Gibb for the years 490-555, under the title The Damascus Chronicle of the Crusades, 1932, and a partial French tr., under the title Damas de 1075 à 1154, by R. Le Tourneau, 1952, for the period indicated. The first of these translations is accompanied by an important preface. For the earlier part of the History, see Cl. Cahen, in Arabic and Islamic studies in honor of Hamilton A. R. Gibb, Leiden 1965, 156-67.

IBN AL-KALBĪ [see al-kalbī].

IBN KAMĀL [see kemālpasha-zāde].

IBN KAMMŪNA, Saʿd b. Manṣūr, oculist and philosopher, lived in Baghdād in the 7th/13th century, under pagan Mongol rule. His works, mostly manuals of philosophy and commentaries on Ibn Sīnā and Suhrawardī, secured him a place in Islamic philosophical discussions.

A strong tendency toward rationalist deism pervades his Tanḳīḥ al-abḥāth li 'l-milal al-thalāth, in which the author, who was a Jew, discusses religion and prophethood in general (drawing on Ibn Sīnā, al-Ghazālī, Maimonides, and Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī), and devotes a separate chapter to each of the monotheistic faiths, treating the subject with a remarkable show of objectivity. Steinschneider considered the work "the most interesting tract of inter-religious polemics in Arabic". Most of it is devoted to Islam, and the cumulative effect of the discussion was hardly apt to please a Muslim. Written in 679/1280, the book served as a pretext for a mob outbreak against the author, who died shortly thereafter (683/1284-5).

The same qualities of calm discourse, a certain conscious pride in the capacity for adducing detachedly pro and contra arguments, an appeal to common sense and an appreciation of the essential good to be found in various creeds are evident in his treatise on the differences between Rabbinic and Karaite Jews.

Bibliography: see Examination of the inquiries into the three faiths, ed. M. Perlmann (Un. of Calif. Publ. Near East. St. 1967). (M. Perlmann)

IBN ḲASĪ, patronymic of the members of the Banū Ḳasī family which, according to the Djamhara of Ibn Ḥazm, is descended from a Visigothic count, Ḳasī; the latter gave his name to a long line of Muwallad descendants settled in the regions lying between the Pyrenees and the valley of the Ebro; their superficial Islamization allowed them to preserve old connexions and even family ties with the noble houses of Vasconia. The most outstanding member of this family was Mūsā b. Mūsā Ibn Ḳasī who, from his fief at Tudela, declared war on ʿAbd al-Raḥmān II, forming an alliance with García Iñiguez of Navarre; after a series of submissions and rebellions, he was officially acknowledged lord of Tudela. At the request of the Umayyad amīr Muḥammad I, he led an expedition against Catalonia and, at the height of his power, succeeded in becoming known as the third king of Spain. As a protection against attacks from Asturias, he built the fortress of Albelda two leagues south of Logroño. He was attacked by Ordoño I, and was put to flight and severely wounded in the cutskirts of Clavijo; he died shortly afterwards and was succeeded by his son Lope, who acknowledged the suzerainty of Ordoño I, himself dying soon after. His brothers, Muṭarrif and Ismāʿīl, had themselves proclaimed at Tudela and Saragossa, while Muḥammad b. Lope, grandson of Mūsā b. Mūsā, yielded to the authority of Muḥammad I; appointed governor of Saragossa, he rebelled again and then, under pressure from the Tudjībīs of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, submitted again to the Umayyads; he was eventually killed, after having made repeated attacks on the capital of the Ebro which was occupied by the Tudjībīs. From his death onwards, the numerous descendants of Mūsā b. Mūsā Ibn Ḳasī, divided and in rivalry, grew increasingly weak and ended in obscurity, during the reign of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān III. A son of Muḥammad b. Lope, lord of Tudela, died in 303/915, the same year that his brother Muṭarrif was assassinated by his nephew Muḥammad, son of his brother ʿAbd Allāh. A princess of the same lineage, Urraca, married Fruela II, and the other members of this turbulent family were led to Cordova to serve in the army of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān III or were converted to Christianity and frequented the courts of León and Navarre.

IBN ḲASĪ, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim Aḥmad b. Ḥusayn, one of the many rebels who helped to precipitate the fall of the Almoravid dynasty in Spain, during the critical period which preceded the landing of the Almohad troops at Cadiz in 541/1146-7.

The scene of his exploits was in the South of what is now Portugal, in the Algarve, and more especially at Silves, the former capital of that region. Immediately outside the town he had had built a rābiṭa in which to assemble his followers, the murīdūn (aspirants to the mystical life), who were formed into religious militias. From this monastery of soldier-monks he spread his doctrine and published his claims to the imāma.

In his youth Ibn Ḳasī was a prodigal who pursued a life of pleasure, until, being suddenly touched by grace, he gave away his possessions and undertook long pilgrimages through Andalusia. From chance meetings on his travels he had gathered round himself a personal guard composed of individuals who were far from respectable (dāʾirat al-sūʾ). He professed to be a saint, represented himself as the mahdī and performed false miracles (makhārīḳ). These items of information that are so unfavourable to Ibn Ḳasī come to us from Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb. According to this historian, his disciples were imbued with the doctrines of the Bāṭinī ghulāt, infatuated with the philosophic concepts spread by the Ikhwān al-ṣafāʾ. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid al-Marrākushī, the author of the Muʿdjib, passes a judgement on him that is much more severe, but in fact it is too arbitrary and seems to bear little relation to reality. He depicts him as nothing more than a charlatan, a sly trickster (ṣāḥib ḥiyal, rabb shaʿbadha), and indeed not a subject of any interest.

To evoke a more exact idea of the man it is necessary to adhere to the facts.

On the question of his belonging to the clan of the declared anti-Almoravid Ṣūfīs, it can be accepted as established that Ibn Ḳasī had felt the influence of the Almeria school. This was directed by Ibn al-ʿArīf, who died at Marrākush in 536/1141, a victim of the suspicion and ill-will of the authorities, at the same time as Ibn Barradjān of Seville, who seems to have been his master rather than his disciple. If we are to believe al-Shaʿrānī, Ibn Barradjān claimed the title of imām and was recognized as such in 130 villages. Ibn Ḳasī apparently proposed to follow the example of this celebrated Ṣūfī, who was very opportunely arrested and thrown into prison on the orders of ʿAlī b. Yūsuf b. Tāshfīn before he had had time to put his idea into practice.

Ibn Ḳasī's venture took place between the year 537/1142, one year after the tragic end of Ibn al-ʿArīf and Ibn Barradjān, and the year 546/1151, the date of his assassination, against a political background that was at first profoundly disturbed by the decay of the Almoravid power. Rebellion then became established in the towns; insecurity spread through the countryside. The roads were infested with brigands and footpads. An attack on the fortress of Monteagudo failed (538/1144). But on 12 Ṣafar 539/14 August 1144, a small detachment of 70 murīdūn, under the command of a certain Ibn al-Ḳābila, a brave and distinguished man, succeeded by a ruse in capturing the fortress of Mertola. Ibn Ḳasī took possession of the stronghold and established himself there, making his supporters recognize him as imām. As a result of two rebel chiefs, Ibn Wazīr and Ibn Mundhir, rallying to his cause, Evora, Béja, Huelva, Niebla and Silves joined Mertola to form the fragile kingdom over which Ibn Ḳasī, an ambiguous figure who wished to be both politician and Ṣūfī, was to endeavour to rule. But as early as 540/1145 differences arose, which brought him into conflict with his brother and Ibn Wazīr. He thought it a clever move to approach the Almohads. He succeeded in coming to terms with them and encouraged them to land in Spain. Immediately Jerez, Arcos, Ronda and Niebla recognized Almohad sovereignty; in the Algarve, Silves fell in its turn; next Béja, Mertola, Seville and Badajoz capitulated. Ibn Ḳasī's fortunes began to be jeopardized. The Almohad intervention which he had solicited and supported was the cause of his fall. To escape the clutches of his powerful allies he planned a rapprochement with the Portuguese of Coimbra. This manœuvre provoked the distrust of the people of Silves, for the consequences of such a policy might have been dangerous for their safety. A group of individuals decided to assassinate him; they approached him, struck him down and fixed his head on the end of the very lance that he had received as a gift from the Christians of Coimbra (546/1151).

Of the works attributed to him, only that entitled Khalʿ al-naʿlayn is generally mentioned. Ibn ʿArabī, born in Seville fourteen years after Ibn Ḳasī's death, a disciple and continuator of Ibn al-ʿArīf, has left a commentary on it.

IBN AL-ĶĀSIM, Abu ʿAbd Allāh ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ķāsim b. Khālid b. Djunāda al-ʿUtaķī, the most prominent disciple of Mālik b. Anas [q.v.], and considered the most reliable transmitter of Mālik's opinions. He was a mawlā affiliated to the descendants of the ʿUtaķā', a band of robbers who had been captured and subsequently manumitted by Muḥammad. He was born in 128/746 or, more probably, in 132/749 in Ramla, and died in Cairo in 191/806. He is reported to have studied with Mālik for twenty years, and he was the main agent in spreading Mālikī doctrine to Egypt and from there to North Africa and the Maghrib. A main work of the Mālikī school, the Mudawwana, is based on the answers which Ibn al-Ķāsim gave, first, to Asad b. al-Furāt [q.v.] and, later, to Saḥnūn [q.v.]; the version of this last, properly called al-Mudawwana wa 'l-mukhtaliṭa, because its author had not been able to complete its revision and editing before his death, gained public acclaim and is commonly referred to as the Mudawwana, and only a few fragments of the version of Asad b. Furāt, called Asadiyya, have survived. The Mudawwana of Saḥnūn was often commented upon by later scholars. Ibn al-Ķāsim is also the author of one of the versions of the Muwaṭṭa' of his teacher, Mālik, and considerable portions of it have been preserved. He does not seem to have transmitted many traditions (aḥādīth), apart from the contents of the Muwaṭṭa'.

IBN ĶĀSIM [see muḥammad b. ḥāzim].

IBN ĶĀSIM AL-GHAZZĪ, Shams al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad al-Miṣrī, also known as Ibn al-Gharābīlī, a Shāfiʿī scholar and commentator, d. 918/1512. He was born and grew up in Ghazza, and was a disciple of Djalāl al-Dīn al-Maḥallī (d. 864/1459; Brockelmann, II, 138, S II, 140), but little else is known of his life.

The following works of his have survived:

1. Fatḥ al-ķarīb al-mudjīb, or al-Ķawl al-mukhtār fī sharḥ Ghāyat al-ikhtiṣār, a commentary on the Mukhtaṣar, or Taķrīb, or Ghāyat al-ikhtiṣār of Abū Shudjāʿ [q.v.]; editio princeps, Būlāķ 1271, very often reprinted, also Singapore 1310 with a Malay interlinear translation; ed. and transl. into French by L. W. C. van den Berg, Leiden 1894 (some corrections of this faulty translation in G.-H. Bousquet, Kitâb et-Tanbîh, Bibliothèque de la Faculté de Droit de l'Université d'Alger, ii, xi, xiii, xv, Algiers 1949-52); numerous glosses, e.g., that of al-Bādjūrī [q.v.].

2. A gloss on the Fatḥ al-ghayth of ʿAbd al-Raḥīm al-ʿIrāķī, which is a commentary on his own Alfiyya or Tabṣirat al-mubtadi' wa-tadhkirat al-muntahī, based on the work of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ [q.v.], on the science of traditions.

3. A gloss on the commentary of al-Taftāzānī [q.v.] on the ʿAķā'id of al-Nasafī [q.v.].

4. A gloss on the commentary of Aḥmad b. Ḥasan al-Djārabardī on the Shāfiya of Ibn al-Ḥādjib [q.v.], on grammar.

5. Manẓūma fi 'l-dāl wa 'l-dhāl, a short ķaṣīda containing pairs of words which differ from each other only by the one having the letter dāl and the other the letter dhāl; Cat. Berlin, 7027.

IBN KATHĪR, Abū Maʿbad (or Abū Bakr) ʿAbd Allāh b. Kathīr al-Dārānī al-Makkī, one of the "seven readers" [see ķirā'a] of the Ķur'ān. Born at Mecca, in 45/665, in a family of Iranian origin which had emigrated to the Yemen, he was a mawlā of ʿAmr b. ʿAlķama al-Kinānī. He followed the trade of dealer in perfumes (ʿaṭṭār, in the Ḥidjāz: dārānī). His authorities were the Companion ʿAbd Allāh b. al-Sā'ib, Mudjāhid and Dirbās. His direct pupils were Ibn Abī Bazzā, or Bazzī, and Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī, called Ķunbul. Both of these became connected with the Shāfiʿī Ibn Mudjāhid, who procured Ibn Kathīr's recognition as a "canonical reader" (al-Subkī, i, 102). Bazzī and Ķunbul are referred to under the name of Ḥaramiyyāni (al-Dānī, Taysīr, ed. Pretzl, 3). Ibn Kathīr had a definite influence on contemporary traditionists, Baṣrans as well as Kūfans, such as Sufyān b. ʿUyayna, the two Ḥammāds, and the grammarians al-Khalīl and al-Aṣmaʿī. The Baṣran reader Abū ʿAmr b. al-ʿAlā' is said to have been inspired by him.

IBN KATHĪR, ʿImād al-Dīn Ismāʿīl b. ʿUmar b. Kathīr, born in Boṣrā circa 700/1300 and died in Damascus in Shaʿbān 774/February 1373, was one of the best-known historians and traditionists of Syria under the Baḥrī Mamlūk dynasty. Educated at Damascus, where he went to live with his elder brother in 706/1306, after the death of their father, he had as his main teacher, in fiķh, the Shāfiʿī Burhān al-Dīn al-Fazārī (in 729), but next fell strongly, and very early, under the influence of Ibn Taymiyya (d. 728/1328) and his school. In addition, through his marriage with the daughter of Djamāl al-Dīn al-Mizzī (d. 742/1342) he became the son-in-law of one of the most famous traditionists of Syria.

His own career, as one of the Syrian ʿulamā', was for long a modest one. Towards the end of the year 741/1341, after the death of Tankiz and before that of Muḥammad b. Ķalāwūn, Ibn Kathīr took part in two enquiries which were held, under the presidency of the governor Alṭunbughā al-Nāṣirī, to pass judgement on a zindīķ accused of incarnationism (ḥulūl) (Bidāya, xiv, 189-90; E. Strauss, L'inquisition dans l'État mamlouk, in RDSO, xxv (1950), 16-7).

In Muḥarram 746/May 1345, he was appointed khaṭīb in the mosque founded at Mizza by the amīr Bahā' al-Dīn al-Mardjānī (d. 759/1358; Bidāya, xiv, 216, 263). In Dhu 'l-Ķaʿda 748/February 1348, under the governorship of Arghūn Shāh (d. 750/1349), he succeeded his teacher al-Dhahabī, who had just died, as teacher of ḥadīth at the turba of Umm Sâliḥ and, according to some sources, in 756 he obtained, for a very short time, the post of director of the Dār al-ḥadīth al-Ashrafiyya after the death of the ḳāḍī Taḳī al-Dīn al-Subkī. In 752/1351, after the failure of the revolt of the amīr Baybughā Urūs, he was received at the Dammāghiyya madrasa by the caliph al-Muʿtaḍid (d. 763/1361-2), who arrived in Damascus, accompanied by the four ḳāḍī al-ḳuḍāt of Egypt, to restore order there. Under the first governorship of ʿAlī al-Māridānī, Ibn Kathīr took part, in Djumādā II 755/June-July 1354, in the council which condemned to death a Shīʿī of Ḥilla, who, passing through Damascus, was accused of having publicly insulted at the Umayyad mosque the first three caliphs, Muʿāwiya, and Yazīd (Bidāya, xiv, 250). In Radjab 759/June 1358, the amīr Mandjak consulted him, together with other ʿulamāʾ, in order to ratify various decisions concerning the struggle against corruption (Bidāya, xiv, 261-2). During the revolt of the amīr Baydamūr in 762/1361 (Bidāya, xiv, 280-2), Ibn Kathīr, on being consulted with the other chief ʿulamāʾ of Damascus, seems to have prudently counselled, in his fatwā, a policy of conciliation and compromise. When Baydamūr returned to Damascus, after his dismissal, in Shaʿbān 766/April-May 1365, Ibn Kathīr was appointed to organize in his honour some readings of the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī (Bidāya, xiv, 312). In Rabīʿ I 767/November-December 1365, when the ḳāḍī al-ḳuḍāt Tādj al-Dīn al-Subkī, accused of various extortions, appeared before a council presided over by the governor Mankalī-Bughā, Ibn Kathīr defended his ḳāḍī energetically (Bidāya, xiv, 316-8). It was probably in gratitude for this that Mankalī-Bughā conferred on him, in Shawwāl 767/June-July 1366, a professorship in Ḳurʾānic exegesis at the Umayyad mosque (Bidāya, xiv, 321). The amīr Mandjak, appointed governor of Damascus in 770/1368-9, reorganized the defences of the Lebano-Syrian coast, threatened by the incursions of the Franks of Cyprus; Ibn Kathīr wrote, at his request, a short dissertation on the merits of the ribāṭ: al-Idjtihād fī ṭalab al-djihād (Cairo 1347/1928). Ibn Kathīr died a few years later and was buried in the cemetery of the Ṣūfiyya beside his master, Ibn Taymiyya.

By far the most important of Ibn Kathīr's works is his great history of Islam, al-Bidāya wa 'l-nihāya (Cairo 1351-8/1932-9, 14 vols.), the interest of which varies according to the periods treated but which is nevertheless one of the principal historical works of the Mamlūk period. The Bidāya begins with a sīra which, although it is late, is far from lacking interest. His history of the caliphate makes use, among other sources, of al-Ṭabarī, Ibn ʿAsākir, Ibn al-Djawzī, Ibn al-Athīr, Sibṭ Ibn al-Djawzī, Ḳuṭb al-Dīn al-Yūnīnī, al-Dhahabī, etc. The Bidāya ends with a chronicle of the history of Damascus, which owes much to the Taʾrīkh of al-Birzālī (d. 739/1338-9) and his Muʿdjam. The popularity of the Bidāya is proved by the great number of historical works for which it, in its turn, was the basis, including those of Ibn Ḥidjdjī (d. 816/1413), Ibn Ḳāḍī Shuhba (d. 851/1348) and especially Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī (d. 852/1449), who wrote a continuation not only of Ibn Kathīr but of two of the latter's great teachers, al-Mizzī and al-Dhahabī. Al-ʿAynī (d. 855/1451) was also indebted to the Bidāya.

Ibn Kathīr's contribution to the science of ḥadīth is also important. His K. al-Takmīl, which consisted of a catalogue of the first Muslim traditionists, used the Tahdhīb of al-Mizzī and the work of al-Dhahabī. But his principal work in this field is his K. al-Djāmiʿ, a monumental compilation in which were listed, in alphabetical order of the Companions who had transmitted them, the traditions contained in the Musnad of Ibn Ḥanbal, the "Six Books" and some other less well-known works. In addition, Ibn Kathīr summarized in his Mukhtaṣar (Cairo 1355/1937), the Muḳaddima li-ʿulūm al-ḥadīth of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (d. 643/1245). He himself refers, in the Bidāya (xi, 24), to a commentary on the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī on which he was engaged; this commentary was not completed, but the project was taken up again by Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī. The latter states (al-Durar al-kāmina, i, 373) that Ibn Kathīr had also made a collection of the *ḥadīth*s quoted in the Tanbīh of al-Shīrāzī (d. 476/1083-4) and in the Mukhtaṣar of Ibn al-Ḥādjib (d. 646/1248-9), a work which he himself had studied, at the beginning of his career, with al-Fazārī.

Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī also reports that Ibn Kathīr had begun work on a vast commentary on the Ḳurʾān. His Tafsīr (Cairo 1342/1923), essentially a philological work, is very elementary and foreshadows, in its style, that which al-Suyūṭī wrote later. His K. Faḍāʾil al-Ḳurʾān (Cairo 1348/1929) is a short manual consisting of a summary of the history of the Ḳurʾān.

Ibn Kathīr was also interested in jurisprudence. He had planned to write a vast treatise of fiḳh based on the Ḳurʾān and ḥadīth, but did not get further than the chapter on the Pilgrimage, in the section on ʿibādāt. He also alludes, in the Bidāya (xii, 124), to a commentary on the Tanbīh of al-Shīrāzī. In his fatwā, mentioned above, on the djihād, he was inspired by the K. al-Siyāsa al-sharʿiyya of Ibn Taymiyya. The Ṭabaḳāt al-shāfiʿiyya are lost, but often mentioned in the obituaries of the Bidāya; they were continued and completed by Ibn Ḳāḍī Shuhba.

IBN AL-ḲAṬṬĀʿ, ʿAlī b. Djaʿfar b. ʿAlī al-Shantarīnī al-Saʿdī al-Ṣiḳillī, anthologist, historian, grammarian and lexicographer (we have very little information about his work as a poet), who was born in Sicily in 433/1041, at a time when the island was ravaged by civil war. He devoted himself to the study of lexicography and grammar under the direction of such scholars as Ibn al-Birr [q.v.] who, according to the sources, made him familiar with the Ṣiḥāḥ of al-Djawharī [q.v.]. But, as soon as the Norman forces began their conquest of the island in 1061, Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭāʿ, together with a certain number of the Muslim élite, left Sicily. After a short stay in Andalusia he proceeded to Egypt, where he is known to have been at the beginning of the 6th/12th century.

On the subject of his life in his new home we have only a few items of information, which tell us that he was soon chosen to be tutor to the sons of the Fāṭimid wazīr al-Afḍal b. Badr al-Djamālī [q.v.] and that he devoted himself to the teaching of prosody, grammar and lexicography; several distinguished pupils were educated at his school, among whom Abū Muḥ. ʿAbd Allāh b. Barrī [see IBN BARRĪ] is noteworthy. Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭāʿ died in Egypt in 515/1121 and was buried not far from the tomb of the imām al-Shāfiʿī.

Apart from a certain number of works named in the various sources but thought to be lost (a list of these will be found in U. Rizzitano, Notizie bio-bibliografiche, see Bibl.), two of his writings have partially survived: the Kitāb al-Durra al-khaṭīra min shuʿarāʾ al-Djazīra, an anthology of Arabo-Sicilian poetry, of which there survive only extracts as a result of the activity of later compilers (see Notizie bio-bibliografiche, 275-80), and al-Mulaḥ al-ʿaṣriyya. His other writings have been transmitted in their entirety, but almost all are unpublished: they are the Madjmūʿ min shiʿr al-Mutanabbī wa-ghawāmiḍihi (a short commentary on some verses of the poet of Sayf al-Dawla, see Bibl.); a group of five short treatises on metre (see Notizie bio-bibliografiche, 282-4), the Kitāb al-Afʿāl, which was first noticed by E. Griffini (see Centenario della nascita di M. Amari, Palermo 1910, i, 431 ff.) and of which we possess an edition (Ḥaydarābād 1354), and lastly the unpublished Abniyat al-asmāʾ (see Notizie bio-bibliografiche, 285-92, where the dībādja, the list of chapters and the conclusion are published).

IBN AL-ḲAṬṬĀʿ, ʿĪSĀ B. SAʿĪD AL-YAḤṢUBĪ, Andalusian vizier of humble extraction but of Arab origin. Although he was the son of a simple schoolmaster, he succeeded in raising himself in the social scale thanks to al-Manṣūr [q.v.], who gave him important posts and even entrusted to him the command of an army sent to Morocco in 386/997 to bring Zīrī b. ʿAṭiyya (cf. H. R. Idris, Zīrides, 81) to reason. Al-Manṣūr's successor, his son ʿAbd al-Malik al-Muẓaffar [q.v.], confirmed his appointment as vizier and left the administration of the state to him; he even gave his youngest sister in marriage to ʿĪsā's son (396/1005). But his rise made him many enemies, while he incurred the resentment of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, the brother, and of al-Dhalfāʾ, the mother, of ʿAbd al-Malik, who had complete confidence in him. Anticipating a change in the wind, and urged on by the nobles jealous of the authority of the Slavs (Saḳāliba [q.v.]), he hatched a plot to put an end to the domination of the ʿĀmirids to whom he owed so much, and to replace Hishām II by a grandson of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān III, Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Djabbār. However, al-Muẓaffar, informed from various sources of the plot against him, forestalled him and decided to have his vizier put to death. When attended by his gay companions, he summoned Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭāʿ and had him murdered by his men in his own madjlis. Ibn Ḥayyān gives a vivid description of this shocking act, which happened on 10 Rabīʿ I 397/4 December 1006. His goods were confiscated—but it was discovered that he was much poorer than had been commonly believed—and the vengeance of the ḥādjib was extended to the family, the friends and the subordinates of his victim.

IBN AL-ḲAṬṬĀN, ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM HIBAT ALLĀH B. ABĪ ʿABD ALLĀH AL-FAḌL B. ʿABD AL-ʿAZĪZ B. MUḤAMMAD B. AL-ḤUSAYN B. ʿALĪ AL-BAGHDĀDĪ, traditionist, oculist, and especially poet, of Baghdād, born in 478 or 479/1086, died 28 Ramaḍān 558/30 August 1163. Although he was the author of medical works which have not survived, and also transmitted *ḥadīth*s without incurring the reproof of critics, Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭān is known chiefly for his vigorous satires which, as Goldziher says (Muh. St., ii, 60), "spared neither the caliph nor anyone else", for his mudjūn and for his wit, as well as for his dealing with Ḥayṣa Bayṣa [q.v.]. He was one of the first to use the metre fiʿlun/mutafāʿilun/faʿūlun [faʿilun] characteristic of the dū bayt [see RUBĀʿĪ], with the omission of the final foot, as often used by Bahāʾ al-Dīn Zuhayr [q.v.].

IBN ḲAYS AL-RUḲAYYĀT, ʿUBAYD ALLĀH (not ʿAbd Allāh, which was the name of his brother) B. ḲAYS B. SHURAYKH, Arab poet of the Umayyad period. He belonged to the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy, one of the lesser clans of the Ḳuraysh. He was born at Mecca, perhaps in the twenties (the anecdote *Aghānī*³, v, 158, 20 which points to 12/633 is not authentic) and grew up in the Ḥidjāz. In 37/657 after the battle of Ṣiffīn he moved with some of his kinsmen to al-Raḳḳa in the Djazīra (Mesopotamia); amongst them was ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Abī Saʿd, whose daughter Ruḳayya is the lady from whom together with some of her namesakes the poet took his strange surname (see Nöldeke, Zur Grammatik, 29). He remained in Mesopotamia for about 30 years, making, however, occasional journeys to the Ḥidjāz. In 62/683 two sons of his brother ʿAbd Allāh and some other kinsmen of his were slain in the battle on the Ḥarra, and he mourned their loss (poems 40 and 41). Towards the end of the sixties, those of the Banū ʿĀmir b. Luʾayy who dwelt in Mesopotamia became involved in the contest between the Umayyads and the Zubayrids. When Ḥarb b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid, the brother of Ruḳayya, killed one of the Banū Sulaym, ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb al-Sulamī (d. 70/690) raided the Banū ʿĀmir in the Wādi 'l-Aḥrār in the neighbourhood of al-Raḳḳa; on this occasion Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt was taken prisoner, but he was set free thanks to the intervention of two Sulamīs (poem 43). He then moved with his kinsmen to Syria; but already in 71/690 we find him in the ʿIrāḳ on the side of Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. He took part in the battle of Dayr al-Djāthalīḳ near Maskin, where Muṣʿab fell (72/691). After the battle he fled to Kūfa and found shelter in the house of a lady hailing from the Khazradj, whom he calls in his poems Kathīra. This sojourn gave rise to a love-story about Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt and Kathīra (Ibn al-Washshāʾ, al-Muwashshā, 54, 15). After a year he ventured to return to Medina and found in ʿAbd Allāh b. Djaʿfar b. Abī Ṭālib a generous patron. He now sang the praise of the Umayyads. ʿAbd Allah b. Djaʿfar interceded for him with ʿAbd al-Malik, and the caliph pardoned him, though he did not grant him his former annuity. So Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt went to the court of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān, the governor of Egypt, and composed panegyrics on him. In the dispute between the caliph and his brother ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz he supported the latter's claim to the throne (poems III, 9.16 and LXI, 12). The year of the poet's death is unknown.

Though a considerable part of the nearly 1000 verses of Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt which have come down to us consists of panegyrics, yet he belongs first and foremost to the erotic poets who flourished at his time in the Ḥidjāz. With ʿUmar b. Abī Rabīʿa, by whom he is otherwise easily surpassed, he has some traits in common; his style is lucid and fluent, he avoids uncommon words, he prefers the short metres, especially khafīf and munsariḥ. His language shows occasionally traces of the dialect of the Ḥidjāz, e.g., bi 'l-raʾi instead of bi 'l-raʾyi in no. 39, 41. His verses were set to music by the great singers of Medina and later by those at the court of the ʿAbbāsids. Muḥammad b. Ḥabīb (d. 245/860) was probably the first who brought the poet's verses (shiʿr) together, and this collection has come down to us in the recension made by Abū Saʿīd al-Sukkarī (d. 275/888). Another collection or rather selection (Ikhtiyār shiʿr ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt) was made by Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr (Fihrist, 143, 3) who died in 280/893. The noted genealogist of the Ḳuraysh, al-Zubayr b. Bakkār (d. 256/870), considered him the best poet produced by the Ḳuraysh in Islam; his Akhbār ʿUbayd Allāh b. Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt is apparently the main source of the article on the poet in Abu 'l-Faradj's Aghānī, [1]iv, 155-67; [3]v, 72-100). Other books with the same title were written by Ḥammād b. Isḥāḳ, the grandson of Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī (Fihrist, 243, 2), and, along with selected poems, by Ibn al-Marzubān (d. 309/921).

Bibliography: al Sukkarī's recension of Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt's poems, extant in the Istanbul MS Aṣir Efendi 746 (of which the two Cairo MSS A and B are but copies), was published, with some further poems from other sources and accompanied by a German translation, notes and a valuable introduction, by N. Rhodokanakis (Der Dīwān des ʿUbaid-Allāh b. Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt, in SBAk, Wien, cxliv, 1902). It is to be noted that the readings of MS C are given in the Additions at the end of the book. IBN KAYSĀN, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Kaysān al-Naḥwī, Arab grammarian, the date and place of whose birth are unknown. He was a pupil of Bundār Ibn Lizza and, in particular, of al-Mubarrad (d. 285/998) and Thaʿlab (d. 291/904); under these teachers he acquired a knowledge of the two grammatical traditions of Baṣra and Kūfa. He lived in Baghdād and died there in 299/911, according to the generally accepted date, in 320/932 according to Yāḳūt (Udabāʾ, xvii, 141). His teaching used to attract a great number of listeners, men of wealth or high rank; but whether richly dressed or ill-clad, it is said that they all received the same welcome from him. Among his pupils were Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān known as al-Djaʿd (al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 72) and Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad b. Baḥr al-Ruhnī al-Shaybānī (Yāḳūt, op. cit., xviii, 32).

The historical sources all alike recognize his great philological knowledge, but they unanimously attribute to him (or reproach him for) the mingling of the grammatical doctrines of Baṣra and Kūfa. He counts as a good representative of the so-called eclectic school of Baghdād. In fact Ibn Kaysān appears to be an author of individuality, with a fine and penetrating intellect, who refused to take sides (see in particular al-Ḳifṭī, Inbāh, iii, 58, lines 1-3). But, in regard to method, as G. Weil says in the Einleitung (78) of his ed. of the K. al-Inṣāf of Ibn al-Anbārī (Leiden 1913), he was a Baṣran. Ibn Kaysān betrays himself by the title of his K. al-Masāʾil ʿalā madhhab al-naḥwiyyīn mimmā 'khtalafa fīhi 'l-Baṣriyyūn wa 'l-Kūfiyyūn (Fihrist, 81): to contrast Baṣrans and Kūfans in this way, one has to know what a grammatical system is, one has to be a Baṣran; the Kūfan Thaʿlab had given simply Ikhtilāf al-naḥwiyyīn as the title of his book which was the point of departure of these long grammatical controversies. Furthermore, Ibn Kaysān, by the title quoted above, is the first author known to have given this generic name Kūfī to all those who accepted the views of the grammarians of Kūfa.

The Fihrist (81) enumerates fifteen works of Ibn Kaysān; Yāḳūt (op. cit., xvii, 139) adds the titles of four others. None of them has survived. They reveal the activities of the naḥwī, who dealt with the question of secretaries: firstly the K. Ghalaṭ Adab al-kātib, then the K. Maṣābīḥ al-kuttāb. He was also a lexicographer: K. Gharīb al-ḥadīth, and a Ḳurʾānist: K. al-Ḳirāʾāt, K. Maʿānī 'l-Ḳurʾān. Ibn al-Anbārī (Nuzha, 162, Baghdād, ed. al-Sāmarrāʾī) also mentions the Sharḥ al-sabʿ al-ṭiwāl [al-djāhiliyyāt]; of this Sharḥ, the ms. Berlin 7440 contains the commentary on the Muʿallaḳāt of Imruʾ al-Ḳays, Ṭarafa, Labīd, ʿAmr b. Kulthūm and al-Ḥārith b. Ḥilliza. From it M. Schlössinger published the commentary for the Muʿallaḳa of ʿAmr (ZA, xvi (1902), 15-64) and F. L. Bernstein that for Imruʾ al-Ḳays (ZA, xxix (1914), 1-77). In addition, W. Wright published the K. Talḳīb al-ḳawāfī wa-talḳīb ḥarakātihā, in Opuscula arabica, 47-74 (Leiden 1859), mentioned by Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, no. 3557, a treatise on rhyme.

Remarks. "Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Kaysān," says the Fihrist (81), and it considers Kaysān to be a name (ism). "Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Kaysān," says Yāḳūt (op. cit., xvii, 137), and regards Kaysān as a surname (laḳab), the name being Ibrāhīm. On the other hand Ibn al-Anbārī (Nuzha, 162; cf. Yāḳūt, ibid.; al-Ḳifṭī, Inbāh, iii, 57) reports the formal statement of Abu 'l-Ḳāsim al-ʿUkbarī (d. 456/1064) that Kaysān is his father's surname. The situation is thus not clear. At the beginning of the present article the form of the name is given according to Ibn al-Anbārī (Nuzha, 162) and al-Zubaydī (Ṭabaḳāt, Cairo 1373/1954, 170), as Brockelmann did (I[2], 111 and S I, 170).

In any case, a careful distinction must be made between Ibn Kaysān Abu 'l-Ḥasan and the other Kaysān, also a grammarian, who was taught by al-Khalīl and was a pupil of Abū ʿUbayda: namely Abū Sulaymān Kaysān b. al-Muʿarraf al-Hudjaymī (al-Zubaydī, Ṭabaḳāt, 195-6; al-Ḳifṭī, Inbāh, iii, 38; Yāḳūt, Udabāʾ, xvii, 31-4; al-Suyūṭī, Bughya, 382).

IBN AL-ḲAYSARĀNĪ (the nisba refers to Ḳaysāriyya, Caesarea in Palestine; see Samʿānī, Kitāb al-Ansāb, s.v. al-Ḳaysārī). The following persons are known under this name:

1. ABU 'L-FAḌL MUḤAMMAD B. ṬĀHIR B. ʿALĪ B. AḤMAD AL-MAḲDISĪ AL-SHAYBĀNĪ, a specialist in traditions. He was born in Jerusalem in 448/1058, studied in Baghdād from 468/1075 onwards, and travelled widely in the eastern part of the Islamic world in order to collect traditions. Being an indefatigable walker, he made all his journeys in search of traditions on foot, and he refrained from asking for alms, accepting only what was offered to him, so that he often suffered hardship; he also earned money as a professional copyist of collections of traditions. He finally settled in Hamadhān where he built a house. He went to Jerusalem in order to take the iḥrām on what proved to be his last pilgrimage, and he died on the return journey in Baghdād in 507/1113.

Whilst the unequalled extent of his knowledge of traditions and his personal integrity are generally recognized, his reliability is judged variously by the critics. Al-Anṣārī al-Harawī [q.v.] is reported to have spoken well of him as a young man, and he was praised by Ibn Manda [q.v.], who related traditions from him, and by others. Other critics, however, such as Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad b. Nāṣir al-Salāmī (d. 550-1155; cf. Ibn Radjab, al-Dhayl ʿalā ṭabaḳāt al-Ḥanābila, i, Cairo 1372/1952, 225-9, no. 113; al-Dhahabī, Tadhkirat al-ḥuffāẓ, iv, Ḥaydarābād 1334, 81-5, 16th ṭabaḳa; Brockelmann, S I, 200, no. 7, is to be corrected), denied or at least questioned his reliability. This may have been caused, in part, by some of the opinions he held; he adopted the Ẓāhirī madhhab, "for no particular reason", which may merely have been a rationalization of the tendency, common to many traditionists, to take literally the traditions from the Prophet (he is also called, erroneously, a Ḥanbalī, which is another rationalization of the same tendency), and he was inclined towards extreme Ṣūfism and regarded music, as a means to produce mystical ecstasy (samāʿ [q.v.]), as permitted; he also wrote a treatise trying to establish that it was permitted to look at beardless youths.

He set his son, Abū Zurʿa Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad (b. 481/1088, d. 566/1170), to acquire particularly "high" *isnād*s, and although he was not a scholar himself he related these traditions in Baghdād, which he used to visit from Hamadhān.

Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Ḳaysarānī is the author of numerous writings, some of them substantial, concerned mostly with the technicalities of the transmission of traditions; those which have been preserved in manuscripts are listed in Brockelmann (see below), and the following have been printed: (1) Kitāb al-Ansāb al-muttafiḳa fi 'l-khaṭṭ al-mutamāthila fi 'l-naḳṭ wa 'l-ḍabṭ, with a Supplement by Abū Mūsā Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Iṣfahānī (d. 581/1185); editio princeps by P. de Jong, Homonyma inter nomina relativa, Leiden 1865; (2) Kitāb al-Djamʿ bayn ridjāl al-Ṣaḥīḥayn (also with a longer title), Ḥaydarābād 1323; (3) Tadhkirat al-mawḍūʿāt, Cairo 1323, 1327; (4) Shurūṭ al-aʾimma al-sitta, ed. Muḥammad Zāhid al-Kawtharī, Cairo 1357.

(s.v. al-Maḳdis); Ibn Khallikān, s.v.; al-Dhahabī, Ḥuffāẓ, iv, 37-41, 15th ṭabaḳa; al-Maḳrīzī, Kitāb al-Muḳaffā, printed in the preface of de Jong, and at the end of the edition of the Kitāb al-djamʿ (by far the most detailed biography, with quotations from Abu 'l-Faḍl's poems); Ibn Ḥadjar al-ʿAsḳalānī, Lisān al-Mīzān, s.v.; Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, iv, 18; Sarkīs, Muʿdjam al-maṭbūʿāt, i, 221 f.; Brockelmann, I, 436; S I, 603.

2. ABŪ ʿABD ALLĀH MUḤAMMAD B. NAṢR B. ṢAGHĪR B. DĀGHIR B. MUḤAMMAD B. KHĀLID, SHARAF AL-DĪN, the prominent poet of Syria in the time of Nūr al-Dīn Zangī and rival of Ibn Munīr al-Ṭarābulusī al-Raffāʾ. He was born in ʿAkkā in 478/1085, was superintendent of the mechanical clocks in Damascus for some time, then lived in Aleppo, and died in Damascus, where he had been invited by the amīr Mudjīr al-Dīn (Zambaur, 30), ten days after his arrival in 548/1154. His studies included traditions; he was one of the teachers of Ibn ʿAsākir [q.v.], and al-Samʿānī [q.v.] mentions meeting him (Kitāb al-Ansāb, s.v. al-Ḳaysārī); he was also knowledgeable in astronomy, geometry and arithmetic. Much of his poetry consisted of panegyrics of princes and important people. Ibn Khallikān saw the autograph of his dīwān in Aleppo, and he quotes some lines from his poetry; more extensive quotations are given by Yāḳūt, and several of his *ḳaṣīda*s are quoted by Abū Shāma [q.v.] in the Kitāb al-Rawḍatayn. Only one copy (badly preserved) of his dīwān seems to have survived (Cairo², iii, 111).

IBN ḲAYYIM AL-DJAWZIYYA, SHAMS AL-DĪN ABŪ BAKR MUḤAMMAD B. ABĪ BAKR AL-ZARʿĪ, Ḥanbalī theologian and jurisconsult, born at Damascus on 7 Ṣafar 691/29 January 1292 and died there in 751/1350. He was of humble origin, his father being the superintendent (ḳayyim) of the Djawziyya madrasa, which served as a court of law for the Ḥanbalī ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt of Damascus.

Ibn al-Ḳayyim's education was particularly wide and sound. There are mentioned, among his main teachers, the ḳāḍī Sulaymān b. Ḥamza (d. 711/1311) and the shaykh Abū Bakr (d. 718/1318), son of the traditionist Ibn ʿAbd al-Dāʾim, but in particular he was, from 713/1313, the most famous pupil of Aḥmad Ibn Taymiyya, all of whose ideas he can be said to have absorbed and whose work he helped to popularize, while retaining his own personality. Well-versed, like his master, in all the main disciplines of the time—Ḳurʾānic exegesis, ḥadīth, uṣūl al-fiḳh and furūʿ—and like him an adversary of the monist school (ittiḥādiyya) which had arisen from the teaching of Ibn al-ʿArabī (d. 638/1240), Ibn al-Ḳayyim was, unlike his master, much more strongly influenced by Ṣūfism.

He was interested particularly in the Manāzil of al-Anṣārī (d. 481/1089), who enjoyed great prestige under the Mamlūks. Much less of a polemicist than his master and much more a preacher (wāʿiẓ), Ibn al-Ḳayyim finally left behind him the justified reputation of a writer of great talent, whose eloquence contrasts with the incisive dryness of the succinct prose of his famous master.

In 726/1326, Ibn al-Ḳayyim was imprisoned in the citadel at Damascus, at the same time as Ibn Taymiyya, and was not released until 728/1328, after the latter's death. In 731/1331-2, he made the Pilgrimage to Mecca; it is said that the Syrian caravan, which left Damascus under the leadership of the amīr ʿIzz al-Dīn Aybak, contained a considerable number of jurisconsults and traditionists (Ibn Kat͟hīr, Bidāya, xiv, 154).

Ibn al-Ḳayyim's career was modest, and was hampered by the opposition which the neo-Ḥanbalism of Ibn Taymiyya encountered in the governmental circles of the Mamlūk state. On 2 Rad͟jab 736/15 February 1336, he delivered for the first time the k͟huṭba in the mosque which Nad͟jm al-Dīn b. K͟hālik͟hān had recently founded in the gardens of the G͟hūṭa outside Bāb S͟harḳī and Bāb Tūmā (Bidāya, xiv, 174). On 6 Ṣafar 743/11 July 1342, he gave his inaugural lecture at the Ṣadriyya madrasa, where he was to teach until his death (ibid., xiv, 202).

On two occasions he was in disagreement with Taḳī al-Dīn al-Subkī (d. 777/1378), the S͟hāfiʿī chief ḳāḍī of Damascus, on points of fiḳh, without however becoming involved in serious quarrels.

In Muḥarram 746/4 May-2 June 1345, he had a disagreement with al-Subkī on the question of whether a race or a contest of shooting (musābaḳa), in which each of the two competitors puts down his stake, is permitted without the participation of a third competitor (known as muḥallil) who himself takes part without contributing a stake and thus makes lawful an operation which otherwise might be regarded as constituting a game of chance (ḳimār); expressing the ideas of Ibn Taymiyya, Ibn al-Ḳayyim maintained that the presence of this muḥallil was not necessary (Bidāya, xiv, 216). However, when summoned by the S͟hāfiʿī ḳāḍī ʾl-ḳuḍāt, he had to submit to the opinion of the majority.

A little later, in 750/1349, he was again in disagreement with al-Subkī, for having given some *fatwā*s on the problem of repudiation (ṭalāḳ) in conformity with the doctrine of Ibn Taymiyya (Bidāya, xiv, 235); the Bedouin amīr Sayf al-Dīn b. Faḍl reconciled him with his adversary.

Ibn al-Ḳayyim died at Damascus on 23 Rad͟jab 751/26 September 1350; he was buried beside his mother in the cemetery of Bāb Ṣag͟hīr. His son D͟jamāl al-Dīn ʿAbd Allāh (d. 756/1355) succeeded him in his teaching at the Ṣadriyya.

Ibn al-Ḳayyim's doctrinal and literary output was considerable. A list of his works is given in the D͟hayl of Ibn Rad͟jab (ii, 449-50). For his Fawāʾid, and its place in the history of rhetoric, see BAYĀN, at 1116b. The Madārid͟j al-sālikīn (Cairo 1333/1916, 3 vols.), which consist of a commentary on the Manāzil al-sāʾirīn of al-Anṣārī, can be considered as the masterpiece of Ḥanbalī mystic literature. The Iʿlām al-muwaḳḳiʿīn (Cairo 1325/1915, 3 vols.), or guide for the perfect muftī, is a treatise on juridical methodology (uṣūl al-fiḳh) following the ideas of Ibn Taymiyya in this field. In politics, the K. al-Ṭuruḳ al-ḥukmiyya (Cairo 1317/1900 and reprinted since that date) is based on the ideas set out by Ibn Taymiyya in his Ḥisba and his K. al-Siyāsa al-s͟harʿiyya. Finally, in the field of uṣūl al-dīn, there should be mentioned the Ḳaṣīda nūniyya, an important "profession of faith" in verse directed mainly against the Ittiḥādiyya, and also a polemical treatise against the D͟jahmiyya, the K. al-Ṣawāʿiḳ al-mursala (Cairo 1348/1930).

Several Muslim scholars of the Mamlūk period were among Ibn Ḳayyim's pupils or were in varying degrees influenced by him: among them were the S͟hāfiʿī traditionist and historian Ibn Kat͟hīr (d. 774/1373; cf. Bidāya, xiv, 234-5), Zayn al-Dīn Ibn Rad͟jab (d. 795/1397), the last great representative of mediaeval Ḥanbalism, and Ibn Ḥad͟jar al-ʿAskalānī (d. 852/1449). Indeed he is still today an author very highly esteemed not only among the Wahhābiyya, but also among the Salafiyya and in many circles of North African Islam.

IBN K͟HAFĀD͟JA, ABŪ ISḤĀḲ IBRĀHĪM B. ABI ʾL-FATḤ AL-K͟HAFĀD͟JĪ, famous Andalusian poet, born in 450/1058 at Alcira (D͟jazīrat S͟huḳr), in the present province of Valencia, whence his *nisba*s of al-D͟jazīrī and al-S͟huḳrī.

Born into a wealthy family which owned property in the district, he did not seek favours nor respond to those who invited him to join their entourage, although he followed the custom of the time in singing the praises of important men, such as the Almoravid prince Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. Tās͟hfīn, on the occasion of ʿīd al-fiṭr in the year 510/1117. Nevertheless he was far from being a court poet and preferred to live in his provincial retreat and to write of the exuberance of nature there, which he wholeheartedly appreciated. In his youth he knew the pleasures of love and enjoyed an uncomplicated life. He died at the age of over eighty in 533/1139.

Ibn K͟hafād͟ja, who appears in his poetry as a sensual man who enjoyed life, writes on all subjects, but it is especially when he writes of nature—his great source of inspiration—that he is at his best; it is moreover as a poet of nature that he is best known. His inspired and passionate descriptions of rivers, ponds, gardens, trees, fruits and flowers earned him the nickname of al-D͟jannān (the gardener).

Ibn K͟hafād͟ja's poetry, which received well-deserved fame in his lifetime, was collected in a dīwān (his rāwiya was Abū Zakariyyāʾ Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Arkus͟hī; cf. Ibn Saʿīd, Mug͟hrib, i, 316 and n.), one of the very few surviving complete *dīwān*s of Andalusian poets, and it is significant that at least a dozen manuscripts of it are in existence. The most important Andalusian anthologists, Ibn K͟hāḳān, Ibn Bassām, al-Ḥid͟jārī, Ibn Diḥya and Ibn Saʿīd, gave him an important place in their works, and one of the most sensitive critics, al-S͟haḳundī, included in his brief Risāla fī faḍl al-Andalus no less than eight extracts from his poetry. But perhaps nobody admired Ibn K͟hafād͟ja more than al-Maḳḳarī, who quotes him constantly and refers to him as the "al-Ṣanawbarī of al-Andalus" (Analectes, ii, 328). He was greatly admired in the East, and from the time of Ibn K͟hallikān, who devoted a notice to him, he appears in Eastern anthologies. The school textbooks of the Arab world contain a selection of his poems and recognize him as one of the best poets of al-Andalus.

Ibn K͟hafād͟ja wrote also rhymed prose; there exist some of his Ik͟hwāniyyāt, one of which, addressed to Ibn K͟hāḳān, was inserted by the latter into his Ḳalāʾid, and some rasāʾil in which he laments the loss of a friend (a theme also found in his poems but there treated sincerely), always with only superficial emotion, as when he expresses, in terms which may be called romantic, his emotion in the presence of ruins, or when he recalls with nostalgia and melancholy the days of his youth with the well-known theme of repentance.

Ibn Khafādja drew much of his inspiration from Eastern poets such as al-Sharīf al-Raḍī, ʿAbd al-Muḥsin al-Ṣūrī or Mihyār al-Daylamī, and probably also from al-Buḥturī and al-Ṣanawbarī, although in the case of the last two he does not admit it (cf. H. Pérès, Poésie andalouse, 36). He in his turn influenced a series of Andalusian poets, beginning with his nephew Ibn al-Zaḳḳāḳ, with whom, together with another poet, Ibn ʿĀʾisha, he is said to have competed, upon an occasion described by al-Maḳḳarī (Analectes, ii, 424). He has been described as the creator of a "School of Levante". García Gómez states that the khafādjī style continued until the end of the kingdom of Granada.

IBN KHAFĪF, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad al-Shīrāzī, also called al-Shaykh al-Kabīr or al-Shaykh al-Shīrāzī, famous mystic of Shīrāz, died 371/982 in his native town, it is said at a very great age (Yāḳūt, s.v. Shīrāz). His works (26 titles preserved in the Shadd al-Izār, 42-3) are lost, with the exception of some sentences transmitted mainly by al-Sulamī, Abū Nuʿaym and al-Kushayrī, from a biography written by his disciple, the Ḥallādjī "philosopher" Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Daylamī and later re-written and translated into Persian by Ibn Djunayd, the author of the Shadd al-Izār (Sīrat-i Ibn Khafīf, ed. A. Schimmel, with two professions of faith). But this work is more reliable for information on the life of the master than on his teaching.

According to al-Hudjwīrī (456/1063) however, Ibn Khafīf was the founder of an independent school of mysticism (Kashf, GMS, xvii, 247; cf. Tadhkirat al-awliyāʾ, ii, 135). He had a lasting influence on the Kāzerūnī movement (Vita Kāzerūnī, ed. F. Meyer, Istanbul 1943, 17), and he figures in the mystic genealogy of the Suhrawardiyya (Depont and Coppolani, Confréries religieuses musulmanes, 534). As a result, the name of Ibn Khafīf found a place in the genealogical trees of the futuwwa (Gölpinarlı, in İktisat fakültesi mecmuası, xi, 34). Rūzbahān Baḳlī (d. 606/1209), who was the author after Ibn Khafīf of a Kitāb al-Ighāna and who reproduces in his Jasmin (ed. Corbin, 9) a long extract from the ʿAṭf of al-Daylamī, receives the khirḳa at the hands of a descendant of the Banū Sāliba, who were formerly protégés of the Daylamī dynasty and among whom the office of khafīfī was handed on from father to son (Shadd, 299; Shīrāz-nāma, 113; cf. ibid., 117; Massignon, Passion, i, 374). Finally, in the time of Ibn al-Djawzī (d. 597/1200), the ribāṭ founded by Ibn Khafīf at Shīrāz was still flourishing (Shadd, 58). Ibn Khafīf's teaching, together with the more or less occult influence of Ḥallādjism, thus penetrated deeply into the mystic life of Fārs until just before the Mongol invasion.

The question arises as to whether the historical personality of Ibn Khafīf was such as to justify his filling such an important role. It is known for certain that he was Ẓāhirī in fiḳh, an Ashʿarī in kalām, and an anti-Sālimī in mystical theology (L. Massignon, Essai, 315). More simply, the life and the thought of this illustrious Shīrāzī can be said in principle to divide themselves into two successive periods. The first is dominated by the practical problems of the mystic life (Muʿāmalāt) which preoccupied greatly the ascetics of Fārs, who often showed definite tendencies to Ẓāhirism and particularly to nascent Malāmatiyya or futuwwa (examples are Abū ʿAmr al-Iṣṭakhrī, ʿAlī b. Sahl, Bundār b. al-Ḥusayn; al-Sulamī, Ṭabaḳāt, ed. Sharība, 467, Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Muzayyin, and especially Abū Djaʿfar al-Ḥadhdhāʾ, who enjoyed great prestige among them: Shadd, 96). The second period, which came under the Djunaydī influence of the Baghdād school, is more speculative; it was during this period that the master finally settled in Shīrāz, that his written work appeared and that he played a political role at the court of the Daylamī ʿAḍud al-Dawla (who was ruler of Shīrāz from 338/949), when his eminent position may have enabled him to offer protection to the Ḥallādjīs who were returning to their native country from ʿIrāḳ, where they had been persecuted. It seems preferable to suppose his thought to have developed in harmony with these two broad phases of his life, leading him towards increasingly intellectualist theses (Djunaydī and semi-Ḥallādjī), than to attribute to him an eclecticism as vague as it was persistent. There are various indications to corroborate this hypothesis: Ibn Khafīf used in turn two initiatory *isnād*s, the one purely Shīrāzī with the names of Djaʿfar al-Ḥadhdhāʾ (Sīra, 149, 178, 202) and of Abū ʿAmr al-Iṣṭakhrī (Sīra, 33, 35, 87, 152), the other artificially linked to al-Djunayd (L. Massignon, Essai, 129, rejected by the Kāzerūnīs, op. cit., 25); Ibn Khafīf retracted at the reading of a dissertation of al-Djunayd (ʿAṭf, ed. Vadet, 3), he hesitated between the school of al-Djunayd and the teaching of his first Baghdādī master Ruwaym, a Ẓāhirī mystic of Malāmatiyya tendencies who had close links with Abū ʿAmr al-Iṣṭakhrī but was on rather bad terms with al-Djunayd (I. Goldziher, Die Zâhiriten, 179; al-Sulamī, op. cit., 462; al-ʿAfīfī, Malāmatiyya, 60; Taʾrīkh Baghdād, viii, 431; cf. Shīrāz-nāma, 95-6).

The mystic theology of Ibn Khafīf, worked out from actual experience but rapidly codified at a later stage in a circle of theoreticians, reconciles after a fashion the two basic aspects of his life. It seems to have been governed by the following propositions: (1) The necessity of poverty (faḳr) and the pre-eminence of this poverty over wealth ("poverty" is an imitation of the Prophet, it is also "to rid oneself of one's attributes", Tadhkirat al-awliyāʾ, 131; hence it is like a negative realization of tawḥīd, "unification of the Divine names and attributes with verification in the heart", Abū Nuʿaym, x, 386). (2) The "poor man" is not ipso facto a ṣūfī, any more than the ṣūfī is himself a walī. (3) The impression of the "moment" (ghalaba) is not enough to constitute ecstasy (wadjd), just as the latter is an insufficient basis for sanctity (wilāya). (4) Sanctity is much more a condition, and one not clearly defined, than a transitory and unstable "state" (ḥāl). Certainly, in the eyes of Ibn Khafīf the "station" is preferable to the "state", in the same way that "sobriety" is of more worth than "drunkenness". It is difficult to say whether Ibn Khafīf gave anywhere in his works a valid definition of this "sanctity" which he considered to be the true end of "poverty". It has been defined for him by his Ḥallādjī disciples or pseudo-disciples on the basis of their conceptions of ʿishḳ and maḥabba. Ibn Khafīf contented himself with an incomplete synthesis. This fact helps to explain both the universal fame of the master of Shīrāz and the almost total disappearance of his work.

The basic text remains the edition of the Sīrat-i Ibn Khafīf by Dr A. Schimmel (Ankara 1955, with introd. and bibl.). This text, however, unfortunately does not supersede the notices by the two historians of Shīrāz: Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Zarkūb (d. 734/1333; Shīrāz-nāma, ed. Bahmān Karīmī) and Ibn Djunayd al-Shīrāzī (d. 791/1388, Shadd al-Izār). For Ibn Khafīf's "ḥallādjism" there may be consulted L. Massignon, Akhbār al-Ḥallādj, Paris 1957, 38 and 81, also Vie et œuvres de Rūzbihān Baklī, in Studia Orientalia Ioanni Pedersen . . ., Paris 1953.

The life and doctrine of Ibn Khafīf are part of a group of wider questions which have not yet been sufficiently answered. These are: (1) The opposition between the Djunaydism of Baghdād and the practical mysticism of Persia and Khurāsān in the 3rd/9th century (the memory of Abū Yazīd al-Bisṭāmī, Malāmatiyya, the insistence on "poverty" and "sincerity", futuwwa; for a summary of their doctrine, see Abū Nuʿaym, x, 387). (2) This opposition was not unconnected with the growing Ashʿarism and Ẓāhirism: at the time of Ibn Khafīf these were the two militant and opposing wings of Shāfiʿism, particularly that of ʿIrāḳ, with which the school of al-Djunayd finally became integrated. (3) It is only when these first two questions have been answered that Ibn Khafīf's rather ambiguous attitude to Ḥallādjism will be better understood, and with it perhaps the internal evolution of this doctrine, at least in Fārs.

IBN KHAFĪF [see MUḤAMMAD B. KHAFĪF].

IBN KHĀḲĀN, name of several secretaries and viziers of the ʿAbbāsid period.

(1) Yaḥyā b. Khāḳān, secretary of Khurāsānī origin, was in the service of al-Ḥasan b. Sahl [q.v.] under the caliphate of al-Maʾmūn and became, under al-Mutawakkil, secretary to the office for land-taxes, and then director of the maẓālim-court, when his son ʿUbayd Allāh became vizier.

(2) ʿUbayd Allāh b. Yaḥyā was the first member of the family to become a vizier. Patronized by the caliph al-Mutawakkil, who had appointed him as his private secretary, he succeeded in about 236/851 in gaining appointment to the office of vizier, which had for some years remained vacant, and in obtaining important powers, notably those permitting him to nominate the main government officials and thus to eliminate any possible rivals. He was tutor to one of the princes; at the end of al-Mutawakkil's reign he exercised a considerable influence and seems to have encouraged the caliph in his anti-ʿAlid policy. Having withdrawn from political life after the assassination of al-Mutawakkil, he was exiled to Barḳa in 248/862, and did not return to Baghdād until 253/867. The accession of the caliph al-Muʿtamid led to his being appointed once again to the office of vizier, which he occupied from 256/870 until his death in 263/877.

(3) Muḥammad b. ʿUbayd Allāh, Abū ʿAlī, known as al-Khāḳānī, became vizier in the reign of al-Muḳtadir in Dhu 'l-Ḥidjdja 299/July 912 and remained in office until Muḥarram 301/August 913. He succeeded Ibn al-Furāt, whose officials he dismissed, and attempted to replenish the treasury by imposing severe fines on these discredited officials. He also took measures against the Shīʿī elements in the population of Baghdād and attempted to satisfy the claims of the Ḥanbalīs, but his administration did not please the caliph's entourage. After his dismissal, he was imprisoned once by ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā and a second time by Ibn al-Furāt, who had returned to power n 304/917; he died in 312/924-5.

(4) ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥammad, Abu 'l-Ḳāsim, son of the above, had been secretary during his father's vizierate and succeeded Ibn al-Furāt in Rabīʿ I 312/June 924, but encountered serious internal difficulties with which he was incapable of dealing, so that he was dismissed in Ramaḍān 313/November 925 on the insistence of the amīr Muʾnis; after having been imprisoned and paying a fine, he died in 314/926-7.

IBN KHĀLAWAYH, Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḥusayn b. Aḥmad (but Muḥammad in Shīrawayh's History of Hamadhān, see Ḳifṭī, Inbāh, i, 325, 12) b. Ḥamdān al-Hamadhānī, famous Arabic grammarian and adīb. He was born in Hamadhān [q.v.]. The exact year of his birth is not known but it must have been in the ninth decade of the 3rd century A.H., since he went in 314/926, while still young, to study in Baghdād, where he found eminent teachers. Among his teachers of the Ḳurʾān was the head of the Ḳurʾān readers of Baghdād, Ibn Mudjāhid (d. 324/936) and he studied grammar and lexicography not only with the representatives of the Kūfan school Ibn al-Anbārī [q.v.] and Abū ʿUmar al-Zāhid al-Muṭarriz Ghulām Thaʿlab (d. 345/956), but also with the famous Baṣran Ibn Durayd [q.v.] and the latter's pupil al-Sīrāfī [q.v.], and also with Nifṭawayh, who was already a representative of the mixed school (khalaṭa 'l-madhhabayn, Fihrist, 81, bottom; in Brockelmann, S I, 184 listed under the Kūfans; d. 323/935). Consequently he was himself an eclectic. There is named as one of his teachers of ḥadīth Muḥammad b. Makhlad al-ʿAṭṭār (Taʾrīkh Baghdād, iii, 310 f.; Dhahabī, Tadhkirat al-ḥuffāẓ, 11th ṭab., no. 40, where Aḥmad is incorrectly given instead of Makhlad; d. 331/942-3). Subkī lists him among the Shāfiʿīs (Ṭabaḳāt, ii, 212 f.); according to Ibn Ḥadjar, however, he was an Imāmī, who pretended to be a Sunnī only in the presence of Sayf al-Dawla (Lisān al-Mīzān, Ḥaydarābād 1330, ii, 267; cf. also Krenkow in a postscript to Ibn Khālawayh, Iʿrāb thalāthīn sūra, 246). From Baghdād he went to Syria, and in Aleppo was admitted to the court of the Ḥamdānid Sayf al-Dawla [q.v.], who appointed him tutor to one of his sons. After Sayf al-Dawla's death he remained in the service of the Ḥamdānids. Ḳifṭī (Inbāh, i, 326, lines 5 ff.) records from the Kitāb al-Utrudjdja by Muslim b. Muḥammad al-Lahdjī that Ibn Khālawayh visited the Yemen, and Ibn al-Djazarī (Ṭabaḳāt al-ḳurrāʾ, i, 237, bottom) also mentions the precise place, Dhimār. He died in 370/980-1 in Aleppo.

Already during his lifetime Ibn Khālawayh was famous. His reputation as an expert in all branches of ʿilm and adab brought to him many pupils from far and near. The sources mention explicitly the ʿIrāḳī faḳīh and man of letters al-Muʿāfā b. Zakariyyāʾ (d. 390/1000), the reader of the Ḳurʾān Ibn Ghalbūn (a native of Aleppo, d. 389/999) and al-Ḥasan b. Sulaymān al-Anṭākī (d. 399/1008-9) as well as the traditionist Ibn ʿAdī, known also as Ibn al-Ḳaṭṭān (Brockelmann, I, 167; d. 360/971). He is reputed also to have been a poet of ability, Thaʿālibī (Yatīma, Damascus 1304, i, 76 f.) and Yāḳūt (Irshād, iv, 6) providing a few brief specimens of his work. The disputations which he is reported to have had with al-Mutanabbī [q.v.] in the presence of Sayf al-Dawla are said to have led to blows (Ibn Khallikān in his biography of al-Mutanabbī).

Of his works, the fullest lists of whose titles are given by Ḳifṭī, Yāḳūt and Ibn Khallikān (see also Flügel, Grammat. Schulen, 231), there survive: (1) Kitāb Laysa. This deals, in numerous but mainly short chapters, with subjects of Arabic morphology and lexicography. Its name Laysa comes from a stereotyped formula which begins almost every chapter: laysa fī kalām al-ʿarab ... illā ... The British Museum manuscript was published by H. Dérenbourg in Hebraica, x (1893-4), 88-105, AJSL, xiv (1898), 81-93, xv (1898-9), 32-41, 215-23, xviii (1901), 36-51; it contains 111 abwāb and breaks off in the 111th bāb. The text printed by Shinḳīṭī, Cairo 1327 (76 pp.), following an unspecified manuscript, contains the same text with the addition of 77 further abwāb. According to Suyūṭī, Muzhir, nawʿ 40 at the beginning, the Kitāb Laysa consisted of three substantial volumes, and Ibn Khallikān refers to it as kitāb kabīr; the existing printed text can therefore be only a part of the whole work. Of the fifty or so quotations contained in the Muzhir about a third do not appear in the Cairo printed edition. (2) Kitāb Iʿrāb thalāthīn Sūra min al-Ḳurʾān al-karīm (deals with istiʿādha, basmala, *sura*s 1 and 86-114), printed Cairo 1360/1941. (3) Kitāb al-Badīʿ fi 'l-ḳirāʾāt, a handbook of Ḳurʾān readings, canonical (the "Seven" and Yaʿḳūb al-Ḥaḍramī, the ninth of the "Ten" readers) and non-canonical, see A. J. Arberry, Ignace Goldziher memorial volume, i, Budapest 1948, 183-90. (4) Mukhtaṣar shawādhdh al-Ḳurʾān min kitāb al-Badīʿ li-'bn Khālawayh, an extract from no. 3, not made by the author himself, and containing only the non-canonical readings, ed. G. IBN KHALDŪN, Walī al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan (732-84/1332-82), one of the strongest personalities of Arabo-Muslim culture in the period of its decline. He is generally regarded as a historian, sociologist and philosopher. Thus his life and work have already formed the subject of innumerable studies and given rise to the most varied and even the most contradictory interpretations.

I. Life. Ibn Khaldūn's life may be divided into three parts, the first of which (20 years) was occupied by his childhood and education, the second (23 years) by the continuation of his studies and by political adventures, and the third (31 years) by his life as a scholar, teacher and magistrate. The first two periods were spent in the Muslim West and the third was divided between the Maghrib and Egypt.

At Tunis. Ibn Khaldūn was born in Tunis, on 1 Ramaḍān 732/27 May 1332, in an Arab family which came originally from the Ḥaḍramawt and had been settled at Seville since the beginning of the Muslim conquest (Ibn Ḥazm, Djamhara, ed. Lévi-Provençal, 430), playing there an important political role. The family then left Seville for Ceuta immediately before the Reconquista. From there they went to Ifrīḳiya and settled in Tunis during the reign of the Ḥafṣid Abū Zakariyyāʾ (625-47/1228-49). Ibn Khaldūn's great-grandfather, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, who wrote a treatise on Adab al-kātib (see E. Lévi-Provençal, in Arabica, ii (1955), 280-8), was put in charge of the finances during the reign of Abū Isḥāḳ (678-81/1279-83). The usurper Ibn Abī ʿUmāra (681-2/1283-4) put an end to his career and to his life, having him strangled after confiscating his possessions and subjecting him to torture. His son, Muḥammad, also occupied various official positions, both at Bougie and Tunis, and died in 737/1337, after renouncing political life upon the fall of Ibn al-Liḥyānī (711-7/1311-7). The latter's son, the father of our Ibn Khaldūn, wisely avoided politics, leading the life of a faḳīh and man of letters (Taʿrīf, 10-15).

He was thus able to ensure that his son ʿAbd al-Raḥmān received a very thorough education. The latter also attended courses given by the most famous teachers of Tunis, to whom he devotes lengthy sections in his autobiography (Taʿrīf). He thus received a classical education, based essentially on the study of the Ḳurʾān, of ḥadīth, of the Arabic language and of fiḳh. The Marīnid invasion (748-50/1347-9) resulted in the arrival in Tunis, with the sultan Abu 'l-Ḥasan, of a large number of theological and literary scholars. This widened the horizons of the young Ibn Khaldūn, who was thus enabled, particularly under the supervision of al-Ābilī, to learn about the philosophy and the main problems of Arabo-Muslim thought. He was however to undergo much suffering. The Marīnid occupation ended in disorder and bloodshed, and in addition the terrible Black Death which ravaged the world in the middle of the century, coming from the East, claimed many victims in the country, among them Ibn Khaldūn's parents. He was at this time 17 years of age and was to retain all his life a memory of the horror of this event, which is reflected in many passages in his Taʿrīf and his Muḳaddima. This was the first traumatic experience of his life, which was later to have an undoubted influence on the direction of his thought. In addition, the departure of the Marīnid scholars left a great intellectual vacuum at Tunis, and it seems that at this time the sole aim of the young Ibn Khaldūn was to leave Tunis for Fez, then the most brilliant capital of the Muslim West.

He states (Taʿrīf, 55) that he had a great thirst for learning. His elder brother, Muḥammad, dissuaded him from his project, but not for long.

At the court of Fez. He was not yet 20 when, towards the end of 751/1350, the powerful chamberlain Ibn Tafrāgīn appointed him to the office of writer of the ʿalāma (the ruler's official signature) on behalf of the sultan Abū Isḥāḳ. He accepted, without, it seems (Taʿrīf, 561), the intention of remaining long in the post. The invasion of Ifrīḳiya by the amīr of Constantine, Abū Yazīd (753/1352), provided him with the desired opportunity. Under cover of the defeat, he parted company with his master, took refuge for a time at Ebba, then reached Tebessa, then Gafsa, before arriving at Biskra, where he spent the winter with his friends the Banū Muznī. Thus the second period of his life, which was both scholarly and adventurous, began with one of those changes of direction which were to recur on later occasions and which have been severely criticized by the majority of those who have made a study of his life and work. But it was in fact probably not a bad thing: intuitively, Ibn Khaldūn was refusing to be engulfed in an Ifrīḳiya which was then in the process of disintegration and whose court furthermore was far from providing an example of loyalty and good behaviour.

Meanwhile, the Marīnid Abu 'l-Ḥasan, after an unfortunate adventure, had been killed (752/1351), leaving the western territories of the Maghrib to his son Abū ʿInān, who in any case had not waited for his death before supplanting him in Fez. Once again the Marīnid hegemony seemed to be consolidating itself. Abū ʿInān seized Tlemcen (753/1352) and reduced Bougie again to submission. From Biskra, Ibn Khaldūn offered him his services. On his journey he met the Marīnid chamberlain Ibn Abī ʿAmr, appointed governor of Bougie, who invited him to his new residence, where he lived for some time (until the end of the winter of 754/1353-4), before being summoned to the court at Fez. He was officially part of the sultan's literary circle (madjlisuh al-ʿilmī) and soon afterwards also formed part of his secretariat (kitābatuh), though without much enthusiasm it seems, for such a post "was not in the family tradition"—that is to say it was beneath their dignity. This remark reveals a far-reaching ambition in a young man of barely 23 years. Somewhat disappointed, he therefore continued to occupy himself mainly with his studies. "I devoted myself", he writes (Taʿrīf, 59), "to reflection and to study, and to sitting at the feet of the great teachers, those of the Maghrib as well as those of Spain who were residing temporarily in Fez, and I benefited greatly from their teaching". In brief, his desire for learning still took precedence over his political interests. Nevertheless, it may be that, taking advantage of the sultan's illness, he took part in a plot aiming to liberate the former amīr of Bougie, Abū ʿAbd Allāh, and to re-install him in his former kingdom. He himself denies this and refers to intrigues, jealousy and malice (Taʿrīf, 67); he was certainly thrown into prison however, remaining there for two years (758-9/1357-8) until the death of Abū ʿInān. This was followed by disturbances, by clashes between the claimants to the throne, and by treachery and bloodshed. Ibn Khaldūn, now set free, took part in all this according to the custom of the time. Changes of loyalty were common and he was no exception and found himself appointed, in Shaʿbān 760/July 1359, to the office of Secretary of the Chancellery (kitābat al-sirr wa 'l-tarsīl) for the new sultan, Abū Sālim. In order the better to perform his rôle and consolidate his position, he even made the effort of becoming court-poet ("akhadhtu nafsī bi 'l-shiʿr", Taʿrīf, 70), and he quotes long extracts from his work as a panegyrist. But this was all wasted effort, since his fortune declined. Two years later he left the chancellery for a judicial post, the maẓālim. Then further disturbances resulted in the accession of a new sultan. Ibn Khaldūn changed his allegiance in time, and considered that he was unjustly deprived of any fruits of the victory. He did not hide his ill-humour, made enemies and, after many difficulties, he obtained permission to withdraw to Granada (autumn 764/1362).

At the court of Granada. In Ramaḍān 760/August 1359, a palace revolt had driven Muḥammad b. al-Aḥmar from the throne, so that, in Muḥarram 761/December 1359, he had taken refuge in Fez with his famous vizier Ibn al-Khaṭīb. There was formed at this time, between the latter and the young Ibn Khaldūn, a real friendship which, apart from inevitable spells of unpleasantness, was to withstand the test of time. In Djumādā II 763/April 1362, Muḥammad b. al-Aḥmar regained his throne and Ibn al-Khaṭīb his former rank. The friendship established at Fez ensured that Ibn Khaldūn, forced in his turn to flee to the other side of the Mediterranean, was received in Granada with the highest honours. At the end of 765/1364, he was even sent to Seville, charged with a delicate peace mission to Pedro the Cruel. This contact with the Christian world, then in the midst of a period of change, had an important influence on him. On his return, the Naṣrid amīr showered favours on him (Taʿrīf, 85). Ibn Khaldūn then sent for his wife and children to come to Constantine. But Ibn al-Khaṭīb felt some resentment at the success of his young friend and Ibn Khaldūn preferred not to take full advantage of his favoured position (spring 766/1365).

At the court of Bougie. It is true that at this time there arose a unique opportunity for him to satisfy his ambition. His friend, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad, with whom he had already been in a conspiracy at Fez, had in fact regained his kingdom of Bougie, and offered him the office of ḥādjib (chamberlain), which was at that time the most important office in the state, and appointed to the vizierate his younger brother Yaḥyā [see next article]. Ibn Khaldūn held at the same time posts as teacher of fiḳh and as preacher. But this success was short-lived. In the following year, the amīr of Constantine, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās, took the offensive and inflicted a crushing defeat on his cousin Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad, who was killed in the battle. Ibn Khaldūn, refusing suggestions that he should continue the struggle in support of one of the younger sons of the dead ruler, handed over the town to the conqueror (Shaʿbān 767/May 1366) and himself entered his service. This was not to be for long, however. Ibn Khaldūn saw which way the wind was blowing: he resigned in time, and took refuge at first with the Dawāwida Arabs, then with his friends the Banū Muznī at Biskra, whereas his brother Yaḥyā was arrested. To the offer by the sultan Abū Ḥammū, in a letter of 17 Radjab 769/8 March 1368 (Taʿrīf, 102-3) of the office of ḥādjib at Tlemcen, he replied with a courteous refusal, sending him instead his brother Yaḥyā, who had in the meantime been set free. He explains his motives thus: "I was in fact cured of the temptation of office (ghiwāyat al-rutab). Furthermore I had for too long neglected scholarly matters. I therefore ceased to involve myself in the affairs of kings and devoted all my energies to study (al-ḳirāʾa) and teaching" (Taʿrīf, 103).

Thus at Biskra he attempted to lead the life of a man of letters. He carried on a long correspondence, much ornamented by rhetorical flourishes, with his friend Ibn al-Khaṭīb (Taʿrīf, 103-30). However he could not resist intrigue. He gave his support, against Abu 'l-ʿAbbās, to the alliance between the Ḥafṣid of Tunis and the ʿAbd al-Wādid Abū Ḥammū of Tlemcen. He next took it upon himself to raise support for the Marīnid Abū Fāris. He was constantly on the move, attempting to form from the small tribal units a force capable of supporting a really great power. But on each occasion events upset his calculations. The claimants were simply too numerous, and this resulted in a new series of changes of front which were basically perhaps only his unsuccessful attempts to back the winner. But in the Muslim West of the 8th/14th century no winner existed. Furthermore his friends the Banū Muznī were beginning to object to the suspicious activities of their guest. Ibn Khaldūn tried once again to escape the lure of politics. He took refuge in the ribāṭ of Abū Madyan, "preferring", he writes, "to live in retirement and devote myself exclusively to learning, if only I might be left inpeace" (Taʿrīf, 134). He was not left in peace, nor was he of a temperament to remain so for long. Thus, after some new setbacks in the central Maghrib, he met with failure in Fez (774/1372). Welcomed at first, he was later arrested, then released, and finally permitted to withdraw to Muslim Spain (spring 776/1375), where he wished "to settle permanently, withdraw from the world, and devote my life to learning (ḳaṣd al-ḳarār wa 'l-inḳibād wa 'l-ʿukūf ʿalā ḳirāʾat al-ʿilm)" (Taʿrīf, 226). Yet again he was disappointed. He had become a political personality with a reputation which could not fail to arouse mistrust. He was henceforward condemned to offer his services for hire, and to be regarded with mixed feelings never entirely free from suspicion, whereas apparently his only ambition now was to be left in peace to work out the conclusions to be drawn from his tumultuous experience and to put his ideas in order.

At the castle of Ibn Salāma. Practically ordered to leave the kingdom of Granada, Ibn Khaldūn returned to the Maghrib and, after some difficulties, settled with his family at Tlemcen (1 Shawwāl 776/5 March 1375). In the meantime his friend, the vizier Ibn al-Khaṭīb, whom he had tried in vain to save (Taʿrīf, 227)—and this is what had earned him the enmity of the amīr of Granada—had been strangled in prison at Fez. Ibn Khaldūn may have seen this as a warning; he certainly seems after this to have made a firm decision to restrict himself to study and teaching. But the sultan of Tlemcen was willing to forget the past—Ibn Khaldūn had after all been in turn for him and against him—with the ulterior motive of making use of him once again. He entrusted him with a mission to the Dawāwida. Ibn Khaldūn pretended to accept, but as soon as he had left Tlemcen, he took refuge with the Awlād ʿArīf; they gave him a warm welcome and interceded on his behalf with the sultan of Tlemçen, who gave permission for his family to join him. For the next four years (776-80/1375-9) Ibn Khaldūn lived in the castle of Ibn Salāma, 6 km. south-west of the present-day Frenda, in the department of Oran (Taʿrīf, 228). This was a decisive turning-point in his life: really enclosed for the first time in his ivory tower, he informs us that he worked out the Muḳaddima "according to that original plan (al-naḥw al-gharīb) for which he received inspiration during his retirement" (Taʿrīf, 229).

Again in Tunis. After this, to enable him to continue his work, a vast amount of documentation became more and more necessary. Ibn Khaldūn was at this time 47 years of age. He dreamed of returning to Tunis, which he had left at the age of 20—Tunis, where "my ancestors lived and where there still exist their houses, their remains and their tombs" (Taʿrīf, 230). He wrote for, and obtained, the permission of Abu 'l-ʿAbbās (771-96/1370-94), the architect of the Ḥafṣid restoration, with whom he had had connexions more than ten years earlier at Bougie. And thus, in Shaʿbān 780/November-December 1378, "he abandoned his traveller's staff" (Taʿrīf, 231) in his native town. There he followed his new career as a teacher and a scholar and completed a first redaction of his ʿIbar, the first copy of which, accompanied by a long panegyric (Taʿrīf, 233-4), he presented to the sultan. But the success of his teaching—which some considered subversive—and the favours which he received from the ruler, earned him many enemies. The formation of a cabal against him, the moving spirit in which was the famous Ibn ʿArafa, made him fear the worst. He decided to leave the Muslim West, where his awkward past followed him wherever he went. He made the pretext for this the Pilgrimage. The sultan granted him permission for this; there was a boat on the point of leaving for Alexandria; and Ibn Khaldūn embarked on 15 Shaʿbān 784/24 October 1382 (Taʿrīf, 245).

In Cairo. On his arrival in the Mamlūk capital, Ibn Khaldūn was truly dazzled. Students flocked to his courses at al-Azhar, and soon he was appointed teacher of Mālikī fiḳh at the al-Ḳamḥiyya madrasa. Some time afterwards he was also appointed Mālikī chief ḳāḍī (Djumādā II 786/July-August 1384). There then began for him a period of suffering: his family, finally given permission to join him through the intervention of the sultan al-Ẓāhir Barḳūḳ, was shipwrecked off Alexandria. At the same time his intransigeance and the intrigues of his enemies, who were furious at seeing one of the most important offices of the state entrusted to a "foreigner", caused him to be dismissed from his office as ḳāḍī (Djumādā I 787/June-July 1385). In 789/1387, he was appointed to the newly built al-Ẓāhiriyya madrasa, and then, on his return from the Pilgrimage, he was appointed teacher of ḥadīth at the madrasa of Ṣarghatmish. Ibn Khaldūn preserved in its entirety his inaugural course of lectures (Muḥarram 791/January 1389), devoted to the Muwaṭṭaʾ of Mālik (Taʿrīf, 294-310). At the same time, he was placed at the head of the khānḳāh of Baybars, the most important Ṣūfī convent in Egypt. Then, after fourteen years devoted exclusively to teaching, he was once again appointed to the office of ḳāḍī (15 Ramaḍān 801/21 May 1399). He was again dismissed (Muḥarram 803/August-September 1400), and some months later (Rabīʿ II 803/November-December 1400) he was obliged to accompany al-Nāṣir on his expedition to relieve Damascus, which was being threatened by Tīmūr-lang, already master of Aleppo. Left in the besieged town—and abandoned without warning by al-Nāṣir, who suspected that a plot was being hatched in Cairo during his absence—he played a certain part in the surrender of the town under a false promise of amān, and has provided a detailed account of his interviews with the Mongol leader (Taʿrīf, 366-83). He may in fact have thought that he saw in Tīmūr-lang the man of the century who possessed enough ʿaṣabiyya to re-unite the Muslim world and to give a new direction to history (Taʿrīf, 372, 382). Finally, after writing for Tīmūrlang a description of the Maghrib and having witnessed the horrors of the burning and sacking of Damascus, he returned to Cairo, having been stripped and robbed by brigands on the way. In spite of his compromising attitude towards Tīmūrlang (Taʿrīf, 378), he was well received at the court. Four times more he was appointed ḳāḍī and then dismissed. His last, and sixth, appointment to this office was in Shaʿbān 808/January-February 1406, a few weeks before his death on 26 Ramaḍān 808/16 March 1406.

During his stay in Cairo, Ibn Khaldūn did not sever relations with the Muslim West. He retained his Maghribī dress, a dark burnous. He also attempted to encourage the exchange of gifts between the sultans of Egypt and those of the Maghrib and to produce a climate of co-operation (Taʿrīf, 335-46). He sent a copy of his ʿIbar to the Marīnid Abū Fāris (796-9/1394-6), continued to correspond with his friends, and preserved in particular long passages, in prose and in verse, from the letters sent to him by the famous poet of Granada, Ibn Zamrak (Taʿrīf, 262-74).

Ibn Khaldūn's life has been judged variously, and in general rather severely. There is certainly no doubt that he behaved in a detached, self-interested, haughty, ambitious and equivocal manner. He himself does not attempt to hide this, and openly describes in his Taʿrīf his successive changes of allegiance. He has been accused of fickleness and a lack of patriotism. But for such judgements to be strictly applicable presupposes the existence of the idea of "allegiance" to a country, which was not the case. The very concept scarcely existed and was not to appear in Muslim thinking until it was affected by contact with Europe. The only treason was apostasy, nor was loyalty understood except in the context of relations between one man and another, and examples of felony were provided daily by those of the highest rank. Ibn Khaldūn was, moreover, readily pardoned by those who wished to use his services—he was in turn the enemy and the servant, now of one and now of another, in the same way that men were treacherously killed, with or without good reason, simply as a precaution. The struggles which rent the Muslim West in Ibn Khaldūn's time were merely a series of minor and abortive coups. He should therefore be judged according to the standards of his own time and not according to ours.

Furthermore, Ibn Khaldūn, as he proves in his Muḳaddima, was an astonishingly clear thinker. It is true that his behaviour was dictated by ambition, the desire of power, a taste for adventure and even a complete ruthlessness in political matters; but it is unlikely that this was all. It would be strange if the theoretician of ʿaṣabiyya did not envisage a plan, perhaps rather vague, for the restoration of Arabo-Muslim civilization which he saw—and he states this clearly—to be in its death-throes. His adventures could thus be seen as only the unfruitful and calculated search for an ʿaṣabiyya powerful enough to save Islam from ruin. Certain facts support this hypothesis, but Ibn Khaldūn states nothing explicity and his Taʿrīf (on which moreover opinions vary) provides no assistance. As has already been mentioned, it gives us no insight into the inner thought of the author himself and presents only his external character. There is thus no way of knowing what his real intentions were.

II. Works. Ibn Khaldūn is known primarily for his Muḳaddima and his ʿIbar, but he wrote other works which have not all survived.

In about his twentieth year, he attempted, under the influence of al-Ābilī, to make a résumé of the theologico-philosophical "summa" of al-Rāzī entitled Kitāb Muḥaṣṣal afkār al-mutaḳaddimīn wa 'l-mutaʾakhkhirīn min al-ʿulamāʾ wa 'l-ḥukamāʾ wa 'l-mutakallimīn (Cairo 1905), an outline which is a condensation of all the Arabo-Muslim cultural tradition concerning the problems of dogma and its philosophical repercussions. This résumé, entitled Lubāb al-Muḥaṣṣal fī uṣūl al-dīn (Tetuan 1952; autograph manuscript dated 29 Ṣafar 752/28 May 1351, Escorial no. 1614), shows a direction of thought which Ibn Khaldūn was never to lose completely.

It should also be remembered that Ibn Khaldūn had stressed in his Taʿrīf the studious nature of his period at Fez and at Granada. During this period, that is between 752-65/1351-64, the date at which Ibn al-Khaṭīb's Iḥāṭa was finished (to which we owe the following information), he wrote five works: (1) a commentary on the Burda [q.v.] of al-Būṣīrī; (2) an outline of logic; (3) a treatise on arithmetic; (4) several résumés of works by Ibn Rushd, though unfortunately it is not known which ones; and (5) a commentary on a poem by Ibn al-Khaṭīb on the uṣūl al-fiḳh. All these works are now lost, and indeed seem to have been quickly forgotten even during the author's lifetime. Ibn Khaldūn does not even mention them in his Taʿrīf, and his Egyptian biographers do not appear to have heard of them.

They seem moreover to have been of a traditional theologico-philosophical type, including the arithmetic which a faḳīh had to know. Nothing up to this time indicated that Ibn Khaldūn would go down to posterity as the brilliant founder of the science of history and of other disciplines. The flowering of his genius took place at the castle of Ibn Salāma, as the result of the fusion of the traditional disciplines in which he had been educated with the rich harvest of political experience which, through a bitter series of failures and impasses, had made him aware of the meaning and deep significance (ʿibar) of history. There then began, in the calm of the castle of Ibn Salāma, the work of analysing the passionate and disturbing human adventure, which certainly has its grandeurs but of which he had experienced mainly the miseries. Ibn Khaldūn really changed as a thinker: the pedestrian faḳīh which he might after all have been had become a historian of genius, and even the founder of a number of disciplines which were to become some of the most productive of the modern humanities. The first draft of his Introduction (Muḳaddima)—which contains the essence of his thought—to his universal history (Kitāb al-ʿIbar), as well as large sections of this history itself, were written between 776/1375 and 780/1379 during his retirement. He later continued without ceasing, until the end of his life, to re-write this basic work, and especially the Muḳaddima. The Taʿrīf, an autobiography which stops in Dhu 'l-Ḳaʿda 807/May 1405 (ed. al-Ṭandjī, Cairo 1951), and the Shifāʾ al-sāʾil, a treatise on mysticism written towards the end of his life (ed. al-Ṭandjī, Istanbul 1958; and ed. I. A. Khalifé, Beirut 1959), are minor works compared with his masterpiece, and their main interest is in the light they throw on it. It should be mentioned that the problem of the authenticity of the Shifāʾ al-sāʾil, so important for the history of Ibn Khaldūn's thought, has not yet been definitively solved.

The Ottoman historian Naʿīmā [q.v.] (d. 1128/1716) praises Ibn Khaldūn in the introduction to his work and gives a summary of his ideas. (The first translation into Turkish, of part of the Muḳaddima, was made by the S̲h̲ayk̲h̲ al-Islām Pīrī-zāde Meḥmed Ef. in 1143/1749 (see IA, s.v. Ibn Haldûn, col. 740b); the most recent, complete, translation is by Zakir Kadiri Ugan, 2 vols., Istanbul 1954.) Yet it was in Europe that Ibn K̲h̲aldūn was discovered and the importance of his Muḳaddima realized: by d'Herbelot (Bibliothèque Orientale 1697), by Silvestre de Sacy (Chrestomatie arabe, 1806), by von Hammer-Purgstall (Ueber den Verfall des Islam . . ., 1812) and especially by Quatremère, who, in 1858, produced the first complete edition of the Muḳaddima—another edition of it was published in the same year in Cairo by Naṣr al-Hūrīnī, based on another manuscript containing in particular the dedication to the sultan Abū Fāris of Fez (796-9/1394-7)—and by de Slane, who, some years afterwards, produced the first French translation of it (Les Prolégomènes, Paris 1863-8). Since then there has been a continual series of editions and studies on it, in both the East and the West, a proof of the increasing interest in Ibn K̲h̲aldūn's thought, and there have recently been so many of them that bibliographical works on them (by H. Pérès and W. J. Fischel) became necessary. The most recent translation, by F. Rosenthal (into English, 3 vols. New York-London 1958), has the advantage of having been made from the Istanbul manuscript (Atif Efendi 1936), which contains a note in Ibn K̲h̲aldūn's writing stating that it had been "scientifically revised" by the author. There should also be mentioned the Portuguese translation by Khoury, in 3 vols., São Paulo 1958-60; a French translation by V. Monteil is being published.

The ʿIbar, the Universal History itself, naturally aroused less interest. The first to produce an edition and translation of extensive passages from the ʿIbar was Noël Desvergers, under the title Histoire de l'Afrique sous la dynastie des Aghlabites et de la Sicile sous la domination musulmane, Paris 1841. Another partial translation was published some years later by de Slane under the title Histoire des Berbères et des dynasties musulmanes de l'Afrique Septentrionale (4 vols., Algiers 1852-6), followed by an edition of the passages translated (2 vols., Algiers 1863). Next there appeared the complete Būlāḳ edition (7 vols., 1868), and since then there have followed also some partial translations. There has not yet appeared, however, a truly critical edition of either the Muḳaddima or the ʿIbar. The latest edition, that of Beirut (1956-9)—from which our references are taken—is a commercial one, which is however provided with useful indexes.

The criticism generally made of the ʿIbar is that it did not fulfil the promises made in the Muḳaddima. This is obvious, but it could not have been otherwise. No one man could write alone a universal history according to the demands of the Muḳaddima. But it has more serious shortcomings: Ibn K̲h̲aldūn at times demonstrates a surprising lack of learning, for example, concerning the Almohads and their doctrine: "In addition, precise dates are rarely given; the chronological details throughout the work are too often contradictory, and one is obliged to prefer on many occasions those provided in other more humble and much more succinct works" (R. Brunschvig, Ḥafṣides, ii, 392). Nevertheless, the Kitāb al-ʿIbar, through its intelligent arrangement of facts and the detail and scope of the account, remains, in the opinion of the specialist who has made most use of it, an incomparable tool, particularly "for the two centuries nearest to our author, the 13th and the 14th" (R. Brunschvig, op. cit., ii, 393). It should also be added that this work, often disappointing on the history of the East, is generally valuable especially for the Muslim West, and in particular for the Berbers.

But Ibn K̲h̲aldūn's main work, of universal value, is the Muḳaddima. In the author's intention, and as the title indicates, it is an Introduction to the historian's craft. Thus it is presented as an encyclopaedic synthesis of the methodological and cultural knowledge necessary to enable the historian to produce a truly scientific work. Initially, in fact, Ibn K̲h̲aldūn was preoccupied with epistemology. Then gradually, meditating on the method and the matter of history, he was led, in full consciousness of what he was doing, to create what he refers to as his "new science" (ʿilm mustanbaṭ al-nas̲h̲ʾa, 63), which itself turned out to contain more or less implicitly the starting points of several avenues of research leading to the philosophy of history, sociology, economics and yet other disciplines.

In his preface to the Introduction proper (muḳaddimat al-Muḳaddima, 1-68), Ibn K̲h̲aldūn begins by defining history—which he expands to include the study of the whole of the human past, including its social, economic and cultural aspects—defining its interest, denouncing the lack of curiosity and of method in his predecessors, and setting out the rules of good and sound criticism. This criticism is based essentially, apart from the examination of evidence, on the criterion of conformity with reality (ḳānūn al-muṭābaḳa, 61-2), that is of the probability of the facts reported and their conformity to the nature of things, which is the same as the current of history and of its evolution. Hence the necessity of bringing to light the laws which determine the direction of this current. The science capable of throwing light on this phenomenon is, he says, that of ʿumrān, "a science which may be described as independent (ʿilm mustaḳill bi-nafsih), which is defined by its object: human civilization (al-ʿumrān al-bas̲h̲arī) and social facts as a whole" (62).

All that follows, that is the main part of the Muḳaddima itself, is only the detailed exposition of this new and independent science which the author had perceived. In it he develops his argument, contrary to some opinions, according to a strict plan, the broad lines of which he states and clearly explains (68) before beginning his exposition. This exposition is divided into six long chapters which in turn are subdivided into many paragraphs of varying lengths and often mathematically arranged. Chapter 1: a general treatise on human society. In it Ibn K̲h̲aldūn makes an outline study of the influence of environment on human nature, an ethnological and an anthropological study. Chapter 2: on the societies of rural and, generally speaking, fairly primitive, civilization (ʿumrān badawī). Chapter 3: on the different forms of government, on states and institutions. Chapter 4: on the societies of urban civilization (ʿumrān ḥaḍarī), that is of the most developed and sophisticated forms of civilization. Chapter 5: on industries and economic affairs in general. Chapter 6: on scholarship, literature and cultural matters in general.

This plan clearly shows that Ibn K̲h̲aldūn in his Muḳaddima was inclined to concentrate on social phenomena in general. The central point around which his observations are built and to which his researches are directed is the study of the aetiology of decline, that is to say the symptoms and the nature of the ills from which civilizations die. Hence the Mukaddima is very closely linked with the political experiences of its author, who had been in fact very vividly aware that he was witnessing a tremendous change in the course of history, which is why he thought it necessary to write a summary of the past of humanity and to draw lessons (ʿibar) from it. He remarks that at certain exceptional moments in history the upheavals are such that one has the impression of being present "at a new creation (kaʾannahu khalk djadīd), at an actual renaissance (nashʾa mustaḥdatha), and at [the emergence of] a new world (wa ʿālam muḥdath). It is so at present (li-hādha ʾl-ʿahd). Thus the need is felt for someone to make a record of the situation of humanity and of the world" (53). This "new world", as Ibn Khaldūn knew (866), was coming to birth in other lands; he also realized that the civilization to which he belonged was nearing its end. Although unable to avert the catastrophe, he was anxious at least to understand what was taking place, and therefore felt it necessary to analyse the processes of history.

His main tool in this work of analysis is observation. Fairly recently there has been stressed the realistic aspect of his thought. Ibn Khaldūn, who has a thorough knowledge of the sources on logic and makes use of it, particular of induction, greatly mistrusts speculative reasoning. He admits that reason is a marvellous tool, but only within the framework of its natural limits, which are those of the investigation and the interpretation of what is real. He was much concerned about the problem of knowledge and it led him finally, after a radical criticism, to a refutation of philosophy. "In casting doubts on the adequacy of universal rationality and of individual reality, Ibn Khaldūn at the same time casts doubts on the whole structure of speculative philosophy as it then existed" (N. Nassar, La pensée réaliste d'Ibn Khaldūn, 66). Having thus calmly dismissed Arabo-Muslim philosophy, he chose, in order to explore reality and arrive at its meaning, a type of empiricism which has no hesitation in "having recourse to the categories of rational explanation which derive from philosophy". In short, Ibn Khaldūn rejects the traditional speculation of the philosophers, which gets bogged down in fruitless argument and controversy, only to replace it by another type of speculation, the steps of which are more certain and the results more fruitful since it is directly related to concrete facts.

This new positive speculation which he suggests and of which he provides an example in the Mukaddima is operated through a dialectical process which has been referred to in several studies (see in particular the recent works of Y. Lacoste and N. Nassar). He could not in fact penetrate to the heart of reality, describe the struggles and conflicts, the tensions and the successive failures of states and civilizations produced by their internal dissensions without encountering, and calling attention to, the process of dialectic, especially since he had encountered logic in his earlier years and since the ideas of contradiction, antithesis, opposition, the complementariness of opposites, of ambiguity, of complexity and of confusion had long been familiar to the Muslim thinking in which he had been educated. They are thus often evoked as operative concepts permitting understanding and explanation. In surmounting the contradictions dialectically, and in attempting to explain them and hence to resolve them, Ibn Khaldūn thus arrives at a dynamic conception of the dialectic development of the destiny of man, and at a system of history which is retrospectively intelligible, rational and necessary. His famous cyclic schema of historical interpretation, which in itself is not particularly original, must be included, in order for its true meaning to be seen, in this general view.

The wealth of the ideas provided in the Mukaddima has enabled several specialists to find in it the early beginnings of a number of disciplines which have become independent sciences only very recently. There is of course no argument about Ibn Khaldūn's quality as a historian. Y. Lacoste writes: "If Thucydides is the inventor of history, Ibn Khaldūn introduces history as a science" (Ibn Khaldoun, 187). But he has been regarded also as a philosopher, and it is surprising in particular to discover in his Mukaddima a very elaborate system of sociology. His "new science", his ʿilm al-ʿumrān, the discovery of which dazzled even himself, is basically, strictly speaking, nothing but a system of sociology,—conceived it is true as an auxiliary science to history. He considers that the basic causes of historical evolution are in fact to be sought in the economic and social structures. He therefore set himself to analyse them, elaborating as he did so a certain number of new operative concepts, the most pregnant of which is incontestably that of ʿaṣabiyya [q.v.]. It should be mentioned that this concept of ʿaṣabiyya, and that of ʿumrān, have given rise in modern times to many discussions—which cannot be enumerated here—regarding their interpretation (see M. Talbi, Ibn Khaldūn et le sens de l'histoire, in SI, xxvi (1967), 86-90 and 99-112). He was interested particularly in the influence of the way of life and of methods of production on the evolution of social groups. In a famous sentence, he states: "The differences which are seen between the generations (adjyāl) in their behaviour are only the expression of the differences which separate them in their economic way of life" (210). This sentence is often compared with an equally famous one of Marx: "The method of production in the material matters of life determines in general the social, political and intellectual processes of life". The similarity is indeed striking, and it is not the only one between them. Thus Ibn Khaldūn's thought is often interpreted, particularly in recent years, in the spirit of dialectical materialism. But, in spite of the undoubted similarities, it would be difficult to regard Ibn Khaldūn as a forerunner of materialism. Moreover the explanation he gives is not exclusively a socio-economic one but also psychological. "The Prolegomena do not contain only a general sociology but also a very detailed and subtle social psychology which may be divided into political psychology, economic psychology, ethical psychology and general psychology. The intermingled and closely linked elements of this social psychology and this general sociology form a whole complex which it is difficult to disentangle" (N. Nassar, op. cit., 178).

There have been identified also, in this complex, economic doctrines sufficiently detailed to justify a study devoted to them, and a philosophy of history to which M. Mahdi has devoted an important work. It also provides ethnographic, anthropological and demographic information of real value.

Thus the atypical figure of Ibn Khaldūn in Arabo-Muslim culture has been unanimously considered, since his discovery in Europe, as that of an authentic genius, "un penseur génial et aberrant" (Brunschvig, op. cit., ii, 391), whose Mukaddima represents "one of the solemn moments of human thought" (Bouthoul). Certainly a "solitary genius", he does not belong to any definite current of Arabo-Muslim thought, since his works are in fact the product of a multitude of agonizing enquiries. His thinking represents a radical change, which unfortunately remained as unproductive as his political misadventures. "Just as he had no forerunners among Arabic writers, so he had no successors or emulators in this idiom until the contemporary period. Although he had a certain influence in Egypt on some writers of the end of the Middle Ages, it can be stated that, in his native Barbary, neither his Muḳaddima nor his personal teaching left any permanent mark. And indeed the systematic lack of comprehension and the resolute hostility which this nonconformist thinker of genius encountered among his own people forms one of the most moving dramas, one of the saddest and most significant pages in the history of Muslim culture" (R. Brunschvig, op. cit., ii, 391).

IBN KHALDŪN, Abū Zakariyyā' Yaḥyā, brother of the above, was born in Tunis about 734/1333, died at Tlemcen in Ramaḍān 780/December 1378-January 1379. Like his brother and probably with him, he devoted himself industriously to study in his native town and was intimate with all the important scholars of his time in the Ḥafṣid capital. To judge from his book (on which see below), he seems to have had a special preference for poetry and belles lettres. We know very little of his personality; the references are scattered in various sources, especially ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's autobiography and that portion of the Kitāb al-ʿIbar which deals with the history of the Berbers. This last book gives a detailed account of the murder of Yaḥyā in Tlemcen; Yaḥyā himself gives a few details of his career in his Bughyat al-ruwwād.

Yaḥyā's political life did not begin until 757/1356, when he was with his brother (who was soon afterwards imprisoned) at the court of Abū Sālim, sultan of Fez, and the latter sent two Ḥafṣid amīrs, his prisoners, from Tlemcen back to Bougie. He accompanied these two princes in place of his brother, as chamberlain to one of them, the amīr Abū ʿAbd Allāh. As the latter, in spite of a long siege, could not regain Bougie, he sent Yaḥyā to Abū Ḥammū II, king of Tlemcen, to ask for his assistance (764/1362). Yaḥyā found a kindly reception in Tlemcen and his request was granted. After the Mawlid festival, which he attended there and commemorated in a poem, he went back to his master to bring him to the ʿAbd al-Wādid court on 8 Djumādā II 764/26 March 1363. Both returned to Bougie with an expeditionary force sent by Abū Ḥammū.

In 767/1365-6, the Ḥafṣid amīr of Constantine, after taking Bougie, imprisoned Yaḥyā in Bona and confiscated his property; he escaped soon afterwards and went to Biskra to Ibn Muznī and his brother. It was probably at this time that he made the pilgrimage to the tomb of ʿUḳba, which he describes in his Bughyat al-ruwwād. In 769/1367 he returned from Biskra to Tlemcen at Abū Ḥammū's request, arrived there in Radjab 769/February 1368, and was appointed Kātib al-inshā'. When he learned that Tlemcen was threatened by the Marīnids, he forgot the kindness shown him by Abū Ḥammū and left him (early 772/1370-1) to enter the service of the Marīnid sultan, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, and afterwards of his successor Muḥammad al-Saʿīd. It was only after the capture of Fās al-Djadīd by Sultan Abu 'l-ʿAbbās in 775/1373 that Yaḥyā returned to Tlemcen, where Abū Ḥammū again welcomed him and gave him his former secretarial office. He soon won the king's confidence again but thereby aroused the jealousy of the other court officials, and notably of Abū Ḥammū's eldest son and probable successor, Abū Tāshfīn (II). The latter, with a few hired assassins, fell upon Yaḥyā as he was leaving the palace one night in Ramaḍān 780/1378 and murdered him. When Abū Ḥammū learned that his son had been the instigator of the crime, he had not the courage to take steps against the murderers.

Although Yaḥyā's political career was shorter and less brilliant than that of his brother, yet it gave him the opportunity to write a historical work of great learning, the Bughyat al-ruwwād fī dhikr al-mulūk min Banī ʿAbd al-Wād. It was much used by Brosselard and Bargès in their works on Tlemcen and A. Bel published the Arabic text with French translation under the title Histoire des Beni ʿAbd al-Wād, rois de Tlemcen (2 vols., Algiers 1904-13). His history of the kingdom of Tlemcen is particularly important for its information on the long and often brilliant reign of Abū Ḥammū II, whose secretary and trusted adviser the writer was. In this capacity he was no doubt able to consult original political documents and he even quotes some in full in his book. Although the book neither covers so wide a field as that of his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān nor shows such a lofty point of view or critical spirit, it is far superior in literary value. Yaḥyā reveals in it not only literary but also poetical skill, his elegant style is often elevated and his narrative is adorned with quotations from the best ancient Arab writers. He not only gives us a picture of the political history of the central Maghribī kingdom, but he also preserves for us in his work poems by contemporary court poets and gives information about scholars of his time and about the poetical meetings at the court of Tlemcen—information hardly to be found elsewhere and affording a precise survey of the intellectual life of the ʿAbd al-Wādid capital in the 8th/14th century.

IBN KHALLĀD, Abū ʿAlī Muḥammad al-Baṣrī, a Muʿtazilī theologian. After a slow start, he became the most distinguished disciple of Abū Hāshim (d. 321/933; see al-djubbāʾī), first in al-ʿAskar and then in Baghdād. He is the author of a Kitāb al-Uṣūl and a Kitāb al-Sharḥ; he was also a man of letters and of general culture (adab wa-maʿrifa). He did not live to an old age, and therefore seems to have died before the middle of the 4th/10th century. Two of his disciples, who also studied under Abū Hāshim and in their turn were teachers of the ḳāḍī ʿAbd al-Djabbār b. Aḥmad [q.v.], were Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī al-Baṣrī and Abū Isḥāḳ Ibrāhīm b. ʿAyyāsh (mentioned by Ibn al-Murtaḍā, see below). It is probable that the Sharḥ al-uṣūl al-khamsa of the ḳāḍī ʿAbd al-Djabbār is a revision and completion of the (unfinished) Kitāb al-Sharḥ of Ibn Khallād. The same work was commented upon and supplemented by the Zaydī imām al-Nāṭiḳ bi'l-Ḥaḳḳ (d. 424/1033; Brockelmann, S I, 697f.; P. Voorhoeve, Handlist, 407). In the official isnād of the Muʿtazilī doctrine, Ibn Khallād appears as the authority of Abū ʿAbd Allāh al-Baṣrī, who is in his turn the authority of the ḳāḍī ʿAbd al-Djabbār. The recorded details of his doctrine (see M. Horten, Die philosophischen Probleme der spekulativen Theologie im Islam, 1910, index, s.v. Ibn Hallâd) confirm his doctrinal position between Abū Hāshim and ʿAbd al-Djabbār.

IBN KHALLIKĀN, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Shams al-Dīn al-Barmakī al-Irbilī al-Shāfiʿī, Arabic biographer, b. 11 Rabīʿ II 608/22 September 1211 at Irbil in a respectable family that claimed descent from the Barmakids. At the age of two, he lost his father, who was mudarris in the Muẓaffariyya college founded by the Begteginid [q.v.] Muẓaffar al-Dīn Gökburi (see Ibn Khallikān, no. 558). He began his studies under his father's successor Sharaf al-Dīn al-Irbilī (ibid., no. 44); he then continued them from 626/1229 in Aleppo under Ibn Shaddād (ibid., no. 852) and Ibn Yaʿīsh (ibid., no. 842). After Ibn Shaddād's death in 632/1234 he went to Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (ibid., no. 422) in Damascus. He also visited Mosul several times and became acquainted with the historian Ibn al-Athīr (d. 630/1234) and with Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn Yūnus (Subkī, Ṭabaḳāt al-Shāfiʿiyya, v, 158 ff.). In 635 or 636 he went to Egypt and was in 646/1249 at the latest appointed deputy to the ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt of Egypt Badr al-Dīn Yūsuf b. Ḥasan known as Ḳāḍī Sindjār who was in office until 659/1261. In this year the Mamlūk Sultan Baybars appointed Ibn Khallikān ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt of Damascus. In this capacity he administered justice in the whole of Syria, whilst the judges of the Ḥanafī, Ḥanbalī, and Mālikī schools were his deputies. In 664/1266 Baybars gave orders that the judges of the aforesaid three schools should be promoted to the rank of ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt, and in 669/1271 Ibn Khallikān lost his post altogether. He went back to Cairo and became a mudarris in the college al-Fakhriyya. After the death of Baybars in 676/1277, Ibn Khallikān was again appointed ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt of Syria and in 677/1278 was received in Damascus with great honours. But new troubles lay ahead. When Ḳalāwūn ascended the throne, the governor of Damascus Sunḳur al-Ashkar rose in revolt, but was defeated. The troops of Ḳalāwūn entered Damascus in Ṣafar 679/June 1280, and a general amnesty was announced. Yet Ibn Khallikān was arrested and accused of having given a fatwā which Sunḳur could use as a justification for his revolt; but three weeks later he was released and re-installed as ḳāḍī 'l-ḳuḍāt by an immediate order of the Sultan. At the beginning of the next year (680/1281) Ḳalāwūn visited Damascus; three days later Ibn Khallikān was dismissed. He died on 26 Radjab 681/30 October 1282 in Damascus.

Ibn Khallikān was a man of keen intellect, a shrewd observer, well versed in all legal matters, and just and impartial in his judgement; he was also very cultured, sociable, witty, and a lover of the pleasures of life. He was very fond of poetry and a connoisseur of the Dīwān of Mutanabbī. Amongst his friends were the Egyptian poets Bahā' al-Dīn Zubayr [q.v.] and Ibn Maṭrūḥ (Wafayāt, no. 821). Above all he had a liking for historical studies, so much so that he began to collect materials on the lives of persons who for some reason or other had gained fame. Later on he arranged his notes alphabetically according to the ism of the person concerned. Thus began his famous biographical dictionary Wafayāt al-aʿyān wa- anbā' abnā' al-zamān, which contains only persons whose year of death the author could ascertain. He omitted on purpose (1) the Companions of the Prophet, (2) the transmitters of the second generation (tābiʿūn) with few exceptions, and (3) all caliphs, because information about persons belonging to one of these groups was easily available in biographical and historical works. He began with the arrangement in 654/1256 at Cairo, but when in 659/1260 he had come to the article on Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Barmak (no. 816) he had to stop, owing to his transfer to Damascus; it was only after his return to Cairo in 669/1271 that he could revise and finish his work in 672/1274. This book, intended by its author as a historical compendium, is a mine of information, especially in those parts where he speaks of contemporaries, whilst in the articles on men of earlier times he often quotes sources which are either lost or not yet published. He himself took pains to improve his book; his autograph (in the British Museum, Cat. no 1505 and Supplement no. 607) is full of emendations and marginal notes. This and the popularity of the book explain also the differences in the number and serial order of the articles in manuscripts and editions. A supplement, Fawāt al-Wafayāt, was written by Muḥammad b. Shākir al-Kutubī (d. 764/1363). There exist also translations into Persian and Turkish.

IBN KHAMĪS, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥ. b. ʿUmar b. Muḥ. b. ʿUmar b. Muḥ. b. Muḥ. b. ʿUmar b. Muḥ. al-Ḥimyarī, al-Ḥadjrī al-Ruʿaynī, al-Tilimsānī (and not al-Tūnusī as Ibn Ḳunfudh mistakenly says), Arab poet born at Tlemcen in 650/1252 and assassinated at Granada in 708/1308.

On his origins, which he traces to the tribe of Ḥimyar in the Yemen, there is known only what he himself states in his poems; of the early part of the 58 years of his life we know only that he knew poverty and lived in "a room in a funduḳ with sheepskins for bed-covers ", that he was able to give himself freely to pleasures, of which he later repented in his poems, and that he received a very profound literary education, to judge by his work and by his appointment, in 681/1282, to the office of personal secretary of the sultan Abū Saʿīd ʿUthmān I b. Yaghmurāsan (681-703/1282-1303).

It is not known how long he occupied this post. In 688/1299, the traveller al-ʿAbdarī, who was passing through Tlemcen and who had a great admiration for him, found him in difficult circumstances. Ten years later, Tlemcen was invested by the Marīnid Abu Yaʿḳūb Yūsuf (685-706/1286-1307) and the siege lasted a hundred months, until the besieger was assassinated. Although the exact date and the manner are unknown, it was during this siege that Ibn Khamīs left his native town, following an attempt on his life by those in power who accused him of being in favour of a surrender of the city. This at least is what he himself insinuates in two of his poems. He went to Ceuta, at that time governed by Abū Ṭālib ʿAbd Allāh b. Muḥ. b. ʿAḥmad al-ʿAzafī and his brother Abū Ḥātim; there he attempted to establish himself as a teacher, but his attempt failed, his own pupils, instigated by a rival named Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Abi 'l-Rabīʿ, having baffled him from the start by hurling at him embarrassing grammatical questions. He went to Algeciras, then to Malaga and finally, in 703/1304, to Granada. Everywhere he earned his living by teaching and by writing poems in which he gives himself the "pleasure of praising" the great. The ruler of Granada at this time was Muḥammad III, known as al-Makhlūʿ (701-8/1302-9), whose vizier, Ibn al-Ḥakīm Muḥ. b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ibrāhīm (660-708/1262-1308), was an important personality of the period and by way of being a patron. Returning from a long voyage in the east, the latter had passed through Tlemcen where he had met Ibn Khamīs. At Granada his court was attended by scholars and men of letters; he invited Ibn Khamīs to join it, thus assuring him at last an easy life, in return of course for laudatory poems. In 706/1306, Ibn Khamīs returned to Malaga on a visit, then went to Almeria where the general Ibn Kumāsha, a subordinate of Ibn al-Ḥakīm, hastened to welcome him. He loved to travel—"I am", he said "like the blood; I put myself in motion every spring". He never forgot Tlemcen, and dreamed of returning there. But, one morning, on the feast of the breaking of the fast in the year 708/1309, he was surprised in his dwelling at Granada by a riot resulting from the coup d'état provoked by Abu 'l-Djuyūsh Naṣr b. Muḥammad, who seized power (708-13/1309-14); a certain ʿAlī b. Naṣr, called al-Abkam (= the dumb), killed him with a lance. The reason for the murder was his connexion with Ibn al-Ḥakīm, who was killed on the same day.

The biographers of Ibn Khamīs describe him as a scholar, philosopher, sage, astrologer, alchemist, heresiographer, and littérateur. But there is no positive evidence for these attributes and all that is certain is that he was a poet. All that have survived of any works he may have written are poems. They are said to have been collected by a certain ḳāḍī Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥ. b. Ibrāhīm al-Ḥaḍramī, who has not been further identified, in a collection entitled al-Durr al-nafīs fī shiʿr Ibn Khamīs, of which nothing more is known. The poems of Ibn Khamīs are nevertheless accessible, if not entirely, at least in large part. They are scattered throughout the works of al-ʿAbdarī, Yaḥyā Ibn Khaldūn, Ibn al-Ḳāḍī and al-Maḳḳarī, who reproduces Ibn al-Khaṭīb. Ibn Manṣūr was able to collect of them sixteen ḳaṣīdas, totalling more than 610 verses, ten of them each consisting of more than 30 verses and two reaching 80 verses each.

We find in them the traditional themes: madḥ, hidjā', fakhr, sometimes preceded by nasīb. He praises the Banū Zayyān of Tlemcen, the traveller Ibn Rushayd and especially the vizier Ibn al-Ḥakīm, who has protected the poet and confounded his enemies, and who has power, courage, generosity, etc. ... He directs his satire against the Banū Yaghmūr (sic), who have attempted to have him assassinated and who are thus responsible for his exile far from his own small country, bruised by anarchy, who have "forfeited his loyalty for a cheap return" and who are proud, pitiless and vile tyrants. He prides himself on his illustrious ancestry: Mudjāshiʿ, Nahshal, Ḥimyar, Sakāsik, etc.

Apart from this, his poems are embroidered with proper names and unusual words, revealing a depth of culture which it is surprising to find in a native of 7th/13th century Tlemcen of modest circumstances. His works are composed against a background of the stories of Arab, Persian and Greco-Roman antiquity: Hermes, Socrates, al-Fārābī, al-Suhrawardī, Sayf b. Dhī Yazan, ʿAmr b. Hind, Nuʿmān, Imruʾ al-Ḳays and many others form a gallery of the famous. In addition, his guiding principle as regards form is summarized in a verse: "He who does not chew over obscure (ḥūshī) language does not taste the savour of the art of good expression (balāgha)". This strange precept was not merely a theoretical one, and some of his poems are impossible to understand without a good dictionary. This is probably the reason why he has formerly been classed, with Shanfarā, Taʾabbaṭa Sharran and Sulayk b. ʿĀmir, among the "stallions" (fuḥūl) of Arabic poetry.

IBN AL-KHASHSHĀB, Abū Muḥammad ʿAbd Allāh b. Aḥmad b. Aḥmad b. Aḥmad al-Khashshāb (afterwards called Ibn al-Khashshāb) al-Naḥwī (this form for his name is given by his contemporary Ibn al-Djawzī, al-Muntaẓam, x, Ḥaydarābād 1358, 238); his place of birth is unknown, while the date given for his birth, 492/1099, is not certain (see the criticism of Ibn Khallikān, ii, 289). He lived in Baghdād and died there on 3 Ramaḍān 567/30 April 1172, a date generally accepted.

Ibn al-Khashshāb is a complex character. There was in him an insatiable intellectual curiosity. Among his teachers were al-Djawālīḳī and Abū Saʿāda Ibn al-Shadjarī, but he went to hear all the teachers of repute of his day, and he read incessantly. In short, he learnt practically everything that could be learnt at that time in Baghdād. He studied the Islamic sciences, mention being made of farāʾiḍ (division of inheritances) and nasab (genealogy). He excelled in grammar (naḥw), and then in ḥadīth. In addition, he had a knowledge of arithmetic, geometry (handasa) and logic (manṭiḳ), and according to Yāḳūt even of falsafa (philosophy).

He was a teacher, who spoke well and easily; he knew how to crack a joke successfully, and moreover he had very beautiful handwriting. Among his pupils were Abū Saʿd al-Samʿānī and ʿImād al-Din al-Iṣbahānī; the latter composed a dithyrambic panegyric of him (Kharīdat al-ḳaṣr, i, al-Ḳism al-ʿIrāḳī, Damascus 1375/1955, 28, and al-Ḳifṭī, Inbāh, ii, 102). But, apart from such rewarding teaching, his great intellectual activity bore very little fruit: four radds (refutations), his reaction to what he read or to accepted teaching; three sharḥs which he did not complete, and certain other writings. Something was lacking in all this great activity. Al-Ḳifṭī (op. cit., 101) speaks of the ḍadjar, the black mood, to which he was subject. Here we have an indication that his nervous equilibrium was unsatisfactory. This point may explain the lack of control which revealed itself even in his dress and conduct and which was the cause of adverse criticism; and he was also accused of avarice.

The radds: Radd of Ibn Bābashādh in his Sharḥ to the K. al-Djumal al-kabīr of al-Zadjdjādjī (Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, ii, no 4197). Radd of Abū Zakariyyāʾ al-Tibrīzī in his Tahdhīb of the Iṣlāḥ al-manṭiḳ of Ibn al-Sikkīt (ibid., i, no. 828). Radd of Abū Saʿāda Ibn al-Shadjarī, last madjlis of his Amālī, on the subject of verses of al-Mutanabbī (ibid., i, no. 1180). Only one has been preserved, the Radd of the Maḳāmāt of al-Ḥarīrī, in manuscript with varying titles (Brockelmann, S I, 494), published under the title al-Istidrākāt ʿalā Maḳāmāt al-Ḥarīrī wa-ʾntiṣār Ibn Barrī (Istanbul 1328) and also following these Maḳāmāt (Cairo 1326); see also Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa, i, no. 1319. On the question of his glosses on the subject of the Durrat al-ghawwāṣ of al-Ḥarīrī and the reply of Ibn Barrī, see Ch. C. Torrey, Orient. Studien Th. Nöldeke gewidmet, Giessen 1906, i, 212-3.

The sharḥs: Sharḥ to the K. al-Lumaʿ fi ʾl-naḥw of Ibn Djinnī. Sharḥ to the Muḳaddima fi ʾl-naḥw of the vizier Ibn Hubayra. The only one to have survived is the Sharḥ to the K. al-Djumal fi ʾl-naḥw of ʿAbd al-Ḳāhir al-Djurdjānī, which he called al-Murtadjal fī sharḥ al-Djumal, MSS at Gotha (211) and elsewhere (Brockelmann, S I, 504).

Ḥādjdjī Khalīfa (v, no. 11019) also refers to his al-Lāmiʿ fi ʾl-naḥw and Mawālīd ahl al-bayt (vi, no. 13360), which does indeed seem to be his work and which is relevant to what has been called his knowledge of nasab.

Two works not mentioned in the sources consulted have survived in manuscript. MS Köprülü 1393/5 (five folios) (MSO, xiv, 1911, 193, no. 57) contains al-Lumaʿ fi ʾl-kalām ʿalā lafẓat āmīn al-mustaʿmala fi ʾl-duʿāʾ wa-ḥukmihā, a study on the word āmīn (amen). MS Cairo², iii, 281-2, has preserved al-Ḳaṣīda al-badīʿa al-ʿarabiyya al-djāmiʿa li-shatāt al-faḍāʾil wa ʾl-rumūz al-ʿilmiyya, dedicated to Abu ʾl-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī (like himself, a pupil of al-Djawālīḳī); it is a versified work on ten subjects relating to the Islamic sciences, enumerated in the Catalogue (282) referred to, and repeated by Brockelmann (S I, 494). This Catalogue gives the reference: see ʿAbd al-Ḳādir al-Maghribī in al-Bayyināt fi ʾl-dīn wa ʾl-idjtimāʿ wa ʾl-adab wa ʾl-taʾrīkh, i, 204-17.

IBN AL-KHAṢĪB, Aḥmad b. al-Khāṣīb and Aḥmad b. ʿUbayd Allāh [see al-khaṣībī].

IBN AL-KHAṢĪB, Abū ʿAlī Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Khaṣīb al-Anbārī, kātib and man of letters of the 3rd/9th century, called Naṭṭāḥa and known also, as his grandfather Ibrāhīm had been (Ibn al-Muʿtazz, Ṭabaḳāt, 92), as al-Khaṣībī, after the ancestor of the family, the governor of Egypt al-Khaṣīb b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd, who had been praised by Abū Nuwās (see E. Wagner, Abū Nuwās, Wiesbaden 1965, 70 ff. and index).

Often confused with the viziers Aḥmad b. al-Khaṣīb and his grandson Aḥmad b. ʿUbayd Allāh [see al-khaṣībī], he was in fact only the secretary of ʿUbayd Allāh b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Ṭāhir (d. 300/913); according to the Fihrist (Cairo ed., 181), he was executed by Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir (d. 296/908-9), but this may have been the son of ʿUbayd Allāh (d. 301/914); however, no further details are available on this person, who has nevertheless a permanent place in Arabic epistolography (see e.g., A. Z. Ṣafwat, Djamharat rasāʾil al-ʿArab, iv, 362-4).

Ibn al-Nadīm (Cairo ed., 180) and, after him, Yāḳūt (Udabāʾ, ii, 227-30) attribute particularly to Naṭṭāḥa a voluminous collection of letters, a K. al-Ṭabīkh, a K. Ṭabaḳāt al-kuttāb, a K. Ṣifat al-nafs and a collection of private letters; Ibn al-Nadīm states that the majority of his letters are ikhwāniyyāt and notes that he had carried on a correspondence with Ibn al-Muʿtazz. He was also well known as a poet, and some lines of his have survived.

IBN AL-KHAṢĪB, Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan b. al-Khaṣīb, astrologer who lived in the 2nd/8-9th century, in the circle of the Barmakids (cf. in Ibn al-Ḳifṭī the mention of a Kitāb al-Manthūr dedicated to Yaḥyā b. Khālid). He was known in Europe under the name of "Alkasin filius Alkasit" (cf. colophon of MS Bibliothèque Nationale 7.934 and Derwischt, Bibliographie générale de l'astronomie, London 1964), or more frequently under that of "Albubather" (Scheibel, Astronomische bibliographie, Breslau 1792, under year 1492). He was given the flattering description of "Auctor astronomiae perspicuus". This "astronomer", to judge by the works which have survived (cf. Brockelmann), was primarily an astrologer. Little is known of his life except that he was of Persian origin and lived for a long time at Kūfa. His learning reflects strongly this origin and the special position which astrology had acquired among the Persians. Probably of "Sabian" sympathies, he practised with enthusiasm the art of ikhtiyārāt, masāʾil (electiones, interrogationes). He made use of "lots" (sahm, pars, cf. al-Bīrūnī, Kitāb al-Tafhīm, ed. Djalāl Paymānī, 440). Going beyond the apparently scientific reserve affected by Ptolemy in his Tetrabiblion (opus quadripartitum), he enjoyed speculating on the compatibility and incompatibility of the planets, signs and houses of the Zodiac, and "lots". He also used hayladj/hyleg. He was also bold enough to predict the duration of states and dynasties (taḥwīl sinī 'l-ʿālam, an idea of Zurvanite or Indian origin). He earned thus the wrath of his biographer Ibn al-Ḳifṭī, who complains of having been misled by the falseness of these prophecies, based on the absolute confidence which Ibn al-Khaṣīb placed in the geographical dominance of the sign of Gemini over Egypt. He thus was a man of resource, with an ample supply of prescriptions of all kinds, whose enormous repertoire probably gained him the goodwill of his patrons and later the interested approbation of foreign civilizations. The work which earned him the most lasting success was the Mughnī fi 'l-mawālīd, De nativitatibus, an extract from a sort of astrological encyclopaedia to which he had given the Persian name of Kār-i mihtar ("The Practice of the Prince"?). The text of it is preserved in the Arabic collection in the Escurial, in Latin translation in the manuscript in the Bibliothèque Nationale mentioned above and in the two Sessa editions published in Venice in 1492 and 1501. Ibn al-Khaṣīb's translator was the Jewish scholar Plato of Tivoli, whose manuscript was the basis for the works of Sessa. Two centuries later, the learned librarian of the Elector of Saxony, Johannes Milius, drew attention to and wrote a commentary on the works of Albubather. The De nativitatibus was from then on inseparable from the Centiloqium of the pseudo-Hermes Trismegistus, with which Sessa linked it in a single volume (Milius, Memorabilia bibliothecae ienensis sive Designatio manuscriptorum, 199). At the end of his career, as at the beginning, Albubather's works formed an integral part of Hermetic literature.

IBN AL-KHAṬĪB, Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Saʿīd b. ʿAbd Allāh b. Saʿīd b. ʿAlī b. Aḥmad al-Salmānī, vizier and historian of Granada, who bore the *laḳab*s of Lisān al-Dīn and Dhu 'l-wizāratayn, apart from those by which he was designated after his death. Of Arab descent through the sub-tribe of the Salmān, a clan of the Murād of the Yemen, he came from a family which was established in Syria and which arrived in the Iberian peninsula in the 2nd/8th century, took up residence in Cordova, and then moved successively to Toledo, Loja and Granada. At first the family was known by the name Banū Wazīr, but after Saʿīd al-Salmānī it had the name Banu 'l-Khaṭīb.

Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb was born in Loja, about 50 km. from Granada, on 25 Radjab 713/15 November 1313, but he was educated in Granada where his father had settled in order to enter the service of the sultan Abu 'l-Walīd Ismāʿīl. He had numerous eminent teachers who are listed by his biographers and, thanks to their instruction and to his own particular aptitudes, he succeeded in acquiring a vast fund of knowledge which later enabled him to win distinction in various branches of learning and to write many works, whose titles number more than 60. After his father's death in the battle of Salado or Tarifa on 7 Djumādā I 741/30 October 1340, his talents and learning enabled him to enter the service of sultan Abu 'l-Ḥadjdjādj Yūsuf b. Ismāʿīl as secretary, under the administrative and technical direction of the vizier Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. al-Djayyāb; when the latter died of the plague in the middle of Shawwāl 749/mid-January 1349, Ibn Khaṭīb was appointed to the office of kātib al-inshāʾ, head of the royal chancellery, with the title of vizier; he retained this office in the reign of Muḥammad V al-Ghanī bi-'llāh who raised his rank, and it was then that he assumed the title of Dhu 'l-wizāratayn. After Muḥammad V's deposition (760/1358-9), Ibn al-Khaṭīb's fortune changed for some years; the ḥādjib Riḍwān, the protector of Ibn Khaṭīb, who had enjoyed great influence and authority in that sovereign's reign before his fall, was assassinated, Lisān al-Dīn was put in prison, and it was only as a result of the intervention of his friend Ibn Marzūḳ, secretary of the Marīnid sultan Abū Sālim, that he regained his freedom and was permitted to go to Morocco, accompanying the dethroned sovereign into exile. He travelled throughout the territory of the Marīnids and finally settled in Salé where he acquired estates and wrote some of his works (see A. M. al-ʿAbbādī, Muʾallafāt Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb fi 'l-Maghrib, in Hespéris, xlvi (1959), 247-53). When Muḥammad V was restored to the throne in Djumādā II 763/March-April 1362, Ibn al-Khaṭīb returned to Granada where he was restored to the office of vizier and became the chief dignitary of the court. But some years later, finding himself the victim of intrigues and fearing the worst, he seized the opportunity provided by a tour of inspection of fortresses in the western part of the kingdom of Granada to cross over to Ceuta and, from there, to Tlemcen (773/1371-2), where he was very favourably received by the sultan Abū Fāris ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz; throughout the short reign of his son and successor Abū Zayyān Muḥammad al-Saʿīd (a minor), he was safe from the demands of Muḥammad V that he should be sent to Granada for trial, for he had been unjustly accused of heresy, among other crimes, as a result of the calumnies of his influential rivals in Granada, especially the ḳāḍī al-Nubāhī and the vizier Ibn Zamrak. When Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was dethroned, Abu 'l-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Abī Sālim was proclaimed his successor; then for a short time, through the hostility of one of his enemies, Sulaymān b. Dāwud, who held important offices at the Marīnid court, Ibn al-Khāṭīb experienced the harshest days of his life. Cast into prison, he was brought to trial, through the influence of Ibn Zamrak, who had succeeded him as chief minister of Granada and who had elected to be his accuser, before a private court set up for this purpose, and, although no conclusive sentence seems to have been pronounced in spite of the wishes of those who were in favour of his execution, he was put to death at the instigation of Sulaymān b. Dāwūd, being strangled in prison, at the end of 776/May-June 1375.

Ibn al-Khaṭīb was the greatest Muslim writer of Granada and an almost unparalleled source for knowledge of the history and culture of the end of the 7th/13th and of the greater part of the 8th/14th century. He distinguished himself in almost all branches of learning and wrote works on history, poetry, medicine, adab and mystico-philosophic subjects. The chancellery correspondence that came from his pen, in its beauty of style, represents, in the words of one author "a marvel of literature"; there is a specimen of it in the Rayḥānat al-kuttāb wa-nuʿdjat al-muntāb, from which M. Gaspar y Remiro published and translated various texts in his Correspondencia diplomática entre Granada y Fez (siglo XIV). Extractos de la «Raihana Alcuttab» ... (Mss. de la Bibl. del Escorial), Granada 1916. His journeys as ambassador to the Marīnid sultans and during his exile in Morocco as well as in his capacity of overseer of fortresses in the kingdom of Granada and also in other circumstances gave him the opportunity to write various *riḥla*s, *risāla*s and *maḳāma*s which have enjoyed a well-deserved reputation (for some of these, see A. M. al-ʿAbbādī, Mushāhadāt Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb fī bilād al-Maghrib wa 'l-Andalus (Madjmūʿa min rasāʾili-hi), Alexandria 1958, who re-publishes the Khaṭrat al-ṭayf fī riḥlat al-shitāʾ wa 'l-ṣayf; Mufākharāt Mālaḳa wa-Salā, translated, from the text of Müller in his Beiträge, i, 1-13, under the title El "Parangón entre Málaga y Salé", by E. García Gómez, in al-Andalus, ii (1934), 183-96; and Miʿyār al-ikhtibār fī-dhikr al-maʿāhid wa 'l-diyār, edited earlier by Simonet, in Descripción del reino de Granada bajo la dominación de los naseritas, Madrid 1861, and by Müller in his Beiträge, i, 45-100; finally, ʿAbbādī gives for the first time an edition of a Riḥla of Lisān al-Dīn across the Maghrib taken from the K. Nufāḍat al-djirāb fī ʿulālat al-ightirāb (ms. Escorial 1755), the whole preceded by an introduction and accompanied by notes and a bibliography, all helpful).

Ibn al-Khaṭīb is also the author of medical works such as al-Maʿlūma and the Risāla fī takwīn (takawwun?) al-djanīn (cf. Renaud, in Hespéris, xix (1942-5), 97 ff., xxxiii (1946), 213 ff.) and of an anthology of poetry entitled Djaysh al-tawshīḥ (cf. Stern, Two anthologies of muwaššaḥ poetry: Ibn al-Ḫaṭīb's ..., in Arabica, ii (1955), 151-69), without counting the poems of his own composition which occur in his works. Pending the completion of Mme. Arié's thesis on the writings of Ibn al-Khaṭīb, the most complete list of his works is that given by al-Maḳḳarī in the final sections of the Nafḥ al-ṭīb, to which one must refer for everything relating to this great figure of the politics and literature of Granada (see also Ibn Khaldūn; Pons Boigues, Ensayo, 334-47, no. 294; and Brockelmann, II, 260-3 and S II, 372).

In spite of Ibn al-Khaṭīb's large corpus of writings, which also include certain works on mystico-philosophic subjects such as the Rawḍat al-taʿrīf bi 'l-ḥubb al-sharīf (ms. Damascus Ẓāhiriyya, taṣawwuf 85) and others (see ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbd Allāh, al-Falsafa wa 'l-akhlāḳ ʿind Ibn al-Khaṭīb, Tetuan 1953 and, lastly, Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr al-Ṭiṭṭawānī, Ibn al-Khaṭīb min khilāl kutubih, which have no apparatus criticus), it is above all as an historian that he is renowned. In this field of writing, we may select in particular: (1) al-Iḥāṭa fī taʾrīkh (var. akhbār) Gharnāṭa, a long monograph on Granada divided into two parts containing the description of the town and the biographies of celebrated personages, including the *amīr*s, who were born or lived in Granada or who visited it, with most interesting historical notes, in some cases unique; only a number of incomplete editions have appeared: Cairo 1319/1901-2, 2 vols., very imperfect; Cairo 1955, one vol. by ʿAbd Allāh ʿInān (on this ed. and the surviving mss. of the Iḥāṭa, see, in addition to the editor's introd., MIDEO, iii (1956), 324-8). (2) al-Lamḥa al-badriyya fi 'l-dawla al-naṣriyya (Casiri has given long extracts from this, as well as from the Iḥāṭa, together with a Latin trans., in his Bibliotheca, ii, 71 ff., 177-246, 246-319. A fairly acceptable edition of the Lamḥa was published in Cairo in 1347/1928-9; I. S. Allouche translated some chapters from it in his article La vie économique et sociale à Grenade au XIVe siècle, in Mél. d'hist. et d'archéol.: Hommage à G. Marçais, Algiers 1957, ii, 7-12). This work of Ibn al-Khaṭīb presents a panorama of the civilization of Granada, with biographies of the Naṣrid sovereigns, from approximately 628 to 765/1230 to 1363. (3) Aʿmāl al-aʿlām fī-man būyiʿa ḳabl al-iḥtilām min mulūk al-Islām, one of the last works written by Ibn al-Khaṭīb, in 774 and 776/1372-4 (partial ed. by Ḥ. Ḥ. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb, in Centenario M. Amari, ii (1910), 427-82 (trans. R. Castrillo, El Africa del Norte en el «Aʿmāl al-Aʿlām» de Ibn al-Jaṭīb, Madrid 1958) and E. Lévi-Provençal, Histoire de l'Espagne musulmane extraite du «Kitāb Aʿmāl al-Aʿlām», Rabat 1934, ²Beirut 1956; partial ed. by A. M. al-ʿAbbādī and M. I. al-Kattānī, al-Maghrib al-ʿarabī fi 'l-ʿaṣr al-wasīṭ, Casablanca 1964). This is an unfinished history of Islam, the first part of which is devoted to the East, the second to Muslim Spain, and the third to North Africa and Sicily.

IBN KHĀTIMA, Abū Djaʿfar Aḥmad b. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Khātima al-Anṣārī, man of letters, poet, historian and grammarian of al-Andalus. Born at an unknown date in Almeria, where he spent the greater part of his life, he died in 770/1369. An intimate friend of Lisān al-Dīn Ibn al-Khaṭīb, he associated with the most eminent personages in the kingdom of Granada, but he does not appear to have held any office other than that of kātib and muḳriʾ at the mosque of Almeria. His teachers included Abu 'l-Barakāt al-Balāfiḳī, Ibn Luyūn, Ibn Djābir, Ibn Shuʿayb and Ibn Farkūn. Held in high esteem in his own lifetime, he is the author of works of merit in various fields. Those known are:

1. Taḥṣīl al-gharaḍ al-ḳāṣid fī tafṣīl al-maraḍ al-wāfid, on the outbreak of the plague which occurred in 749-50/1348-9. In medicine, Ibn Khātima studied epidemics in general, and the causes and effects of that of 749-50 in the town of Almeria in particular; mss: Berlin 6369, Escorial (Derenbourg, no. 1785); German trans. Taha Dinanah, in Arch. für Gesch. d. Med., xx (1926), 27-81; Spanish trans., from the German text, of the medical part by J. Fernández Martínez, in Actualidad medica (Granada), 403-4 (1958), 449-512, 566-88.

2. Maziyyat al-Mariyya ʿalā ghayrihā min al-bilād al-andalusiyya; this work, of a historical character, is lost, but it is often quoted as a source by Ibn al-Khāṭīb, al-Maḳḳarī, Ibn al-Ḳāḍī and other historians of the period.

3. Dīwān; autograph ms. Escorial (Derenbourg 381), divided into five parts: (a) fi 'l-madḥ wa 'l-thanāʾ; (b) fi 'l-nasīb wa 'l-ghazal; (c) fi'l-mulaḥ wa 'l-fukāhāt; (d) fi 'l-waṣāyā wa 'l-ḥikam; (e) muwashshaḥāt; study and Spanish trans. of the dīwān by S. Gibert (thesis, Madrid 1951). There is another ms. in Rabat, Bibl. Générale, no. 269.

4. Kitāb rāʾiḳ al-taḥliya fī fāʾiḳ al-tawriya; a collection of poems of Ibn Khātima containing tawriyas [see bayān], compiled by one of his pupils named Ibn Zarḳala; mss: Escorial (Derenbourg, no. 419), Bibl. Nat. Paris (Blochet, no. 5749), Rabat (Catal. 1958, no. 1826); study and comm. on this work by S. Gibert in Etudes d'orientalisme ... Lévi-Provençal, Paris 1962, 543-57.

5. al-Faṣl al-ʿādil bayn al-raḳīb wa 'l-wāshī wa 'l-ādhil, a short treatise in rhyming prose on the distinction between the spy, the informer and the censor; ed. and trans. S. Gibert, in al-Andalus, xviii (1954), 1-16.

6. Īrād al-laʾāl fī anshād al-ḍawāl(l), a résumé of a treatise on philology by al-Zubaydī and Ibn Makkī of Cordova with a commentary by Ibn Hishām and arranged in order by Ibn Hānī al-Sabtī; ed. and comm. by G. S. Colin, in Hespéris, xii (1931), 1-32.

In his Nayl al-ibtihādj (Cairo 1350/72), Aḥmad Bābā gives the title of another work of Ibn Khātima, on some questions of grammar, Ilḥāḳ al-ʿaḳl bi 'l-ḥiss, of which nothing further is known.

The National Library of Madrid (ms. 511 gg. 390 Cat. Guillén Robles) possesses a poem of Ibn Khātima that is also included in his Dīwān; it is a takhmīs of a poem of Ibn al-Khaymī of mystical character.

IBN KHAṬṬĀB [see al-khaṭṭābī].

IBN KHAYR AL-ISHBĪLĪ, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Khayr b. ʿUmar b. Khalīfa al-Lamtūnī al-Amawī, philologian and traditionist of Seville, where he was born in 502/1108. He became imām of the mosque at Cordova, and died in that city in 575/1179. Ibn Khayr, who studied under many teachers in different regions of al-Andalus, owes his fame to the catalogue (fahrasa [q.v.]) of the works which he had read and of the teachers who had given him their idjāza at Seville, Cordova, Almería, Malaga, Granada, etc. This work, called Fahrasat mā rawāhu ʿan shuyūkhi-hi min al-dawāwīn al-muṣannafa fī durūb al-ʿilm wa-anwāʿ al-maʿārif, was published in Saragossa in 1894-5 by J. Ribera y Tarragó (2 vols., as vols. ix-x of the BAH) under the title Index librorum de diversis scientiarum ordinibus quos a magistris didicit. After an introduction studded with ḥadīths, the author enumerates the works he has studied on Ḳurʾānic sciences (readings, abrogating and abrogated verses, commentary), goes on to ḥadīth, to which he devotes much space, together with the siyar and the ansāb, then to Mālikī fiḳh. Next come grammar, lexicography, adab, poetry. Finally, he lists the fahrasas which preceded his own. For each discipline he quotes the names of his masters, classifying them by region, but gives hardly any biographical information on them. This catalogue is a most important document for the study of the works known and taught in the author's day in Muslim Spain (see H. Pérès, Poésie andalouse, 28 ff.). Ibn Khayr in his turn had a great many pupils, a list of whom occupied, it is said, ten thirty-page notebooks.

IBN AL-KHAYYĀṬ, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. Manṣūr, known as Ibn al-Khayyāṭ, grammarian, a native of Samarḳand who lived in Baṣra and Baghdād. In Baghdād he is said to have quarrelled over grammatical matters with al-Zadjdjādj (d. 316/928 [q.v.]). Among his pupils are mentioned Abu 'l-Ḳāsim al-Zadjdjādjī and Abū ʿAlī al-Fārisī. The latter, in a reply to Sayf al-Dawla, denied having tried to denigrate Ibn al-Khayyāṭ (see Yāḳūt); and from this we learn also that at a certain period of his life the grammarian became afflicted by complete deafness. But Yāḳūt also depicts Ibn al-Khayyāṭ as endowed with a splendid physique and as being a pleasant companion. He died at Baṣra in 320/932.

Apart from the K. Maʿāni 'l-Ḳur'ān, all the works attributed to Ibn al-Khayyāṭ are concerned with Arabic grammar: al-Naḥw al-kabīr, al-Mūdjaz fi 'l-naḥw, al-Muḳniʿ fi 'l-naḥw. Since the time of the Fihrist (77 and 81), this grammarian has been classed mimman khalaṭa 'l-madhhabayn, "among those who combine the two systems" of grammar: those of Baṣra and of Kūfa. But this should not be misinterpreted: it means that, while using the Baṣran method on certain points, he adopted certain Kūfan view-points, but not that he adopted a mixed grammatical system, since, properly speaking, there did not exist an eclectic grammatical system of grammar at Baghdād.

Bibliography: Ibn al-Khayyāṭ is not mentioned in Brockelmann. All the references given in Kaḥḥāla, ix, 23, add nothing to Yāḳūt, Muʿdjam al-udabā', xvii, 141-2 = Irshād, vi, 283-4. See also an anecdote in Zubaydī, Ṭabaḳāt, Cairo 1373/1954, 75-6. (ED.)

IBN AL-KHAYYĀṬ, ABU 'L-ḤASAN ʿALĪ B. MUḤAMMAD AL-RABAʿĪ, Arab poet who lived for almost half a century at the court of the Kalbī amīrs of Sicily, to whom the government on the island had been entrusted by the Fāṭimids in 337/948 [see ṢIḲILLIYA].

Practically nothing is known of the life of Ibn al-Khayyāṭ at Palermo, and indeed all traces of his activity as a poet at the court of the last representatives of the Banū Kalb (until 431/1040) would have been lost if Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad al-Tudjībī al-Barḳī had not preserved in his commentary on the Ikhtiyār al-Khālidiyyayn min shiʿr Bashshār (ed. Muḥ. Badr al-Dīn al-ʿAlawī, Cairo 1934) some fragments of the work of the poet, who was a great friend of his, though we do not know where and when this friendship was formed.

To judge by the some two hundred lines of his poems which are to be found in various sources, Ibn al-Khayyāṭ is to be considered as the true panegyrist of the Kalbīs, whose political actions, and especially struggles against frequent conspiracies and acts of sedition, he followed for some fifty years, that is until the fall of the dynasty, which was hastened by the treachery of the ḳā'id Ibn al-Thumna. Although it is difficult to form a judgement on the poet on the basis of the few verses which have survived, the fragments of his work show, besides his sincere attachment to the cause of the Kalbī family, a sensitivity to certain aspects of the natural background of the country in which he spent the whole of his life.

Bibliography: The only attempt to penetrate the spirit of the poetry of Ibn al-Khayyāṭ has been made by Iḥsān ʿAbbās in al-ʿArab fī Ṣiḳilliyya, Cairo 1959, 207-23 (cf. U. Rizzitano, Il contributo del mondo arabo agli studi arabo-siculi, in RSO, xxxvi (1961), 83-4). Sources (apart from al-Tudjībī) which have preserved verses by Ibn al-Khayyāṭ are mentioned in U. Rizzitano, Nuove fonti arabe per la storia dei Musulmani di Sicilia, in RSO, xxxii (1957) [Scritti in onore di G. Furlani], 536, n. 2. (U. RIZZITANO)

IBN KHAYYĀṬ AL-ʿUṢFURĪ, KHALĪFA, d. 240/854, generally known as Shabāb, was a prominent chronicler and genealogist who specialized in the study of tradition (muḥaddith). Little is known about his life. He seems to have lived for about 80 years. He was born in Baṣra, and it would appear that he was educated and also taught exclusively in his native city, not travelling to other cities as was then customary. This is indicated by the fact that al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī does not mention him in his History of Baghdād, nor does any other chronicler or biographer refer to any journey that he undertook; furthermore, most of his teachers were of Baṣrī origin or had resided in Baṣra. He came of a well-educated family; his grandfather, who bore the same name, and also his father, were authorities in Tradition. Several men of outstanding culture were among his teachers, such as Yazīd b. Zurayʿ, Sufyān b. ʿUyayna, Muḥammad b. Djaʿfar Ghundar, Hishām al-Kalbī, ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī, etc., but he was closest to Yazīd b. Zurayʿ [q.v.], who is described by Ibn Saʿd as a worthy man with ʿUthmānī tendencies. These tendencies are apparent, to some extent, in Ibn Khayyāṭ's works.

On the whole Ibn Khayyāṭ is regarded by scholars of traditions as honourable, straightforward and trustworthy. Among his many disciples were al-Bukhārī, ʿAbd Allāh b. Aḥmad, Ibn Ḥanbal and Baḳī b. Makhlad.

According to Ibn al-Nadīm, he was the author of four books: al-Ta'rīkh, Ṭabaḳāt al-Ḳurrā', Ta'rīkh al-Zamnā wa 'l-ʿurdjān wa 'l-marḍā wa 'l-ʿumyān, and Kitāb Adjzā' al-Ḳur'ān wa-aʿshārihi wa-asbāʿihi wa-āyātih. It would appear that the Ṭabaḳāt al-Ḳurrā' mentioned by Ibn al-Nadīm is identical with the book which has survived under the title of Ṭabaḳāt Khalīfa b. Khayyāṭ (the unique copy of this book is now in al-Ẓāhiriyya Library, Damascus).

Al-Ta'rīkh has also survived, in a copy found in Morocco (the only copy so far known). In a single volume of 168 fols., it was copied in Muslim Spain in 477/1084.

The author commences his book by defining the word ta'rīkh. After discussing the birth of the Prophet he covers the period from the Hidjra to the year 232/846, thus ignoring the Meccan period of the Prophet's life. The importance of the work lies not only in the fact that it is the oldest complete Islamic survey of events which has reached us, but also in the materials it contains and the way in which it was written. The author gives special attention to the Umayyad Caliphate of Damascus and to Muslim foreign affairs, in particular to the extension of the Islamic Empire. He usually narrates each event from two points of view, local and official. He pays little attention to Islamic internal affairs, but he does deal with such decisive events as the death of ʿUthmān, the war between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya, the battle of al-Ḥarra, the Khāridjī movements, etc.

This book is a very important document for the study of Islamic administration in its early years, as the author, at the end of his account of each Caliph's reign, enumerates all the statesmen, generals and senior officials who held office under him.

As for the biographical al-Ṭabaḳāt, it too is the oldest complete book of its kind to have survived; Ibn Saʿd, though earlier, is incomplete. The unique copy was made by one of the author's disciples, probably during the author's life-time. It consists of 97 folios, written in a fine hand between kūfī and naskh. Age and mishandling have made it very difficult to read. It contains the biographies of approximately 3375 men and women who were cited as authorities for Islamic traditions during the first 236 years of Islam. It is divided into two unequal parts, a very large one devoted to the men and a smaller to the women.

Ibn Khayyāṭ composed his book in a different way from his contemporary and fellow-citizen Ibn Saʿd. He begins by enumerating the men who were authorities in tradition and lived in Medina, commencing with the Prophet, then the members of Ḳuraysh, group by group according to their pedigree and their relation to the Prophet; then the members of the other Arab tribes. He then takes the Muslim cities and centres and deals with them in a similar manner. The author's biographical accounts are very brief but the significance of the book lies in the fact of its completeness and the close attention which the author pays to genealogy: he enumerates every Arab tribe, group and family who had migrated at the rise of Islam and names their place of settlement. Such information is most valuable for the study of the Islamic movement, the great Arab migration of the 1st/7th century and the history of the Umayyad Caliphate, because of the vital role played by the tribes under this dynasty. The book is of at least equal importance for the study of Islamic dogma, culture and society.

Both texts were edited, independently, by Suhayl Zakkār (Damascus 1967) and by Akram al-ʿUmarī (Baghdād 1967).

IBN KHĀZIM [see ʿABD ALLĀH B. KHĀZIM].

IBN KHURRADĀDHBIH, ABU 'L-ḲĀSIM ʿUBAYD ALLĀH B. ʿABD ALLĀH (var. AḤMAD), is one of the earliest geographical writers in Arabic whose writings have survived more or less in their original form. His biography did not interest early authors. Only al-Masʿūdī, Ibn al-Nadīm and al-Iṣfahānī, all of the 4th/10th century, provided some brief particulars concerning his work. His grandfather's Iranian name was transliterated Kh.r.dā.dh.b.h. and read both as Khurdādhbih, "excellent gift of the sun", and Khurradādhbih, "created by the excellent sun". Originally a Zoroastrian, he embraced Islam in order, it is said, to please a member of the powerful Iranian family of the Barāmika [q.v.] viziers, probably Yaḥyā b. Khālid [q.v.].

Of his father, it is known only that in 201/816, during the caliphate of al-Maʾmūn, he was governor of Ṭabaristān and that he succeeded in bringing certain districts of Daylam [q.v.] into submission.

He himself seems to have been born in Khurāsān; as to the dates of his birth and death there is some disagreement: the years 205/820 and 211/825 have been suggested for the former and 300/911 for the latter. He grew up apparently in Baghdād, in ease and comfort, and received an excellent literary and artistic education from teachers of the standing of Isḥāḳ al-Mawṣilī [q.v.]. He is said to have had a marked propensity for knowledge and study.

When he reached manhood, his principal career was at first as Director of Posts and Intelligence (ṣāḥib al-barīd wa 'l-khabar) in the province of Djibāl [q.v.], subsequently being promoted to the office of director-general of the same department in Baghdād and later in Sāmarrā. In this capacity he had access to the caliph al-Muʿtamid and soon became his familiar and friend, taking part in his diversions and sharing his taste for entertainment, secular literature and the arts.

This turn of mind, his Iranian origins and the requirements of his professional career are all reflected in his literary works. A list of them, apparently incomplete, is given by Ibn al-Nadīm, according to whom he wrote the following works: 1. Adab al-samāʿ (correct behaviour when listening to singing and music); 2. Kitāb al-Ṭabīkh (on the culinary art); 3. Kitāb al-Sharāb (on drinking); 4. Kitāb al-Nudamāʾ wa'l-djulasāʾ (on boon-companions and fellow revellers); 5. Kitāb al-Anwāʾ [q.v.]. None of these five works has survived. 6. Kitāb al-Lahw wa'l-malāhī, edited from the unique manuscript by I. A. Khalifé (Beirut 1964); it is presumably to this work that al-Maʿarrī [q.v.] is alluding in his Risālat al-Ghufrān when he speaks of the "classes of singers" (ṭabaḳāt al-mughannīn). In this book he treats of music and musicians, borrowing the basic technical vocabulary from Persian and giving allegedly historical information (which al-Iṣfahānī considered to be unacceptable). Al-Masʿūdī reproduces five pages from the text of a dissertation on the same subject given by Ibn Khurradādhbih in the presence of the caliph al-Muʿtamid. These have been edited by al-ʿAzzāwī under the title K. al-Lahw wa'l-malāhī. De Goeje translated this title as "Le livre du jeu et des instruments de musique" (The book of playing and of musical instruments). 7. Kitāb Djamharat (var. Djumhūr) ansāb al-Furs wa 'l-nawāḳil (var. nawāfil) (= The book of the principal genealogies of the Persians and of the transplanted population). 8. Kitāb al-Taʾrīkh, regarded by al-Masʿūdī as "the best constructed and most exhaustive" work of its kind (yet it does not appear in Ibn al-Nadīm's list). These two works are frequently cited by al-Thaʿālibī, and no. 8 is cited once by Ibn Shaddād. 9. Kitāb al-Masālik wa'l-mamālik (= The book of itineraries and kingdoms), which made his reputation, often copied or used as a model for imitation and twice edited and translated into French in full, and once in part only; it has been the subject of a controversy that is still unresolved in regard to the date of its composition and the authenticity of the version which has survived; finally, in regard to its scientific value, it has given rise to contradictory appreciations by the early Arab writers and by modern orientalists.

IBN AL-ḲIFṬĪ, Djamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid al-Shaybānī, versatile Arab writer, born in 568/1172 at Ḳifṭ in Upper Egypt. He received his early education in Cairo and in 583/1187 went to Jerusalem, where his father had been appointed as deputy to the Ḳāḍī al-Fāḍil, the famous chancellor and adviser of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (Saladin). During the many years which he spent as a student there he was already collecting the material for his later works. He was forced by the disturbances which followed Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's death to go in 598/1201 to Aleppo, where, under the protection and with the encouragement of a friend of his father, he was able again to pursue his scholarly interests for several years, until the Atabeg of Aleppo, al-Malik al-Ẓāhir, placed him in charge of the dīwān of the finances, a task which he undertook only reluctantly, but which brought him the honorific title of al-Ḳāḍī al-Akram. After al-Ẓāhir's death (613/1216) he resigned, but three years later was appointed by al-Ẓāhir's successor to the same post, which he then held without interruption until 628/1230. There is no doubt that Ibn al-Ḳifṭī had used his influential position in order to further the cause of scholarship, for during these years he gave shelter in Aleppo to Yāḳūt, who had fled from the Mongols, and gave him much help in the compilation of his great geographical dictionary. Dismissed at his own request in 628/1230, Ibn al-Ḳifṭī was able to devote a few years to his own studies until he was appointed vizier by al-Malik al-ʿAzīz in 633/1236. He remained in this office until his death in 646/1248.

Of the 26 works of Ibn al-Ḳifṭī of which the titles are known only two survive: (1) The Kitāb Ikhbār al-ʿulamā' bi-akhbār al-ḥukamā', usually referred to simply as Ta'rīkh al-ḥukamā', which exists in an epitome by al-Zawzanī (written in 647/1249), ed. J. Lippert, Leipzig 1903; it contains 414 biographies of physicians, philosophers and astronomers with many statements from Greek writers which have not survived in the original; (2) Inbāh al-ruwāt ʿalā anbāh al-nuḥāt, parts i-iii ed. by Muḥ. Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibrāhīm, Cairo 1369-74, which contains about a thousand biographies of scholars. Of the posthumous Akhbār al-Muḥammadīn min al-shuʿarā' there exist only fragments in Ms. Paris arab. 3335. The remaining titles are mainly of historical works: a history of Cairo until the reign of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, a history of the Seldjūḳs, of the Mirdāsids, of the Būyids, of Maḥmūd b. Sabuktakīn, of the Maghrib, of the Yemen; a comprehensive Ta'rīkh al-Ḳifṭī in the epitome of Ibn Maktūm (d. 749/1348) is evidently identical with the history of Cairo mentioned above. Other titles indicate individual biographies (of Ibn Rashīḳ, Abū Saʿīd al-Sīrāfī), the history of scholarship (the Shaykhs of al-Kindī), a supplement to the Ansāb of al-Balādhurī, etc.

IBN KILLIS, Abu 'l-Faradj Yaʿḳūb b. Yūsuf, famous Fāṭimid vizier of the caliph al-ʿAzīz [q.v.]. He was by origin a Jew, born in Baghdād in 318/930. He went with his father to Syria and settled at Ramla, becoming an agent for various merchants; but, according to one tradition, having appropriated their money and being unable to repay it, he fled to Egypt, where he entered the service of Kāfūr [q.v.], who thought highly of him and whose complete confidence he gained by enabling him to appropriate various inheritances whose existence he brought to his notice and in addition by making purchases for him for which Kāfūr paid in drafts on state land. He acquired precise information on the revenues of all the villages in the country and obtained control of expenditure for Syria and Egypt. Kāfūr having declared one day that if he were a Muslim he ought to be vizier, Ibn Killis aspired to the vizierate, embraced Islam in 356/967 and devoted himself to an assiduous study of the Ḳur'ān and the laws of Islam under the guidance of a teacher. But the following year Kāfūr died, and the vizier Abu 'l-Faḍl Djaʿfar b. al-Furāt, who was jealous of Ibn Killis, had him arrested. Later the son of this vizier was to marry a daughter of Ibn Killis (Yāḳūt, Udabā', vii, 173). Thanks to interventions and bribes, he was released and set off for North Africa. It is possible that, while still in Egypt, he had been won over by the Fāṭimid propaganda which was active at the time.

He entered the service of al-Muʿizz li-dīn Allāh who was impressed by his qualities as an administrator. He returned with him to Egypt, which he had encouraged him to conquer, in 362/969. From the beginning of 363/October 973 he was entrusted with the reorganization of the financial system with the assistance of Uslūdj b. al-Ḥasan. By vigorous measures he considerably increased the revenues of the state and ensured confidence in the muʿizzī dīnār. After the death of al-Muʿizz in 365/975, he continued to manage affairs on behalf of his son al-ʿAzīz, who appointed him vizier at the beginning of 367/August 977 and, in Ramaḍān of the following year/February 979, conferred on him the title of al-wazīr al-adjall ("the illustrious vizier"). He was thus the first vizier of the Fāṭimid dynasty. Al-ʿAzīz bestowed on him honours and wealth, and it was during his tenure of office that under this caliph Egypt enjoyed a prosperity never before attained and the Fāṭimid empire saw its greatest territorial expansion.

Ibn Killis's foreign policy was expressed in the advice which he gave before he died to al-ʿAzīz: to undertake nothing against the Byzantines so long as they themselves did not attack, to be satisfied with a vague acknowledgement of vassalage from the Ḥamdānids of Aleppo, but not to spare Mufarridj b. al-Djarrāḥ, the chief of the Ṭayyi Arabs of Palestine [see DJARRĀḤIDS]. He carried it out successfully but not without resorting to intrigue, to deception and even to attempts at assassination. He re-took Damascus from the Turk Alptakīn, ally of the Ķarmaṭīs, but when the latter, having become a favourite of the caliph in Egypt, showed the vizier little respect, he had him poisoned (Ibn al-Athīr, viii, 219, s.a. 365). Ibn Killis put an end to the complicated situation created in Syria and Palestine by Ķassām, the successor of Alptakīn in Damascus, the Ḥamdānid Abū Taghlib, who had come from Djazīra to seek his fortune in Syria, and Mufarridj b. al-Djarrāḥ; then he forced Bakdjūr, the Ḥamdānid representative at Ḥimṣ (whom al-ʿAzīz had made governor of Damascus and whom Ibn Killis hated because he had had put to death the tenant of the lands which the vizier owned in the region of Damascus and had seized these lands) to leave Damascus [for details, see AL-ʿAZĪZ]. But Ibn Killis prevented the caliph from getting too deeply engaged in northern Syria.
